The Motives which incited Almagro and his Captains to return unto Peru, were not the bare Command and Juriſdiction over a hundred Leagues of Land, for they poſſeſſed that, and much more, already in Chili, where the People received and treated them with exceſſes of Kindneſs and Service, and where their Dominions increaſed, and were daily enlarged with new Conqueſts over Countries that abounded with Gold, and other Riches; but the ambition of being Prince over the Imperial City of Cozco, over-balanced all other conſiderations; and was that Bone of Diſſention thrown in by the Devil between thoſe two Governours, from whence aroſe the Civil Wars which interrupted the propagation of the Goſpel, and occaſioned the Death of many Chriſtians, and was the Cauſe that an innumerable company of others dyed without the Sacrament of Baptiſm; but the paſſion which Almagro and his Companions had for the Imperial City, tranſported them with a deſire to return into Peru, not by the way they came, for the Difficulty thereof, and their Sufferings were ſtill freſh in their memory, but taking their paſſage over a Sandy Deſart, in which they endured extremity of Heat, with want of Water, the Sufferings were as great as when they ſuſtained the contraries of Snow, Froſt, and craggy Mountains; as we ſhall hereafter more particularly relate; and in the mean time we cannot but take notice of the different manner that theſe Hiſtorians, Carate and Gomara relate this Expedition of Almagro into Chili, for they ſay that he returned by the ſame way, and that he made ſeveral Lether Bottels, or Jacks, to carry Water, which was much wanting in thoſe dry Deſarts, in which there is a plain miſtake; for where there is abundance of Snow, there can be no want of Water: But theſe Authours confound the going with the return of Almagro, which were two different ways, ſubject to contrary inconveniencies. And farther they ſay, that the Gold which Paullu preſented to Almagro in Chili, was forced from the Indians of Charcas by Saavedra, as they were carrying it for a Preſent to their King; for that ever ſince the beginning of the War between the two Brothers, Huaſcar and Atahualpa, they had conſerved their Gold, and had ſtopped all intercourſe and correſpondences by that way. Upon all which matter, that ancient Conquerour, (of whom we have made mention in the former part) taking notice in his Marginal Notes on the Hiſtory of Gomara of the confuſed Relation of theſe paſſages; in a kind of anger makes the Exceptions following to the Chapter 135.

" In the Relation which this Authour gives of Cozco and Chile, there are many " things that might be added, and many things omitted; for in writing his Hi- " ſtory, he ſeems to have taken his information from ſuch as were as ignorant of " matters as himſelf; the which appears in this particular paſſage; the truth of " which is this: Almagro, as is evident, did not return from Chile, by the way that " he went thither, which was by a paſſage over that Mountain, on which they " endured extremity of hunger and cold, and by that entrance into Copayapu, " which is the firſt Valley of Chile on that ſide, where fell ſo much Snow, that " many Indians, Spaniards and Horſes were frozen to death; and many of thoſe " who eſcaped, loſt their Toes and Fingers, benumbed by the Froſt, but by ano- " ther way, as we ſhall hereafter declare. Five Months after which, Ruy-dias, and

" John

" John de Herrada, who were left in Peru for Agents to Almagro, paſſed that way " with their people, and in like manner endured much extremity both by hunger " and cold; for the paſſage is long, and of at leaſt five or ſix days continuance, " with hard travel; during which time they wanted Proviſions very much, be- " cauſe the Indians, which carried them, were frozen to death: And yet they " paſſed at a better ſeaſon than did Almagro, the Snows not being ſo deep, nor " the cold ſo intenſe; howſoever they ſuffered much, and many died: Their " chief relief and remedy againſt Hunger they received from the Fleſh of thoſe " Horſes, which being frozen, were conſerved from corruption. But Almagro " (as is ſaid) returned not by this way of the Mountain by which he came, but " by the Plains, which run along by the Sea-coaſt, where the Countrey is de- " ſart, and uninhabited from Atacama, which is the moſt remote people of Peru, " untill you come to Copayapu, which is eighty Leagues diſtant from thence, and " in the way there are certain Pools of ſtagnated, or ſtanding Waters, which do " not run: For which reaſon, and becauſe they are not drawn, they ſtink, and " are corrupted, and are about ſix or ſeven Leagues diſtant one from the other; " wherefore for better Accommodation of the whole Army, Almagro ordered, " that the Horſe ſhould lead the Van, and be the firſt to paſs the Deſart in ſmall " Parties of five and ſix in a Company; ſo that the Wells being drawn by the " firſt, the Waters became ſweet and wholſome for the uſe of thoſe that follow- " ed, and were again filled with a new ſupply of Water ſufficient for a ſmall " Company, by which means the whole Army paſſed without much inconveni- " ence; but Almagro himſelf, to avoid the Deſart embarked on a ſmall Veſſel, " which was brought for him by Noguerol de Ulloa, one of his Captains, who was " Son of the Alcayde, or chief Conſtable of Simancas, whom the Biſhop of Camora " put to death. Geronimo de Alderete, who many years after was Governour of " Chile, obſerving when he was at Copayapu, that the paſſage over the Mountains " was clear of Snow, reſolved to paſs that way; and having many others in his " company, they made ſearch for the Remains and Relicks of that great Morta- " lity which happened to thoſe who paſſed with Almagro; and there they found a " Negro ſtanding againſt a Rock on his feet bolt upright, as alſo a Horſe on his " feet, as if it had been a Figure ſet up of Straw, and the Negro holding the Reins " in his hands, which were rotten, the skin and fleſh being fallen from the bones; " and this was five or ſix years after that Valdivia had been Governour there, " whom Alderete ſucceeded. And thus far are the Words of that ancient Con- querour, who made Marginal Notes on the Hiſtory of Gomara, and farther ex- preſſes himſelf in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XXII.

Almagro leaves Chili, and returns to Cozco. Prince Manco Inca demands a ſecond time to be reſtored to his Empire; and what Anſwer was made thereunto. Hernando Piçarro travels into Peru; and the Inca is impriſoned.

Almagro reſolving to return unto Peru, (which in the end proved fatal to him) acquainted Paullu Inca with his intention, becauſe he had found him faithfull and uſefull to him, asking his opinion, by which way it might be moſt convenient to return, that he might avoid the like danger as before; for having conſidered the late diſaſture, for want of credence or belief to the words of the Inca, and that he and all his company had certainly periſhed therein, had not God, who deſigned to make them Preachers of the Goſpel, and inſtruments to propagate the Catholick Faith, reſcued them by his infinite mercy from ſuch deſtruction; he therefore conſulted Paullu and his Indians; who for anſwer gave him a deſcription of the way by the Sea-coaſt, and told him, that ſince the Wars between Huaſcar, and his Brother Atahualpa, that way was rendred impaſſable for want of Water, for that the Wells and Fountains of which Travellers were uſed to drink, were filled up and covered with Sand, and for want of drawing were become dry, or yielded little Water, which alſo was corrupted and ſtinking. Howſoever, he would ſend ſome Indians before, who ſhould open and cleanſe the Wells, and drain the filthy Water thence, ſo that ſweet and wholſome Water might ſpring in the place thereof; and that according to the Advices he ſhould receive from theſe Indians, concerning the quantity of Water which theſe Pools yielded, he might proportion the number of his ſeveral Squadrons; for that Wells, the more they are drained, the more and the better Water they yield, and that he needed not fear to divide his people, for that there was no Enemy in all that Countrey to oppoſe them. And in regard that theſe Pools, or Wells, are ſome ſix, ſome ſeven Leagues diſtant one from the other; he would cauſe Leather Bottles to be made for carrying Water to ſupply their neceſſities by the way; in which manner the Incas his Anceſtours did uſe to travel over thoſe deſarts. This diſcourſe and propoſal of Paullu Inca, Almagro and his Captains judged very rational, and therefore they deſired him to order matters in the ſame courſe and method herein for the common good and benefit of all, as was agreeable to the cuſtome of the Incas his Forefathers, from whom he was deſcended. Paullu being very proud of the Commands of the Governour and his Spaniards, and that they were pleaſed to repoſe ſuch a confidence in him, in a matter where their lives and ſafeties were concerned, he inſtantly ſet to work, and with all diligence diſpatched away his Indians to open and cleanſe the Wells and Springs, with Orders to return him Advices according as they ſucceeded therein. And farther, he gave order to flea ſome Sheep, that with their Skins they might make Veſſels for carrying Water, and that Proviſions of food ſhould be made ſufficient to ſupply their neceſſities during their Journey, and travel over thoſe eighty Leagues of deſart Countrey. Whilſt theſe matters were preparing, the Indians which were ſent before to open and cleanſe the Wells and Springs, ſent Advices of their proceedings, and that the Spaniards might, when they were pleaſed, begin their Journey.

But Almagro did not think fit ſo abſolutely to confide in a matter of ſuch importance, wherein the life and ſafety of his whole Army did conſiſt, unto the bare report of the Indians; but for more ſecurity, and better caution, he diſpatched four Horſe-men before with Orders to adviſe him from the end of every days

Journey

Journey of the Waters, and of the way, not truſting to Advices by word of mouth, but to avoid miſtakes to ſend all by writing. Upon the certainty of theſe Informations the Spaniards adventured to begin their Journey in greater and leſſer Parties, untill they were all departed out of Chili. In this manner they travelled untill they came to Tacama, where Almagro received intelligence, that Noguerol de Ulloa was not far diſtant, who was that perſon whom the Marquis of Piçarro had employed in a Ship to make diſcovery of the Ports which were on that Coaſt, and to proceed as far as Chili, that he might from thence bring him intelligence of the proceedings and ſucceſſes of Almagro, and accordingly ſend him recruits and proviſions as his occaſions required. Almagro (as we have ſaid) hearing that Noguerol de Ulloa was near, wrote him a Letter, deſiring to ſee him, that he might inform himſelf of all the Tranſactions in Peru ſince his departure. In anſwer whereunto, Noguerol gave Almagro a meeting, at which they had opportunity of diſcourſe together at large; but that they might have more time mutually to relate the ſucceſſes of both Kingdoms, and not retard the March of the Army; and that he might alſo oblige Noguerol, who was very much his friend; he told him, that he would go aboard his Ship, where he would be his Souldier and Seaman for three or four Days; and in the mean time his Army might proceed in their March to that place, where he deſigned to croſs upon them by Sea, and again joyn with them. With this intention Almagro embarked on the Ship to the great contentment of Noguerol, and having a good paſſage by Sea, he ſpeedily overtook his Army, where we ſhall leave him for a while, untill we have given an account of the general inſurrection of the Indians, who, after the departure of Almagro out of Chili, revolted from the ſubjection of the Spaniards.

In order unto which, we muſt call to mind, that ſo ſoon as Almagro was departed from Cozco on his way to Chili, and the other Captains on their reſpective Enterpriſes; that Prince Manco Inca finding the Governour Piçarro at leiſure and eaſe, moved him a ſecond time to comply with thoſe Capitulations which were agreed between the Indians and the Spaniards, and which he himſelf had promiſed to ſee executed and performed, that is, to ſee him reſtored unto the poſſeſſion and enjoyment of his Empire; the which he now more earneſtly urged, that ſo his people might live in peace and quietneſs, and be encouraged by ſuch obligations to aſſiſt and ſerve the Spaniards. The Governour and his Brothers were much out of countenance at this motion, not knowing what ſubſtantial reply to make to this demand, nor how to entertain the Inca longer with vain hopes and expectations: Howſoever, not to make him deſperate, they told him, that though they were not unmindfull of the Capitulations, to a performance of which they had obliged themſelves; yet ſeveral accidents having lately happened, which had diſappointed as yet the performance of the agreement, they could not put the ſame in execution, untill they had received an anſwer from the Emperour their Lord and Maſter; to whom having given intelligence of theſe Capitulations, and that one point of them was his Reſtauration to the Empire, they could not in good manners, and in duty, but attend his Majeſty's pleaſure therein, which they did not doubt but would ſpeedily be brought by Hernando Piçarro, and prove to the ſatisfaction of the Inca, in regard that a Prince ſo juſt and religious as their Emperour, could not doe leſs than confirm and ratifie that agreement; and therefore deſired him to have patience untill the Arrival of Hernando, who would clear and remove all the obſtructions which at preſent retarded the execution of this agreement. In the mean time intelligence coming of the Arrival of Hernando Piçarro at Tumpiz, and the Marquis finding hereby a good excuſe to leave Cozco, as he had long deſired, that he might avoid the importunity of the Inca, and viſit his new Plantation of los Reyes, which he had lately begun, and deſired to ſee finiſhed; he told him, that to expedite the Commands of his Imperial Majeſty in order to his Reſtauration, it was neceſſary for him to meet and receive his Brother Hernando Piçarro; and therefore he deſired his leave for a ſhort time to make that Journey, aſſuring him, that his ſtay ſhould not be long, before he returned again to perform and comply with the Capitulations agreed; and in the mean time, that his Highneſs would be pleaſed to retire into his Fortreſs for his own better quiet, and ſatisfaction, and ſecurity of the Spaniards, and to remain in that place untill his return, where his Brothers and Companions would attend and ſerve him according to their duty and obligation.

In

In this manner the Marquis and the others, thought fit to amuſe the mind of the Inca Manco, and flatter his humour with gentle hopes, leſt being a Perſon of a great ſpirit and courage, though he had long diſſembled the abuſes and affronts, which by vain deluſions had been impoſed upon him, he ſhould at length grow impatient of longer delays, and plot and attempt ſomething towards his Reſtauration, and to the execution of the agreement eſtabliſhed. Though the Inca did not like this manner of proceedings, nor eſteem them for good ſigns or ſymptoms of real intentions towards his Reſtauration; yet not to anger the Marquis, or provoke him to ſome worſe injuries and wrongs, he with prudence diſſembled the whole matter, conſenting to whatſoever the Marquis required of him; and ſo putting a good countenance on it, he chearfully went to the Fortreſs; and to ſhew his humility and plain dealing, he walked a-foot up the Hill unto the Caſtle: So ſoon as the Spaniards ſaw him there, they made him a Priſoner, as Gomara alledges in Chapter 134, according to theſe words following:

" Mango, the Son of Guayna Capac, to whom Franciſco Piçarro gave the coloured " Wreath at Vilcas, ſhewing himſelf to be a Man of Valour, and of a Spirit to " reſent affronts, was clapt into Irons, and impriſoned in the Caſtle of Cozco. Thus far Gomara.

So ſoon as the Indians perceived that their Inca was in Priſon, and that their hopes were vain, and all the promiſes vaniſhed, they made ſad complaints and lamentations; but Prince Manco Inca comforted them, ſaying, that he was reſolved to obey the Spaniards in every thing with a ready, and with a willing mind, and exhorted them to doe the like, in regard that ſuch was the Command of Huayna Capac, ſpecified in his laſt Will and Teſtament; and therefore that they ſhould not be inſtant, or precipitate matters, untill they had ſeen the ultimate iſſue of this reſolution; hoping that the Spaniards had put him under this reſtraint, that their munificence and generoſity might be more evident to the World, when at the ſame time they ſhould reſtore him to his liberty, and to his Empire; and in the mean time, that they ſhould entertain no thoughts of the Viracochas, but ſuch as were juſt and good, conſidering that they were a people deſcended from Heaven. Thus the Marquis fairly took his leave of the Inca, but privately enjoyned his Brothers, John and Gonçalo Piçarro, and the Guards to take care of his Perſon, and ſecure him: And ſo he proceeded on his Journey to the City of los Reyes, where he received his Brother Hernando, who brought him his new Commiſſion, Honours and Titles, and welcomed him with Magnificence and Triumph; which Gomara in the 133d Chapter relates in theſe words:

" Soon after that Almagro was departed from Chili, Fernando Piçarro arrived at " Lima, a City of los Reyes, bringing to Franciſco Piçarro the Title of Marquis de los " Atavillos, and to D. Diego de Almagro Commiſſion for the Government of the " New Kingdom of Toledo, which was bounded by the Territories of the New " Caſtile, then under the Command and Juriſdiction of Piçarro, and did extend a " hundred Leagues South-East from thence. Moreover, Hernando required from " the Conquerours, in behalf of the Emperour, the whole ſum received for ran- " ſome of Atabaliba, for that the ranſome of one King is the ſole right of another: " To which demand anſwer was made, that the Emperour had already received " his Fifth, which was as much as his Right came to, and that nothing more was " due to him. And herein they grew ſo warm, that matters proceeded almoſt " to a Mutiny, ſaying, that in the Court of Spain their Services were deſpiſed and " vilified, and that they were eſteemed rather for Slaves, than for Souldiers and " Adventurers, who deſerved the Countrey and Riches they had Atchieved by " their Induſtry and Valour: But to appeaſe them, Franciſco Piçarro told them, " that what they had gained by their Bravery and Virtue, they deſerved to enjoy; " and that they merited the ſame Franchiſes and Dignities, as thoſe who aſſiſted " the King Don Pelayo, and his Succeſſours, to recover Spain out of the hands of " the Moors; and therefore he told his Brother, that he was to ſeek and contrive " ſome other expedient to ſatisfie the promiſe he had made to the Emperour; " for that none of them would willingly refund, nor would he force any perſon " to relinquiſh his right. Then Hernando demanded ſo much per cent. out of the " Gold which was melted down; by which he incurred the great diſpleaſure and

" hatred of the people; but that not being granted, he went to Cozco, and en" deavoured to gain the good will of Mango Inca, that by his favour he might " procure a considerable quantity of Gold for the Emperour, whose Coffers were " greatly exhausted by the expence of his Coronation, and by his Wars against " the Turk before Vienna, and by his Expedition against Tunis. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, with which he concludes that Chapter. But we say that the Marquis sent his Brother to Cozco, with Commission to be Governour there in his stead, and with Instructions to be carefull to secure the Inca, whilst he himself remained at los Reyes to people and increase that Plantation.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Means which Prince Manco Inca practised in order to his Restauration unto the Empire.

THE Prince Manco Inca being now a Prisoner in that Fortress which his Ancestours had built, (for ostentation of their Glory, and as a Trophy of their Greatness, little imagining that it should ever become a Prison for any of those descended from them) did by his prudence and patience of mind endeavour to sweeten the bitterness of his Prison, by caressing and treating the Spaniards, both Commanders and Inferiours, with gifts and presents not onely of Fruit, Birds, Flesh, and other Provisions; but likewise with Gold and Silver, Emeralds and Torquoises: And moreover, his communication with them was so affable and obliging, and with signs of so little regret and discontent for his Imprisonment, that the Officers being well assured that he would not endeavour an escape, gave him the liberty to walk freely within the Precincts of the Fortress. During which time the Inca received intelligence, that Hernando Piçarro was upon his Journey to Cozco to be Commander in Chief in that City; upon which advice he made more urgent instances, that he might have the liberty to live in one of his Houses within the City; the which he easily obtained, for he was so much in favour with the Spaniards, that they refused him nothing of what he desired: And this request the Inca more earnestly pressed at that time, that Hernando at his coming might not find him a Prisoner, and under that notion suspect him, and cause him to pay his ransome, and not give him credit or belief in any thing that he should promise. In which particular we shall quote the testimony of Gomara and Carate, who relate the matter almost in the same words. Carate in the third Chapter of his third Book, saith as follows:

" Hernando Piçarro being arrived at Cozco, made great Courtship to the Inca;
" and though he treated him very kindly, yet he always had an eye upon him:
" We may believe that this extraordinary kindness was to introduce and usher in " the Request he had to make him for some Gold, both for the Emperour and " himself. Two Months after that Hernando arrived at Cozco, the Inca desired " leave of him, that he might go into the Countrey of Yucaya, where a certain
" Festival was celebrated; whence he promised to bring him a Statue of Massy
" Gold, which was made in representation of his Father Guaynacava; and be" ing on his Journey thither, he then completed that which he had meditated, " ever since the departure of Almagro from Chili. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

It is certain that the Inca did ask and obtain leave to go unto Yucaya, which, as we have formerly mentioned, was the Garden of those Kings, and about a League from thence, near the River side, was the place of their Sepulchres, called Tampu, where where their Bowels were buried, when taken out, in order to embalm their Bodies; and it is probable, that the Statue of Gold which was to represent his Father, might be placed there. The Inca being at Yucaya on pretence of celebrating this Feast, he summoned together some old Captains, which remained of those belonging to his Father, and others of principal note; and at a full Assembly complained of the treachery and perfidiousness of the Spaniards, for not complying with the Articles and Capitulations which they had agreed and contracted with his Brother Titu Atauchi, likewise of his Imprisonment under Irons, and of the absence of the Captain-General, who had twice when he was upon his departure, promised to restore him to his Empire, and had failed, entertaining him onely with vain hopes and delusions. Moreover, he affirmed, that though he was from the beginning sensible of the false and perfidious intentions of the Spaniards, yet he was willing to temporize and dissemble with them, that so he might justifie himself before God and his people, that he had been in no manner accessory to the breach of that peace which had been agreed between the Incas and the Spaniards; that he well observed how the Spaniards divided the Lands of the Countrey amongst themselves both in Cozco, Rimac and Tumpiz; whereby it plainly appeared, that they had no intention to restore unto him the Empire; and that if he had dissembled compliance and contentment in all things towards the Spaniards, it was with design to secure his own Person, which without any occasion, or offence, they had imprisoned, and cast into Irons. Wherefore as loyal Subjects and faithfull Vassals, he conjured them to give counsel to him their Prince in an enterprise of such grand importance; for that his design was to vindicate his Right to the Empire by force of Arms, hoping that neither the Pachacamac, nor his Father the Sun, would desert him in defence of his righteous cause: For answer whereunto, the Captains and Curacas made choice of one of the most Ancient amongst them to be Speaker, and deliver the common Sentiments of them all thereupon; who having first made his due Obeisance unto the Inca, discoursed in this manner:

"It never was, Sir, the Advice of your Council, nor esteemed by them either "secure or decent, that your Majesty should commit your Person into the hands "of Strangers, or trust unto them for restitution of your Empire: Howsoever, "they were willing to comply, and concur with your Majesty's humour, which "they found inclining to the maintenance of that peace and concord which was "concerted with them by your Brother Titu Atauchi; from which we can now "expect little benefit, if we take our measures from the Treatment of your Brother Atahualpa, who having contracted for, and paid his ransome, was afterwards put to death. And we must attribute it to the Mercy and Providence of the Pachacamac, that they treated not your own Royal Person, when "in their power, and under custody, in the same manner as they had done "your Brother. As to your Restauration to the Empire, there is little to "be expected from a Nation so entirely given over to Avarice; for it is not to "be imagined that those who are greedy of the fruit, should restore the tree unto "the true Proprietor; but it is more probable they should destroy, and put him "and his out of the way, lest they should aspire to that Empire, which they resolve to enjoy. Wherefore since the Spaniards themselves have given just cause "to suspect, and doubt the performance of their promises, your Majesty ought "immediately, without delay, to raise as many Souldiers as is possible, and make "such other provisions as are necessary for War, wherein no time is to be lost; "for that they being now divided into several parties, may be more easily Massacred, and cut to pieces, than when united in one body: In management of "which design, we must agree to attack them all at the same time in several "places, so that they may not be able to assist or succour each other. We must "also secure the ways, and stop and hinder all intercourse and correspondence "between them: And in regard your Souldiers are so numerous, that their "Multitudes may easily overwhelm such a handfull as are the Spaniards, and "are able to throw the very Mountains upon them, if your Majesty so commands; nay if they refuse to grant them Succours onely, and Provisions, they "must necessarily perish with famine, being as it were besieged by your Subjects, who encompass them on all sides: But this resolution is to be speedily "executed, for the success of the whole design depends thereupon; of which "we need not doubt, if we consider the justice of our cause.

Which having ſaid, the Captain ended his Diſcourſe, whereupon a general Inſurrection was concluded and reſolved. In purſuance whereof, Meſſengers were diſpatched with great ſecrecy to the Captains and Officers in all parts of the Kingdom, enjoyning them to raiſe what Souldiers they were able, and upon one and the ſame day to ſurprize and maſſacre all their New-come Gueſts, and to furniſh and ſupply the publick Granaries, or Magazines, with all the Proviſions they could amaſs and gather. And in regard thoſe Repoſitories were much emptied by the late Wars of Atahualpa, they ought to be again furniſhed and ſupplied from private Stores; for which ſatisfaction and reparation was promiſed to be made to every particular perſon, after theſe Enemies and Tyrants were deſtroyed and confounded. That in the performance of this Exploit, the life, ſafety and liberty of them all did conſiſt from the leaſt to the greateſt of them, even to the very Inca. Upon which Command of Prince Manco Inca, all the Souldiers which inhabit the Countrey from the City of los Reyes to the Chichas, which is three hundred Leagues and more in length, made a general Inſurrection, and put themſelves into a poſture of War: But on the other ſide of the Kingdom, which is from los Reyes to Quitu, all was quiet, for that the people were deſtroyed by the Wars of Atahualpa, and by the ſlaughter the Spaniards had made of them on occaſion of the Impriſonment and Death of that King. In like manner Advices were ſent by diſguiſed Meſſengers to the Kingdom of Chili, who were publickly to pretend, that they were ſent to enquire of the Health of Paullu, and the High Prieſt Villac Umu, but were ſecretly to inform them of the truth and depth of the deſign, whoſe part therein was to fall upon Almagro and his people, and utterly to deſtroy them; without which there was no hopes for the Inca of Reſtauration to his Empire. The people being in Arms, the Inca gave unto the people their reſpective tasks and parts of the work; thoſe who were the In-land Inhabitants, as far as from Atahuaylla, and thoſe along the Coaſt from Nanaſca, which were on the ſide of Chinchaſuyu, were to attempt Rimac, and kill the Governour and his Company. The people of Cuntiſuyu, and Collaſuyu, and Antiſuyu, were to undertake Cozco, and there to kill Hernando Piçarro, and his Brothers, and all the Spaniards with them, which were not above two hundred in all; and Captains were named with inferiour Officers both for one and the other Army. The ſucceſs of which, as to what relates to the City, we ſhall declare in the Chapter following, wherein the Merciſull hand of God did manifeſtly appear in favour of the Spaniards, that the Goſpel might be propagated amongſt the Gentiles, and their Idolatry confounded.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Insurrection of Prince Manco Inca; and of the Two Miracles which were wrought in favour of the Christians.

THE Plot being thus laid, the Inca gave Command that the Souldiers now leavied, and in a posture of War should march towards Cozco, and to the City of los Reyes, to kill, slay and destroy the Spaniards therein; and also as many of them as they found scattered and dispersed over the Kingdom; for by the great kindness and peaceable disposition which the Indians had shewn to them hitherto, the Spaniards became secure, and without fear or jealousie of any Mischief, employed themselves in digging Gold out of the Mines, with as much confidence as if they had been in their own Countrey. The War having taken its beginning from the slaughter of many Spaniards, that were labouring in divers places, they marched to Cozco, with all the privacy they were able, and came thither on the day appointed; and that very night following they suddenly fell on the Spaniards with loud Noise and Shouts, being two hundred thousand in number, many of which were armed with Bows and Arrows, which they shot with Fire-balls into all the Houses of the City, not sparing the very Palaces of their Kings, nor any other, excepting onely the Temple of the Sun, and the Chambers belonging to it, and also the Convent of the Select Virgins, and the Shops of the four Streets, where this House was situate; and though these Houses were despoiled of their Riches, and without Inhabitants, yet their Reverence and Devotion towards those sacred places, caused them to abstain from all sort of Sacrilege or violence thereunto. They also thought fit to conserve from Fire the three great Halls in the Market-place, where they usually celebrated their Festivals in rainy Weather, intending to maintain them for the like use again, after they had freed themselves from the Tyranny of the Spaniards. One of these Halls was situate in the highest part of the City, adjoining to the Houses of the first Inca, Manco Capac, as we have described in the Model of the City: The other Hall appertained to the Houses of Inca Pachacutec, called Cass-ana: The third Hall was belonging to the Edifice of Huayna Capac, which they called Amarucancha, where now the Jesuites have their College. And moreover they preserved a handsome round Cupolo, which was built on the Front of these Houses; all the other Buildings were burnt, and not so much as one left standing. To burn the House of the Inca Viracocha, where the Spaniards were quartered, the stoutest and most valiant Indians were chosen, who stormed it with great Fury, and shooting their Arrows at far distance, set it on fire, and entirely consumed it. The great Hall thereof, which is now the Cathedral, and then a Chapel, where the Christians said Mass, was by the Providence of God defended from the Fire; and though innumerable Arrows, carrying Fire, were shot into it, and began to burn it, in several parts, yet in a miraculous manner it quenched of it self, as if Water in flouds had been thrown upon it: And this was one of the Miracles which God wrought for us, to make way for the Propagation of the Gospel, in that City, where certainly is now settled the most devout and religious society of Men that is in all the New World, both for Spaniards and Indians.

Hernando Piçarro, and his two Brothers, with their Souldiers, which in all did not make above two hundred, which was an inconsiderable number against so mighty a Force, kept close in a Body; and like good Souldiers were always upon the Guard, placing their Centinels at every Avenue, and Watchmen upon the Tower. As oft as the Noise of the Indians allarm'd them, they stood to their Arms, and bridled their Horses, of which every night thirty stood ready sadled, to make Sallies on the Enemy, and survey their Force. When they had discovered their great great multitude, but not as yet the Weapons they carried, wherewith to offend the Horſe, (which were the Creatures they moſt dreaded,) they reſolved to retreat into the Market-place, which being wide and ſpacious, was much more advantageous for receiving the Enemy, than in the narrow Streets: And being there drawn up in Battalia, the Body of Infantry, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty Men, was placed in the middle, flanked on each ſide with the Horſe, not being above Eighty in all; of which two Troops, of twenty in a Troop, were placed in the Van, and two Troops, of the like number, were drawn up in the Rere, ſo that they might charge the Enemy on whatſoever ſide they ſhould be attacked by them.

The Indians ſeeing the Spaniards in a Body, aſſaulted them on every part with great fury, intending to over-run them in an inſtant; but the Horſe ſallying out upon them, made ſtout reſiſtance, and fought with them untill Break of Day, when the Indians again reinforced the Battel, and rained ſhowers of Arrows upon them, with Vollies of Stones diſcharged from their Slings, howſoever the Horſe, (which is wonderfull to conſider) revenged themſelves upon them with their Lances, killing in every onſet, an hundred and fifty, or two hundred Indians; by reaſon that they neither carried defenſive Arms, nor uſed Pikes to keep off the Horſe, though they were armed with them; for not being uſed to fight againſt Cavalry, but onely Foot to Foot, and naked Men againſt naked Men; the Spaniards by their Horſe and Armour prevailed over the Indians with great Slaughter, who hoped notwithſtanding by their numbers to become Conquerours in the end.

In this poſture of War the Indians continued for the ſpace of ſeventeen Days to ſtraiten and beſiege the Spaniards in the Market-place of Cozco, not permitting them to ſally forth; during which time, as well by night as by Day, the Spaniards continued in their Ranks and Squadrons, to be in a readineſs againſt the Enemy, and as often as they went to drink, they were forced to go in Companies to the Stream, which runs through the Streets of the City; and to ſearch into the Ruines of the Houſes, which were burnt, for Mayz, which was the onely Food they had to ſuſtain them; but Provender for their Horſes was more wanting than Victuals for themſelves, howſoever they found ſome Proviſion for ſupport both of one and the other, though much damaged by the Fire, which Hunger and Neceſſity made paſſable. On which particular Carate reports as followeth.

" In this manner the Inca attempted Cozco with all his Force, and beſieged it " for eight Months, and at every Full of the Moon he ſtormed the Spaniards " on all ſides, but Hernando Piçarro, and his Brothers, vvith many Gentlemen " and Captains, that vvere vvithin the City, made ſtout reſiſtance, and repulſed " the Indians vvith great Valour; in vvhich Actions thoſe vvhich vvere moſt ſig- " nalized, vvere Gabriel de Rojas, Hernan Ponce de Leon, Don Alonſo Enriquez, and " the Treaſurer Riquelme, vvith many others; all vvhich, vvith their Souldiers, " behaved themſelves vvith Courage and Bravery, and none of them unbracing " their Armour, either by day or night, fighting like deſperate Men, vvho had " given all over for loſt; for having received intelligence, that the Governour, " and all the Spaniards, vvere cut off, and ſlain by the Indians, vvho had made a " general Inſurrection in all parts, they expected no Relief or Succour, but " from God, nor Safety, but in their ovvn Arms, though they killed and vvoun- " ded the Indians very much, and daily diminiſhed their numbers.

Thus far are the Words of Carate, vvho briefly relates the great Danger and the many Straits to vvhich theſe Conquerours vvere reduced in this Siege, vvherein, though they uſed all the diligence imaginable to provide themſelves vvith Food, yet all had not ſufficed to free them from Famine, had not their Indian Servants, vvho lived vvith them in their Houſes, like good and faithfull Friends, ſupplied their vvants; for by day they paſſed over to the Enemy, in vvhom to beget a Confidence of them, they ſeemed to fight againſt the Spaniards, and by night they returned to them laden vvith Proviſions; all vvhich is confirmed by the Teſtimony of Gomara and Carate, though that and the other Enterpriſes of the Inca are touched onely in ſhort by them, vvho are ſilent alſo in the account of thoſe Miracles vvhich our Lord Jeſus Chriſt vvorked at Cozco

in favour of the Spaniards, where was moſt danger, and where the Indians ſpent the fierceneſs of their Fury. And indeed the Danger was ſo great, that in the firſt eleven or twelve Days of the Siege, the Spaniards were ſo haraſſed and tired out, as well Horſe as Foot, by the continual Skirmiſhes in which they were engaged, and for want of Proviſions, that they were reduced to the laſt extremity; for by this time thirty Chriſtians were killed, and almoſt all wounded, without Remedies or Salves for their Cure; ſo that in a few days not being able longer to hold out, they all expected to periſh, having no hopes of Relief or Succour from other places, or means, than onely from Heaven, to which they lifted up their Cries, and offered their daily Prayers, begging the Mercy and Defence of God, and the Interceſſion and Protection of the ever bleſſed Virgin Mary.

The Indians having obſerved, that the Night when they burned all the Town, yet the Gallery in which the Spaniards were quartered ſtill remained untouched by the Flames, wherefore they attempted to burn that alſo, (and might eaſily perform it, in regard there was none to make Head, or Oppoſition to prevent them,) and for ſeveral Days and Nights, at all hours, they continually put fire to it, but it would not burn; which the Indians much admiring, ſaid, That the Fire had loſt its Force and Virtue, and could not conſume that Houſe in which the Viracochas had lived and quartered. At length the Spaniards found themſelves ſo hard put to it, and ſo aſſailed on all ſides, that they reſolved to put it to the iſſue of a Battel, and rather dye fighting, with their Arms in their Hands, than linger out a miſerable Death, and at length periſh with Famine or faintneſs, permitting the Enemy tamely to cut their Throats, after they had no farther Force or Spirit to reſiſt them.

Having thus reſolved, they confeſſed their ſins to three Prieſts, that were with them, and for want of time, ſuch as could not, confeſſed one to the other, and all called upon the Name of God, and upon thoſe Saints to which they had devoted themſelves; and being thus prepared to dye like Chriſtians, ſo ſoon as it was day, the Indians, who were a thouſand to one, being aſhamed to be ſo long oppoſed by ſuch a handfull of Men, aſſailed the Spaniards with their uſual Fury, reſolving not to quit or remit the Battel, untill they had totally deſtroyed them; and the Spaniards, on the contrary, with loud Cries calling upon the Name of the Virgin, and the Apoſtle St. James, their Champion, maintained the Fight with ſuch Reſolution, that the Slaughter was great on both ſides, and many Spaniards wounded. At laſt, after five hours Fight, the Chriſtians became ſo weary, and their Horſes ſo ſpent with the Engagement of that Day, that they expected nothing leſs than Death. The Faintneſs and Relaxation of the Spaniards gave new Courage to the Indians to reinforce and renew the Fight, for Prince Manco Inca obſerving the Paſſages of the Battel from an high place, animated his People, calling upon them by the Names of their ſeveral Provinces, and inciting them to renew the Fight, being, as it were, certain with the Succeſs of that Day to recover his Empire. When on a ſudden, and in this Extremity, it pleaſed God to own the Cauſe of his faithfull People, by ſending to their Aſſiſtence the bleſſed Apoſtle St. James, the Champion and Protectour of Spain, who viſibly appeared both to the Spaniards, and the Indians, mounted on a White Horſe, carrying a Target, with the ſign of his Military Order thereon inſcribed, and in his Right Hand a Sword, which, by the gliſtering of it, ſeemed like Lightning. The Indians, greatly affrighted to ſee this new Cavalier enter the Liſts, asked one the other, what Viracocha that was, which carried the Yllapa, in his Hand; which Word ſignifies Thunder, and Lightning, and the Thunderbolt. Whereſoever this new Cavalier aſſailed the Indians, they ran like Men amazed, trampling one upon the other, and on what part ſoever the Indians aſſaulted the Chriſtians, the Saint immediately appeared in the Front, to ſuccour and defend them from the Indians, who, affrighted with the Apparition, fled and forſook the Battel; and the Spaniards herewith taking courage, renewed the Fight, and killed an innumerable number of the Enemies, who being poſſeſſed with a fear, ran away, and forſook the Battel.

Thus were the Chriſtians delivered this day by this bleſſed Apoſtle, and the Victory wreſted out of the Hands of the Infidels; the ſame was the Succeſs of the day following, and as often as the Indians adventured to fight; for ſo ſoon as they began to engage, they became amazed with confuſion, and not knowing where where to go, or what to doe, they returned to their Quarters, asking one the other, what the meaning of theſe matters was, and how it came to paſs that they were thus Vtic, Campa, Llaclla, which is as much as to ſay, fooliſh, cowardly, puſillanimous. Howſoever all this did not deter them from their purpoſe; for they continued the Siege for the ſpace of eight Months after all theſe Actions, as will appear in the Sequel of this Hiſtory.

CHAP. XXV.

The Miracle which was wrought by our Lady in favour of the Chriſtians; and of a ſignal Combate between two Indians.

THE Indians being retreated into their Camp, the Inca called the Captains before him, and publickly reprehended them for the Cowardiſe and Puſillanimity which they had ſhewn in that days Battel, telling them what a ſhame it was that ſuch a multitude of Indians ſhould fly from before the Face of a ſmall number of Viracochas, who were already tired out, and haraſſed and weakned with Famine and Hunger; wherefore they ſhould now look to it, and endeavour to repair the Honour which they had loſt in the late Battel, and acquit themſelves like Men; for otherwiſe he would ſend them to ſpin with the Women, and chuſe other Captains in their places, of better Courage and Bravery. The Indians, in excuſe of what was paſt, alledged, that there appeared a new Viracocha, carrying Thunder and Lightning in his Hand, who ſo terrified and amazed them, that they knew not what they did, whether they fought, or were put to flight, but promiſed to behave themſelves better in the next Engagement; on which aſſurance the Inca ordered them to put their Souldiers into a readineſs againſt the third night, when he reſolved to make another attempt on the Viracochas, hoping that by the Darkneſs they ſhould not ſee or diſtinguiſh the Viracocha who ſo lately affrighted them. The Chriſtians on the other ſide with humble Thankfulneſs acknowledged the Mercy of Divine Providence in their Delivery, and became ſo encouraged and heartned by their Succeſs, that having well fixed their Arms, and refreſhed their Horſes, they believed, and were aſſured that Heaven had beſtowed that Kingdom on them, in teſtimony and in earneſt vvhereof he had given them the late unexpected Victory.

The night being come, vvhich the Inca had appointed for another Exploit, the Indians ſallied forth vvith furious Rage, threatning to revenge and make amends for the late Diſgrace, and not to ſpare, or give quarter to one of the Viracochas: of all vvhich the Spaniards having intelligence from the Indians, vvho had been their Menial Servants, (and novv ſerved them for Spies,) put themſelves into a poſture to receive them at the time appointed, calling vvith great Devotion upon the Name of Chriſt our Lord, the bleſſed Virgin, and the Apoſtle St. James to ſuccour and defend them in that time of Extremity. The Indians being dravvn up in Battel, and ready to aſſail the Chriſtians, behold, there appeared in the Air our Lady, vvith the Child Jeſus in her Armes, vvith ſo much luſtre and brightneſs, that the Infidels beholding the Apparition, vvere ſtrucken vvith amazement, and looking up ſtedfaſtly upon it, ſuch a Duſt, or Sand, fell like a Devv from above into their Eyes, that they knevv not the place in vvhich they vvere, and ſo returned again to their quarters, from vvhence for many days they durſt not adventure to ſally forth.

This vvas novv the ſeventeenth night that the Indians had ſo ſtraitned the Spaniards vvithin the compaſs of the Market-place, that neither by Day or Night they they could adventure out, unleſs in ſtrong Parties; but after this Apparition the Indians became ſo amazed, that the Spaniards afterwards had the liberty of a greater compaſs, and their Quarters were much enlarged. But as Infidelity is always blind, ſo in a few days the Impreſſion made by the late Wonder beginning to wear away, the Inca perſuaded his Souldiers to make another attempt upon the Chriſtians, to which they were zealouſly moved, out of an earneſt Deſire to ſee their Inca reſtored to his Empire: Howſoever ſuch was the ſenſe they conceived from the late Apparitions, that their Hearts failed them, ſo ſoon as they put themſelves into a poſture of Fight, ſo that all their Reſolutions and Deſigns produced nothing more than Noiſe and Allarms, which ſerved to keep the Spaniards in a continual Watchfulneſs, who ſeeing that the Indians durſt not engage them, they retired again to the Gallery, which was their head Quarter; and ſo often as they returned thither, they bleſſed God, who had conſerved that narrow place for them, wherein to cure their wounded, and to ſhelter thoſe who were as yet ſound and well; and for that reaſon they made a Vow to dedicate that place for a Chapel to the Service of God, ſo ſoon as he ſhould have freed and delivered them from the Hands of his Enemies.

In all which neceſſities the Indian Servants were very uſefull, bringing Herbs to cure the ſick and wounded, and Food to relieve the healthfull; for (as we have ſaid in the firſt part of this Hiſtory) there are many skilfull Herbaliſts amongſt the Indians, ſo that the Spaniards themſelves confeſs, that unleſs the Indians had ſuccoured them in their Diſtreſs, relieving their Hunger with Mayz, and Herbs, and other Proviſions, and had ſerved them for Spies, and as it were Centinels to give them ſignals, when the Enemy moved either by day or night; it had fared worſe with them, and perhaps it had been impoſſible for them to have ſubſiſted; all which Service and Fidelity of the Indians to Strangers in their Countrey, and to Enemies of their Kings and Religion, is to be attributed to the wonderfull Providence of God, who was pleaſed to infuſe ſuch Fidelity and ardent Affection into the Hearts of theſe poor Wretches towards the Spaniards their Maſters, that they would dye an hundred times, and ſuffer all imaginable tortures, rather than betray them.

After the Inſurrection of the Indians was ſuppreſſed, both the Natives of Cozco, and all the other Nations, who were preſent at that Siege, confeſſed themſelves to have been overcome by the appearance of the Virgin Mary, the Luſtre of whoſe beautifull Countenance, which darted Rays from her ſparkling Eyes, charmed them with ſuch Love and Affection towards them, as not onely cauſed them to lay down their Weapons, but likewiſe to accept and embrace the Catholick Faith, and willingly to learn her Names and Titles both in the Latin and Caſtilian Tongues; which to underſtand the better, they have tranſlated into their own Language all the Names and Titles given to our Lady, which they repeat as often as they have occaſion to pray and ask bleſſings from her.

But to return again to Prince Manco Inca, his Captains and Souldiers, it is certain, that they were ſo terribly affrighted with the Viſions they had ſeen, that they durſt not ſo much as mention them, for the very thought and remembrance of them was full of Amazement. Howſoever they continued the Siege in hopes of better fortune, though they durſt not adventure to engage, having been often worſted by St. James, who always appeared in the Front of the Spaniards, which the Indians obſerving, and that the new-come Cavalier affrighted and terrified them more than all the others, they called out with loud voices, and ſaid, Keep but up and reſtrain that Viracocha which rides upon the White Horſe, that he fall not upon us, and you ſhall quickly ſee how we will diſpatch and deal with all the others. After the Siege had continued for the ſpace of five Months, a certain Indian Captain, who was poſſeſſed with a great opinion of his own Valour, was deſirous to ſignalize himſelf, and try whether Fortune would be more favourable in a ſingle Combate, than in a common Fight; and upon this preſumption he asked leave of his Superiour Officers to challenge any Viracocha whatſoever to a ſingle Duel; and in regard he obſerved that the Spaniards fought on Horſeback with Lances, he armed himſelf with the like Weapon, and with a little Hatchet, or Pole-Axe, by his ſide, called Champi, which were all the Arms that he would uſe. And in this manner he preſented himſelf before the Guards, which were always ſet for Centinels, at every Avenue of the Market-place, which was the head Quarters of the Spaniards, and there with a loud Voice cried out, That if any Viracocha had Courage to engage with him in a ſingle Duel, that he ſhould come forth and fight with him, for he there attended him with his Arms: But the Spaniards eſteeming it a condeſcenſion too mean, and no Honour to kill a ſilly Indian, ſcorned to accept the Challenge.

But at length a Noble Indian, of the Nation of Cannari, who from his Infancy had been bred up a Page in the Court of the great Huayna Capac, and then profeſſed himſelf a Servant to the Marquiſs Don Franciſco Piçarro; for having yielded himſelf to him in one of the late Skirmiſhes, he ever after acknowledged him for his Maſter; with this Perſon I had an Acquaintance, and left him alive in Cozco, when I came thence for Spain. This Cannarian, I ſay, asked leave of Hernando, and John, and Gonçalo Piçarro, Brothers of his Lord, to anſwer the Challenge, ſaying, That ſince that Fellow had the boldneſs to defie the Viracochas, that he, who was a Servant of theirs, would undertake the Duel, not doubting but, by virtue of their propitious Fortune, to return victorious. Hernando Piçarro, and his Brother, applauding his Courage and Reſolution, granted him licence; upon which he took the like Arms which the other carried, and went forth to meet him: And having fought together a long while, they cloſed three or four times, and wreſtled, but being not able to throw one the other, they looſed, and again returned to the management of their Arms; with which the Cannarian being moſt dextrous, thruſt his Enemy into the Breaſt with his Lance, and then cutting off his Head, he carried it by the Hairs thereof unto the Spaniards, with which teſtimony of Conqueſt he was received with that Triumph which his Victory deſerved.

The Inca, and his People, were much aſhamed of the Victory which the Cannarian had gained; for had it been a Spaniard, the Diſhonour had been much leſs, but to be overcome by one of their own Indian Vaſſals, was an Affront and Diſgrace which could portend nothing but ill fortune; and being a People naturally ſuperſtitious, and terrified with the apprehenſion of ſuch Omens, they never afterwards attempted any thing of Moment, during the remainder of the Siege; nor did any thing remarkable ſucceed, unleſs the unfortunate Death of that worthy John Piçarro, as we ſhall hereafter relate.

So often as I call to mind theſe Miracles, and ſeveral others, which God was pleaſed to work in favour of the Chriſtians, both at the Siege of Cozco, and of los Reyes, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, I cannot but wonder that the Hiſtorians ſhould be ſo ſilent therein, eſpecially ſince they were ſo clear and evident to all the World, having in my youth heard them reported both by Indians and Spaniards, with great admiration; in memory of which, after the Siege, they dedicated unto our Lady that Gallery wherein the Spaniards were quartered, and where now the Cathedral Church is built, called by the Name of St. Mary of the Aſſumption and Advocation; and the City it ſelf they dedicated to St. James of Spain; to both which Saints Anniverſary Days of Feaſts are appointed, in thankfull remembrance for the gratious Benefits received; the which Feſtivals begin in the morning with a ſolemn Proceſſion, and Sermon, and then High Maſs is celebrated; and laſtly, the Day is concluded with the Sport of Bulls, and other Recreations.

In the Porch of this Church, which leads to the Market-place, the Picture of St. James is painted, mounted on a White Horſe, with his Buckler on his Arme, and a Serpentine Sword in his Hand, with many Indians dead and wounded under his Feet; which Picture when the Indians beheld, they ſaid that a Viracocha like this, was he that deſtroyed us in the Market-place. In the Year 1560. when I departed from Cozco, to go into Spain, the Picture was then freſh; the Inſurrection of the Inca began in the Year 1535. and ended in 1536. and I was born in the Year 1539. ſo that I might well be acquainted both with Indians and Spaniards, who had been actually in thoſe Wars, and Witneſſes of thoſe Apparitions, which we have declared; and I my ſelf, for five Years together, have always been preſent at the Sports and Paſtimes of thoſe Feſtivals; for which Reaſons from plain demonſtration, I cannot but wonder why Hiſtorians have been ſilent in theſe particulars, unleſs it be, that they would attribute unto the valour of the Spaniards all the Honour of thoſe Days, without making due return of thankfull acknowledgment unto God for the Victories ſo miraculouſly obtained.

Many

Many days after I had wrote this Chapter, turning over the Leaves of the Book of Acosta, I met with some thing to this purpose, in confirmation of the Miracles which our Lord Jesus Christ, and his Mother the Virgin Mary, Queen of the Angels, had wrought in the New World, in favour of our holy Faith and Religion; which when I had read, and found my own Reports confirmed by his Authority, I cannot express the Joy I conceived by this happy concurrence. For since the Delivery of truth is my chief Aim and Design, I cannot but be greatly delighted when I find my Relations confirmed either in part, or in whole, by the Authority of other Historians; for I hate the Character of being either a Flatterer, or a fabulous Writer; which to avoid, I have thought fit to produce the Words of Acosta in the 27th Chapter of his 7th Book, which are as followeth.

" When the Spaniards were besieged in the City of Cozco, and so closely pres" sed and straitned, that without the Assistence of Heaven it was impossible for " them to escape, I have heard from very credible Persons, that the Indians
" threw Fire on the Roof of that House where the Spaniards were lodged, and " where now the Cathedral Church is built; and though the Covering of the " House was a sort of Thatch, (which they call Chicho, or rather Ychu,) and that " the Fire was made with a rasimy kind of burning Wood, yet it took no hold " on that combustible matter; for our Lady appearing from above, kept a con" stant Guard over that place, and immediately extinguished the Fire; all which " the Indians visibly saw, and remained with astonishment. All the Relations " and Histories, which are wrote on this Subject, report for a certain truth, that " in divers Battels, which the Spaniards fought in New Spain, and in Peru, the " Indians plainly discovered in the Air, a Cavalier, mounted on a white Horse, " with a Sword in his Hand, fighting for the Spaniards; whence it is, that in all " parts of the West-Indies great Devotion and Honour is paid to that glorious " Apostle St. James; and at other times in several difficult Encounters, the Image " of our Lady hath presented it self, from which Christians have received inex-
" pressible Benefits; and were all these Apparitions and Wonders of Heaven par" ticularly described, they would swell a Volume too large for this History, &c.

Thus far are the Words of Acosta, who reports, that almost fourty years after these matters were transacted he made a Voyage into Peru, where he received Information of all these particulars. And having said thus much, we will return again to our Spaniards, who remaining under such propitious circumstances of the Divine Providence, were enabled to become the Masters of an hundred New Worlds.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Spaniards gain the Fortreſs with the Death of the worthy John Piçarro.

IN the 5th Chapter of the 8th Book of the firſt part, we there mentioned the Loyalty which the Natives of the Cannaris bore towards their Kings the Incas, and we then promiſed to declare, how that on occaſion of the great Love, and Friendſhip which one of that Nation profeſſed towards the Spaniards, all the others withdrew their Obedience, and renounced their Allegiance to the Incas. In the 37th Chapter of the 9th Book of the firſt part, we deſcribed the great Loyalty of that People towards their Princes; we are now to give an account of the reaſon, for which the ſame was afterwards denied. The Cauſe was this:

When the Indians, after the Victory obſerved the many Favours and Honours which the Spaniards beſtowed on the Perſon of the Cannarian, who fought the duel, they became ſo entirely affectionated and devoted to the Spaniards, that they denied all farther Service and Duty to their own Inca, and from that time became Spies, Informers and Betrayers of the other Indians, and in the very civil Wars which the Spaniards had one with the other, even to the time of Franciſco Hernandes Giron; the Cannarians which lived in Cozco, under the Command of this Don Franciſco the Cannarian, and were then very numerous, ſerved for Spies, and Informers againſt the Indians; and in all the civil Wars which the Spaniards waged one againſt the other, to that very War of Hernandez Giron; the Cannarians (who were very numerous at Cozco, and lived there under the Command of Don Franciſco Cannari,) did all that time ſerve for Spies; and dividing themſelves into two Parties, ſome took the Kings party, and others ſided with the Tyrant; ſo that at the end of the War, they ſo ſhuffled their matters together, that they all pretended to have been of the ſtrongeſt and the conquering ſide; and whereas they are naturally a ſort of diſſembling People, they all rejoiced, and congratulated the Succeſs of the Victorious; which piece of Fraud and Diſſimulation the Spaniards could hardly diſcover amongſt them, becauſe they always treated with their Commanders, and not with the Commonalty, ſo that they could not know their Faces, or diſtinguiſh their Perſons; and yet theſe fawning Raſcals, who were all of a Bloud and Kindred, conferred together, and communicated intelligence of all that paſſed in one or the other Army. And thus much I was given to underſtand from one of the Natives of Cannaris, who after the War of Hernandez diſcovered all theſe ſecret Cabals, and Intrigues to another, who asked him, how it fared with thoſe who had taken part with the Tyrant; but as to Don Franciſco Cannari himſelf, he became ſo proud, and inſolent, by that favour and countenance which the Spaniards had ſhewn to him, that ſome Years afterwards he adventured (as is commonly reported) to poiſon Philip Inca, the Son of Huayna Capac, of whom we have formerly made mention; and this matter is the more ſuſpicious, becauſe he afterwards married the Wife of this Philip Inca, who was a very beautifull Woman, and took her rather by force, than by Courtſhip, cauſing his Creatures and Confidents to threaten her into the Match, to which ſhe was forced to yield againſt the Conſent and Approbation of the Incas; but now there was nothing but Patience, for their Empire and Command was taken from them. We ſhall hereafter tell of another Atchievement of this inſolent Indian, to the great ſcandal of all the other Indian Inhabitants of that City.

The Spaniards finding themſelves daily favoured by the miraculous Hand of Divine Providence, and the Indians ſo cowed and terrified, that they durſt not make any Attempt upon them, but onely to keep them, as it were, blocked up, they reſolved at length to ſally forth, and ſhew, that though their numbers could bear no compariſon with the multitudes of the Indians, yet that they entertained no dread or apprehenſions of them; to evidence which, they made frequent Sallies, forcing them to retreat to what place, and as far as they pleaſed; with which at length they became ſo amazed and affrighted, that they would make no Defence, ſo that twenty five or thirty Spaniards were able to deal with great Squadrons of the Indians, and kill and put them to flight, as if they had been ſo many Infants or Children. For if God be for us, who can be againſt us? In this manner the Indians left the Siege of the City, being driven from the Fields, and all the Quarters thereabouts; and not one appearing, unleſs in the Rocks and Mountains, where the Horſe could doe but little ſervice: And yet the Rocks were not a ſufficient ſafe-guard and protection for them, becauſe the Horſe trotted over them like ſo many Goats: This, I ſay, is a compariſon of my own, but I have heard another, much more apt to this purpoſe, from one of the Conquerours of thoſe times, called Rodriguez de Villa-fuerte, who was one of thoſe thirteen who remained with Franciſco Piçarro, when all his other companions deſerted and abandoned him, as we have formerly related.

Sallies,

This Cavalier, with divers others, going one day to bring ſeveral Gentlemen on their way, that were travelling into Spain, I alſo remember to have been with them, though but a Youth, it being then towards the end of the year 1552; and being on the Road which leads to Arequepa, Rodriguez de Villa-fuerte, during all the time that he was travelling from Cozco to Queſpecancha, which are three Leagues, related the many ſucceſſes which occurred in the late Siege; pointing with his finger at the places where ſuch and ſuch Actions had paſſed, telling that there ſuch a perſon performed ſuch an Exploit, at ſuch a place another acted ſuch a piece of bravery; and, amongſt others, which were very ſtrange and wonderfull, he recounted one of Gonçalo Piçarro on the very ground where it was performed; the which we ſhall mention in its due place. And having made us a Narrative of many ſtrange Atchievements, he added, that we ought not to disbelieve theſe matters as incredible, for that God was pleaſed viſibly to aſſiſt, and favour us with his Miracles; amongſt which it was none of the leaſt, that our Horſes were nimble, and tripped over the Rocks and Precipices of thoſe Mountains with ſuch eaſe and activity, as if they had been Doves or Pigeons; and yet thoſe Mountains, which are to the Eaſt-ſide of the way, are very ſteep and craggy. I wiſh I had not forgot many particulars which he related to us that day, for they would have furniſhed me with ſufficient matter to have filled many leaves of Paper touching the many Exploits performed by the Spaniards in that Siege: Howſoever, in general, it is worthy our admiration that a hundred and ſeventy Men onely ſhould be able to oppoſe two hundred thouſand fighting Men, and contend with them under the many ſufferings of Hunger, Watchings by continual Allarums, tired out with Labours, wounded without the help and cure of Chirurgeons, and many other inconveniences which attend ſtraitned and diſtreſſed Sieges: And more than all this, the Reader may fanſie in his imagination, conſidering that it is impoſſible to deſcribe all the particular difficulties which the Spaniards endured, and overcame by the invincible Valour of their Spirits, which were ſupported by the ſole Power of God, who was pleaſed to make choice of this people, for thoſe who were to preach and plant the Goſpel in that Empire.

The Indians having now quitted the Siege, the Spaniards judged it no complete Victory, unleſs they made themſelves in like manner Maſters of the Fortreſs: Wherefore having left a ſufficient Guard in the City, they mounted the Hill towards the Fort, which was valiantly defended by the Indians for five or ſix Days together: At laſt one night after they had fought ſtoutly the whole day, ſo that the Spaniards were retired to their Quarters, and that Don John Piçarro, who ſome days before had been wounded, had for his better eaſe taken off his Helmet; it happened, that a Stone thrown at random from a Sling ſtrook him on the head, of which unhappy wound he died in three days afterwards.

" This was a loſs (Auguſtine Carate reports) which ſenſibly touched all thoſe " Spaniards, who were Adventurers in that Countrey, for that this Piçarro had " the reputation of a valiant Perſon, and an experienced Souldier in the Wars " againſt the Indians, and was generally beloved and eſteemed by all. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

And

And thus did this Worthy Gentleman end his days, to the great grief and ſorrow of all that knew him; for he had the fame and reputation of a generous Perſon, valiant and courteous, being adorned with all thoſe Vertues which become a Gentleman, and a Perſon of Honour. His Body was buried in the great Chapel of the Cathedral of that City, and over it was laid a great Marble Stone of an Azure blew, without any Inſcription; though his Merits deſerved a fair Epitaph, which perhaps might have been omitted, for want of Engravers in Stone; for at that time, and many years after, they knew not the Art to Engrave; nor to uſe any other ſharp tool, unleſs the Sword and Lance. At this great loſs and expence the Spaniards gained the Fortreſs of Cozco, and drove the Indians from thence. The Hiſtorians in the relations they make of this Siege, declare the taking of this Fortreſs in the firſt place; but the Indians report it to have been afterwards; which is the truth of the Hiſtory, but in other matters they agree with the Spaniards.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the ſeveral Exploits performed both by Indians and Spaniards during the Siege of Cozco.

THE Death of John Piçarro, who was Brother to the Governour, and a Perſon of principal note, gave ſpirit and encouragement to the Indians, who from ſuch ſucceſſes as theſe, were apt to conceive new hopes and expectations; ſo that they reſolved to adventure again another Battel; for though they had been worſted and foiled in every one, yet ſtill the deſire they had to be revenged on the Spaniards, and reſtore the Empire again to their Inca, prevailed above the apprehenſion of their ill ſucceſſes, and cauſed them ſtill to perſevere in their obſtinate reſiſtence. Howſoever, the Chriſtians were not now ſo narrowly beſieged by the Indians, but that they had liberty to ſally forth, and range for a League round; and yet they ſtill troubled and moleſted them, not ſuffering the Indian Servants to carry them Victuals, or other refreſhments: To ſupply which, the Spaniards were forced to make frequent Excurſions into the Countrey for Proviſions and Forage; of which they were always in want during the Siege; for though the Indian Servants ſtole ſomething for them, which they privately conveyed into the Town; yet it was ſo little, as could not ſatisfie their neceſſities. Auguſtine Carate relates one of theſe Sallies in this manner following:

" During this War and Siege, Gonçalo Piçarro made a ſally with twenty Horſe,
" and an in-road as far as to the Lake of Chinchero, which is about five Leagues
" from Cozco, where he was aſſailed and overwhelmed with ſuch multitudes of " people, (having engaged farther with them, than prudence and due regard to " his ſmall company did require) that he had certainly been taken, had not Her-
" nando Piçarro, and Alonſo de Toro, with ſome few Horſe, ſeaſonably come in to " his reſcue. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

This Lake of Chinchiru (ſo called by the Indians) is about two Leagues diſtant from the City Northward, it is a Water extremely delightfull, and which anciently, by the Munificence of the Incas, was furniſhed with ſeveral Pipes and Aqueducts to convey the Water into divers parts of thoſe Plains, which refreſhed the Grounds which were ſowed, and made all that Valley of Cozco to become fruitfull, untill Wars and Troubles amongſt the Spaniards themſelves cauſed them to be neglected, and for want of care became wholly uſeleſs. Afterwards in the years 1555, and 56, they were repaired by my Lord and Father Garçilaſſo de la Vega, being then Mayor of that City; and in that good condition I left them, when I departed thence, and ſo I hope they will be conſerved, becauſe that Water is greatly beneficial to all that Valley. But to return again to what Carate ſpeaks of the danger in which Gonçalo Piçarro was engaged, when he was reſcued by his Brother; it is to be noted (as we have mentioned in our Hiſtory of Florida) that he was the moſt dextrous Man with his Lance of any of thoſe who had paſſed into the New World; in confidence of which, both he and his people fought ſtoutly that day, and adventured ſo far, that they had been overwhelmed by the multitude of Indians, had they not been ſuccoured beyond all expectation; and indeed 'twas a mercy wholly to be attributed to Divine Providence; for neither did Gonçalo require it, nor Hernando Piçarro know that his Brother was engaged ſo far to all extremity.

Another day when the Spaniards and Indians engaged in the Field of Salinas, which is about a ſmall League diſtant from Cozco to the Southward, many brave Actions were performed by both parties; and though the Indians were many, and made ſtout reſiſtence, yet they were at length overcome, and put to flight: Howſoever, ſome reſolute Captains amongſt them, who choſe rather to dye, than cowardly to run away in ſight of their Inca, who from a high Tower beheld and obſerved the Actions of the day, continued in the Field, and fought with undaunted courage: One of which poſting himſelf in the middle of the road which leads to Collao, attended the coming of a certain Cavalier (whom I knew) as he was making up to him on Horſe-back with his Lance in his hand; the Indian with a fierce countenance, like an undaunted Souldier, ſtood ready with his Bow drawn to receive him; and at the ſame time that the Spaniard made a thruſt at him with his Lance, he ſtrook the point of it down to the ground, and catching hold of it, forced it from his hands. Another Gentleman of my acquaintance ſtanding by, and obſerving a ſingle Combat between a Spaniard and an Indian, did not concern himſelf, becauſe they were one to one, untill he ſaw that the Indian had wreſted the Lance out of the hand of the Spaniard; and then he thought it time to take part with his companion, and ſo made at him with his Lance; but the Indian bearing off the blow with what he had in his hands, wreſted alſo the Spear from the Spaniard, and defended himſelf from both of them at the ſame time; their Names I ſhall conceal out of reſpect to their poſterity; one of which was a Scholar with me at the Grammar School. Gonçalo Piçarro, who was engaged in another place, and had put his Enemies to flight, happened to come in at the ſame time, and be a Spectator of this Action; and ſeeing how matters paſſed, he cried out with a loud voice, Out for ſhame, what two to one! The Spaniards knowing the voice of Gonçalo Piçarro, made a ſtop, untill he himſelf came up to make trial, whether he could deal better with him than they had done: The Indian ſeeing another Horſe-man come upon him, ſet his footing on the firſt Lance he had gained, and with the other he encountred the third Cavalier; who before he could come to wound him, he gave ſuch a ſtroke with his Lance at the head of the Horſe, as raiſed him bolt upright, and almoſt threw him back upon his hanches. The Indian finding himſelf thus hardly beſet, quitted his Lance, and catched hold of that in the hand of Piçarro, intending to wreſt it from him, as he had done the others; but Piçarro keeping faſt hold thereof with his left hand, drew his Sword with his right to cut off the hands of the Indian; but he being aware thereof, ſeeing the Sword over his head, looſed the Lance, and catched up the other, which was under his feet. And now the two Cavaliers, which were Spectators, thought it time to dally no longer, but to come in, and without other complement to kill the Indian: but Gonçalo Piçarro cried out againſt it, ſaying, That it was pity ſo brave a Man ſhould dye; and that he deſerved rather Honour and Reward, than Death. The Indian obſerving that the two other Cavaliers were reſtrained by the words of Piçarro, and that he had ſaved his life; he immediately threw away his Lance, and in token of ſubmiſſion went to him, and kiſſed his right leg, ſaying, Henceforth thou ſhalt be my Inca, and I will be thy Servant: And for ever afterwards he ſerved him with great fidelity; and Gonçalo Piçarro loved him as his own Son, untill ſuch time as he was killed in the Battel of Canela, as we ſhall hereafter underſtand. This Story I heard from the Mouth of Rodriguez de Villa-fuerte, who was preſent in that Battel; and the ſame was confirmed by the report of many others. And Gonçalo Piçarro confeſſed himſelf, that in all the Wars in which he had been engaged, he had never been ſo hard put to it, nor never ſo endangered as he had been by that Indian.

Not far from this place to the Southward, another Action happened as ſtrange as the former, which Rodriguez de Villa-fuerte related that day unto us: which was this: A certain Cavalier riding ſoftly on his Horſe upon the way, for the Indians were all fled, and not one of them appeared; on a ſudden the Horſe fell under him; and though the Rider nimbly leaped from his back, yet the Horſe with ſome difficulty recovered himſelf, and ſtood upon three legs, an Arrow having wounded him in the ſinews of one of his foremoſt legs; the Spaniard looking about him to ſee from whence this Arrow was ſhot, could not for a great while diſcover any perſon, untill at length on the Eaſt-ſide of the way, they found an Indian leaning againſt the ſide of a bank within a great Water-gall; (of which there are many in that Countrey) but howſoever the diſtance was ſo great, that it was judged almoſt impoſſible, that an Arrow could be ſhot ſo far, as to the place where the Horſe fell: But looking more narrowly into the matter, and conſidering that the Arrow muſt neceſſarily come from that part, they went that way, and found an Indian dead ſtanding right upon his legs, leaning againſt the ſide of the bank, graſping his Bow in one hand, and his Arrow in the other: This Indian, it ſeems, had received a thruſt with a Lance, which paſſed from his ſhoulder to the bottom of his waſte; and to avoid the Horſe, had thrown himſelf into that Water-channel; and finding himſelf in a languiſhing condition, was reſolved to make one bolt or ſhot more before he died. This Indian had certainly made a good ſhot of it, had not the diſtance been far, and his ſpirits fainting; for had the Arrow been drawn with full force, he had either wounded the Spaniard in the face, or in the body; but being weak, it flew low, and ſhot the Horſe in the fore-leg. Theſe two notable Exploits were performed by Indians on that day, which was the laſt of the Siege. And ſo leaving the Affairs of Cozco, we ſhall proceed on to the Tranſactions of Rimac, where the Governour Don Franciſco Piçarro was then reſiding. At firſt he was ignorant, and not informed of the many dangers with which his Brothers were encompaſſed; but ſo ſoon as he was advertiſed thereof, he performed the office and part of a carefull and able Commander, as we ſhall make appear by that which follows.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVIII.

What Number of Spaniards the Indians might kill in the ways; and what ſucceeded at the Siege of the City of los Reyes.

SO ſoon as Marquis Piçarro perceived that the uſual correſpondence and intercourſe of Letters between him and his Brothers ceaſed, he immediately ſuſpected ſome miſchief in the way; and to prove and try the truth thereof, he employed ſeveral Indians, who were Domeſtick Servants to Spaniards, to enquire of their Kindred and Relations, and inform themſelves of the News of Cozco, and of all the Tranſactions of that Kingdom; for it was not without juſt ſuſpicion of miſchief that the Ways and Avenues were all ſtopped. The Yanacunas (for ſo they call the Indian Servants) enquiring into the matter, underſtood that the Inca had made an Inſurrection, and with a ſtrong Army was Maſter of Cozco; but as to the Particulars thereof, they gave no other account to the Marquis, but onely in a confuſed manner, without head or tail; howſoever, he thought fit with all diligence to write unto Panama, Nicaragua, Mexico, and Santo Domingo, deſiring that Succours ſhould be ſent with all ſpeed. Upon which paſſage Carate hath theſe Words:

" The Marquis ſeeing the Number of Indians to increaſe, and Multitudes of " them ready to Aſſault the City of los Reyes, he gave it for granted that Hernando
" Piçarro, and all thoſe of Cozco, were periſhed; and that this Inſurrection had " been ſo general over all Chili, that Almagro and all his Souldiers were defeated " and deſtroyed: Howſoever, to undeceive the Indians in their belief, that the " Ships were detained on purpoſe to make an eſcape, and that the Spaniards alſo
" might deſpair of other ſafety than in their Arms, he diſpatched away the Ships " for Panama with Letters to the Vice-king of New Spain, and to all the Gover-" nours of the Indies, acquainting them with the dangers and difficulties in which " they were engaged, and deſired Succours and Relief from them in that diſtreſs.
Thus far Carate.

But beſides theſe Diſpatches, he wrote alſo by conveyance of the faithfull Yanacunas, to Alonſo de Alvarado, who was then employed in the Conqueſt of the Chachapuyas, and to Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, who was then in Peru, the Affairs of both which ſucceeded proſperouſly. He wrote alſo to Garçilaſſo de la Vega, whoſe Affairs on the other ſide were not ſo happy in the Conqueſt of that Countrey, or Province, which by contraries they called the Buena Ventura, or the Countrey of Good Fortune, where the five Rivers called Quiximies empty themſelves into the Sea, and are plentifull and rapid ſtreams. In theſe parts matters did not ſucceed ill with him, by reaſon that he found little reſiſtence from the Inhabitants, for there were few or none in all that Countrey; onely the Mountains were ſo high, barren and cragged, that it was ſcarce inhabitable: of which, and of the difficulties he ſuſtained in this Expedition, we ſhall diſcourſe more at large hereafter. He wrote alſo to John Porcel, who was employed in the Conqueſt of the Pacamurus, inſtantly conjuring them with all ſpeed to come unto the City of los Reyes, that being united together they might make the better reſiſtence againſt the Indians. In the mean time, not knowing to what diſtreſs his Brothers might be reduced, he with all diligence diſpatched away ſeventy Horſe under the Command of his Kinſman Captain Diego Piçarro, which was all the force that he was able to ſpare, with an Addition of thirty Foot-Souldiers, as Carate reports.

The Indians, whoſe deſign was to deſtroy the Marquis, and all his people, underſtanding by their Spies, that he was ſending Succours to relieve his Brothers, changed their reſolution of aſſaulting los Reyes, and determined to ſtop and interrupt them in their paſſage, and to that end to take poſſeſſion of all the narrow Paſſes and Avenues; for in the Road from Cozco to Quitu, there are many ſtrait ways, which are not paſſable without much difficulty. The Plot being thus laid, they ſuffered Diego Piçarro, and his Company, to travel ſeventy Leagues vvithout giving them the leaſt interruption or diſturbance; for though there vvere many difficult Paſſes before they had proceeded ſo far, yet they thought fit to trole them on to ſome conſiderable diſtance from the Governour, that hearing no nevvs of them, he might believe that they vvere arrived in ſafety at Cozco: So at length taking them on the ſide of a ſtony Mountain called the Parcos, they threvv from the top mighty Stones, and pieces of Rocks upon them, called Galgas, againſt which no Armour being proof ſufficient, they overvvhelmed them all vvithout uſe of Lance or Svvord, not one of them eſcaping. In the ſame manner they ſerved Captain Morgovejo de Quinnones vvith ſixty Horſe and ſeventy Foot; and after that they over-threvv Captain Gonçalo de Tapia, as he vvas marching vvith ſixty Foot-Souldiers, and eighty Horſe; and ſoon after that they defeated Captain Alonſo de Gahete vvith forty Horſe, and ſixty Foot under his Command. So that on ſeveral paſſages of the vvay, four hundred and ſeventy Spaniards vvere loſt, of which tvvo hundred and fifty vvere Horſe. Carate reckons them to have been three hundred, and tvvo hundred and tvventy Foot: But Peter de Cieça making up the account of the number of Spaniards which the Indians killed in this general Inſurrection, declares in the 82d Chapter of his Book, as followvs:

" It is ſaid that the Indians of this Province of Cunchucu were a ſtout, and a
" warlike people; for which reaſon the Incas finding ſome difficulty to ſubdue " them, did labour to win and allure them by fair words, and obliging actions.
" Theſe Indians killed many Spaniards in divers parts; to revenge which, Mar" quis Piçarro ſent Francis de Chaves to make War on the Indians in a moſt cruel " and terrible manner; in purſuance of which, as ſome Writers report, he burned " and empaled great numbers of them. The truth is, about that time, or a little " before, a general Inſurrection was made in all the Provinces; and on the way " or road between Cozco and Quitu, they killed above ſeven hundred Spaniards;
" and ſuch of them as they took alive, they put to death with cruel Tortures.
" God deliver us from the rage of the Indians, for certainly they are a furious
" and bloudy people, where they can get the Maſtery, and effect their deſires;
" though, to excuſe themſelves, they alledged, that they fought for their Liberty,
" and to free themſelves from the Slavery and Tyranny of the Spaniards, &c.

Thus far are the Words of de Cieça; which are confirmed by Blas Valera, who reports, that above ſeven hundred Spaniards were killed in the late Inſurrection; of which above three hundred were Aſſaſinated in the Mines, and in their Poſſeſſions and Lands, wherein they were ſcattered in purſuit of their gains and benefits; and that four hundred and ſeventy which were ſent for Succours, were killed in the Mountains: but theſe were not all diſpeeded together, but in ſeveral Detachments, that ſo the firſt might arrive with better ſpeed and diligence; for it was never imagined that ſo much danger was in the way; or that the Indians, who were able to contend with, and overcome ten Horſe-men, ſhould be capable to overthrow ſixty, ſeventy or eighty Horſe in a body, beſides the Infantry. And though he preſumed much on this opinion, and on the confidence he had of his own people; yet not having received intelligence of the firſt, nor yet of the ſecond that were ſent, he was greatly troubled; wherefore to ſatisfie himſelf therein, and to underſtand ſome news from his Brothers, he diſpatched away another Captain called Francis de Godoy, a Native of Carceres, with a Party of forty five light Horſe without baggage or other incumbrance; not that they ſhould proceed ſo far as Cozco, but onely to enquire on the ways, and get the beſt intelligence they could concerning their Companions. Of which paſſage Gomara ſpeaking in the 136th Chapter, hath theſe Words:

" Piçarro being much troubled that he received no Letters from his Brothers,
" nor from his other Captains; and being jealous of the misfortune which then " had happened, he diſpatched away forty Horſe under Command of Francis de
" Godoy to make enquiries of what had ſucceeded, and to bring him intelligence " thereof.

" thereof. Godoy returned (as they say) with his tail between his legs, and with " two Spaniards in company with him, who had belonged to Gabete, and by help " of their Horses had made an escape; the ill news hereof, which greatly troubled " Piçarro, was speedily seconded by Diego d' Aguero, who fled for safety to los Reyes, " and gave a relation, that all the Indians were in Arms, and had burned all his " Plantations, and were very near with a most powerfull Army. The news " hereof greatly terrified the whole City, in regard the Number of the Spaniards " was much diminished; howsoever, Piçarro dispeeded Peter de Lerma de Burgos " with seventy Horse, and many Indians who were Friends, and were become " Christians to intercept them in their passage, and hinder them from making too " near an approach towards the City, and he himself marched in the Rere with " all the Spaniards that remained; but Lerma fighting with good success, drove " the Enemy into the Rocks, where he might have totally destroyed them, had " not Piçarro sounded a retreat.

" That day one Spanish Horse-man was killed in the Fight, but many were " wounded; and Pedro de Lerma had his Teeth beaten out: Howsoever, the In- " dians returned many thanks to their God the Sun, who had delivered them " from those dangers; and in testimony thereof, offered many Sacrifices unto " him. Then they removed their Camp to a certain Mountain near unto los " Reyes, through the middle of which runs a River, where they continued for the " space of ten Days, fighting and skirmishing with the Spaniards; but with the " Indians, who were their Enemies, they avoided all Engagements.

Thus far are the Words of Gomara; the which is confirmed by Carate almost in the same words, and which (if we well observe) is more in favour to the Indians, than to the Spaniards. The truth of all which is this; The Infidels having killed and destroyed many Spaniards on the Ways and Roads, became so encouraged by their success, that they resolved to attempt los Reyes, and destroy the Marquis and all his people; and being on their March thither with this intention, about eight or ten Leagues from the City, they encountred Pedro de Lerma and his Forces, and engaged valiantly with them: And in regard the Fight began in a Plain, the Spanish Horse had a great advantage on the Indians, and killed many of them; but they afterwards making a retreat into the Mountains, with loud shouts, and with the sound of Trumpets and Drums allarum'd all the Indians round, so that they encreased to the number of forty thousand: And in regard the Mountains were sharp and craggy, and that the Horses began to be tired and weary, the Indians adventured to sally out upon them, and to renew the Fight. Pedro de Lerma had the misfortune to have his Teeth beaten out with a Stone hurled from a Sling, besides which many Spaniards were wounded, of which thirty two died, to the great grief and sorrow of all; likewise eight Horses died of their wounds, though actually in the Battel there was but one Man, and one Horse that was slain. The Governour who came in the Rere, observing how his Souldiers were distressed, sounded a retreat, which served for a Signal to the Enemy, that he was marching to the Succour of his Friends; at which the Indians being affrighted, made a retreat, and so ended the Battel of that day, which was very bloudy. The Spaniards hereupon returned to the City, and the Indians to their Quarter and Rendezvous, where the Countrey flocking in, they quickly made a Body of sixty thousand Indians under Command of their General Titu Yupanqui, called by Carate Tiço Yupangui, and by Gomara Tizoyo; and with this force they pitched their Camp near the City, having the River between to keep and defend them from the Spanish Horse.

There they offered Sacrifices, and returned thanks to the Sun for having, as they imagined, given them an advantage over the Spaniards, and caused them to retreat into their City, and to give over the Fight. The Historians who write of these matters say, that the Indians offered their Sacrifices in thanks for deliverance from their dangers; and farther they add, that they continually skirmished with the Spaniards, and not with the Indians, who took part with the Spaniards, scorning, as it were, to engage and fight against their own Vassals, after they had had the Honour to fight with the Viracochas; and though daily Encounters passed between them of little or no damage to the Spaniards, because on the Plains the Horse had great advantage, and could hem in and encompass the Indians on all sides; yet the continual Allarums which were given the Spaniards both by Night and Day, kept them ſtill watchfull, and tired them out with conſtant labour. Moreover, they ſuffered much for want of Proviſions; though they received ſome ſupplies from the Indians, who were their Menial Servants, and would every Night (as they had practiſed at the Siege of Cozco) go forth into the Enemy's Camp, where pretending, that they had revolted from their Maſters, would return back with Proviſions, and with intelligence of all the deſigns and intentions of the Enemy; which was of great uſe to them, for that when the Indians made any Attack upon them, they were always in a readineſs to receive them; and it was by advice from them that Diego de Aguero, and many others who had Plantations near los Reyes were not ſurprized, before they had time, by help of their Horſes, to ſecure their retreat within the Walls of the City. But beſides theſe humane Aſſiſtences, God was pleaſed to work Miracles at that Siege in favour of the Chriſtians, as he had formerly done in that of Cozco; for that the River to which they truſted much for their ſafety, and was their beſt defence, was the occaſion of ruine, and turned to their entire deſtruction; for during the time of the Siege, the Waters ſwelled above the banks, ſo that whenſoever they paſſed over to the Spaniards, or were forced to return, they received a loſs; for that being often put to flight, many with fear caſt themſelves into the Waters, and were drowned; and yet this River was not ſo deep as many others are in that Countrey, being commonly ſhallow, unleſs in the Winter, when the falls of the Land-waters make great Flouds; howſoever, the Spaniards made nothing to paſs and re-paſs it at their pleaſure; which when the Indians obſerved, they concluded that the very Elements fought againſt them, and were reconciled to the party of the Viracochas; and that the Pachacamac, who is the God which ſuſtains the Univerſe, had forſaken their Cauſe, and favoured the Enemy. Farther they conſidered, that ſo ſoon as they ſaw the Viracochas drawn up in the Field, their hearts failed them; and that though they were a thouſand to one, yet they durſt not engage with them; all which were clear evidences, that the great Creatour of the World did intereſt himſelf in favour of the cauſe and quarrel of the Spaniards.

The Indians being affected with theſe Apprehenſions, and with a clear manifeſtation of the Miracles of God, they every day abated in their Courage, and became ſo cowed and diſheartned, that from that time afterwards they attempted nothing of any moment; and though they continued their Camp on the ſide of the River, it was rather in obedience to their Commanders, than in hopes of performing any thing to the ruine of their Enemies, and the good of themſelves. In the mean time the Indian Domeſtick Servants gave intelligence to their Maſters of all that was diſcourſed and deſigned in the Camp of the Indians; and the Spaniards being ſenſible of the great Miracles which God wrought for them, and that their Enemies obſerved the ſame, they returned thanks for all thoſe Wonders, comparing their deliverance by means of this River, to that which the Children of Iſrael received from the Egyptians at the Red Sea. And in regard their greateſt Battels and Victories ſucceeded on the banks of this River, they conceived a moſt eſpecial devotion for the Bleſſed St. Chriſtopher, calling unto remembrance all the Wonders which are recorded of that Saint, and which are painted commonly in Churches, to deſcribe and ſet forth the Miracles which God performed in the River by means of that Saint; and afterwards in all their Battels and Skirmiſhes, they invoked the Name of St. Chriſtopher equally with that of St. James: And after this Siege, they called thoſe Hills in which the Indians kept their Head-quarters, the Mountains of St. Chriſtopher, becauſe they were ſo near, that nothing but the River parted them and the City, and were the places where the Spaniards put an end to the War, having entirely ſubjected and conquered the Indians.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Flight of Villac Umu. Philip the Interpreter punished. The Prince Manco Inca leaves his Empire, and remains an Exile in foreign parts.

WE have in the foregoing Chapters declared, how that Prince Manco Inca sent Messengers into Chili, to advise his Brother Paullu, and the High Priest, Villac Umu, of his Design, to kill and destroy all the Spaniards that were in Peru, as being the onely means thereby to recover his Empire, desiring them to take the same course with Almagro, and his People, who were in those parts.

Now we must know, that this Intimation was brought to Chili, before Almagro was departed thence, howsoever Paullu having consulted with his Friends, did conclude and agree, that they were not then in a condition to fight the Spaniards, in regard that having lost above ten thousand Indians, by Colds, and Snow, in passing the Mountains, (as we have formerly mentioned,) their Force was much decreased, and not capable to oppose the Spaniards in open Field; and that such was the Vigilancy of the Enemy, as well by night as by day, being always on the Guard, that there was little hopes to take an advantage on them by surprise; wherefore it was thought most convenient to dissemble their Discontents with a colour of Service and Fidelity to the Spaniards, untill a more fit opportunity did happen for execution of their Design; in order whereunto, Paullu and Villac Umu being then together in Tacama, (which is a Countrey of Peru, distinct from the Desarts of Chili, as we have mentioned in the 22d Chapter of this Book,) they agreed, that the High Priest should leave the Spaniards, and be gone, but that Paullu should continue with them for a Spie, to give Intelligence to the Inca, his Brother, of all the Designs, which were contrived against him.

Gomara reports, that both of them fled away together, but Carate saith otherwise; for in the first Chapter of his third Book, he mentions none but the High Priest, and in the fourth Chapter of the same Book, speaking of Paullu, he hath these Words.

" Almagro made Paullu Inca, and bestowed on him the Imperial Wreath; be" cause that Manco Inca, being conscious of his evil Intentions, was fled with " many Souldiers into the high Mountains of Andes.

Thus far are the Words of Carate, whose Testimony (as we have said) we shall always follow, where Authours disagree, because he was resident in Peru, and the other was not. In like manner Philip the Interpreter, who was with Almagro, made his Escape; for that ever since the Death of Atahualpa, he was fearfull of the Spaniards, and desired to get as far from them as he was able, not that he kept a Correspondence with the Indians, for they were always jealous of him, lest he should betray them; but he was desirous to imitate the other Indians, and cast off the Spaniards, whom he abhorred in his very Soul. But this Flight was fatal to him; for not being acquainted with the Countrey, he fell into the Hands of Almagro, and his Souldiers, who calling to mind how he once deserted Alvarado, and having a suspicion that he was privy to the Escape of the High Priest, and would not reveal it, he was sentenced to be hanged and quartered. Upon this passage, though not according to the order of time, Gomara, in the the 135th Chapter of his Book, hath theſe Words, which we have extracted verbatim.

" This unhappy Wretch confeſſed at the time of his death, that he had given " falſe Evidence againſt the good King Atabaliba, that he might enjoy one of " his Wives with ſecurity. This Philipillio de Pohechos was an ill Man, treache- " rous, inconſtant, falſe, deſirous of Mutinies, bloudy, and had little of a Chri- " ſtian, though he had been baptized.

Thus far are the Words of Gomara, whence we may conſider, how lamentable a thing it is, that the firſt Interpreter that was choſen to preach the Goſpel in thoſe parts, ſhould prove ſuch a Villain. But Almagro little regarding the Flight of Villac Umu, ſo long as Paullu remained with him, proceeded in his March towards Cozco; when he received intelligence of the Inſurrection which the Indians had made, of which though formerly he entertained ſome ſuſpicions, yet he was not ſo inquiſitive as was fit, becauſe he depended for theſe Advices, on that Fidelity and Service which Paullu and his People profeſſed towards them. The way which he took in his March was by Collao, where the Countrey being open, and plain, was not ſo dangerous for Ambuſhes, as the way between Cozco and los Reyes. When he arrived near Cozco, he found that the Prince Manco Inca had quitted the Siege; for not knowing the Deſign againſt the Piçarros, he imagined, that the Intention of Almagro was to relieve and Succour his Friends. Almagro took this occaſion to ſee and treat with the Inca; for having had former acquaintance with him, he believed that he might be able to draw him to his Party. The Inca, who hoped to take this opportunity to kill Almagro, and all his Followers, conſented to an Interview; but ſuch was the Prudence and Caution of Almagro, that he was always ſo well guarded with his Souldiers, both Horſe and Foot, that the Indians durſt not attempt any thing upon them. Nor would the Inca hearken to the Propoſition that was made, to take part with Almagro, but told him plainly, That his Intention was to recover the Empire for himſelf, and therefore was reſolved not to be concerned, either for one ſide, or the other: Howſoever when he and Almagro were parted, the Indians would have perſuaded him to accept the Propoſal, and to foment the Civil War between the Spaniards, ſaying, That when they had killed and weakned each other, he might then be better able to ſubdue and maſter the prevailing Party. To which the Prince made this Reply, That it became not the Honour of an Inca to diſſemble, or fail in his Word, unto thoſe to whom it was given, and that he would rather loſe his Empire, than maintain it with Falſity, or Treachery, to thoſe whom he had received into his Favour, and under his Protection.

Whilſt Almagro was thus in treaty with the Inca, Hernando Piçarro ſent privately to try the Pulſe of Saavedra, who was then with Almagro, promiſing, that if he would revolt unto his Party, he ſhould neither want Honours nor Benefits. But this John de Saavedra, who was of as Noble Bloud, as any that owns that Name in Seville, rejected the Propoſals that were made him of Advantage, rather than ſtain his Honour with the leaſt blemiſh. And thus theſe three Parties ſtood at a Gaze, without any Attempt made by one or other. At length the Inca conſidering that Almagro was returned from Chili, and had brought with him four hundred and fifty Spaniards, though he had loſt two hundred, or thereabout, in his Paſſage over the Snowy Mountains, in the Wars, and by other Accidents; and that if in many Months he was not able to ſubdue the Spaniards, when they vvere not more than one hundred and ſeventy, hovv much more vvould they prove an unequal match to them, at this time, vvhen they vvere encreaſed to ſix hundred: And though they vvere divided by private Quarrels, and Civil Diſſentions, yet they vvould quickly unite, and be cemented again, ſo ſoon as the Indians, vvho are their common Enemy, ſhould appear in a formidable manner againſt them. And as to the matter of carrying on the War, Experience had taught them already, that it vvould prove fatal, and of moſt ruinous Conſequence; for that in the ſpace of one Year, ſince this Inſurrection firſt began, they had loſt above fourty thouſand Men, which had periſhed by the Svvords of the Enemy, by Famine, and other Calamities, vvhich attend the ſucceſs of War; and therefore in Compaſſion to his People, he would rather chuſe to give over his Pretenſions, as deſperate, than engolf himſelf in ſuch a Deſign which was every day attended with new Difficulties.

And having duly conſidered theſe things, and conſulted on them vvith ſome few of his Relations, he reſolved to give over the War; and that he might intimate ſo much to the Officers of his Army, he aſſembled the principal of them together, and publickly diſcourſed vvith them to this effect:

" Brethren, and Sons of mine, I have vvell obſerved, and proved the great " Affection and Zeal ye have demonſtrated tovvards my Service, having with " much Alacrity, and Readineſs, offered your Lives and Fortunes, Wives and " Children, that ye might again eſtabliſh me in the Throne of my Empire; " but ſince it is apparent, that the Pachacamac viſibly fights againſt us, and hath " decreed that I ſhould not be King, there is no reaſon for us to withſtand and " oppoſe his Divine Will.

" I am well aſſured, and I believe ye are all ſenſible, that my Deſires to " reign and govern, are not grounded on Principles of Ambition; but that " my Kingdoms may recover that Peace and Liberty which they enjoyed " under the gentle and eaſie Government of my Anceſtours; it being the Du- " ty of every good King to ſtudy the Proſperity and Welfare of his People; " and according to the practice of the Incas, to prefer that before any other " Conſideration whatſoever. But I have good reaſon to ſuſpect and fear, " that the Deſigns of theſe Men, whom we call Gods, and ſay they were " ſent from Heaven, are very much different from theſe Principles. How- " ſoever, for my part, I cannot, but with much Regret and Tenderneſs to- " wards you, ſeek to gain my point at the coſt of your Lives, and would " rather live in a private manner, deſpoiled of my Empire, which is my In- " heritance, than to recover it at the expence of their Bloud, whom I love " as dearly as my own Children. And now therefore, that the Viracochas may " not treat you ill for my ſake, I am reſolved to retire my ſelf, and to " live an Exile from my Countrey, that ſo all Cauſe of Jealouſie and Suſ- " picion being removed by my Abſence, ye may be received into their good " Grace and Favour.

" And now I find the Prophecy of my Father Huayna Capac fully accom- " pliſhed, which was, That a Stranger Nation ſhould deprive us of our " Empire, and deſtroy our Laws, and Religion. Had we well conſidered " this, before we began the War, we ſhould have acquieſced, and ſubmit- " ted, becauſe my Father, the King, enjoined us to obey and ſerve the Vi- " racochas, whoſe Laws, as he ſaid, were better than ours, and their Arms " more powerfull than our force. Both which things have proved true, for ſo " ſoon as they entred into this Empire, Our Oracles became ſilent, which is a " ſign that they yielded unto theirs: And as to their Arms they have had " an advantage over ours; for though at the beginning we had the fortune " to kill ſome few of them, yet at length one hundred and ſeventy onely " which ſurvived, were able to deal with us; nay as we may ſay, did conquer us, " ſeeing that in the end we are forced to retreat.

" The truth is, it cannot well be ſaid that they conquered us, nor can " they boaſt much of their Victories; for ſetting aſide the Miracles which " appeared in their Favour, they of themſelves gained no advantage over " us. For what can we ſay to the Fire, which burned our own Houſes, " and became extinct, ſo ſoon as it touched theirs? What can we think " of that Cavalier, who, at the Extremity of the Siege, appeared with Thun- " der and Lightning in his Hand, and routed and deſtroyed all before him? " And then in the Night, a moſt beautifull Princeſs appeared in the Clouds, " with an Infant in her Armes; which, with that aſtoniſhing Brightneſs ſhe " darted from her Eyes, diſmayed and blinded us in ſuch manner, that we " knew not what we did, and even feared to return unto our own Quar- " ters; how much leſs durſt we adventure to give Battel to theſe Vira- " cochas?

Moreover,

" Moreover, we have ſeen, and tried, how ſuch a handfull of Men have " been able to defend themſelves againſt ſuch multitudes of ours, without Food, " Sleep, or Reſt; that when we imagined, they were wearied, faint, and rea- " dy to yield, they appeared formidable, and refreſhed with new Vigour. All " which being conſidered, 'tis apparent that the Hand of God is in it, and that " the Pachacamac, who favours them, doth diſcourage and infuſe fear into our " Minds; wherefore let us yield our ſelves, rather than bring ſo many calami- " ties upon our own Heads. For my part, I am reſolved to retire within the " Mountains of Antis, and there ſecure and defend my ſelf better, than I am " able to doe with all my power; and there living quietly, and without of- " fence, I ſhall not provoke thoſe Strangers to doe Hurt and Miſchief unto you " for any Cauſe or Reaſon of mine. In this my Solitude and Baniſhment it " will be my Comfort to hear that it paſſeth well with you, and that ye live " with Liberty and Contentment under this new Government of the Spaniards; " wherefore inſtead of my laſt Will and Teſtament, and in purſuance of that " Command left us by my Father, I do conjure you to ſerve and obey them, to " the utmoſt of your power, ſo ſhall ye be well treated and uſed by them: " And ſo farewell, and remain in peace; and now methinks I am very ſorry " to leave you in the Hands of Strangers, wiſhing with all my Heart, that I " were able to take you all with me.

When the Inca had ended his Speech, his People dropped a Floud of Tears, with ſuch Groans and Sighs, that the fulneſs of Sorrow ſtopped the utterance of Words; nor durſt they diſſuade him from this reſolution, perceiving that he determined ſo to doe; wherefore in the firſt place he disbanded all his Souldiers, that were under Command of their reſpective Caciques, adviſing them to repair unto their ſeveral Provinces, and there patiently ſubmit unto, and obey, and ſerve the Spaniards; but the Inca collecting as many as he could together of his own Bloud, and Family, both Men and Women, fled with them into the wild Mountains of Antis, and ſeated himſelf at a certain place, called Villcapampa; where he paſſed his time (as we may imagine) in Solitude, like a Prince depoſed and diſpoſſeſſed of his Sceptre, and there lived, untill he was killed by a certain Spaniard, to whom he had given Protection, and conſerved from his Enemies, and who moſt inhumanely ſought his Life: As we ſhall ſee in its due place.

CHAP. XXX.

BLas Valera discoursing of the Wisedom, Abilities, Prowess and Valour of the Indians of Peru, he gives this Character of them, as follows; which I the rather mention, because it conduces much to the matter in hand, and will serve to confirm what we have already said, and what we shall hereafter report.

" The People of Peru exceed most Nations of the World in quickness of Wit, " and strength of Judgment, the which appears in that they have been able " without the help of Letters, to attain unto the knowledge of many things, " which the learning of the Egyptians, Caldeans and Greeks could never reach; so " that if in place of their Knots, they had made use of Letters, they had sur- " passed the Romans, and Galls, and other Nations, in all points of Learning " whatsoever. That rudeness of Manners which appears in them at present, is " not for want of Natural Parts, or Endowments of Mind, but for want of prac- " tice in the Fashions and Customs of Europe, and of Instructours in Liberal Sci- " ences, being taught nothing but what relates to Interest and Gain; for such of " them as have Masters, or Teachers, and leisure time, and liberty to learn; nay, " if they do but see a thing, they will imitate it so exactly, without being taught, " that they become better Artists and Mechanicks than the Spaniards themselves, " and would become better Scholars in reading and Writing, and be more expert " in all sorts of musical Instruments than the Spaniards, had they onely the ad- " vantage of being taught; nor would they prove ill Scholars in the Latin Tongue: " And moreover they are not more ignorant in our Books, than we are in the " knowledge of theirs; for though we have now lived amongst them, and have " had Conversation with them for seventy Years, yet have not attained to the " knowledge of their Knots, nor the nature of their Accounts; when they in a " short time have attained to the knowledge of our Letters and Ciphers; which " are evidences of their Ingenuity, and good capacity: And as to their Memory, " they generally exceed the Spaniards, having by their Knots, and Joints of their " Fingers, figured several Common places, out of which they do extract par- " ticulars in their due Order for the help and benefit of the Memory. And " what is more strange, the same Knots serve for divers Passages, and Arguments " of History; and giving them onely the Subject, they will run on with a Histo- " ry as currently as a Reader can his Book; which is an Art unto which no Spa- " niard as yet hath been able to attain, nor know in what manner, it is perfor- " med; and are all good Arguments of the acute Judgment and great Memory " of the Indians.

" As to their Art in Military Affairs, take all things in their due Circumstances, " the People of Peru are more expert than those of Europe; for shew me the most " brave and famous Captains of Spain or France, on Foot without Horses, with- " out Armour, without Lance, Sword, Pistol, or other Fire-arms; let them ap- " pear in their Shirts without Cloths, with a Sling instead of a Girdle, and their " Heads covered with a Cap of Feathers, or Garland of Flowers, instead of a " Head-piece, or Steel Bergandine; let them march with their bare Feet over " Briers, or Thorns; let their Diet be Herbs, and Roots of the Field, carrying " a piece of a Mat in their Left hands instead of a Buckler; and in this manner " let them enter the Field to blunt the Edges of Swords, and Halbards, and Pikes " with three Forks; and let them stand the Stone-slings, the poisoned Arrows, " and the skilfull Archer, which will hit the Eye, or the Heart, or any thing; if in " this naked and simple condition they become Conquerours, I will then say, that " they deserve the Fame and Reputation of valiant Captains above the Indians,

" but in regard it is impoſſible to put the Europeans in this ſtate and condition, " or to perſuade them to the uſe of ſuch Arms, Cuſtoms, or Habit, ſo humanely " ſpeaking, they will never make trial or eſſay to gain Victories with ſuch tools " or inſtruments. And, on the contrary, were the Indians armed as are the Eu- " ropeans, trained up with the ſame Military Diſcipline, and inſtructed in the Art " of War, both by Sea and Land, they would be more invincible than the Turks. " Of the Truth hereof Experience is the beſt proof; for whenſoever the Spaniards " and Indians were equal in their Arms, the Spaniards were ſlain in great numbers, " as for Example, in Puno of Mexico, and long before that in other places; for " the truth is, when the Spaniards have been laden and encumbred with their " Arms, and the Indians free and light, the Spaniards have been often defeated in " open Battel; as in Quitu, in Chachapuaya, in Chaquiſaca, in Tucma, in Cunti, in " Sanſa, in Parcus, in Chili, and other parts. Wherefore in comparing the Va- " lour and Proweſs of the Spaniards with that of the Indians, both of Mexico and " Peru, there can be no meaſure or trial made by the Succeſs or Conqueſts, by " reaſon of the great inequality in their Arms, and above all, the Invention of " Fire-arms was more terrible to them than all the reſt, and ſeems ſomething " more than what is humane or natural; and in reality the Victories which have " been obtained in moſt parts of the new World, and eſpecially in Peru, were won- " derfull Effects of Divine Providence, and rather to be attributed to the Power " of God, in favour of the Goſpel, than to the Valour of the Spaniards. But " though we may compare the Europeans and the Aſitiaticks together in the point " of Arms, yet we cannot admit of any Compariſon between the Spaniards and " the Indians, as to the Art of War, in which, no doubt but the Spaniards have " much the advantage: But to let paſs this point, and compare Indians with In- " dians, there is no doubt but the Incas, and the People of Peru, were much the " better Souldiers; of which they have given us ſufficient Teſtimonies by the " many Conqueſts they made over the many Countries they reduced to their " Obedience, and enjoyed; nor were they ſignalized for their Valour of late " Years onely, (as ſome People vainly imagine) but for above five or ſix " hundred Years paſt, amongſt which many Kings of them have been very " powerfull; namely Manco Capac, Inca Roca, Viracocha Inca, Pachacutec, and thoſe " deſcended from that Line to the great Huayna Capac, who was Emperour, be- " ſides many other Captains of the ſame Bloud, of whom we have treated at " large in other places.

Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera; after which ſhort digreſſion let us re- turn again to our Spaniards.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the differences which arose between the Almagro's, and the Piçarro's; and of the Imprisonment of Hernando Piçarro.

SO soon as Almagro and Piçarro saw that the Inca had disbanded his Army, and was fled, and had left unto them free possession of the Empire; they began then openly to discover their Passions, and turn their Arms each against the other; one affected to rule and govern absolutely alone, and the other prepared to prevent and disappoint him of the Possession of that supreme Power which neither admits a Superiour nor a Rival. Thus Almagro required Hernando Piçarro to surrender the City to him, and leave him in free possession thereof, pretending, that it was the Part and Division which belonged to him, and not to his Brother; as not being comprehended within the two hundred Leagues of Land belonging to the Marquis, which were to be measured, and set out from the Equinoctial Southward, along the Sea-coast, according to the Capes, and Points, and Bays, running by the Sea-shore; but certainly Land was never measured in that manner, or by other Lines than by the High-ways. Howsoever the party of Almagro insisted on this point, and would understand no other Measures than by the Sea-coast, which if Piçarro had granted and condescended unto, though His Majesty should have enlarged his Jurisdiction an hundred Leagues farther, yet his Dominion would not have reached so far as los Reyes, much less could it have extended unto Cozco. Howsoever these groundless Reasons and Fancies had so far possessed the Mind of Almagro, and his Party, that they would suffer no Contradiction, or hearken to any Arguments to the contrary, but violently resolved to abandon the Kingdom of Chili, and return to Peru, and Cozco, from whence afterwards so many Ruines and Mischiefs did ensue.

To this Demand Hernando Piçarro made Answer, that he did not command that City by virtue of his own Authority, but by a Power derived from the Governour, who was his Captain General, to whom having made Oath never to surrender up that City into any other hands, than his own; he could neither perform the part of a Gentleman, nor of a Souldier, in case he should betray his Trust by such a base surrender, which was an absolute Breach of his Oath; but in case they would write to the Marquis, and obtain his Order, he would immediately yield all compliance to his Commands. But waving that particular, he insisted, that the Imperial City belonged to his Brother, and was comprehended within the Limits of his Jurisdiction; for that the measures he propounded by Capes, and Gulfs, and Bays, along the Sea-coast, were mere fancies, and fallacies, and such as never were admitted amongst any rational Geographers; for the turnings and windings of the Land will take up above half the extent of Ground, as is manifest by experience of the doubling of the Lands onely from the Isle of Palmes to the Cape of St. Francis. Nor ought the Land to be measured by the High-ways, which often turn and wind, and are steep, and oftentimes ascend three or four Leagues, and then again descend as many more; which upon a streight Line from one Hill to another, will not make half a League. But the Piçarros did not approve of this kind of Measure, alledging, that the Leagues were to be reckoned according to the Degrees of the Equinoctial, as Mariners mete out by their Compasses the distances at Sea, allowing to every Degree seventeen Leagues and an half, in sailing plain North and South: Now whereas there were not above eleven Degrees of South-latitude from the Equinoctial to the City of los Reyes, which make not more than an hundred ninety two Leagues and an half; and that to Cozco, which stands in fourteen Degrees, it will not make above two hundred forty five Leagues in all; so that both Cities of los Reyes, and Cozco, were to be comprehended within the new Enlargement which His Majesty gave to Piçarro, though the number of Leagues were not specified in that Grant.

Hereunto the Party of Almagro replied, that in case the distances were to be meted by the Heavens, and not by the Land, they were not to be taken North and South, but East and West, which gives Eighty Leagues to a Degree: But in regard that neither side would agree to that Measure, the matter, as they said, ought to be accommodated, and forty nine Leagues allowed to a Degree, and then the Jurisdiction of Piçarro would not reach farther than six Degrees from the Equinoctial, yielding forty nine Leagues to every Degree; now in case the Piçarros yielded to any of these three sorts of Measures, neither Cozco, nor los Reyes, would be comprehended within his Jurisdiction.

In these Debates, pro & con, many Days were spent, which were oftentimes so warmly argued, that had it not been for the Moderation and Discretion of Diego de Alvarado, Uncle to the General Don Pedro de Alvarado, and Gomez de Alvarado, a Person of great worth, they had proceeded to Arms, and open violence; he came in company with Almagro unto Chili, and being sensible of the evil Consequences which a Breach or Misunderstanding of this nature between the Governours would produce, he so laboured to beget a good correspondence between them, that at length, by consent of the major part, it was agreed that Hernando should intimate to the Marquis his Brother the Demands and Pretensions of Almagro; and that untill an Answer should be returned thereunto, all matters should remain in suspence, and Acts of Hostility should cease, which accordingly was observed for some days; but some Men of an unquiet humour, who were desirous to disturb that Union and Friendship which was established between those two Companions, suggested to Almagro, that he had done ill, and to the prejudice of his own right, by referring the Title and Claim which he justly had by Grant from the Emperour, to the Will and Pleasure of another. That Hernando Piçarro had resolved what to doe before he wrote, and that this pretence of Writing was onely to keep himself in his station so long as he could; for it could not be expected that the Marquis should ever be contented to resign and quit the Imperial City of Cozco, and that the Agreement which was made, being without limitation of time, might bind Almagro for ever, in case Piçarro should not return an Answer thereunto. Wherefore in regard his Claim to the Government of that City was clear, and without dispute, he was advised without farther Ceremonies, or pause, to take Possession thereof, it not being probable that ever the contrary party should assent to the Surrender of a Jewel so rich and important as that City; and therefore, that he should look to his own Interest, and not make delays in a matter which so much concerned him.

Almagro, who had no need of Sparks to enflame the burning heat of Ambition, which was smothered in his Mind, immediately took Fire at these Incentives, and embraced the Advices, which were given him by his evil Companions, for such Counsels as these are never projected by good Men: Wherefore without farther Consultation with his wise and true Friends, he rashly attempted the lodgings of Hernando and Gonçalo Piçarro, and in a dark night, and with armed Forces, broke in upon them, for the Guards were asleep, and secure, on confidence of the Truce which was so lately made; howsoever the matter was not so covertly carried, but that Intelligence was brought by one of Almagro's Men of the danger approaching, the which Hernando Piçarro would not believe at first, or conceive it possible, that a Gentleman should so manifestly violate his Word, and the Faith, he had given; but whilst Hernando was thus arguing, a noise and combustion was heard without, and then he that brought the News said, Sir, since you give no credit to what you hear with your Ears, believe what you see with your Eyes, for, behold, they are come.

Hereupon an Allarm was given to the Servants and People belonging to the Piçarros, who instantly armed, and ran to defend the Doors of the House, which had been fortified, and strongly barred, as were all the Quarters of the City where the Spaniards lodged, ever since the time that the Inca departed. The Almagrians not finding a speedy Entrance, set Fire to the House in several places: Hereupon the Defendants giving themselves for lost, opened the Doors, and so Hernando and Gonçalo Piçarro, with many of their Friends and Relations, who were all of the Countrey of Estremenno, or Estremadura, were taken, and put together into a strait Chamber of the Cassana, which they made secure with bars and bolts of Iron:

Some

Some evil Counſellours which loved to make and foment differences, adviſed Almagro to kill Hernando Piçarro, for that ever ſince the firſt time that he came from Spain, they had diſcovered in him a ſtrange malice towards his Perſon, having never mentioned him with any kind character; and that he was a Man of a violent ſpirit, revengefull to the utmoſt, and of a different temper to his Brothers; and therefore that it was dangerous to ſuffer ſuch a Man to live.

Almagro was ready to have executed this counſel, but that Diego, and Gomez de Alvarado, John de Saavedra, Bartolomeo de Terrazas, Vaſco de Guevara, and Geronimo de Coſtilla, and others, who were all Gentlemen of Noble deſcent, and friends to peace and quietneſs, reſtrained this violence; telling him, that there was no reaſon in that open manner to break with the Marquis, who had been his faithfull friend and confederate in all Enterpriſes; for perhaps the reputation he had blemiſhed by breach of the Truce might be ſalved again, and the ſeizure he had made on the Government might be accommodated; but the Aſſaſſination of Hernando Piçarro was a thing ſo odious to the World, and ſo infamous to his Name, that the ſtain thereof could never be blotted out; and therefore he would doe well to conſult with Reaſon and Prudence, rather than with his Anger and Revenge, which would carry him to more dangerous extremities.

With theſe and the like Reaſons theſe Gentlemen perſuaded Almagro to deſiſt from this cruel intention, contenting himſelf with the Government of the City; which having taken upon him, he cauſed all the Officers of the Corporation, and the people a hundred Leagues round, according to the limits prefixed to him by his Majeſty, to ſwear Fealty and Allegiance to him. Where we will leave him for a while, and paſs forwards to other matters which hapned at the ſame time.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the Hardſhips and Difficulties which Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and his Companions, ſuſtained to Diſcover the Countrey of Buena-ventura, which ſignifies Good Fortune.

WE have formerly related how that Don Francis Piçarro finding himſelf beſieged by the Indians, who had made a general Inſurrection, greatly feared, that his Brothers in Cozco, and Almagro in Chili, were deſtroyed by them; and therefore with all diligence diſpatched Advices to Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, St. Domingo, and the other Iſlands of Barlovento, to demand ſuccours and relief; he likewiſe ſent Orders to recall his Captains, namely, Alonſo de Alvarado, Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and John Porcell, requiring them to deſiſt from their Conqueſts, and to return to him with all their force, having need of their Aid againſt the power of the Indians. Alonſo de Alvarado, who was the neareſt of any to his Quarters, was the firſt that came in, but not timely enough to yield his aſſiſtence before the Indians began to flag, and withdraw their force from the City of los Reyes, which they totally abandoned, ſo ſoon as he appeared; but neither Captain Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, nor Captain de los Bracamoros, nor John Porcell, were preſent at this Action, by reaſon that the Indians, who carried the Command, were killed by the way, ſo that the Order or Summons never came to their hands: beſides, Garçilaſſo de la Vega arrived not long after the coming of Alonſo de Alvarado from the Bay, which is called St. Mathew's Bay, and Buena-ventura; the which Countrey (as we have touched before) was bad, and almoſt uninhabitable, ble, ſo that the people which were ſent thither ſuſtained much difficulty and hardſhip; for the Mountains were incredibly high, and covered with lofty trees, of ſuch a ſort of hard Timber, as would not yield to the Hatchet; and the Buſhes ſo thick and cloſe, that they were like a Wall, that neither Man or Beaſt could paſs through them; and the Rains were ſo conſtant, and made ſuch a perpetual Deluge, that when they intended to have burnt them, the fire was extinguiſhed, and would not take.

At firſt when the Spaniards entred upon that Conqueſt, they expected to have found many Indians within the Countrey; and ſo paſſed, as well as they were able, opening the ways by force of Arms and Labour, riſing and deſcending by the Chanels which were made by Waters falling from the Mountain. And with theſe Difficulties they proceeded for many days, though they were ſufficiently informed by the Indians, whom they brought out of Peru to ſerve them, that it was all labour loſt, that there were no people in many Leagues diſtant from thoſe parts, that the Region being uninhabitable, was Abandoned by all people, and never planted by the Incan Kings: Howſoever, the Spaniards would not hearken to them, eſteeming it a diſreputation to their Enterpriſe to return back to the Countrey of their Companions. Wherefore perſiſting in this reſolution to proceed, they travelled at leaſt a hundred Leagues, being reduced to ſuch a want of all Proviſions, that they were forced to eat Herbs and Roots, Toads, Serpents, and other Inſects, which, as they ſaid, in that time of Famine, had as good a relliſh as Hares or Conies; and, as they report, the great Serpents were much better Meat than the ſmaller Snakes. At length, after a long and tedious Journey, in which they had no proſpect of a better condition, but that ſtill their Famine and Hardſhips encreaſed, the Officers of the Army, and of the King's Treaſure, went to the Captain, and told him, That ſince they had learned by experience, that the Hardſhips of that diſcovery were not longer to be ſuſtained; for that having now wandred for above five Months within thoſe Mountains, they had not ſeen ſo much as one Indian to conquer, nor an Acre of Land to cultivate, but had onely met with Mountains, and Rivers, and Lakes, and Brooks, and a perpetual Deluge of Rain; wherefore they conceived it better to conſult his own, and the ſafety of his people by a return, rather than out of an obſtinate humour to throw away the Lives of his people by Famine, and other Hardſhips. To which the Captain made anſwer, That he had many days paſt obſerved and conſidered all thoſe Difficulties which they laid before him; and that about the time of two Months after they had entred within thoſe Mountains, he had conceived ſome thoughts of making a return; but conſidering that ſuch a retreat would have been diſhonourable to them, and to himſelf, he had perſiſted in this Enterpriſe untill this very time; and ſtill muſt continue to intreat, and importune them to take courage and proceed forward, ſo that their Companions, who are emulous of their great undertakings, might not have occaſion to revile them with ſcorn, and bid them to begone to their Riches, and delicious Dwellings of Peru. Wherefore he again requeſted and conjured them not now to relinquiſh their deſign, or turn their backs to a work which they had almoſt overcome; for the more danger, the more honour; and ſince Fame and Glory is the reward of Victory, they ſhould preſs forward like good Souldiers to obtain it, at leaſt perſiſt ſo far in the proſecution of it, untill it appeared deſperate, and drive it ſo far, as that their Adverſaries and evil Tongues might have nothing to object againſt them; for which they would have ſufficient ſubject and cauſe, in caſe they ſhould ſo ſoon return with their buſineſs uneffected; in the mean time he could not but have a ſenſe and feeling of their Labours and Hardſhips, more than of his own; howſoever, ſince they ſaw that he did not flinch, nor retreat a ſtep backward, he deſired them to follow him, who was their Captain, being thereunto obliged as Cavaliers, good Souldiers and Spaniards. With which good words, and preſſing inſtances, being overcome, they complied with his deſires, and proceeded other three Months in their diſcovery: As their Journey lengthned, ſo Sickneſs increaſed; for the bodies of Men not being able to ſuſtain ſuch Hardſhips, many, as well Indians as Spaniards, fell ſick and died, more of Hunger, than of any other Diſtemper. Thus ſeeing that their Men fell ſick, and died every day, ſo that they were not able to proceed forward, they reſolved by common conſent to return, yet not by the ſame way; but taking a compaſs to the Eaſtward, they came about by the South, that for their better ſatisfaction they might take a round, and bring all within within their discovery: Their way was now over other Mountains, not better than those already passed, but worse, if worse could be: And still Famine and Mortality pressed them hard with great discouragement, so that they were forced to kill their worst Horses, and with ther Flesh to make Broth for their sick people. But what was most lamentable to see, was Men dying and perishing with mere weakness; for not having strength to walk, they were left to themselves in the Mountains; and not being able to help one the other, every one shifted for himself: One day they left eleven Men alive in this manner, and another day thirteen: When they were almost starved, and were forced to yield to their weakness, the under-jaw fell in that manner, that they could not shut their mouths; so when they left them, all they said was, God rest, and remain with you; and the poor Wretches would answer with an imperfect pronunciation, God go with you; not having strength to move their Tongues. All these particulars, besides the common report, were related to me by a certain Souldier called ----- de Fortalva; I heard it repeated more than once, and I could not but weep at the sadness of the story: And he farther said, that it did not so much trouble him when he left them dead, but to abandon Men in that condition alive, was more grievous than could be expressed. In this manner above eighty Spaniards perished, besides Indians, in a far greater number. Moreover, they had another difficulty to pass the River Quiximis; for the Timbers which they cut for that purpose, were so heavy, being sappy and green, that they would not float, but sink to the bottom; nor were there any places where it might be waded over, being a very swift and rapid stream, and much infested with Alligators, which they call Caymanes, which are a sort of Crocodile of about twenty five or thirty Foot long; and so voracious, that they are very dangerous in the Water. At length they made some Floats with Boughs fastned together, and therewith passed with as much difficulty as we can imagine. It happened, that being to pass one of these Rivers, and seeking the most commodious place, they espied two great Trees opposite to each other, one on one side, and the other on the other side of the River, with branches extending so wide, that they reached each other; it was thought fit to cut down one of these towards the root, which they did, and so directed the fall of it on the tree on the other side, that it fell and rested on the other; both which trees being joyned together, served for a Bridge, over which the Spaniards and Indians taking hold on the boughs, passed by three and four at a time. At length there remained onely six persons to go over, which were three Spaniards, and three Indians, of which the Captain himself was one who would be the last to bring up the rere; the Indians were ordered to go foremost to carry the Arms, and two other Spaniards who were intimate Comerades of the Captains were to bear the Saddles, and passing in this order near the top of the standing tree, that which was cut gave a crack, and broke off from that part towards the bottom, which remained unhewen; the two Spaniards, and the three Indians, kept their hold fast upon the boughs; and the Captain, who observed the danger more than those who were before him, gave a leap over his Companions, and catched firm hold on a bough of the standing tree, which breaking with his weight, he fell therewith into the Water; those which sate on the other tree were likewise carried down the stream with him, and were never seen more: But two or three of the Captain's Comerades standing on the other side, and observing the danger in which he was, followed him on the bank, and reaching out to him the end of their Lances, he took hold of them, and therewith they drew him to the shore, and saved him, returning thanks to Almighty God for this great deliverance. And now travelling on their way forward, in what place soever that they found any plenty of wild Fruit or Roots larger than ordinary, they would stay there to gather and make provision of them for food in their Journey. And having thus wandered above the space of one whole year in the Mountains, at length one day whilst they made a stay to gather their Fruits, the Captain took a fancy to climb a tree, which grew on the highest part of the Mountain, to see if he could espy any plain or end of those Rocks, or hope to free themselves from that Maze, or Labyrinth: And being on the top of one of the highest trees, which are in those parts like lofty Towers, he could not discover any plain Countrey, being still environed on all sides with mighty Mountains; but looking round about, he observed a great flock of Parrots near him, which with their usual chattering noise took their flight South-East, and at a good distance from him, about five or six Leagues as he could gueſs, he obſerved that they ſtooped from the Wing to ſome low Valley: Now whereas Parrots are great lovers of Mayz, which is their chief food, he concluded, that in or about the place where he ſaw them fall, there muſt be ſome Plantation, or Dwelling for people; and upon this preſumption, eying well the place, he returned to his Companions, and told them, that they ſhould be of good comfort, for that he had diſcovered ſure and certain tokens and evidences, that they ſhould now very ſpeedily arrive at ſome inhabited Countrey. The Spaniards and all their company being comforted and encouraged with this good news, took heart, and next morning fell to work, opening a way through the Boſcage with Axe and Hatchet, and in the ſpace of thirty Days, penetrated and broke through eight Leagues in length, aud then entred into a ſmall Plantation of the Indians, conſiſting of about a hundred Families, with whom Mayz, and other ſorts of Grane and Pulſe, were in great plenty; and the Soil was very good, and able to produce food and maintenance for greater numbers, than did there inhabit: Upon ſight of which, and entrance thereinto, the Spaniards returned thanks to God, who had brought them forth, and delivered them out of thoſe extremes of miſery. The Indians, when they ſaw a people with Beards, and moſt of them cloathed in Skins, (for their Garments were rotted upon their backs, having been for the moſt part wet,) and thoſe who were beſt habited amongſt them were inſtead of their Rags covered with the Bark and Leaves of Trees, they were ſtrangely ſurprized, and much more did they admire to ſee the Horſes, for ſome of them were ſtill conſerved from being eaten. At the appearance of this new ſight, they called to each other to fly into the Mountains; but ſome ſigns being made to them, not to fear, they were induced to ſtay, and call their Cacique, who was then in the Fields; the Cacique coming, received them with much kindneſs and courteſie, ſhewing ſome trouble and pity to ſee them almoſt naked, full of ſcratches and wounds received from the Woods and Buſhes, and ſo weak and pale, that they ſeemed half dead: He entertained them like Brothers, and gave them Manto's of Cotten, ſuch as were made for his own cloathing; and in a ſhort time he took ſuch an affection to the Spaniards, and particularly to the Captain, that he deſired him never more to leave his Countrey; but if he would not be perſuaded to remain there, yet then that he would take him into his company, and carry him to the place of his aboad and reſidence. At this place they remained thirty Days, and had occaſion for their better refreſhment, to have continued there longer; but that out of pity to thoſe poor Indians, that they might not eat up their Proviſions, which they ſo freely beſtowed on them, they quitted their Countrey, the name of which they did not enquire, it being their buſineſs rather to paſs through, than to inform themſelves of Names and Places. The Cacique would needs bring them on part of their way, and appointed thirty of his Indians to be their Guides, and carry ſuch Proviſions for them as were very needfull in that deſart Countrey through which they were to paſs: the which Indians were likewiſe very ſerviceable in tranſporting their people over certain Rivers; for they were skilfull in the manner how to make Floats, and knew how to conduct and ſteer them over, better than the Spaniards. At length coming to the firſt Valley within the juriſdiction of Puerto Viejo, the Cacique and his Indians took their leave of them with many tears, being very ſorrowfull to loſe their company; and eſpecially they were devoted to the Captain, who had won their hearts by his affable and obliging deportment. At laſt the Spaniards entred Puerto Viejo, with no greater number than of one hundred and ſixty Perſons; for of the two hundred and fifty, who at firſt undertook that Conqueſt, above eighty of them were ſtarved with hunger, and periſhed with other hardſhips within the Mountains. At Puerto Viejo they received the firſt intelligence of the Inſurrection of the Indians, but knew nothing as yet of the ſucceſs; wherefore they haſtned with all diligence to the City of los Reyes; and being on their way, they met the Command of the Marquis, ſummoning them to come in unto his ſuccour; upon which they quickned their March, and came to Rimac ſome few days after the Arrival of Captain Alonſo de Alvarado at that place; which coming ſo ſeaſonably to the ſuccour and relief of the Marquis, they were received by him with much joy and comfort.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Alonſo de Alvarado marches to the Succour of Cozco; and what his ſucceſs was in theſe Travels.

SO ſoon as Marquis Piçarro was recruited with Forces, both from Alonſo de Alvarado, and Garçilaſſo de la Vega, he ſent Succours to his Brothers, being altogether as yet ignorant of the ſucceſs of affairs at Cozco; for he was neither informed that Prince Manco Inca was retreated, nor that Almagro was returned from Chili, nor his Brothers impriſoned. Of thoſe Troops which came to him, and of his own, he drew out a Detachment of three hundred Men, well Accoutred, and Accommodated in all reſpects, one hundred and twenty of which were Horſe, and an hundred and eighty Foot: Alonſo de Alvarado was appointed to Command in Chief, which Office did formerly appertain to Pedro de Lerma, a Native of Burgos, who, during the Inſurrection of the Indians, had acquitted himſelf like a good Commander, and a valiant Souldier; and as he always behaved himſelf ſtoutly as became him, ſo one day particularly in a Battel between the Indians and the Spaniards, his Teeth were beaten out with an unlucky ſtone thrown from a Sling: Nor was he onely deprived of his Command, and the ſame given to another, but he was ordered to ſerve under Alonſo de Alvarado in Quality of Captain of Horſe: the which Action, as ſome conſtrued it, was unpolitickly done by the Marquis, and without due conſultation; for ſince he was reſolved in a manner to degrade him, he had better have kept him in his own company, than to have cauſed him to ſerve under a Perſon againſt whom he conceived ſome piques of Emulation: And indeed Pedro de Lerma did more reſent this circumſtance, than the deprivation of his Office; for they were both of the ſame Countrey, and both Noble; and it is a piece of pride incident to the Nature of Mankind, rather to ſubmit to the command of a Stranger, though of meaner rank and quality, than to his equal of the ſame Countrey: And from this errour it was, that Piçarro afterwards loſt the fortune of the day, as we ſhall ſee by the ſequel of the Story.

When the day appointed for the departure of theſe Forces grew near, Garçilaſſo de la Vega deſired licence of the Marquis, that he might with the other Captains be employed in this adventure for relief and ſuccour of his Brothers; to which the Marquis made anſwer, that he ſhould ſuddenly have occaſion of more ſupplies, and that then he ſhould be ſent Commander in Chief of them; but Garçilaſſo inſtantly preſſed that his deſires might not be deferred, for that he could not be quiet in his mind, when he conſidered the diſtreſs of his Lordſhips Brothers; for having an eſpecial Friendſhip for them, and related to them as Countreymen, he could not pardon himſelf, in caſe he ſhould be guilty of remiſneſs, and be a ſecond, and not one of the firſt to yield, and adminiſter Aid to them in their diſtreſs; and that for the recruits which were hereafter to be ſent, he did not doubt but that he was furniſhed with Commanders, unto whom he might worthily commit that charge. The Marquis yielding at length to his importunity, ſuffered him to depart with the others; ſo taking their March by way of the Plains, as far as Nanaſca, to avoid the bad and difficult paſſages, they came to the beautifull Valley of Pachacamac, where about four Leagues diſtant from los Reyes, they were engaged in a bloudy Battel againſt the Indians, who were ſtill in Arms, and in a Body, notwithſtanding that their Prince was retired into the Mountains; and had untill that time always beaten the Succours which had been ſent to Cozco; and with that encouragement adventured to engage with Alonſo de Alvarado, fighting a long time with much bravery; but being now in the open Field, without the covert and defence of Woods and Mountains, where the Horſe could doe ſervice, many of the Indians were ſlain; but in the craggy and woody Mountains they did much miſchief to the Spaniards, killing eleven of them, and ſeven Horſes. From thence Alonſo de Alvarado marched forward, and to make the more haſte, they travelled velled by Day againſt the advice and perſuaſion of the Indians, who aſſured them, that it was a matter moſt pernitious to their health to travel over thoſe ſandy Deſarts by Day; for that whilſt the Sun reflected in its full violence on them, the Heats were inſupportable; and that unleſs they carried Water with them, the people would dye with thirſt. But this advice given by the Indians to march by Night, was not regarded by the Spaniards, who imagined that they gave that counſel out of good will and favour to their Incas; and therefore threatned to kill them in caſe they did not haſten their Journey. The poor Indians, who were humble and obedient, ſubmitted to their pleaſure; and having travelled a whole day, untill an hour after Sun-ſetting, both they and the Spaniards found themſelves in great diſtreſs for want of Water; and more eſpecially the Indians, who having carried Burthens all the day, above five hundred of them periſhed with heat and thirſt. The Spaniſh Foot had incurred the like fate, but that the Horſe underſtanding that a River was not far diſtant, ran thither, and brought Water, which refreſhed them in their great extremity: the which report Auguſtine Carate confirms in the ſixth Chapter of his third Book, as may appear in theſe Words following:

" Alonſo de Alvarado paſſing on his Journey to Cozco, over a ſandy Deſart, ſu-
" ſtained ſuch want of Water, that above five hundred of his Indians, who car" ried Burthens, were choaked with thirſt; and had not the Horſe ran in haſte
" to a River, and brought thence in certain Veſſels ſome Water for refreſhment
" of the Spaniſh Foot, it is believed that they had all periſhed. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

For want of thoſe Indians who died with thirſt, they were forced to ſtay ſome Days, untill they were ſupplied with others to carry their Burthens. And not to incur again the like neceſſity, they left the way of the Deſart, and took up by the Mountains, where they joyned with other two hundred Men, ſeventy of which were Horſe, and the reſt Foot, which the Marquis had ſent under Command of Gomez de Tordoya de Vargas, a near Kinſman to Garçilaſſo de la Vega, to recruit the Forces under Alonſo de Alvarado, which conſiſted of five hundred Spaniards: All which, as they marched through thoſe mountainous and faſt Countries, had many Skirmiſhes at every paſs with the Indians; but being well adviſed by frequent misfortunes of this nature, they marched warily, and with due care to avoid the like ſnares, and unhappy ſucceſſes. At length they came to the Bridge called Rumicacha, which is as much as to ſay the Stone-bridge; which being a difficult paſs, the Indians did all they were able to give a ſtop to the Enemy at that place, and many other Avenues they guarded with Souldiers; to gain which, the Spaniards made a Detachment of about forty or fifty Muſquetiers, with a great number of thoſe Indians, whom they had taken up for Servants, and which were to guide the Spaniards, whilſt the Muſquetiers guarded the rere, untill the whole Body had eſcaped the danger of thoſe cloſe and difficult paſſages. At the Bridge an innumerable Company of Indians crouded on the Spaniards, and fought valiantly; the Battel continued ſeveral hours, but at laſt the Indians were forced to give way with great ſlaughter, for the Muſquetiers of which there were one hundred, galled them very much, and were thoſe onely who gained the Victory, for in thoſe inclоſures the Horſe were able to doe no ſervice; howſoever, the Spaniards loſt twenty eight Men, and nine Horſes, beſides many of their Indian Servants. As Gomara in the 138th Chapter relates in theſe Words:

" Alvarado marched without any interruption with his five hundred Spaniards, " untill he came to Lumichaca, where is a Stone-bridge; but there he met with " great numbers of Indians, who thought to cut off all the Chriſtians, or at leaſt
" diſperſe them: But Alvarado and his Souldiers, though encompaſſed on all ſides
" with Enemies, fought with that Valour and Conduct, that they over-threw " them with a great ſlaughter: but this Victory coſt the lives of many Spaniards,
" and of many Indians, who were friends, and came to ſerve and aſſiſt them, &c.

From Rumichaca Alonſo de Alvarado proceeded forwards, skirmiſhing with the Indians at every turn, where the Paſſes were narrow and difficult; and though they conceived little hopes to overcome them, howſoever it was ſome ſatisfaction to them to diſturb them in their March; and though the Indians being now beaten out out of the Field, durſt not engage in a pitched Battel, as they had formerly done, yet they continued their frequent Skirmiſhes with loſs and damage on one ſide and the other. And having marched twenty Leagues farther unto the Bridge of Amancay, Alonſo de Alvarado received intelligence from the Indians, that the Inca was fled, and retired into the Mountains, that Hernando de Piçarro was impriſoned, that John de Piçarro was dead, with many others, during the laſt Siege, beſides ſeveral other particulars which had happened; to all which Alvarado had been a ſtranger untill that time: But now upon this advice, it was judged moſt ſafe not to proceed farther, untill they had received new Orders from the Marquis, to whom they gave a true information of the ſtate of all affairs; and leſt, in the mean time, Almagro ſhould make an attempt upon them, they fortified themſelves, and provided for a Siege. Almagro hearing that Alonſo de Alvarado was with his Forces come as far as the Bridge of Amancay, diſpatched a Meſſage to him by Diego de Alvarado, and eight other Cavaliers of the beſt Quality then with him; and in a peaceable and civil manner gave him to underſtand, that the title and claim he laid to that Government was very manifeſt and plain by the Commiſſion he had received from his Majeſty; and therefore he exhorted him to return in peace, and if not, he proteſted againſt him for all the Bloud, Miſeries and Damages which ſhould follow. This Meſſage being delivered, Alonſo de Alvarado ſeized on thoſe that brought it, and detained them Priſoners, ſaying, That to the Marquis, and not to him, they ought to notifie their inſtructions, not being authorized or empowred to act any thing without his Orders: And though Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Peralvarez Holguin, Gomez de Tordoya, and other principal Officers were of opinion, that they ought to be ſet free, and liberty given them to intimate their Meſſage to the Marquis himſelf; for that in all parts of the World, even amongſt the moſt barbarous Nations, the Perſons of Ambaſſadours were always privileged, and freed from Moleſtations and Arreſts whatſoever. That this courſe would ſerve to augment and enflame the heats of paſſion, which were kindled between the Governours, rather than to allay and appeaſe them. That it was a hard caſe that thoſe who had gained that Empire, and were in hopes to enjoy the fruits of their labours in peace and quietneſs, ſhould now quarrel and kill each other, when they came to ſhare and divide the prey. That he ſhould conſider with what infamy the relation of this Story would be received in the World, when it ſhould come to be known, that on the ſcore of particular intereſts, a civil and inteſtine War was begun amongſt them: But Alonſo de Alvarado being far from being moved by theſe reaſons, adhered to his own opinion, incited by a natural obſtinacy, to the great diſcontentment of his people, who were deſirous to enjoy the Riches of Peru in peace, and in an amicable correſpondence, which they had acquired at the coſt and expence of much bloud, and of inceſſant labours and turmoils full of danger.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The Battel of the River Amancay ; and the Impriſonment of Alonſo de Alvarado and his Souldiers.

NOT long after the Ambaſſadours were departed from Cozco, Almagro followed them out of the City ; and finding that they did not return in their due time, he retired again to the City, where he remained with ſome trouble and anxiety of mind, ſuſpecting the evil which had befallen them ; for he was very ſenſible both that Alonſo de Alvarado had much a better Army than his ; and that he was not well aſſured of the fidelity of the people with him, of which many had belonged to Hernando Piçarro, and might probably change the ſide and colours at the appearance of the Enemy, for which reaſon it was not judged convenient to carry them into the Field with them : And moreover, he believed that there could be no good deſigns towards him, in regard that a detention or ſeizure had been made of his Meſſengers. Whilſt Almagro was thus divided in his thoughts and fears, he received a Letter from Captain Pedro de Lerma, who (as we have ſaid before) being much diſguſted with the Marquis, and judging this to be a convenient opportunity to revenge himſelf ; gave intimation to Almagro of his own juſt reſentments, on ſcore of the unhandſome uſage he had received from Piçarro ; and hereunto adding the perfidious treatment exerciſed towards his Ambaſſadours, which was a barbarous Act, and diſowned by the greateſt part of his people ; he invited him to advance againſt the Forces under the Command of Alvarado, aſſuring him, that upon his appearance above a hundred of his friends would join with him, and ſecure him of happy ſucceſs with much facility and honour, and that he doubted not but to bring over the whole party to his ſide and intereſt, being entirely diſſatisfied with the proceedings of Alvarado their Captain.

Upon theſe Advices Diego de Almagro, in the ſpace of fifteen Days, fitted and provided himſelf with all matters neceſſary for this Enterpriſe, and departed from Cozco in ſearch of Alonſo de Alvarado ; and in his way he took Alvarez Holguin, who was ſent out upon a party to make diſcovery, and learn ſomething of the proceedings of Almagro, but was betrayed by his own Men, who had been ſuborned and inſtructed by Pedro de Lerma ; as alſo the greateſt number of thoſe who remained were engaged in the Conſpiracy. So ſoon as Alonſo de Alvarado was informed that Alvarez Holguin was taken, he ſuſpected Pedro de Lerma, and would have ſeized him ; for, as Gomara ſaith, he had uttered ſome ſuſpicious words, as that he was of Burgos, and was well acquainted with the humour of Alvarado ; but Pedro de Lerma being adviſed of the ſecret intentions of Alvarado towards him, eſcaped away with ſeveral friends, in a kind of open manner ; for ſuch was the affection and intereſt he had with the Souldiery, that had he had onely four Days time to have worked his deſigns, he had carried the whole Army with him : And now to accompliſh his Plot, he counſelled Almagro to make all ſpeed and haſte poſſible, for that his Victory conſiſted in expedition ; of which he might be well aſſured, for that he had already ſecured the Affections of the people towards him : And as to the Rules which were to be obſerved in the management of this affair, he directed him the manner how, the time when, and the place where he was to aſſault him ; the time was to be at Night, when Darkneſs covers the guilt of Traytours ; and he in Perſon was their guide to the Bridge, where many of the Conſpiratours were attending in expectation of them ; and the Horſe were ordered to paſs the River, which was not ſo deep, but that they might foard or wade it over without danger.

Having

Having theſe Hopes and Expectations of Victory, they marched forward; on the other ſide, the Captains and Officers of Alvarado iſſued out Orders for the Fight, and for Defence, but were not obeyed; for it was night, and moſt of them engaged in the Conſpiracy; the Horſemen pretended, that their Lances were ſtoln from them, and caſt into the River; the Infantry complained that their Muskets, Croſs-bows, and Pikes, were hidden, and laid aſide; ſo that none obeyed the Command of their Captains, but every one was in confuſion, and followed his own Fancy. Thoſe that were appointed to defend the River, and ſecure the Bridge, inſtead of repulſing the Enemy, directed them where they might paſs with moſt eaſe and ſecurity; and in regard it was night, ſo that the Almagrians could not diſcover the fordable places, the Party on the other ſide directed and guided them over, and thoſe at the Bridge invited and aſſured them, that they might paſs without fear. By theſe means Don Diego de Almagro obtained a Victory, and took Alonſo de Alvarado, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, Gomez de Tordoya, and Captain Villalva, Priſoners, with other Captains and Officers of the Army, with about an hundred common Souldiers, who refuſed to enter into the Conſpiracy; all which was performed without the loſs of one Man, either killed or wounded on either ſide, onely Rodrigo de Orgonnos paid for all, having his Teeth beaten out by an unlucky Stone thrown at randome from a ſling, no Man knows how, nor from whence it came. Thus Almagro, and his Souldiers, returned victorious, and triumphant, unto Cozco, giving out Words of Scorn and Contempt againſt the Piçarros, as that they would not leave ſo much as one Piçarra under foot (which is a pebble Stone) in all Peru, that if they affected Government, and Dominion, they ſhould go ſeek it amongſt the Manglares, and in thoſe high Mountains which run along the Sea-coaſt, under the Equinoctial. Thoſe whom they ſuſpected of Malignancy towards them, they ſecured under ſafe Cuſtody; and becauſe they were many in number, they committed them unto two Priſons, ſome they ſent to the Fortreſs, and others to the Caſſana, which is the common Priſon of the Town.

We have formerly mentioned, how that the Marquis Piçarro having diſpatched Alonſo de Alvarado, and ſoon after Gomez de Tordoya, with Recruits and Succours to his Brothers, he himſelf remained in the City of los Reyes, to order and diſpoſe thoſe Troops, which came to him from divers parts, according as he had demanded; of which Gomara, in the 137th Chapter of his Book, gives this Account.

" Alonſo de Fuen Mayor, Preſident and Biſhop of St. Domingo, ſent, under the " Command of his Brother, Diego de Fuen Mayor, Native of Tanguas, many Spa- " niſh Muſquetiers, which were lately come to him with Pedro de Vergara. Fer- " nando Cortes ſent upon his own Ship, commanded by Rodrigo di Grijalua, as far as " from New Spain, a conſiderable quantity of Arms, ſuch as Lances, Sadles, and " Furniture for Horſes, Garments of Silk, and one Suit of Martin's Furr. Gaſ- " per de Eſpinoſa brought from Panama, Nombre de Dios, and other parts of " the Contenent, a great Company of Spaniards; and Diego de Ayala returned " with good Recruits, which he had gathered at Nicaragua, and Quahutemallan; " beſides many others, from divers other parts: So that now the Army of " Piçarro was become far greater than ever, and the number of his Muſque- " tiers much encreaſed, of which though he had no great uſe againſt the In- " dians, yet they came ſeaſonably to his Aid againſt Almagro, as ſhall hereafter " be related, &c.

The Marquis finding himſelf ſo well reinforced, for as Carate reports, his Troops conſiſted of ſeven hundred Spaniards, Horſe and Foot, he reſolved in perſon to march to the Relief of his Brothers; for his Mind could not be at reſt, being in daily apprehenſions and fears for them, and could not be ſatisfied whilſt he remained at ſo far a diſtance: Wherefore taking his way by the Plains, and with ſhort Days Marches, he met the Intelligence which was ſent him by Alvarado, how that the Inca was retired, that Almagro was returned to Cozco, that two of his Brothers were impriſoned, and a third dead; all which ill News the Marquis received with a due ſenſe of Sorrow and Affliction: But that might not be oppreſſed with all his Griefs at the ſame time, the ſecond News, of the loſs of his Forces, and Impriſonment of Alvarado, came not to him untill two days after the Receipt of the former, which ſerved to augment the ſenſe he conceived for his late Misfortunes. Whereupon giving a ſtop to his March, he reſolved to return again to los Reyes, though he was already advanced twenty five Leagues upon his Way; for that when he departed thence, he had made preparations onely for a War againſt the Indians; but now the Deſign being changed, and that he was to fight with Spaniards, another ſort of Arms, and other accoutrements of War, were to be provided, as neceſſary againſt this Enemy.

Moreover he thought it adviſable firſt to make trial of the more moderate Terms of Treaty and Accommodation, not being willing to tempt Fortune a third time, which had been ſevere to him in two former Adventures. He farther conſidered, That his Competitor was ſtrong, both in Horſe and Foot; and that they were wellarmed; and that the moſt ſafe and eaſie way to extinguiſh that Fire which was now kindled in the Breaſt of Almagro, was to revive the ancient Conditions of Brother-hood and Friendſhip, which had been ſo often confirmed, and ratified under ſo many Oaths and Religious Vows; by Virtue of which, that great and rich Empire having been gained, and conquered; it would be moſt lamentable to ſee the Enjoyment of thoſe Bleſſings diſappointed, and at the end of all, to ſee nothing intended, but the Ruine and Deſtruction of each other.

On theſe Conſiderations he diſpatched the Lawyer, Doctour Eſpinoſa, unto Cozco, with Inſtructions, if poſſible, to conclude ſome middle Terms of Accommodation between him and Almagro; and that he ſhould eſpecially endeavour to make him ſenſible, that in caſe their Quarrels and Diſſentions ſhould be made known to His Majeſty, and the Differences between his Governours, ſuggeſted as irreconcileable; it was more than probable, that His Majeſty would, before they could lay the matter open before him, provide himſelf with another Governour to ſupplant them both, and who, without Svveat, or Labour, vvould immediately enter into the Poſſeſſion, and Enjoyment of that Dominion, which they, at the Expence of ſo much Bloud and Induſtry, had atchieved. That he ſhould conſider, that a good Peace was better than an evil War, and that though thoſe Words are commonly inverted, yet under the preſent Circumſtances they vvere moſt certainly true. And laſtly, vvhen he ſhould ſee that Almagro vvas not to be prevailed vvith, on any equal Terms, that then he ſhould conclude with him on Conditions to releaſe his Brothers; and that as for the matter of the Government of Cozco, he ſhould rule and govern there in God's Name, untill ſuch time as that the caſe being ſtated, and made known to His Majeſty, he ſhould be pleaſed to determine the particular Limits and Precincts of each other's Government: Provided alſo in the mean time, that Almagro ſhould not make any Attempt on the City of los Reyes, nor on any of the Territories thereunto belonging.

Doctour Eſpinoſa being thus diſpatched with this Commiſſion, and theſe Inſtructions, he arrived at Cozco, where he propoſed all matters accordingly to Almagro, and his Officers; but they vvere become ſo high, and elated, with their former Succeſs, that they vvould neither yield, nor hearken to any Propoſals: And though Diego de Alvarado, with his uſual Candour and Moderation, inſiſted, That the Articles now offered, were the very ſame that they formerly required; for that they never demanded more than Poſſeſſion, and quiet Enjoyment of the City of Cozco; yet they rejected all his Counſel, and Offers, ſaying, That he was not to preſcribe them Limits, or confine and reſtrain them from marching towards los Reyes; for that he was not to be impoſed upon within his own Juriſdiction, but in that proſperous and flouriſhing ſtate of Affairs, rather to give them to receive Conditions from others. To which Diego de Alvarado made Anſwer, that the Conditions were ſuch as he himſelf gave, and not received; but all he could ſay was in vain, and inſignificant, for it was entirely rejected.

And

And here it is obſervable, that both Governours challenged the City of Cozco for his own, and both agreed that the Limits of their reſpective Governments ſhould be begun and be eſtabliſhed from the Chanels without, one to the Southward, and the other Northward; the choice of which being abſolutely granted to Almagro, he refuſed to accept either; for ſeeing himſelf now in poſſeſſion of the City, and that his Competitour had condeſcended to all his Conditions, he believed that ſuch Compliance proceeded from a fear of looſing all his Government; wherefore ſince Fortune had with diſplayed wings owned his Cauſe, he was reſolved to puſh it forward, and try if he could become ſole Monarch of all that Empire.

Thus Almagro being puffed up with Ambition, and moved with Covetouſneſs, which are two unſatiable Affections of the Mind, he would yield to no Agreement with the Marquis, and Eſpinoſa dying amidſt the heat of theſe Debates, nothing was concluded; nor the Benefit of that Peace and happy Accommodation produced, as might have been expected from the Prudence, Judgment, and moderation of that worthy Perſon, who, before his Death, preſaged the Ruine and Deſtruction of both the Governours. And now Almagro, to teſtifie to the World that he had not yielded to the Propoſitions of the Marquis, he marched out of Cozco with an Army, leaving Graviel de Rojas Governour in his ſtead, with Commiſſion to have a particular Eye and Regard over the Priſoners, who, with the firſt taken with Hernando Piçarro, and thoſe with Alonſo de Alvarado, did amount in all to the number of one hundred and fifty which were committed unto two ſeveral Priſons, as we have already declared.

But in regard that Almagro durſt not truſt Hernando Piçarro in Priſon, leſt he ſhould make his Eſcape, he took him with himſelf, and marched by way of the Plains; and having paſſed the Territories belonging to Cozco, he entred into the Juriſdiction of los Reyes, and came to the Valley of Chincha, which is not much more than twenty Leagues diſtant from that City, where, in token of Livery and Seiſin, he founded a new Colony, giving thereby a clear Evidence of his Intentions, to become Maſter of both Governments. And here for a while he pitched his Camp, to ſee how the Marquis would take this Attempt, giving him thereby to underſtand, That in caſe he ſhould be diſpleaſed with theſe his Proceedings, that he was there ready to defie him, and there expected him in the Field, to decide the Controverſie like a Souldier, and a valiant Captain.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Marquis nominates Captains for the War. Gonzalo Piçarro makes his Eſcape out of Priſon. The Sentence given by the Umpires concerning the Government. The Interview between the two Governours: And the Liberty of Hernando Piçarro.

SO ſoon as the Marquis was returned to the City of los Reyes, he began his Preparations for a War againſt Almagro; his Drums were beat up for new Leavies and Advices were diſpatched along the Coaſt of all matters which had paſſed: Upon which the people flocked together in ſuch numbers, that having increaſed his Army very conſiderably, he gave out his Commiſſions to Captains and other Officers. Pedro de Valdivia, and Antonio de Villalva, were ordained Major-Generals; the Son of Collonel Villalva was made Seargeant Major: Peranzures, Diego de Rojas, and Alonſo de Mercadillo, were appointed Captains of Horſe: Diego de Urbino Native of Orduna, the Kinſman of John de Urbino was made Captain of Lanciers: Nunno de Caſtro, and Peter de Vergara, who had been a Souldier in Flanders, and brought with him from thence into the Indies, a company of Muſquetiers with Ammunition, and neceſſaries agreeable thereunto, were confirmed by Commiſſion for Officers of that Militia. Theſe Commanders muſtered eight hundred choice Souldiers, viz. ſix hundred Foot, and two hundred Horſe, with which Force the Marquis marched out of los Reyes to fight Almagro. Whilſt matters ſucceeded, as we have related, between the Marquis, and Almagro, the Priſoners which remained in Cozco, were contriving the manner how to obtain their deſired Liberty; and in regard that the nature of civil Wars is ſuch, as that Mens Minds are eaſily corrupted and ſeduced to the contrary Faſhion; ſo on this occaſion theſe wanted not Men, who, upon promiſe of Reward, were perſuaded to ſell the Loyalty and Faith which they had ſworn to Almagro, and his Deputy Graviel de Rojas; the price whereof was not paid in hand, but on the bare Promiſe of Ganzalo Piçarro, and Alonſo de Alvarado with about fifty or ſixty more, who were then Priſoners in the Caſſana; the Perſons who were privy to this eſcape, were about forty in number, and were the Guards of the Priſon; who having licence to go in and out to the Priſoners, as occaſion ſerved; they left them inſtruments to file off their Chains and Arms for their Defence; and having other Souldiers with them in the Plot, they provided them with Horſes, and other neceſſaries, for their Flight: The Priſoners, and their Complices, being in readineſs to make their eſcape with the ſilence of the night, it happened, that ſome time before the matter was to be put in Execution, that Graviel de Rojas, as was his Cuſtome, every night came to viſit the Priſoners, where having opened the Doors, he found the Priſoners looſe, and at Liberty, and he himſelf taken; for being encompaſſed by them all, they told him plainly, that either he muſt reſolve to go with them, or dye upon the place. Graviel de Rojas ſeeing himſelf thus unexpectedly ſurpriſed, and not being in any Capacity to make a Reſiſtence, conſented to what they required, and ſo in company with about an hundred Men, he was forced with thoſe who had taken him Priſoner, together with thoſe who revolted, to the party of Franciſco Piçarro, having free paſſage by way of the Mountains, for Almagro, with his Forces, was quartered in the Plains by the Sea-coaſt.

Some

Some have malitiouſly reported, that Graviel de Rojas was joined in the ſame Conſpiracy with the others, but that was a falſe Surmiſe; for had he been really in that Plot, he would not have left near an hundred Priſoners in the Fortreſs, many of which were in the number of the firſt Conquerours, ſuch as Franciſco de Villafuerte, Alonſo de Maçueta, Mancio ſerra de Leguiçamo, Diego de Maldovado, Julio de Hojeda, Tomas Vaſquez, Diego de Truxillo, and John de Pancorvo, with whom I had acquaintance, and were Perſons of great Intereſt and Eſtates amongſt the Indians in Cozco: Beſides which, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, Gomez de Tordoya, and Peralvarez Holguin, remained Priſoners; all which to have taken with them, would have been much to the benefit of the Conſpiratours: But this was the truth of the Matter: The Marquis, when he ſaw his Brother, and his other Friends, rejoiced exceedingly, for he greatly feared, that by the Malice and Rage of his Enemies they had been put to death; and his people were greatly encouraged by theſe additional Forces. Gonçalo Piçarro was made General of the Foot, and Alonſo de Alvarado of the Horſe; and ſo well was Gonçalo Piçarro beloved even by his Enemies, that many quitted their Horſes to ſerve on Foot, onely to have the Honour to be one of his Souldiers.

Almagro having received intelligence of the great Force which was with the Marquis, and that thoſe whom he held in Cuſtody, had made their Eſcapes, and that his Deputy Governour was a Priſoner, he feared that the courſe of his good Fortune was changed; and repenting now that he had not accepted the Propoſitions which were offered him, he reſolved to enter into a Treaty; and to that end he diſpatched three Gentlemen to Piçarro, namely, Alonſo Enriquez, Diego Nunnez de Mercadura, Adjutant, and John de Guzman, Auditour, both which were Officers of His Majeſties Revenue, giving them full Power and Authority, to treat and conclude all Matters without Paſſion, in ſuch manner as ſhould be juſt and reaſonable. Piçarro received them with all the kindneſs and reſpect imaginable; but being entred into a treaty ſuch differences aroſe in the points between them, that nothing was concluded: wherefore to put an end thereunto, the controverſie was referred to the Umpirage, and Award of Frier Francis de Bobadilla, Provincial in thoſe parts of the Order of the Merceds, a Perſon of that Probity, Conſcience and good Underſtanding, that both Parties by mutual Conſent agreed to reſt ſatisfied with his Determination: but in this particular Authours diſagree; for Carate makes mention of this Friar, and of no other; but Gomara reports that the Perſon nominated by Almagro was Friar Franciſco Huſando; but whether the Arbitratours were two, or one, it matters not much; for both Hiſtorians agree in the material Points, and almoſt in the ſame Words, which, according to Carate, in the eighth Chapter of his third Book, are theſe.

"Friar Franciſco being deputed Umpire, by the conſent of both Parties, did "by virtue of that Authority, determine, That in the firſt place Hernando "Piçarro ſhould be ſet at Liberty, and that the Marquis, according to the pri- "mary Agreement, ſhould be inveſted in the poſſeſſion of the City of Cozco; "That both Armies ſhould be disbanded, and the ſeveral Detachments there- "of ſhould be made, and ſent for the Diſcovery of other Parts; and that in- "formation ſhould be given to His Majeſty of all theſe particulars, that ſo he "might determine and ordain according to his own gratious Pleaſure. And far- "ther, for the better Confirmation of theſe Articles, he determined, That an "Interview ſhould be had between the Marquis and Almagro, in the Countrey "called Malla, which was the middle place between the two Armies; and "that neither party ſhould appear with more than twelve Horſe on a ſide. "And in regard that Gonzalo Piçarro did not much confide in the Promiſes of "Almagro, nor truſt much to the Truce that was made, he ſpeedily followed "the Marquis with all his Souldiers, and poſted himſelf privately near the peo- "ple of Malla, and lined a certain Wood, or Thicket, through which Almagro "was to paſs, with about forty Muſquetiers, reſolving, that in caſe more Soul- "diers were brought than were agreed, that then they ſhould fire upon them, "and upon that ſignal he would come in to their aſſiſtence.

Thus far are the Words of Carate, not mentioning farther of Almagro, of whom Gomara reports in the 140th Chapter, as followeth.

" Almagro when he ſaw Piçarro declared, that he was greatly rejoiced to ſee " him, though he could not but much complain of the Severity and hardneſs of " the Sentence. When he went in Company of his twelve Friends, to meet Pi-
" çarro, he recommended unto Rodrigo Orgonnos his General to be near at hand " with his Army in a readineſs, in caſe Piçarro ſhould attempt any thing contra" ry to Agreement, and that he ſhould be ſure to kill Hernando Piçarro, whom he " had left purpoſely in his Power, in caſe he ſhould make any Reſiſtence. Pi-
" çarro came to the place appointed with his twelve Companions, and in the " Arrere was all his Camp, with Gonzalo Piçarro; but whether this was done
" by the appointment of the Marquis, is doubtfull: Howſoever it is moſt cer" tain, that Gonzalo poſted himſelf near to Malla, and commanded Captain Nun-
" nez de Caſtro to place an Ambuſcade of forty Muſquetiers in the Woods, by " which Almagro was to paſs. It happened that Piçarro came firſt to Malla, " where meeting afterwards with Almagro, they embraced with great Joy, and " began to diſcourſe of indifferent matters; but before they had entred upon " buſineſs, one came haſtily, and told Almagro, in hearing of the Company, that " he ſhould ſpeedily be gone, for that he remained there in danger of his Life;
" whereupon without delay he mounted on Horſeback, and without ſpeaking
" one Word more, or Treaty of Buſineſs, he returned: When he diſcovered
" the Ambuſcade, he could not but believe his Eyes, and made grievous Com" plaints of Piçarro, and of the Friars, and of all that Party, terming them as ſo
" many Pilates for the Injuſtice of their Sentence. Though Piçarro was perſua-
" ded to have ſeized him, he refuſed ſo to doe, ſaying, That he had com" mitted himſelf to him under his Parole of Honour, and diſowned to have " given Order to his Brother to lay that Ambuſh, or to have ſuborned the " Friars.

And herewith Gomara concludes this Chapter; and ſo much Carate confirms of this Interview, which proved to little benefit, and ſerved to increaſe the Hatred and Indignation of both Parties; howſoever in fine, a true Underſtanding was made of this matter between Almagro and Piçarro, without any Prejudice or Paſſion, and all things were ſo well pacified and accommodated by the Endeavours of Diego de Alvarado, that Hernando Piçarro was ſet at Liberty: And it was farther agreed, That for ſending Writings and Informations into Spain about the whole Matter, the Marquis ſhould grant unto Almagro the freedom of a Port, and the convenience of a Ship, for carrying his Diſpatches, becauſe he had neither one nor other within his Juriſdiction; and in the mean time, that neither ſide ſhould enterpriſe, or attempt any thing againſt the other, untill new Orders and Commands were come from the Emperour. So Almagro, upon Bail, and Security given him by Alvarado, gave Hernando Piçarro his Liberty, though much againſt the Will and Advice of Orgonnos, who, being well acquainted with the malitious and angry humour of Hernando Piçarro, very much perſuaded the contrary; and indeed when Almagro himſelf conſidered his Errour, he would have detained him, but it was then too late; for it was commonly diſcourſed, that this turbulent Man would cauſe new Commotions, and indeed they were much in the right; for no ſooner was he ſet at Liberty, but a Breach enſued. Nor was Piçarro himſelf very fair, or clear in the performance of his Agreement; for when a new Patent was come from the Emperour, wherein, by a certain Clauſe, it was required, that both Parties ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of what they were already ſeized, and though one had gotten and intruded himſelf into the Lands of the other; yet notwithſtanding for quietneſs ſake, that matters ſhould continue in the ſame Poſture. Howſoever Piçarro having his Brother about him, and his chief Counſellour, required Almagro, in virtue of this new Patent, to quit the Countrey, which he himſelf had peopled and diſcovered. Almagro having read and conſidered that Clauſe, anſwered, That he was ready to obey the Emperour's Command, and Royal Signature, according unto which, he was to keep Poſſeſſion of Cozco, and of other places, whereof he was now the Maſter, and according thereunto he deſired that he might receive no farther Diſturbance and Moleſtation in his Enjoyment.

Hereunto

Hereunto Piçarro replied, that the Emperour's meaning was, that every one ſhould enjoy that whereof he was peaceably poſſeſſed, and not that which was taken by force of Arms, under which the Government of the new Kingdom of Toledo would fall; and therefore he required him immediately to quit and abandon Cozco, and other parts in diſpute, or otherwiſe, that he would chaſe him from thence by force of Arms; for ſince the arrival of the Emperour's late Determination, the Engagements and Securities he had given of Truce, did all ceaſe and expire. But Almagro remaining firm and poſitive in his firſt Reſolutions, Piçarro marched with all his Army to Chincha, of which his Commanders were ſuch, as before related, and his chief Counſellour was Hernando, his pretence at firſt being onely to diſpoſſeſs his Enemies of Chincha, to which he had a clear and an undoubted Title.

Almagro fearing the force of his Enemies, and not willing to engage with them, retreated towards Cozco; and leſt they ſhould purſue him too cloſe in the Rere, he cut the Bridges, and obſtructed the ways, and fortified himſelf in Gnitara, a craggy and mountainous Countrey. Piçarro marched cloſe after him, and having a better, and a more numerous Army, Fernando Piçarro, by the benefit of the night, climbed the mountain with his Muſquetiers, and gained the Paſs. Almagro by theſe means being in a bad condition, marched away with all ſpeed poſſible, leaving Orgonnos to bring up the Rere, and to retreat as orderly as he could, without fighting, the which he performed accordingly, though, as Chriſtopher de Sotelo, and others, report, he had better have given Battel to the Piçarriſts, who were, as it were, ſea-ſick, being trouble with a kind of vomiting. For it was very ordinary for the Spaniards, when at firſt they came out of the warm, or rather, hot Plains, and aſcended to the tops of the ſnowy Mountains, to be taken with a kind of dizzineſs in the Head, and ſickneſs in their Stomachs, as if they were Sea-ſick, ſuch change there is, and alteration of Air, in ſo ſhort a diſtance of place. In fine, Almagro having joined all his Force into one Body, marched directly for Cozco, brake all the Bridges behind him, cauſed Armour to be made of Silver and Copper, with Muſquets, and other Fire-arms; provided the City with Victuals, and repaired the outworks, and old Fortifications, &c.

Thus far are the Words of Gomara, which are confirmed by Carate, though with more brevity. And becauſe theſe Authours to avoid tediouſneſs are ſo ſhort in the relation of theſe particulars, that they become obſcure, we ſhall in the following Chapter ſerve the Reader with a Coment, and enlarge thereupon as the matter requires.

CHAP. XXXVI.

A farther Narrative of what hath been formerly mentioned; and how Hernando Piçarro marched againſt Don Diego de Almagro.

AS we have formerly ſaid, Diego de Alvarado was very much a Gentleman, and a Perſon of great Senſe and Moderation; and indeed he ſhewed himſelf ſo to be, in all his Negotiations of things which we have already related, of what we are now treating, and of what remain for our future Diſcourſe; and had not the Paſſions of the Governours exceeded all the Bounds of Reaſon, he had by his Wiſedom and Diſcretion produced a true and a right underſtanding between them. For when he obſerved, that the Sentence given by the Friars, did rather ſerve to enflame than appeaſe the Differences, he vigorouſly interpoſed, and frequently paſſing from one to the other, he at length produced a good Underſtanding and Peace between them; for it was by his Interceſſion, that Almagro gave Hernando Piçarro his Liberty; and that the Marquis yielded to afford a Ship, and a free Paſs-port to Almagro's Meſſenger, which was ſent into Spain: And to the end that this Peace might be eſtabliſhed for ever, he cauſed all three of them to ſwear unto the maintenance of the Articles, and to oblige them the more firmly thereunto, he himſelf would become Guarranty to both Parties; ſuppoſing, that out of reſpect to him, and in obſervance of their Oaths, as Chriſtians, and of their Paroles, as Gentlemen, they would never violate what they had ſo ſolemnly proteſted. Wherefore Gomara ſaith, that the Peace was made at the Inſtance and Interceſſion of Diego de Alvarado; who moreover became Caution and Guarranty for the ſame. But Orgonnos was he who declared himſelf againſt the ſetting of Hernando at Liberty; and when he ſaw that Almagro was reſolved to doe it, Sir, ſaid he, (as if he had preſaged his Ruine) you may looſe the Bull if you pleaſe, and then, you ſhall find, that he will attack and kill you, without reſpect to his Word or Oath.

As to what Gomara relates of the Souldiers of Piçarro, that they were like Men, that were Seaſick, we muſt underſtand, that thoſe who are freſh Men or lately come out of Spain, (in the Language of Barlovento are called Chapetones,) and thoſe who are inured to the Countrey are termed Baquianos;) theſe, I ſay, after they have reſided ſome time in the Plain, which are by the Sea-coaſt, and come to the Mountains, are preſently ſeized with a Sickneſs, like thoſe at Sea, and according to the different Complexions and Conſtitutions of Men, it is much worſe; for at firſt they will remain a day or two without eating or drinking, and not able to ſtand on their Legs, but continually vomit whatſoever they have in their Stomaches; and beſides, the brightneſs of the Snow ſo dazles their Eyes, that for two or three days they become perfectly blind, though afterwards they recover their ſight again. The Reaſon hereof they attribute to the ſudden change of Air from one Extreme to the other, that is, from the hot Plains, to the cold Cordillera, or the ſnowy tops of the Mountains, for it is not above ſix hours travel from one Region to the other; and it is farther obſervable, that thoſe who deſcend from the Mountain into the Plains, are not affected with this Alteration.

Acoſta, in his Treatiſe concerning this Mountain-ſickneſs, deſcribes the Cauſes and Effects of it much at large in the third Book of his Natural Hiſtory of the Indies, unto which I refer the Reader. Matters being in this poſture, had the Counſel which Chriſtopher de Sotelo, and others, gave to Orgonnos, been followed, which was to have faln upon the Enemy in that condition, when they were weak and ſick, they might, without much reſiſtence, have been defeated; which Carate confirms in theſe Words.

Rodrigo

" Rodrigo Orgonnos having no Orders from the Governour to engage, loſt his ad" vantage; which if he had done, it is probable he might have had ſucceſs; for " the Army of Piçarro was ſo weakned with the Snows, beſides other inconve" niencies of the Mountains, that they were in no condition to make reſiſtence:
" Wherefore the Marquis haſtned into the Plains, and Almagro unto Cozco, &c, Thus far Carate.

Almagro in the inſtructions given to his General, ordered him not to fight, but upon conſtraint; for theſe two Governours had always inclinations to agree, and not drive matters to the extremity of a breach, as may be obſerved ever ſince their meeting at Cozco, before Almagro departed for Chili, when between themſelves all the flames of difference were extinguiſhed: the like paſſed at Malla, where, as both the Hiſtorians agree, they chearfully embraced each other with all the kindneſs and affection imaginable, and diſcourſed of indifferent matters with pleaſure and delight: And this good correſpondence continued, untill wicked Incendiaries interpoſed, who repreſenting every action with an evil face, incited and precipitated them to ſuch deſtructive reſolutions, as were afterwards fatal and ruinous to them both: Nor did theſe pernicious Counſellours reap any benefit thereby unto themſelves, but being involved in the ſame calamities, were enſnared (as is uſual) in their own devices. But to proceed, Carate in the 11th Chapter of his third Book, hath theſe Words:

" The Marquis remaining with his whole Army in the Plains, juſt upon the " turn of the Mountain; he found that there was a great diverſity of opinions
" amongſt his Officers, concerning the manner and way that they were to proceed;
" at length it was reſolved, That Hernando Piçarro, in quality of Lieutenant-" General, ſhould march with the Army unto Cozco, and that his Brother Gon-
" çalo ſhould be Commander in Chief; and that being arrived there, he ſhould " declare, that his intention and deſign of that Expedition was in compliance with " Juſtice, to reſtore thoſe Citizens to their Eſtates and Commands over the In- " dians, who had been deprived and baniſhed from thence by the force and uſur" pation of Almagro. In this manner the Army proceeding on their march to" wards Cozco, and the Marquis returning to the City of los Reyes; Hernando Pi-
" çarro came at length near to Cozco, where the Officers adviſed, as moſt conve" nient, to pitch their Camp in the Plains for that Night; but Hernando was of a
" contrary opinion, and would Quarter within the Mountain: So ſoon as it was
" Day, Orgonnos appeared in the Field with the Forces of Almagro drawn up in Bat-
" talia: His Captains of Horſe were Francis de Chaves, John Tello, Vincent de Gue- " vara, (or rather Vaſco de Guevara) and Francis de Chaves was elder Brother to " another of the ſame name, who was an intimate and familiar friend to the " Marquis. On the ſide of the Mountain ſome Spaniards were drawn up, with " a great number of Indians, who at that time ſerved for Auxiliaries: All the " Friends and Servants of the Marquis, who were Priſoners at Cozco, were crou-
" ded into two Angles of the Fortreſs, which being a Priſon ſo ſtrait, as could " not contain the number of the people, ſome of them were preſſed and crouded " to death in the place.
" The next Day in the Morning, after Maſs, Gonçalo Piçarro, with his Army,
" deſcended into the Plain, where they diſpoſed their Troops into ſeveral Batta" lions, and in that order marched towards the City, intending to draw up his " Men upon a Hill, which over-topped the Caſtle; upon ſuppoſition, that Alma- " gro diſcovering his force, would ſcarce adventure to give him Battel; which he " deſired to avoid, knowing how much depended on the ſucceſs thereof; but Ro-
" drigo Orgonnos having no ſuch thoughts, attended his coming in the open way
" with his Army and Artillery, &c.

Thus far are the Words of Carate, which are confirmed by Lopez de Gomara: To which we ſhall add ſome things which theſe Authours have omitted, and are worthy to be remembred, and may ſerve for the more clear underſtanding of this Hiſtory. And as to the firſt, which was the place where the Battel was fought, we ſay it was an errour of thoſe who relate it to have been on the Hill, which over-looks the Fortreſs: For certainly the Engagement was in that Plain which the

the Indians call Cachipampa, which ſignifies the Field of Salt, and is ſituate about a League diſtant to the Southward from the Fortreſs, near to a pleaſant Fountain of ſaltiſh Water; of which the Inhabitants of the City, and parts adjacent, bringing the ſtreams into ſeveral Salt-pans, make great abundance of Salt: And theſe Works of Salt lying between the City, and the place where the Fight was, they called it the Battel of the Salinas.

Orgonnos drew up his Men into Battalia, with intention to dye with his Sword in his hand: And though the Enemy was much more ſtrong than his Army, both in Men and Arms; yet having been a Souldier in Italy, where he had ſeen much ſervice, and had vanquiſhed in a ſingle Combat a Cavalier, who was a famous Commander; he did not in the leaſt droop in his courage, or ſhew any inconſtancy, or fear of mind: And being a ſtout Souldier, he ſomething reſented, and was heartily piqued at a Meſſage which Hernando Piçarro had ſent him two Days before, becauſe it appeared ſomething like a challenge; being to give him notice, that he, and a certain Companion, would enter the Battel on Horſe-back, armed with Coats of Male, over which they would wear a ſlaſhed Coat of Orange-coloured Velvet; of which he thought fit to give him notice, that in caſe he, or any other, had an intention to engage with him, he might diſtinguiſh him by thoſe Signals.

This Meſſage Hernando was induced to ſend on the ſcore of ſome Indignities, which he remembred and reſented ever ſince the time of his Impriſonment. Orgonnos taking this for a challenge, called Captain Pedro de Lerma to him, whom he knew to be an Enemy to the Piçarros, and one who ever ſince the buſineſs at Amancay, had excluded himſelf from all poſſibility of reconciliation with them; and told him, ſaying, Our Enemy is ſo confident of his Force, that he already triumphs for his Victory, giving us the ſigns by which we may know his Perſon.

Now in regard our Army is inferiour to his in Number, though ſuperiour in Courage and Bravery, ſo that we have little hopes to ſubdue him; howſoever, let us at leaſt raviſh the enjoyment of Victory out of his hands, nor ſuffer him, whatſoever comes of it, to ſee that joyfull day: They are, as they ſay, two Companions, ſo and ſo habited: Let you and I Encounter them with ſuch reſolution, as that they may be ſlain by our hands; ſo ſhall we wipe off this affront, and not dye unrevenged. With this reſolution they prepared themſelves for the Battel, which ſhortly enſued with great effuſion of bloud and cruelty, as will appear in the Chapters following.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the bloudy Battel of the Salinas.

Rodrigo Orgonnos, to perform the part of a good Souldier, put his Forces the next Morning, very early, into order of Battel, his Infantry he reduced to one Battalion, ſupported on each Wing by his Harquebuſiers, which were few in number, and much leſs than thoſe on the contrary ſide, which was the cauſe that he loſt the day. The Captains of the Foot were Chriſtopher de Sotelo, Hernando de Alvarado, John de Moſcoſo, and Diego de Salinas. The Horſe were divided into two Squadrons, the one Commanded by John Tello, and Vaſco de Guevara, and the other by Francis de Chaves, and Ruy Dias. Orgonnos being Commander in Chief, did not oblige himſelf to any particular rank, being to be preſent, and aſſiſting at every action of the Field, and deſigned with his companion Pedro de Lerma to ſeek for Hernando de Piçarro, and fight with him. His Artillery he planted on one ſide, of the Squadrons, where it might moſt annoy the Enemy: before them was a ſtream of Water, which ran through all thoſe Plains, and a Mooriſh ſort of plaſhy ground, which made the Acceſs of the Enemy to them to be ſomething difficult.

On the other ſide Pedro de Valdivia, who was Major-General, and Antonio de Campo Sergeant-Major, diſpoſed their Forces in the ſame order, as might anſwer that of Rodrigo Orgonnos. Their Battalion of Foot was flanked on each Wing with good numbers of Harquebuſiers, who were thoſe that did the work, and gained the Victory of that day: Their Horſe were drawn up into two Squadrons, of a hundred in each, againſt thoſe of Orgonnos. Hernando Piçarro, with his Companion Franciſco de Barahona, were in the Front of one of the Squadrons of Horſe, and Alonſo de Alvarado at the Head of the other; and Gonzalo Piçarro as General of the Infantry reſolved to fight on Foot. In which order marching againſt the Almagrians, they reſolutely paſſed both the ſtream of Water and the Moor, without any oppoſition of the Enemy; for they had given them firſt ſuch a Volly of ſmall ſhot, as had very much diſordered them, and put them into that confuſion, that they might eaſily be routed; for both Horſe and Foot retreated from their ground to avoid the ſhot of the Harquebuſiers; which when Orgonnos obſerved, he doubted much of the Victory, and gave order for the Artillery to play upon them; which ſucceeded ſo well, that one ſhot carried off a whole rank of five Men at once; which ſo diſmayed the Enemy, that had four or five in the like manner followed, they might have defeated that whole Squadron. But Gonzalo Piçarro, and his Major-General Valdivia appearing in the Front, forced the Souldiers forwards, and commanded them to charge the Enemy's Pikes with their Copper ſhot; for as the Souldiers of Almagro were more numerous in their Pikes, ſo thoſe of Piçarro availed themſelves moſt of their Harquebuſiers, and aimed much to defeat their Pikes, that their Horſe might afterwards charge them with leſs danger. And ſo accordingly it ſucceeded, for as Carate and Gomara relate, fifty of their Pikes were broken with two Vollies of ſhot.

The Copper Bullets (for information of thoſe who have never ſeen them) are caſt in a common Mould like others: They take a third or a fourth part of Iron-wire, and at each end of this Wire they make a little hook for a link, and put the end of the two Hooks into the middle of the Mould: Then to divide the Mould into two parts, they ſeparate it with leaf of Copper or Iron as thin as Paper; then they pour in the melted Lead, which incorporates it ſelf with the links of Iron, and divides the Bullet in two parts, faſtned with the Iron links. Then when they ram them into the Gun, they joyn them like one Bullet; and when they are ſhot out, they ſpread themſelves to the length of the Chain, and cut all before them. By theſe means, as the Hiſtorians ſay, they did great execution upon the Pikes, for without this invention they could never have done half this miſchief. Howſoever, they did not aim at the Pikemen themſelves, but at their Pikes, that they might ſhew what they were able to do, and what advantage they had over them in their Arms.

This

This invention of Chain-bullets was brought from Flanders to Peru by Pedro de Vergara, with the Guns which were made for them. I remember to have seen some of them in my own Countrey; and in Spain I have seen them, and made them; and there I was acquainted with a Gentleman called Alonſo de Loayſa, a Native of Truxillo, who was wounded in that Battel, having his lower jaw, with his teeth and gums, carried away with one of thoſe Bullets; he was the Father of Franciſco Loayſa, who lives this day at Cozco, and is one of thoſe few Sons of the Conquerours which remain and enjoy the inheritance and portion divided to their Fathers: and according to this form, I have ſeen others like theſe made for Cannon.

But to return to our Story of the Battel. Rodrigo de Orgonnos, and his Comrade Pedro de Lerma, obſerving the great execution which the Harquebuſiers made upon their people, charged the Squadron of Horſe, commanded by Hernando Piçarro, hoping to find, and kill him, which was the ultimate end of their expectation, for they perceived that the Victory began to incline to the ſide of their Enemies; and ſetting themſelves juſt in the Front of Hernando, and his Companion, whom they diſtinguiſhed, and knew by their Coats of Incarnation-Velvet, they charged them with great bravery and reſolution. Orgonnos, who carried his Lance in its Reſt full-butt againſt Franciſco de Barahona, happened to direct it right upon * the Beaver which covered his face; which being made of a mixture, between Silver and Copper, opened with the blow, and gave paſſage to the Lance which ran into his head; with which falling to the ground, Orgonnos proceeded forward, and ran another with his Lance into the breaſt; and then laying his hand to his Sword, he had performed Miracles in his own Perſon; but that an unlucky Chain, or Partridge-ſhot, from the Harquebuſiers, ſtrook him in the forehead, with which he loſt both his ſight and force. Pedro de Lerma, and Hernando Piçarro, encountred each other with their Lances; but being mounted on Gennets, they fixed them not in the Reſts, but in another manner; which was this: At that time, and long after, during all the time of the Civil Wars, the Spaniards made certain Caſes, or Holſters of Leather, which were faſtned to the bow of the Saddle, and reached to the neck of the Horſe; and then putting the end of the Lance into the Holſter, they brought it under the Arme like a Reſt. In this manner paſſed many brave Combats between the Spaniards in Peru; for the Encounters, or Juſts, were with all the force both of Man and Horſe; but all this needed not againſt the Indians, whoſe Skins were pierced with a more eaſie ſtroke of the Arme. We have judged fit to give this account of the offenſive and defenſive Arms of my Countrey, for the better underſtanding of what is hereafter to be treated. But to return unto the Combat between Hernando Piçarro, and Pedro de Lerma, it happened in this manner: The Lances of both the Duelliſts being very long, and therefore more pliant, or not ſo ſtiff as they deſired, both of them aimed low at each other; ſo that Hernando Piçarro ſorely wounded his Enemy in the thigh, piercing the Coat of Male which covered it. Pedro de Lerma wounded Piçarro's Horſe in the Forehead, which razed the skin, and with the ſharp point of the Lance cut the head-ſtall of the Horſe; and then making a ſecond charge, he happened to bear upon the pummel of the Saddle with ſuch force, that though it were made for War, yet it broke and gave way to the Lance, which paſſing forward, pierced the Coat of Male, and wounded Piçarro in the belly, though not mortally; for the Horſe being over-born, fell backwards to the ground; by which means yielding to the force of the ſtroke, he ſaved his life, which otherwiſe had been in great danger; for had the Lance found full reſiſtence, it had paſſed quite thorow his Entrails.

* In Peru, for want of Bergandines, or Head-pieces, they wore a ſort of Armour for their Face like a croſs Bar.

On this occaſion both our Hiſtorians having juſt cauſe to applaud the Proweſs and Valour of Orgonnos, do almoſt uſe the ſame words. Auguſtine Carate in the Encomium which he gives of him, ſaith as follows:

"In this Fight Rodrigo Orgonnos was wounded with a Chain-ſhot in the fore"head, which paſſed the Beaver of his Head-piece: and yet after this wound he "killed two Men with his Lance; and with his Rapier he ran another into the "mouth, who was a Servant to Hernando Piçarro, miſtaking him for the Maſter, "by reaſon of his good Habit. Thus far Carate.

And

And here it is to be noted, that he who ſent a Narrative of this Battel into Spain, muſt have been an Enemy to Piçarro, becauſe the Relation he gave thereof was to the prejudice of that party; for he reports, that Hernando Piçarro had cloathed a Servant of his with the ſame Habit which he pretended to wear on the day of Battel, that ſo thoſe who fought for him, might reak their fury on his Servant, and ſuffer him to eſcape; which if it had been true, he might have deſerved the diſgrace and character of Coward: But though this Story was abſolutely falſe, yet it ſo far prevailed in Spain, and over all Peru, that the Royal Council of the Indies to be truly informed of the matter, ſent for a famous Souldier, who was preſent at the Battel on Almagro's ſide, called Silveſtre Gonzalez; and amongſt other things demanded of him, they asked, Whether in Peru Hernando Piçarro was eſteemed for a Coward? In reply unto which, though the Souldier was of the adverſe party, yet he averred all that which was reported of Hernando Piçarro, touching the Combat which he and his Companions fought, and related it in the ſame manner as we have done; adding, that ſuch was the common fame and report concerning the particulars of that Battel. This paſſed at Madrid towards the latter years of the Impriſonment of Hernando Piçarro, which were twenty three in all; and this Souldier himſelf acquainted me with what he had declared to the King's Council of the Indies: But that which gave the firſt colour to this ſcandalous report, was (as he ſaid) the term of Servant, which we call a Companion; for it was ſaid, that he was richly cloathed; and ſo it was true, for he was habited exactly like Piçarro, wearing a Coat of Incarnation-coloured Velvet, which was very much ſlaſhed: Thus far was very true, but then that wherein the miſtake lay, was, that this Perſon was a Servant, and not a Companion.

But to proceed: When the Souldiers of Hernando Piçarro ſaw their Commander on the ground, they believed that he was killed; and then preſently the Armies began to engage, and fought with ſuch bravery, that a great ſlaughter enſued on both ſides; for they killed and wounded each other with extreme fury and deſpair, forgetting that they were of the ſame Nation and Religion, or Brothers and Companions in Arms; and that they had entred into Articles of Agreement and Brother-hood for the Conqueſt of that Empire. The Victory continued for a much longer time doubtfull than was believed; for though the Almagrians were much inferiour in their Numbers, yet the others being equal in their Courage and Art of War, made great reſiſtence; but the advantage which the other party had by their Harquebuſes was ſo great, that with the loſs of many lives they at laſt yielded; and after moſt of them were killed and wounded, the reſt were put to flight; when in the purſuit the cruelty and ſlaughter was greater than in the Battel, not pardoning thoſe who were already conquered, and had yielded to their force; as Carate and Gomara do both avouch, one in the 11th Chapter of the third Book, and the other in the Chap. 141. the Words of which are theſe which follow.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of the fatal Conſequences which enſued after the Battel of Salinas.

" THE Armies of Almagro, and Gonzalo Piçarro, joyned Battel, and both " ſides, like Spaniards, fought with much Bravery; but at length the " Piçarriſts prevailed, who made uſe of their Victory with much cruelty and ſe-
" verity, which, in excuſe, they attribute to the revenge they deſigned, for the " defection which was made from Alvarado at the bridge of Amancay. Orgonnos
" having yielded himſelf Priſoner unto two Cavaliers, another came and fell up" on him, and killed him: When Captain Ruydiaz was taken, and quarter given " him, one came behind and paſſed his body thorough with his Lance; in the " ſame manner many others were killed, after they had thrown away their Arms,
" and Quarter given them. Samaniego ſtabbed Pedro de Lerma by night in his bed.
" Many died fighting, with their Swords in their hands, of which the Captains
" were Moſcoſo, Salinas, and Hernando de Alvarado, beſides ſuch a number of Spa-
" niards, that had the Indians (as was talked) fallen upon thoſe few that remain" ed, they might eaſily have become Maſters of them all: But they were ſo bu-
" ſie, and taken up in ſtripping the dead, whom they left naked; and in plun" dering the Tents and Baggage, which were not guarded, for every one was em" ployed in the purſuit, that they had no leiſure to think of this advantage. Al-
" magro, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition of health, did not engage perſonally in the " Battel, but ſtood on the ſide of a Hill to behold the ſucceſs; which when he " perceived to have been fatal to himſelf, he fled to the Fortreſs of Cozco; where
" being purſued and taken by Gonzalo Piçarro, and Alonſo de Alvarado, they caſt " him into the ſame Priſon, wherein they themſelves had been detained, and " held by him. Thus far are the Words of Gomara, with which he concludes that Chapter.

Amongſt the many remarkable paſſages which happened that day, of which ſome are omitted by this Authour; we ſhall add others not unworthy to be noted. One whereof is this; A certain Cavalier carrying behind him on his Horſe, Hernando de Sotelo (who was Kinſman of Chriſtopher Sotelo) for his Priſoner, to whom he had given Quarter, there came a Souldier, and ſhot him with his Carbine through the back, the Bullet wounding, though not mortally, the perſon which rid before him. This, they ſay, was done in revenge, for that counſel which his Kinſman Chriſtopher de Sotelo gave to Orgonnos, adviſing him (as we have before mentioned) to attack the Forces of Hernando Piçarro, when they were ſick, and giddy with the Air of the Mountains. Wherefore when one of the Souldiers cried out, Here they bring Sotelo; the Harquebuſier thinking it to have been Chriſtopher Sotelo, he ſhot him in the back, ſuppoſing thereby to have performed acceptable ſervice, by killing a Man ſo generally hated. Many other cruelties were committed by the Conquerours after the Battel, unworthy the Dignity of the Spaniſh Nation; for more Men were ſlain in cold bloud, than in the heat of the Fight.

Another piece of cruelty was the Death of Pedro de Lerma, which being in an extraordinary manner barbarous, is fit to be obſerved. Lerma (as we have ſaid) being forced to quit the Field, both by reaſon of the wound he had received from Hernando Piçarro, and others, which were given him in the late Fight; he was carried to the Houſe of a certain Gentleman, who was a friend of his, called Pedro de los Rios, with whom I was acquainted when I was very young; he was of as noble, and as ancient a Family, as any was in Cordova, of which there are many in that Royal City.

A certain

A certain Souldier, named John de Samaniego, who had formerly been affronted by Pedro de Lerma, made enquiry after him, that he might take a revenge for the affront: Two days after the Battel he was informed that he lay wounded in the House of Pedro de los Rios; and going thither with the insolence of a victorious Souldier, he found free entrance into the House, for in this time of War there was none to oppose him; so that he went from Chamber to Chamber, untill he came to a poor Bed on which de Lerma was laid; sitting thereupon, he began to discourse with much sobriety and phlegm:

" Senior Pedro de Lerma, said he, I am come in satisfaction to my Honour, to " kill you, for a box o'th' Ear which you once gave me. Sir, answered Pedro de " Lerma, you may well remember, that you were the first Aggressour, and that by " your insolencies you gave me just provocation. It can be little or no satisfac- " tion to your Honour to kill a Man that is wounded, and dying in his bed. If " God shall spare my life, I do here Vow, and engage my Faith to give you all " the satisfaction you shall require either by word of mouth, or in writing, with " all the formalities and circumstances which the Rules of Souldiers can require " in reparation of Honour. No, Zounds, said Samaniego, I will not stay so long, " but I will kill you presently, for my Honour requires it. I deny that, replied " Lerma, for you must rather lose than gain Honour by killing a Man who is " half dead already: but if I live, I will give you entire satisfaction.

These were the precise Words both of one and the other, which were repeated three or four times, the one threatning death, and the other promising satisfaction. At length when Pedro de Lerma imagined that his Adversary was contented with his promise, and with the satisfaction he had offered him according to the formalities and rules of a Souldier; Samaniego arose, and laying his hand upon his Dagger, gave him many stabs therewith untill he died; afterwards going out into the Market-place, he boasted, how in satisfaction of his Honour he had stabbed Captain Pedro de Lerma: And farther to magnifie the glory of his Exploit, he recounted word for word all the discourse which had passed between them, and how often the same words were repeated; with which he was troublesome to all that heard him, for he would admit of no other discourse wheresoever he was, than onely the vapours and boasts he made of this Action; in which impertinency he continued, untill his insolence effected his ruine; and that as he was authour of his crime, so he brought the punishment of it on his own head. The manner whereof we shall relate in this place; for though it be out of the order of time; yet not to lose the opportunity of affecting the minds of the Readers with a detestation of the mercileſs bowels of this Samaniego, whose villany was abominated in all parts of Peru, it will be most seasonable to deliver a Narrative of it, as follows.

Five years after this villany was perpetrated, when the Kingdom was quiet, and in peace, and freed from the Dissentions between the Piçarrists and Almagrians: John de Samaniego was then an Inhabitant in Puerto Viejo, where, according to his usual practice, he still continued to magnifie the glory of his Exploits, vapouring at every turn, that he had in satisfaction of his Honour killed a Captain with his Dagger, who had been Lieutenant-General of the Governour Don Francisco Piçarro, and that none durst ever question him for it, adding moreover many things of intolerable insolences. The Governour, who was chief Justiciary of this place, being tired out with the incessant repetition of these matters, gave Samaniego to understand by a certain friend of his, that it were better, and more agreeable to his Honour, to bury these matters in silence, than to make farther talk of them; for that since he had revenged the injury, he should remain contented, and enlarge no farther on that unpleasant subject. Samaniego, instead of taking this kind admonition in good part, was violently enraged; and going into the Market-place, espied the Governour with about fifteen or twenty Spaniards, (for there were very few more Inhabitants in that Town) and as they were discoursing pleasantly together, he accosted the company, and with an angry Look said,

" 'Tis well that there wants not thoſe who are agrieved at the ſatisfaction which " was given to my Honour, by the Death of Pedro de Lerma: Whoſoever he is, let " him ſpeak clearly in publick, and not in ſecret and obſcure Whiſpers; for by " Heavens I am a Man who dare anſwer him, and give him as many ſtabs, as I " did to Pedro de Lerma. The Governour knowing that he meant and aimed at him, preſently made up to him, and taking hold of the Collar of his Doublet, cried out with a loud voice, I ſeize you in the King's Name, and I charge you all to aſſiſt the Juſtice againſt a Traytour and a Murtherer. Whereupon all that were preſent took hold on Samaniego, and put him in Priſon; for every one hated him, being tired with his inſolences. Hereupon the Governour made Proceſs againſt him by examination and teſtimony of four Witneſſes: the ſubſtance whereof was this; That they had heard Samaniego ſay, that he had killed Pedro de Lerma, who was one of his Majeſty's Captains, and who had performed great Service to the Crown in the late Conqueſt, having executed the Office of Lieutenant-General to Marquis Piçarro; and that he killed him not in the Battel, but as he lay wounded in his bed: Being accuſed upon this Indictment, he was found guilty, and condemned to dye; during the time of which Trial, the Indians having erected a Gallows for him, he was brought forth to puniſhment; and the Indians having in their own Language proclaimed his Crime, were the Executioners alſo to hang him up: which was a piece of Juſtice applauded by all who ſaw and heard of it.

But to return again to our Hiſtory. The Indians did not execute the deſign they had agreed, which was to kill all the Spaniards after the Battel, which they imagined might have been done, after they were weakned by the common ſlaughter: For God, who intended by their means to propagate the Holy Goſpel in thoſe parts, prevented that intention by diſſention amongſt the Indians themſelves; for that the Indians, who were the Menial and Domeſtick Servants of the Spaniards, being affected with a natural Loyalty to their Maſters, would not conſent to the Maſſacre of them, but rather judged themſelves obliged to defend and fight for them; for the remembrance of what was encharged them by Huayna Capac, and Manco Inca, occurred ſtill to their minds, by which they believed, that an obligation lay on them to ſerve and obey the Spaniards. Thus did the diviſion between the Indian Servants, and the others, prevent the execution of their deſign; from which alſo little ſucceſs could have been expected, conſidering that they had no Head, or General, to conduct them: And if they had had one, yet, as Hiſtories ſay, the Indians, who were on the ſide of the Conquerours, would not well have accorded with thoſe who were vanquiſhed.

This Battel happened on the 6th of April 1538, which being on a Saturday, which was the day after the Feaſt of Lazarus, the Spaniards conceived a particular devotion for that Saint; and in remembrance thereof built and dedicated a Church to him in thoſe Plains where this Battel was fought, and which was ſtanding when I departed from thence. Within this Church the Bodies of all thoſe who were ſlain, both of one ſide and the other, were interred: And though ſome alledge, that the Battel happened on the 26th of April, I cannot but believe that it was an Errour of the Printer, who inſtead of 6, put down 26. Blas Valera deſcribing the Grandure of the City of Cozco, touches ſome particulars relating to this Battel, and ſays:

" That in thoſe Plains there is a Church dedicated to St. Lazarus, where for " a long time lay interred the Bodies of thoſe who were ſlain in that Fight. Af- " terwards a Spaniard, who was one of the Conquerours, a Perſon both Noble " and Religious, was accuſtomed to reſort frequently thither to pray for the " Souls of thoſe who were interred in that place. And having continued this " devotion for a long time, at length he happened to hear ſighs and deep groans " from the Vaults of the Church, and therewith appeared before him the Perſon " of one of his friends, which had been there ſlain; but he ſaid nothing more to " him, than onely to intreat him, that he would continue his viſits to that Church " frequently at certain Hours both by Day and Night. At firſt the Spaniard was " poſſeſſed with great fear at the ſight of this Apparition, but at length being

" accu-

" accuſtomed thereunto, and encouraged by Admonitions and Directions from " Father Andrew Lopez, who was a Jeſuit, and his Confeſſour, he continued his " Devotions of Prayer not onely for his friend, but for all thoſe who were there " buried, without any concernment or diſtraction of mind; exhorting likewiſe " others to join with him both in their Prayers and Alms. And afterwards, by " the advice and example of this Perſon, the Meſtizos, who were the Sons of " Spaniards, begotten on the Bodies of Indian Women, did in the year 1581, " tranſport the Bones of their Fathers from that place to the City of Cozco, where " they buried them in an Hoſpital, and cauſed many Maſſes, Alms, and other " pious Works to be celebrated and performed for them; to which all the City " concurring with a general Alacrity, from that time forward the Viſion ceaſed " to appear. Thus far are the Words of Blas Valera.

And now to complete the ſum of all theſe Cruelties after this unhappy Battel, there remains nothing more to be related than onely the Tragedy of Don Diego de Almagro himſelf; the conſequence of which was the total deſtruction of both the Governours, with their Confidents and Abettours, in which calamity the common Welfare of Peru was involved. In which Relation both the Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that is to ſay, Carate in the 12th Chapter of his third Book, and Gomara in Chapter 142, have theſe Words, which are extracted verbatim in ſuch manner as we have recited them in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Tragical Death of Don Diego de Almagro.

" THis Victory being obtained, and Almagro taken, one ſide was enriched, " and the other impoveriſhed; which is the natural conſequence of a Ci- " vil War, waged between Citizens and Relations in Bloud and Conſanguinity. " Fernando Piçarro immediately took poſſeſſion of Cozco, though not without much " diſcontent and murmurings of the people; for though he ſhared the ſpoils a- " mongſt them, yet there not being ſufficient to ſatisfie the expectations of eve- " ry perſon, Mutinies were feared; to prevent which, the Souldiers were em- " ployed on new Conqueſts, and to make things more ſafe, the friends of Alma- " gro were joyned to the others without diſtinction: And to take away farther " cauſe, or occaſion of Faction and Mutiny, Don Diego de Almagro, Junior, was " ſent a Priſoner to the City of los Reyes; as to Almagro himſelf, Proceſs was " made againſt him, and a report was publiſhed, that he, together with his Son, " was to be ſent Priſoner to los Reyes, and thence into Spain: But whereas it was " commonly talked, that Meſa and others intended to reſcue him on the way, " which was a mere pretence to cloak the ſeverity of their proceedings, they ſen- " tenced him to Death. The crimes laid to his charge, were, that he had entred " Cozco by force of Arms; that he had cauſed the effuſion of much Spaniſh " Bloud; that he had entred into a ſecret Treaty with Mango Inga againſt the " Spaniards; that he had given and preſcribed Limits for Government and Juriſ- " diction without licence from the Emperour; that he had broken all his Arti- " cles and Oaths; that contrary to the Peace of their Sovereign Lord the King he " had fought two Battels, one at Abancay, and the other at Salinas; beſides divers " other Miſdemeanours committed by him of leſſer moment. Almagro grievouſly " reſented the ſeverity of this ſentence, and made ſuch ſad lamentations there- " upon, as were ſufficient to draw Tears from the moſt obdurate heart: And

" though he made his Appeal to the Emperour, yet Fernando (notwithſtanding " the importunities of many perſons, who earneſtly urged him thereunto) refu- " ſed to admit of his Appeal. All which not prevailing, Almagro himſelf " implored his mercy, beſeeching him to ſpare his life; in conſideration, that " when he himſelf was in his power, he had not put him to death, nor ſpilt the " bloud of his Friends or Relations. That he would remember how he had been " an inſtrument to raiſe his dear Brother to that high pitch of honour and pro- " ſperity which he now enjoyed. That he would behold, and conſider him for " an old, decayed, and gouty Man; and therefore admit of his Appeal, that he " might paſs thoſe few unhappy days which remained to him of life, within the " dark ſolitudes of a Priſon, there to lament and bewail his ſins. Ferdinando Pi- " çarro remained deaf and unmoved with all theſe preſſing inſtances, which were " ſufficient to have mollified a heart of ſteel, ſaying, that he wondered much, " that a Man of his Spirit and Courage ſhould entertain ſuch apprehenſions of " Death. To which he replied, That ſince Chriſt himſelf feared it, how much " more might the frailty of his Nature be touched with the approach thereof: " And laſtly, he conjured him by the reverence due to his old Age, which, ac- " cording to the courſe of Nature, could not long continue: Almagro was hard- " ly brought to Confeſſion, having ſtill hopes of life; but at length he ſubmit- " ted, and having confeſſed to the Prieſt, he made his Will and Teſtament, " making the King, and his Son Don Diego, his Heirs: Howſoever, he would " not own the Sentence paſſed upon him, leſt Execution ſhould immediately " follow: Nor would Fernando Piçarro allow the Appeal, both becauſe he had " received Commands from Franciſco Piçarro to the contrary, and likewiſe be- " cauſe he believed that the Council of the Indies would revoke the Sentence. " In fine, Execution was performed; and notwithſtanding all the Applications " made for him, he was ſtrangled in the Priſon, and afterwards publickly be- " headed in the Market-place at Cozco, in the year 1538.

" The Death of Almagro was greatly lamented, but by none more (unleſs " by his own Son) than by Diego de Alvarado, who was once ſecurity to Alma- " gro for Fernando Piçarro, and procured his releaſe and freedom out of Priſon; " and yet notwithſtanding all that could in gratitude, and on the ſcore of the " like uſage be pleaded for him, nothing would prevail. Wherefore Alvarado " returned to Spain to impeach Franciſco Piçarro and his Brothers, and to de- " mand ſatisfaction from Fernando for breach of promiſe; but whilſt he fol- " lowed this Suit at Valladolid, where the Court then reſided, he died, but not " without ſome ſuſpicion of Poiſon, becauſe he lay not ſick above three or " four days.

" Diego de Almagro was a Native of Almagro, it was never certainly known " who was his Father, though ſome ſay he was a Prieſt. He had never learned " letters, nor could he reade; howſoever, he was an undertaking Man, dili- " gent, and ambitious of Honour and Fame; he was free and liberal, yet not " without Affectation of vain-glory, contriving to make the World witneſſes " of his generous Actions: His Souldiers loved him for the Preſents and Lar- " geſſes he gave them, otherwiſe he was hated for the hard treatment he fre- " quently uſed towards them both in Words and corporal Puniſhments. He " remitted the Debts of a hundred thouſand Ducats, which his Souldiers owed " him, tearing and cancelling the Obligations of thoſe who were preſent with " him in Chili; which was a piece of Liberality more becoming a Prince, than " a Souldier; and yet when he was dead, there was not a Perſon that would " beſtow a Clout to cover his Wound. His Death ſeemed the more Tragi- " cal, and ſo much the more cruel, becauſe he never would put any Man " to death who had relation to Franciſco Piçarro. He never was Married, " howſoever he had a Son by an Indian Woman in Panama; he called him " by his own Name, and gave him good Education; but his end was unhappy, " as will appear hereafter.

Thus far Gomara; the which is confirmed (as we ſaid before) by Ca- rate.

And

And now on this occaſion it is neceſſary we ſhould ſay ſomething for the better underſtanding of this whole matter. After the Victory, Hernando Piçarro laboured for his own ſecurity to drive his Enemies far from him, leſt they ſhould kill him; for after the Battel the Animoſities which one ſide conceived againſt the other, were raiſed to ſuch a degree of hatred, that they paſſed the terms of all reconciliation: For though Hernando Piçarro endeavoured to the utmoſt of his power to win the affections of the moſt principal Perſons; yet ſo far was that rancour ſpread, and the malice ſo virulent, that Men publickly declared, that they wanted onely an opportunity to revenge themſelves.

On the other ſide, his friends, who found themſelves diſappointed of their vain hopes, began to fall off from him, taxing him with want of compliance, and breach of promiſe; for every one imagined mighty things, and flattered himſelf at leaſt with the Command of a Province. And though, as Gomara ſaith, Hernando gave to every one ſomething, for it was impoſſible to prefer every Man; yet the moſt part eſteemed themſelves diſobliged, and became as uneaſie and diſcontented, as the worſt of his Enemies. Wherefore, as the onely means to be freed from the inſolences of thoſe who complained, they were not ſufficiently gratified, and from the Plots of thoſe who were his profeſſed Enemies; he amuſed their minds with the thoughts of new Conqueſts, as ſhall be ſpecified in the following Chapter.

When Almagro was condemned to dye, his Eſtate was confiſcated to the uſe of his Majeſty. At firſt Hernando did not intend to put him to death, but onely having made his Proceſs to ſend him into Spain; but when he perceived that Plots were laid to cauſe his eſcape out of Priſon, and that the publick diſcourſe of the Town was, that Hernando was more to blame than Almagro, taxing him to have been the great Incentive of all the diſcords and differences between the two Governours, which had never aroſe to that heat of paſſion, had not he blown them into a flame; ſaying farther, that on the ſcore of his own private piques, and to doe himſelf juſtice, he had deveſted Almagro of his Government, who had expended more of his Eſtate, and had contributed more to the Conqueſt of that Countrey, than all thoſe who belonged to Piçarro; which were matters of ſuch high provocation, as were able to move the ſtones to riſe up in judgment againſt them.

When Hernando Picarro was certified of theſe matters, and was particularly informed, that one of his Captains called Meſa, who Commanded the Artillery, was diſcontented for want of his Pay, (as we ſhall more at large declare hereafter) and therefore deſigned to ſet Almagro at liberty, he then reſolved to put him to death, and to haſten his execution; ſuppoſing, that when he vvas once out of the vvay, all the paſſions for him vvould vaniſh, and all things return to a ſetled condition of peace and quietneſs: All which imaginations ſucceeded to the contrary, as vvill be proved by the ſequel of this Story.

Gomara ſaith, That though diligent enquiry was made to know the Father of Almagro, yet it could never be diſcovered; and in confirmation hereof, Carate adds, that being an Infant he was laid at the Church-door: the which may very well be, and yet he not be a Baſtard; for the Catholick Church preſuming that ſuch Foundlings are honeſtly and lawfully begotten, do own them capable of being admitted into Eccleſiaſtical Orders, and to the Degrees of a Prelate: And whereas Gomara alledges, that common report made him the Son of a Prieſt; it is very falſe, and a calumny raiſed by malitious and virulent tongues, which having nothing whereby to obſcure and diſgrace the luſtre and glory of his Actions, have caſt this blemiſh on his Birth without any colour or appearance of truth. Thoſe Sons, whoſe Fathers are not known, are ennobled by their own Merits and Vertue; eſpecially being of that luſtre, as were the great Actions of this General and Governour Don Diego de Almagro; which have legitimated his Birth, and added Nobility to his Family. To what end do Sons boaſt of the Atchievements of their Anceſtours, who blemiſh and obſcure their great Actions by their own Vices? for Nobility is the Parent of Virtue, and is ſupported by it. So that we may truly ſay, that Almagro was the Son of Noble Parents, for ſo his Actions declare him; and ſo great Exploits have always made the Princes of this World rich and powerfull: the truth of which hath been proved at large by what hath preceded.

In fine therefore, (as we have ſaid) this great Hero was ſtrangled in Priſon, which was ſufficient to have made an end of him; but to affect the minds of thoſe who ſaw him with greater compaſſion and ſorrow, his Body was brought forth into the Market-place, and his Throat cut there; he had paſſed the Age of ſeventy five years, and his Health was ſo broken and infirm, that had they not haſtned his Death, he could not have lived much longer. It is ſaid, that his Enemies, to ſhew their great abhorrence and deteſtation of him, had killed him twice. The Executioner in privilege of his Office, and as his Fees, ſtripped him of his Cloaths, and would alſo have taken his Shirt had it been ſuffered: And in this condition he lay expoſed in the Market-place, the greateſt part of the day, neither friend or enemy daring to diſpoſe otherwiſe of his Corpſe; for his friends, who were vanquiſhed, and in cuſtody, could not doe it; and his enemies, though touched with ſome ſenſe of grief and compaſſion, durſt not adventure upon an Action which might adminiſter occaſion of publick ſcandal. Whence we may ſee the falſeneſs of this World, and how ill it rewards the worthy Actions of deſerving Men.

At length, towards the Evening, a poor Negro, who had been the Slave of the deceaſed, came and brought a courſe Sheet, which was his own, or which he had begged; and with the help of ſome Indians, who had been the Servants of Almagro, they wrapped the Body therein, and carried it to be enterred in the Church of the Merceds, where the Friars, according to their accuſtomary Acts of Charity, buried it with many Tears in a Chapel which is under the High Altar.

Thus ended that Great Don Diego de Almagro, who hath left nothing more Memorable of his Life, than his great Actions; and of his Death, than grief and lamentations for it: the which, as it was a fore-runner of the like fate of the Marquis Piçarro, ſo the manner of his Death was agreeable thereunto, and may therewith be compared in all the circumſtances thereof, as will appear by that which follows; that ſo theſe two Companions, who had an equal ſhare in the Conqueſt and Government of this great and rich Empire of Peru, may alſo be equalized in the manner of their Deaths.

CHAP.

CHAP. XL.

Who thoſe Captains were that were employed on the New Conqueſts; the Arrival of Hernando Piçarro in Spain, and his long Impriſonment there.

SO ſoon as Hernando Piçarro had taken Almagro Priſoner, he immediately employed many of his Captains in new Conqueſts; both that thereby he might free himſelf from their importunities, who were in expectation of great and mighty rewards for their ſervices, and might alſo ſecure his own Perſon from ſuſpicion and jealouſies, which his Enemies were contriving and plotting againſt him. Pedro de Valdivia was ſent Commander in Chief, with a conſiderable Force to the Conqueſt of Chili, which was begun, but left imperfect by Almagro; the ſucceſs of which, with his proſperous and unhappy fortune, we have formerly declared in the Life of Inca Yupanqui the tenth King of Peru. Franciſco de Villagra (with whom I was acquainted) went in company with him, as did alſo Alonſo de Montroy. Captain Franciſco de Olmos, with whom went Garçilaſſo de la Vega, was ſent to the Bay of St. Matthew: Of whoſe Conqueſts and Succeſſes Gomara ſpeaks in the 143d Chapter, as follows:

" Gomez de Alvarado was employed in the Conqueſt of the Province of Guanucu; Franciſco de Chaves was ſent to ſuppreſs the Conchucos, who much infeſted " the Inhabitants about Trugillo, and in their Army carried an Idol, to which they " ſacrificed the ſpoils of their Enemies, and the bloud of Chriſtians. Pera de " Vergara marched againſt the Bracamoros, which is a Countrey, that to the North- " ward joins to the Countrey of Quitu; Perez de Vergara went to the Chachapoyas, " and Alonſo de Mercadillo to Mullubamba; but Pedro de Candia went to the High- " lands of Collao; into which, by reaſon of the difficulty and badneſs of the Coun- " trey, he could make no great progreſs; and beſides, his people fell into a Mu- " tiny, who were for the moſt part friends of Almagro, as was alſo Meſa Captain " of the Artillery to Piçarro: For which reaſon Fernando went to them; and ha- " ving accuſed Meſa of Mutiny, and with Scandalous Words againſt the Piçarros, " and with a Plot to have ſet Almagro at liberty, in caſe he had been carried to " the Marquis at los Reyes; all which having been proved againſt him, he put him " to Death. The three hundred Men which belonged to Pedro de Candia he gave " to Perançures, and ſent him forward to the Conqueſt of that Countrey. In this " manner all the Spaniards were employed, and in a very ſhort time enlarged their " Conqueſt, at leaſt three hundred Leagues in length from Eaſt to Weſt, though " with the death and loſs of Multitudes of people. Fernando and Gonçalo Piçarro " ſubdued the Collao, which is a Countrey wherein Gold ſo much abounds, that " they Wainſcoat the in-ſides of their Chapels, and Chambers with Plates of " Gold; and therein is a ſort of Sheep, which have ſome reſemblance of a Ca- " mel, and ſomething of a Deer. Thus far Gomara, who farther on in the ſame Chapter adds:

" Fernando Piçarro, ſaith he, returned to Cozco, where he met with Franciſco Pi- " çarro, whom he had not ſeen ſince the Impriſonment of Almagro. After they " had entertained diſcourſe for ſeveral Days, concerning the matters lately paſt, " and what was farther to be done in order to the Government: It was determi- " ned that Fernando ſhould go into Spain to render a true information unto the Em- " perour of all matters which had paſſed, and to carry with him the Fifths of all " which belonged to his Majeſty, with an account of the Revenue, as it was late- " ly augmented. Many of his friends who knew the true ſtate of matters, and " how ill the Death of Almagro would be reſented by the Emperour, diſſuaded

" Fernando from this intention, eſpecially ſince Diego de Alvarado was then reſiding " at the Court, and ready to accuſe him, ſaying, That this matter would be bet- " ter negotiated at a diſtance, than upon the place: Howſoever, Fernando would " not hearken thereunto, being of a contrary opinion, that he had greatly deſer- " ved of the Emperour for his many Services, and for having by way of Juſtice " cleared the Countrey of thoſe turbulent Spirits, who were Diſturbers of the " Peace. At his departure, he adviſed his Brother Franciſco not to repoſe confi- " dence in any of the Almagrians, eſpecially thoſe who were gone into Chili, whom " he had found to be conſtant and affectionate to the Memory of Almagro: And " he farther counſelled him not to permit them to Cabal, for by experience he " had found, that five onely of them being together, were plotting in what man- " ner to kill him. At length being departed, he came to Spain, and appeared at " the Court with a great Equipage and Riches; but it was not long before they " carried him from Valladolid, to the Priſon of Medina de Campo, from whence, as " yet, he is not freed. And herewith Gomara ends that Chapter.

For the better underſtanding of which, we are to know, That though Gonçalo de Meſa had ſerved Hernando Piçarro in Quality of Captain of the Artillery, yet he, with many others, was much diſcontented, becauſe he looked upon himſelf as ill rewarded for his former Services; and that when he expected to have been ſent Commander in Chief, he was then employed Under-Captain to Pedro de Candia: Wherefore finding himſelf in this manner ſlighted without any place of Honour, or Advantage, he began to ſpeak ill of Hernando Piçarro, and to threaten, that he would ſet Almagro at liberty whenſoever they brought him forth to carry him to los Reyes: All which he declared openly, and without any conſideration of the danger he incurred of his life, he aſſembled his friends, and formed a party for Almagro, in which he found many that were ready to comply. So ſoon as Hernando Piçarro was informed hereof, he immediately, with all diligence, went to the Collao, but Meſa was not then Quartered there, being newly returned with Pedro de Candia from the Frontiers, and was then at Muſſus, which lyes Eaſtward from Collao, a Countrey very Mountainous, and full of deep Rivers, as we have deſcribed at large in the Life of the King Inca Yupanqui: The Spaniards, by reaſon of theſe impediments, not having been able to make their Conqueſts, were returned from Collao when Hernando met them, and put Gonzalo de Meſa to Death; and caſhiering Pedro de Candia from his Command, he beſtowed it on a certain Gentleman called Peranzures de Campo Redondo; who afterwards made an entrance into that Countrey, and did more than any that went before him; howſoever, the ways and paſſages were ſo difficult, that all his labours and endeavours proved vain and fruitleſs. Pedro de Candia eſteeming himſelf affronted, and agrieved hereby, being troubled to be deprived of his Command, concealed the anger hereof in his breaſt, untill ſuch time as an opportunity preſented, that he might declare for the Almagrians; the ſucceſs whereof was fatal to him, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. For Pedro de Candia could not ſo well diſſemble his reſentments, but that they were viſible to Hernando, and appeared in his countenance; for though the Tongue be ſilent, yet the Face commonly diſcovers the grief, or the delight of the Heart: the like diſſatisfaction was alſo apparent in the behaviour of many others. Wherefore conſidering that his endeavours to leſſen the numbers of his Enemies, ſerved to multiply them, he was as it were forced to put Almagro to death, which he accordingly executed after his return to Cozco from Collao; ſuppoſing, that when the cauſe and object of all theſe Mutinies and Diſturbances was removed, all things would return to the uſual and ſetled condition of peace and quietneſs; but it happened out quite contrary: For by the doleſull Tragedy of the Death of Almagro, Hernando Piçarro rendred himſelf ſo odious, that his condition was much more ſecure, by putting himſelf into the hands of the Juſtice of Spain, where Diego de Alvarado was ready to accuſe him, than if he had remained in Peru, where the oppoſite Faction of Almagro watched onely an opportunity to deſtroy him. Hernando Piçarro was a diſcreet Perſon, and againſt the opinion and perſuaſion of all his friends, judged it the leaſt evil to make a Voyage into Spain; where he imagined, that the great Services he had performed in the Conqueſt of that Empire, and the inſuperable Labours he had overcome in the Siege vvould juſtifie his Cauſe before his Majeſty, and the Riches vvhich he imported vvith him, for the King's and his ovvn account vvould make his Acceſs eaſie to the Royal Preſence, and obtain more mercy for him, than he could expect from his Enemies in Peru, who onely attended an opportunity to kill him. Hernando having on these Considerations left the Indies, and escaped out of the hands of his Enemies; that hatred which was prepared for him, was converted against his Brother the Marquis, and proceeded so far, as in the end to effect his ruine; the which will appear in what is to follow.

Hernando Piçarro being arrived in Spain, Diego de Alvarado brought a severe Indictment against him, desiring that the Cause might be tried either by the Civil Law, or by a Court-Marshal, as his Majesty should direct; or otherwise he challenged him to a single Combat, offering to prove by force of Arms, that he had violated both his Word and Faith, and that he himself was guilty of those crimes which he had objected against Almagro: Moreover, he laid many other things to his charge, which for brevity sake we shall pass by. Upon these Accusations Hernando was committed to the Prison of Medina del Campo; during which time, and whilst Alvarado was prosecuting his Suit, he complained, that many rich Presents both of Gold, and Silver, and pretious Stones, were given with intention to corrupt the minds of certain persons; the which being proved, was occasion of trouble to some great and considerable Men. But this being a nice point, we have onely touched upon it; and the rather, because in the heat of this prosecution Alvarado died, not without suspicion of poison, by reason (as Gomara saith) that his Death was sudden and unexpected: Howsoever, before that time, he had so well grounded his process, and proceeded so far, that he had obtained several Verdicts against his Adversary. Howsoever, at length, time, which accomplishes every thing, moderated the severities of his Imprisonment, from whence he procured his discharge in the year 1562, after twenty three years that he had remained in custody, which he sustained with great equality of mind; of which he gave most certain proofs in all the particulars of his adverse fortune, which then manifestly appeared, when with wonderfull patience he received the news of the Death of his Brother, and of his other Kindred, and of the Confiscation of his Lands and Possessions which belonged to him, besides the vast expence he was put to, both in Prison, and to maintain his Law-suits. This was all the World gave him in reward for his great and mighty Actions, and for the innumerable difficulties he sustained to aid and assist his Brother the Marquis Don Francisco Piçarro in the Conquest of Peru, performing, as he always did, the Office of Captain-General; with which we will conclude this second Book, returning thanks unto Almighty God, who hath brought us so far as to this period.

Royal Commentaries.

BOOK III.

CHAP. I.

Of the Conqueſt of the Charcas; and of other Battels between the Indians and the Spaniards.

BY the Death of Almagro, and the Abſence of Hernando Piçarro, all the management of the Conqueſt, and the weight of the Government of Peru was charged on the ſhoulders of Marquis Piçarro, to whom God had given a ſufficient talent of Wiſedom to ſupport the care both of one and the other, had not evil Counſellours interpoſed, to the diſturbance and confuſion of every thing; for the Captains (as we have mentioned in the preceding Book) being diſpeeded away, and amuſed with new Conqueſts, the Land was at reſt and quiet; amongſt which Commanders, Gonzalo Piçarro, Brother to the Marquis, was ſent to conquer the Collao, and the Charcas, and people diſtant about two hundred Leagues to the Southward of Cozco; with him the greateſt part of thoſe Cavaliers were ſent, who came in with Don Pedro de Alvarado to gain new Countries; for thoſe already ſubdued, were onely ſuch as were Dependances on the Cities of Cozco and los Reyes, which, together with all the Vallies along the Sea-coaſt, as far as Tumpiz, were divided amongſt the firſt Conquerours, who had had a hand in the Impriſonment of Atahualpa. Wherefore it was neceſſary to enlarge thoſe Conqueſts, that out of them proviſion might be made for the ſecond Adventurers, who entred in with D. Diego de Almagro, and Pedro de Alvarado.

Gonzalo Piçarro entred on the Collao with a good number of ſtout and valiant Men; at firſt the Indians made little oppoſition, but afterwards when they found them well entred into the Charcas, and at a hundred and fifty Leagues diſtance from Cozco, they then plied them cloſe, and frequently engaged them in Battels, in which there were loſſes on both ſides; and the Indians aimed chiefly at their Horſes; for they were of opinion, that if they could kill them, and force the Men to fight on Foot, they ſhould have much the advantage, and over-power them with their Multitudes, At length it happened, that after a bloudy Fight, in which many were killed on both ſides, that the Spaniards gained the Victory: To proſecute which on all ſides, ſeveral parties took divers ways, and amongſt the reſt, three Companions agreed to go with Gonzalo Piçarro. One of which was Garçilaſſo de la Vega, another John de Figueroa, and the third Gaſpar Jara; all which had Commands over Indians in that Town, which is now called the City of Plate, and in the Indian Tongue Chuquiſaca, and afterwards they improved their Fortunes by Poſſeſſions in the City of Cozco, where it was my Fortune to have acquaintance with them.

Theſe four walking ſoftly over a Plain, to eaſe their Horſes, which were much tired with the Labours of the laſt Engagement, and being at ſome diſtance from the place where the Battel was fought, they diſcovered on the ſide of a little Hill below, ſeven Indian Gentlemen, all armed with their Bows and Arrows, going to join with the Indian Army, and very gallant, with their Plumes of Feathers, and other Ornaments. So ſoon as they ſaw the Spaniards, they put themſelves into Rank, at ten or twelve paces diſtant each from the other, with deſign to divide the Enemy, that they might come apart, and not in a Body together. The Spaniards made ſigns to them, that they were Friends, and would not fight with them; but notwithſtanding the Indians prepared their Arms, and would not accept of their Friendſhip, ſo that both ſides engaged with great Courage and Reſolution.

The Spaniards (as they report themſelves) ſay, that they were aſhamed of the inequality of this match, that four Cavaliers, ſuch as they were, well armed, and mounted on their Horſes, with Lances in their Hands, ſhould engage with ſeven Indians on Foot, and naked, without defenſive Arms, who notwithſtanding refuſed not to fight with as much courage, as if their Breaſts had been covered with Steel, aſſiſting and helping each other with much Bravery. That Indian who had none to encounter him, always helped him, that was engaged, and ſo alternatively came in, to the ſuccour each of other, ſometimes croſs, and ſometimes behind, according to the Order and Method agreed amongſt them; ſo that for the moſt part, two Indians fought with one Spaniard. At length, after a long Skirmiſh, that every Spaniard had killed his Indian, and one of them was in purſuit of a ſingle Indian, who, as he was flying, took up a Stone, which he threw and hit the Beaver of his Head-piece, which covered his Face, with ſuch force as half ſtunn'd him, and had killed him outright, had it not been for that piece of Armour; howſoever, notwithſtanding the Blow, the Spaniard made an end of this Indian, and killed him alſo.

The other two Indians fled, and eſcaped; for the Spaniards were not very eager to purſue them, conſidering that their Horſes had been much tired, and haraſſed with this ſecond, as well as with the firſt Encounter; ſo that they thought it neither honourable, nor worth their pains, to kill the two ſurviving Indians.

After the Skirmiſh was over, the four Companions ſtaid a while, to examine themſelves, and to know what hurt each Man had received; and upon Enquiry they found, that three of them were wounded, and that two of theſe three had received three Wounds apiece, though ſlight ones, and the fourth had his Horſe wounded with an Arrow, the which hurt was many Days in healing; according as he, who was Maſter of the Horſe, related it to me in this manner:

" All four of us, ſaid he, were wounded, but I moſt grievouſly of any, be" cauſe I was more ſenſible of the hurt, which my Horſe received, than if I had " been wounded my ſelf, by reaſon of the great want I had of him. I remember when I was a Child, the great lamentation the Spaniards made for their Horſes, and would rather have been wounded themſelves than their Horſes; and in like manner this Gentleman was troubled for this misfortune.

In fine, theſe four returned to the Army, and acquainted their Companions, that the Engagement which they had had with the ſeven Indians that day, was more dangerous, than the great fight with ſix or ſeven thouſand of them. Several other Skirmiſhes paſſed the ſame day of the like nature, one of which was that which we have recounted in the laſt Chapter of the firſt Book of this ſecond Part, where we ſpeak of the Loyalty and Affection which the Indians taken in fight profeſs unto the Spaniards. In this manner they marched forward, fighting every other day more or leſs, untill they came to a warlike People, called Chuquiſaca, where they engaged with many thouſands of Indians, who ſtraitned the Spaniards with want of Proviſions, and kept them always allarm'd with continual Skirmiſhes, wherein many were killed and wounded, which the Hiſtorians mention, but with great brevity.

Gomara

Gomara in the 143d. Chapter, and Carate in the 12th Chapter of his 3d. Book, ſaith, That Gonzalo Piçarro made a Diſcovery as far as the Province of the Charcas, where he was ſurrounded with ſuch numbers of Indians, which aſſailed him on all ſides, that he was forced to deſire ſuccours from the Marquis, who ſupplied him therewith, both of Horſe and Foot, from Cozco; and for better expedition the Marquis gave out, that he himſelf would go in perſon, and accordingly he marched out with them three or four days from the City.

This Siege, as Authours write, was ſo cloſe, and ſtrait, that the Spaniards being reduced at laſt to the utmoſt extremity, ſent advice thereof to the Marquis, by the Indians whom they retained in their Service, who (as we have ſeen before) had ſerved for Meſſengers with all fidelity in the like dangers, in confidence of whom, they diſpatched many of them by divers ways; ſo that in caſe ſome ſhould miſcarry, others might eſcape.

The Marquis being hereby made ſenſible of the great Diſtreſs to which his Brother Gonzalo Piçarro was reduced, diſpeeded a Captain with Succours, and gave out, for the more haſte of the Supplies, as Carate ſaith, that he himſelf would go in Perſon; but neither the diligence uſed in ſending Relief, which would have come too late, nor yet the appearance which the Marquis made of going in Perſon, would have availed toward the delivery of the Spaniards, from the ſtraits of that Siege, had not God moſt wonderfully appeared for them, and ſent the Divine St. Jago, the Patron of Spain, viſibly to fight on their ſide, as he had done before at Cozco.

The Chriſtians ſeeing themſelves thus wonderfully favoured, and that in this, as in the like occaſions, they had been reſcued by Miracle, they fought with ſuch Courage, that before the Succours came, they had gained the Victory. In remembrance of which ſignal Favour which God had performed for them, they determined to eſtabliſh a Colony of Chriſtian People in that place, where now a Cathedral Church is built, and the Royal Chancery is held, which is ennobled and enriched to that degree, in which we ſee it at preſent; all which is ariſen from the Mines of Potoſi, which are about eighteen Leagues diſtant from thence.

Blas Valera giving a Relation of all the memorable Battels which happened between the Spaniards and the Indians in Peru, gives an Account of that which was fought in this Province, and ſays, that God, by his Angel, fought there for his Goſpel.

CHAP. II.

The Marquis makes a Diviſion of the Kingdom and Province of the Charcas, and Gonzalo Piçarro is ſent to the Conqueſt of the Canela.

THE War being ended, and the Indians ſetled in peace, the Marquis made a Diviſion of the Countrey amongſt the principal Perſons concerned in the Conqueſt. To his Brother Hernando Piçarro he divided a very large ſhare, and another part to Gonzalo, within whoſe Diviſion, ſome years after, the Silver Mines of Potoſi were diſcovered; of which one part belonged to Hernando Piçarro, as Inhabitant of that City; and though he were then in Spain, yet one Mine was reſigned to his Officers, to dig the Plate for his Benefit and Uſe; the which was of ſo rich a vein, that in ſomething more than eight months, they digged Silver of the fineſt ſort from thence without any Allay, and without other trouble than onely to melt down the Metal. I have mentioned theſe Riches in this place, having forgotten to ſpecifie them, when in the firſt part of theſe Commentaries we treated of that famous Hill. To my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega that part was given which is called Tapac-ri. To Graviel de Rojas another very conſiderable Poſſeſſion was given, and the like to many other Cavaliers, and all within the compaſs of one hundred Leagues; of which alſo ſome part was given to the City, called la Paz, or the City of Peace.

But theſe Diviſions then given, were of little value, though the Soil was fruitfull, and abounding with all Proviſions, and very populous, and well inhabited by Indians, untill the Mines of Potoſi were diſcovered in thoſe parts; for then the Rents were raiſed ten for one; and thoſe Poſſeſſions which yielded two, or three, or four thouſand Pieces of Eight, amounted afterwards to twenty, thirty, and forty thouſand Crowns a year. The Marquis, Franciſco Piçarro, having given order to found that City, which is called the City of Plate, and having divided the Indians under that Juriſdiction amongſt the Conquerours and Adventurers; all which happened in the Years 1538, and 1539. he had not reſted and repoſed in quietneſs from his civil War, and late Conqueſts, before he undertook ſome other more laborious, and more dangerous Adventures than the former, which ſhall hereafter be related.

By the death of Almagro the Marquis remained ſole and ſupreme Governour of more than 700 Leagues of Land, which reach North and South from the Charcas to Quitu, and had enough to doe, how and in what manner to ſecure thoſe new Conqueſts, which his Captains had made in divers parts, and how to rule with Laws of Juſtice thoſe People who were ſetled in a quiet and peaceable Condition, yet ſince the deſire of Rule and Government is never to be ſatisfied, his Warlike Mind was incited to farther Enterpriſes, being encouraged with the good Fortune of his paſt Succeſſes.

For now the News arrived, that beſides the Limits of Quitu, and other Countries, over which the Incan Kings were ſupreme Commanders, another Countrey was diſcovered both long and wide, where Cinnamon was growing, for which reaſon they called it the Countrey of Canela, which ſignifies Cinnamon. The Marquis had a deſire to employ his Brother in that Conqueſt, with intention to make the Extent of his Land as long and wide as his own; and having conſulted hereupon with thoſe of his Cabinet Council, he renounced his right to the Government of Quitu, and transferred it to his ſaid Brother, ſo that in the Conqueſt of Canela, which lies Eaſtward from Quitu, he might have the benefit of ſupplies and ſuccour from that City.

Having

Having this Design in his Eye, he sent for his Brother Gonzalo, who was then in the Charcas, employed in the settlement of a new Colony in the City of Plate, and of that Division of Indian Subjects, and rule over them, as was faln to his lot and possession. Gonzalo Piçarro, at the Summons of his Brother repaired speedily to Cozco, where the Marquis then resided; and having there treated of the Conquest of Canela, he prepared himself for that adventure, shewing therein the same forwardness, and personal bravery, as he had done in other Enterprises of the like nature.

In Cozco he levied above two hundred Souldiers, of which one hundred were Horse, and a like number of Foot; with which he marched five hundred Leagues, (which is the distance between Cozco and Quitu,) where Pedro de Puelles was then Governour. In this way thither he met with many light Skirmishes and Encounters with the Indians, which appeared in Arms; but those of Huanucu put him so hard to it, (as Carate reports in the first Chapter of his fourth Book,) that the Marquis was forced to send him speedy Relief by Francisco de Chaves.

Gonzalo Piçarro being delivered out of this danger, and from others of less moment, arrived at length at Quitu, where Pedro de Puelles yielded all Obedience to the Commands of the Marquis, providing him, as was the Office of Governour, with all things necessary for that Expedition, together with a recruit of an hundred Souldiers, so that his numbers were three hundred and forty in all, of which one hundred and fifty were Horse, and the rest Foot.

Moreover he had a Retinue of four thousand Indians, who were laden with Arms, Provisions, and other necessaries for this Enterprise, such as Iron, Hatchets, Match, Cords, and Bas-ropes, Nails, and wooden Pins, to use, as occasion served: They also drove with them a Herd of about four thousand Swine, and Sheep of the biggest size that that Empire afforded, on which they laded part of their Ammunition and Baggage.

Pedro de Puelles was ordained and left in Quitu in Quality of Deputy Governour, and Piçarro having reformed all Disorders, and settled matters on a good Foundation of Rule and Government; he departed from Quitu about Christmas, in the Year 1539. Thus did he march peaceably, and was kindly received, and treated by the Indians, through all the Dominions belonging to the Incas, till at length he entred into that Province which Historians call Quixos. And in regard that Lopez de Gomara and Carate do so well agree in the Relation of this Adventure, that their very Words are almost the same; and because I have often heard the particulars of this Discovery, from the Mouth of those who were present with Gonzalo Piçarro at the very action; I shall repeat the Summ of all that passed, as it hath been delivered by divers Relations.

It is certain, that in the Province of Quixos, which lies North from Quitu, great numbers of Indians presented themselves in a warlike posture in opposition to Gonzalo Piçarro; but so soon as they discovered the many Spaniards, and the Horse which came with him, they immediately retired within the Countrey, from whence they never more appeared. Some few days afterwards there happened so terrible an Earth-quake, that many Houses in those Villages where they then were, fell to the ground; the Earth opened in many places, and so terrible were the Lightnings, and Thunder, and so very quick, almost without Intermission, and so fierce were the Rains, which poured down like Buckets of Water; that the Spaniards much admired at the nature of that Climate, so different to any they had ever seen in Peru.

After this Storm was over, which continued about forty or fifty days, they prepared to pass the snowy Mountains; for which though they had made good Provisions, yet the Climate was so extremely cold, by the great quantities of Snow which fell, that many Indians, who went thin in their Clothing, were frozen to death. The Spaniards, that they might make haste out of that Snow, and Cold, and severe Region, left their Cattel, and provisions behind them, expecting to find sufficient supplies of all things, at the next place, where the Indians inhabited. But the matter succeeded otherwise, for having passed the Mountains, they entred into a Countrey so barren, and fruitless, that it was void of all Inhabitants; wherefore doubling their Journies to get out of it, they came at length to a Province, and People, called Cumaco, situated at the foot of a Hill, which casts out Fire, like the Volcano, where they found plenty of Provisions; but the Countrey was so wet, that for the space of two Months they remained there, it never ceased one day from raining, which was such a damage to them, that all their Cloths became rotten by the moisture.

In that Province, called Cumaco, which is situate under the Equinoctial, or very near it, the Cinnamon grows, of which they went in search; the Trees whereof are tall and lofty, bearing a leaf, as big as the Laurel, with a small sort of Fruit, which grows in Clusters like the Acorn. These Trees grow wild in the Mountains, and produce a sort of Fruit, but not so good as that which is gathered from those Trees, vvhich the Indians plant, and cultivate in their ovvn Grounds; and vvhich having gathered, they lay it up in their stores, and trade vvith it, into neighbouring Countries, though not into Peru; vvhere they use no other sorts of Spice than the Uchu, called by the Spaniards Axi; and by us red Pepper.

CHAP. III.

Of the great Difficulties, and Hardships, sustained by Gonzalo Piçarro, and his Companions; how they made a Bridge of Wood, and a sort of Ferry-Boat, to pass the great River.

THE Spaniards found, that in Cumaco, and the Countries thereunto adjoining, the Indians went naked, without any Cloths, onely the Women for Modesty-sake wore a little flap before them; the Climate is so excessively hot, that they need no Cloths, and is so subject to Rains, that they would become rotten in a short time, as we have mentioned before; and indeed the Spaniards confess, that those Indians did well not to trouble themselves with care for Cloths, which would onely be troublesome, without any use.

Gonzalo Piçarro leaving the greatest part of his People in Cumacu, took with him a small party of such as he esteemed most active, to try and search for some Pass, leading out of the Countrey; for as yet the way for an hundred Leagues together, had been nothing but Mountains, and Desarts, and Woods, which they were forced to lay open by the Hatchet, and strength of their Armes; and sometimes the Indians, who were their Guards, deceived them, carrying them out of the way by Mountains, and Desarts, and difficult passages, where they sustained Hunger, and Cold, without other sustenance than Herbs, and Roots, and wild Fruit, and conducted them by by-ways, to avoid the Countrey of their Friends and Confederates; but in case they happened to lead them aright, then they were esteemed and applauded for good Guides.

With such Labours and Sufferings as these, which may rather be fansied than described, they came at length to that Province which is called Cuca, which was more populous, than any they had formerly passed, and where provisions were plentifull. Here the Chief Lord came forth in a peaceable manner to welcome them, and afforded them Provisions, which was the chief thing of which they stood in want; there is a great River which passes through this Countrey, and is the largest of those which, falling in together, make that River which some call Orellana, and others Marannon.

In

In theſe parts they remained two months in Expectation of the coming of thoſe Spaniards, whom they had left in Cumaco, and had directed to follow them by ſuch traces and marks as they ſhould find of the way they had taken before them; the Companions being come up to them, and a while refreſhed after their Journey, they travelled all together by the Banks of that great River, for the ſpace of fifty Leagues, in all which way, they neither found Bridge, nor ſhallow place, which was fordable, for the Water was very deep, and the River ſo broad, that no Bridge could be made over it.

At length they came to a place where this whole River falls from the top of a Rock, above two hundred fathom high, which Catarack, or falling of the Waters, makes a noiſe, that is heard above ſix Leagues from the place; at which, though the Spaniards were wonderfully amazed, yet it was much more wonderfull to ſee, about forty or fifty Leagues lower, that immenſe quantity of Water contracted and ſtraitened within a Chanel made by one great Rock. This Chanel is ſo narrow, that from one ſide to the other it is not above twenty foot wide; but ſo high, that from the top, where the Spaniards made their Bridge to paſs down to the Surface of the Water, are two hundred Fathom, as was that of the Catarack.

It is indeed ſtrange to conſider, that in that Countrey there ſhould be ſuch prodigious Wonders, which are beyond Expreſſion, as may appear by theſe two inſtances, and divers others, which occur in this Hiſtory. Gonzalo Piçarro, and his Captains, conſidering that there was no more convenient paſſage to be found over the River than this, and that it was neceſſary to paſs to the other ſide, by reaſon that the Countrey was barren on that ſide which they then were in, it was agreed to make a Bridge over the top of the Rock. The Indians, though few in number, ſtoutly defended the Paſs, ſo that the Spaniards were forced to fight with them, which was the firſt Encounter they had with thoſe of that Countrey: When the Spaniards killed any one, or more of them, with their Muſquets, the others immediately fled, being terrified to ſee their Companions killed at the diſtance of an hundred or two hundred paces; and flying with Fear and Amazement, reported in all places, that there was a ſort of People come into their Countrey, of ſuch wonderfull Power, that killed thoſe with Thunder and Lightning, that would not obey them.

The Paſs being now clear, the Spaniards fell to work on the Bridge of Timber, which coſt much labour before the firſt Beam could be paſſed over to the other Rock, which was ſo high, that it was a bold thing for any one to adventure to look dovvn; for vvhilſt a Spaniard caſt his Eyes to behold from the top of that precipice the ſvvift current of the Water belovv, his Head became dizzy, and turned, ſo that dovvn he fell, and vvas drovvned in the Waters. The other Spaniards being vvarned by this unfortunate Example, vvent more cautiouſly to vvork, and after much Difficulty, and Labour, they paſſed the firſt Beam over to the oppoſite Rock, by help of vvhich a ſecond vvas more eaſily laid, and then other pieces of Timber, vvhich vvere neceſſary; ſo that by degrees they formed a Bridge, over vvhich both Man and Horſe ſecurely paſſed, vvhich they left in the ſame condition to remain, in caſe they ſhould have occaſion to return back by the ſame vvay: And ſo they travelled by the ſide of the River, over certain Mountains, vvhich vvere ſo thick vvith Wood, that they vvere forced to open their vvay vvith the Hatchet, and other Inſtruments. With theſe Difficulties they came at length to a Countrey, called Guema, vvhich vvas ſo poor, and ſtarved, that it vvas more barren than any they had paſſed before: Here vvere ſome fevv Indians, vvho at the ſight of the Spaniards fled into the Mountains, and never aftervvards appeared.

Here the Spaniards, and their Indian Servants, vvere forced again to ſuſtain themſelves vvith Herbs, and Roots, and vvith the tender ſprouts of Trees, vvhich are as good to eat, as the ſtalks of our Vine Leaves are here. Thus vvith Famine, and Travels, and with perpetual Rains, ſo that their Cloths vvere never dry on their Backs, many of the Spaniards fell ſick and dyed; yet in deſpight of all theſe Difficulties, they proceeded many Leagues farther on their vvay, untill at length they came vvhere Indians inhabited, ſomething more civilized than the former; for they vvere ſuch as did eat Mayz, and clothed themſelves vvith Garments of Cotten; but ſtill the Climate vvas ſubject to Rains.

Whilſt they ſtaid in this place, they ſent ſome people round by divers vvays, to ſee if they could diſcover any paſſage into a more pleaſant Land; but they all returned vvith the ſame Nevvs, that the Countrey round vvas nothing but vvild Mountains, full of Bogs, Lakes, and Mooriſh Grounds, over vvhich vvas no paſſage, or vvay to go out, or ford over. Hereupon they reſolved to build a Brigantine, or Veſſel, vvhich might ferry them over from one ſide of the River to the other, vvhich novv vvas become about tvvo Leagues broad. In order whereunto, the firſt thing to be done, was to make a Smith's Forge, for Nails and Iron-work; but then they had need of Charcole, which was difficult to be made in thoſe Climates, becauſe the continual Rains extinguiſhed the Fire; to prevent which they made Coverings of Wood, and Huts for themſelves to caſt off the Rain, and to defend them from the Sun, which is directly over their Heads, they being then juſt under the Equinoctial Line, where the Climate was hot and moiſt in exceſs: Part of their Iron-work they made of their Horſes Shoes, which they had killed in that Extremity, to adminiſter ſome ſubſtantial Nouriſhment to their Sick, and to ſuſtain thoſe who were in Health; and for the reſt of the Iron, of which they ſtood in very great need, they made uſe of the ſmall Store which they had brought with them, and which was now become more ſcarce than Gold.

Gonzalo Piçarro, though Chief Commander, was the firſt that laid his Hand on the Hatchet to Hew down the Timber, and to make the Charcole, which was required to forge the Iron, and was always the moſt forward in every Office, though never ſo mean and low, that ſo giving a good Example, none might excuſe himſelf on privilege of his Command. The Roſin which eſtuated from certain Trees, ſerved them in the place of Pitch; their old rotten Shirts and Rags were made uſe of in ſtead of Oakam, to cauke the ſeams of their Veſſels, to which every one did ſo freely contribute, that they were ready to give their Shirts from their Backs, rather than any thing ſhould be wanting; for they conſidered, that the Life and Safety of them all depended on this Veſſel: Which being now in this manner finiſhed, they lanched it into the Water with great Joy and Triumph, imagining, that herewith they ſhould quickly eſcape out of all their Dangers, and be freed from all their Difficulties; but it proved otherwiſe, for a few days ſhewed the contrary, and gave them cauſe to repent, that they had ever made it, as we ſhall ſpeeedily ſee by what follows hereafter.

CHAP. IV.

Francisco de Orellana goes aboard the Vessel which was built, and sails into Spain, to demand the Government of that Conquest; and of his End and Death.

ALL the Gold which they had gathered, which amounted to about the value of one hundred thousand Pieces of Eight, with a great abundance of Emeralds, some of which were of great value, as also their Iron and Iron-work, and whatsoever was of any esteem, they laded on their Vessel, and such as were weak, and sick, and not able to travel, were also put aboard. And now after a Journey of almost two hundred Leagues, they departed from this place, taking their course down the Stream, some by Water, and others by Land, keeping such a convenient distance each from the other, that at night they always joined and lodged together; the which Journey was performed with great difficulty, both of one, and of the other; for those on the Land were forced to open a great part of their way with Hatchet and Bill, and those on the Water were put to hard Labour to stemm the Stream, and keep the Vessel from being forcibly carried down by the current from the Company of their Associates. When at any time their passage was interrupted by some Mountain, so that they could not keep by the Shore of the River; they then ferried to the other side by help of their Vessel, and of four Canoes, which were with them; but this gave a great let and stop to their proceedings, for the space of three or four days, which was very grievous to Men starving and perishing with Hunger.

Having in this manner travelled for the space of two Months, they at length met with certain Indians, who by Signs, and by some Words which were understood by their Indian Servants, gave them intelligence, that about ten days Journey from thence they would find a Countrey well peopled, plentifull of Provisions, and abounding with Gold, and other Riches, of which they were in pursuit; and farther signified to them by Signs, that this Countrey was situate on the Banks of another great River, which joined, and fell into that, wherein they now were. The Spaniards being greatly comforted, and encouraged with this news, Gonzalo Piçarro made Francisco de Orellana Captain of his Brigantine, or Vessel, and thereon put fifty Souldiers aboard, giving them orders to pass down the Stream to that place, where the two Rivers met, and that there leaving the Goods he had then aboard, he should lade his Vessel with Provisions, and return towards them with all the speed imaginable to succour, and relieve them in that great Distress of Famine, of which many Spaniards were already dead, and especially Indians, who of four thousand were reduced to half the number.

According to these Orders Francisco de Orellana entred on the Voyage, and in the space of three days, without Oars, or Sail, onely by force of the Current, he was carried the eighty Leagues before mentioned, though in the opinion of all they proved to be more than an hundred; notwithstanding which being come thither, no Provisions were found, as the Indians had promised; wherefore considering what was to be done in that Extremity, they concluded, that to return again to Gonzalo Piçarro with this ill news, they were not able in the space of a Year to perform that Voyage back, against the force of the Stream, which they had already with the help thereof been carried in three days onely. And not knowing in how long time Gonzalo Piçarro would be able to perform his Journey thither, Orellana resolved to change his Design, and set up for himself; and with these thoughts he set sail, and casting off all care and regard to Piçarro, and his Companions, then in distress, he resolved to take a Voyage into Spain, there to obtain the Government and Conquest of those Countries for himself: But this cruel Reſolution was oppoſed by many of thoſe who were then aboard with him, who ſuſpecting his evil Intention, told him plainly, that he was not to exceed the Order of his Captain General, nor was it humanity to forſake his Companions in their great Diſtreſs, knowing how uſefull and neceſſary that Brigantine was to them. In this point none was more zealous, and urgent than a good Friar called Gaſpar Carvajal, and a young Gentleman, Native of Badajoz, named Hernando Sanchez de Vargas, whom thoſe of the contrary opinion made their chief, and were ſo warm in their Debates on this Subject, that the Quarrel had come to Bloud, had not Orellana with fair and gentle Words appeaſed the Tumult for that preſent. Howſoever he ſo worked afterwards with thoſe, who had oppoſed his Intention, that with great Promiſes he enticed them all to his party, and then rudely treated the poor Friar, whom he had expoſed to the ſame famine and miſery (had it not been for reſpect to his Habit and Profeſſion) as he did Sanchez de Vargas, for whom he thought Death too mean a puniſhment, unleſs attended with the direfull circumſtances of Cruelty; and therefore left him in that Deſart, encompaſſed with high Mountains on the one ſide, and with a great River on the other, and impriſoned both with Sea and Land, he was left there to periſh by Famine.

After which Franciſco de Orellana purſuing his Voyage, renounced in a few days the Commiſſion he had received from Gonzalo Piçarro, diſclaiming all ſubjection to him, but pretended to act as a Captain immediately depending on His Majeſty. The which Enterpriſe may beſt deſerve the term of the higheſt piece of Treachery that ever was acted; though in reality other Captains, who have been concerned in the Conqueſt of this new World, have been guilty of Actions as infamous as this. Captain Gonzalo Hernandez de Oviedo & Valdes, who was Hiſtoriographer to His Catholick Majeſty, the Emperour Charles the Fifth, in the 17th. Book, and 20th. Chapter of his General Hiſtory of the Indies, relates villanous Actions of Treachery, which were repaid in a Coin of the like nature, by thoſe who came to ſucceed them in the ſame Offices, and places of Truſt; to confirm which Truth, there is a Proverb which ſays, Kill, and thou ſhalt be killed, and they ſhall kill him that kills thee. Were it to our purpoſe to enlarge on this Subject, we were able to produce many Inſtances of the higheſt Perfidiouſneſs and Treachery, acted after the time of this Hiſtoriographer; but 'tis not our buſineſs to rake into ſuch horrible Stories, and therefore we ſhall rather paſs them by in ſilence, than repeat thoſe direfull paſſages, from which Men would not be deterred by Thunder, Lightning, or other Evidences of God's Wrath.

But to return to our buſineſs in hand. Franciſco de Orellana found ſome Proviſions amongſt the Inhabitants on the River below, who becauſe they were fierce, and wild, and that the Women came forth with their Husbands to fight, they gave it the name of the River of Amazons; the which Term ſerved to raiſe the Honour of this Atchievement, and to induce the Emperour to beſtow the Government thereof upon Orellana. Proceeding yet farther down this River, they found other Indians, more civil, or at leaſt leſs brutiſh than the others, who received them amicably, and with good Welcome, admiring to behold the Brigantine, and Men ſo ſtrangely habited, but they treated them kindly, and furniſhed them with as much Proviſion, as they had occaſion to uſe. The Spaniards remained in this place for ſome days, where they built another Brigantine, for they were very much ſtraitned for room in the firſt; and having fitted themſelves as well as they were able, they adventured out to Sea, and having ſailed two hundred Leagues, (as the Sea-chart ſets it down,) they arrived at the Iſland of the Holy Trinity, after having paſſed ſo many Difficulties, as before related, and eſcaped ſuch Dangers in the River, as that they often gave themſelves over to be Shipwrecked, and loſt. At this Iſland Orellana bought a Ship, with which he ſailed into Spain, where he requeſted His Majeſty's Commiſſion for the Conqueſt and Government of that Countrey. To make this Enterpriſe appear with greater Reputation, he alledged that it was a Countrey abounding with Gold, Silver, and Pretious Stones, and in Teſtimony thereof he produced the Riches which he had brought with him. His Majeſty having accordingly granted the Requeſt he made for the Government of vvhat he ſhould there conquer; Orellana made Levies of five hundred Souldiers, the greateſt part of vvhich vvere brisk young Gentlemen, and principal Perſons of Honour, vvith vvhich he embarqued at St. Lucar, but he dying in the Voyage, his followers diſperſed, and diſpoſed of themſelves in divers parts. And here was an end of this Deſign, which found a ſucceſs agreeable to the evil beginnings of it.

And now let us return to Gonzalo Piçarro, and ſee what becomes of him, whom we left in ſuch ſad Diſtreſs. After Franciſco de Orellana was diſpeeded away with the Brigantine, he built ten or twelve Canoes, and other Floats, wherewith to paſs from one ſide of the River to the other; ſo often as their Progreſs was interrupted by the impaſſable Mountains, as at other times they had contrived; and ſo they proceeded forwards in hopes to meet the Brigantine, which they had diſpatched for Proviſions, and to bring them Relief, having met no other Enemy than Hunger in all theſe Travels. At the end of two Months they arrived at that Point where the two Rivers met, and where they expected to have found their Brigantine, laden with Proviſions, which, by reaſon (as they imagined) of the ſwiftneſs of the Current, was not able to return to them. And here it was that they found themſelves deceived, and to have loſt all hopes of any poſſibility of eſcaping out of that Hell of a Countrey; for we can give it no better Term, where they had ſuffered ſuch Difficulties, and ſuch grievous Miſeries, without proſpect of deliverance from thence; and here at the Conjunction of theſe two Rivers they found the poor, honeſt Hernan Sanchas de Vargas, who with conſtancy of Mind, and on Principles of Honour, like the true Son of a Gentleman, endured with great Reſolution Famine, and all the Miſeries to which he was expoſed, rather than violate his Faith; and was contented to remain in that ſolitude, that he might render an Account of the perfidious Faith of Orellana, and of his villanous Deſigns, all which was ſtrange to Piçarro, who much admired that there ſhould be ſuch Men in the World, whoſe Actions ſhould be ſo different to their Profeſſions, and unanſwerable to the hopes which were conceived of them; and with this News the Captains and Souldiers became ſo diſmayed, that they ſeemed to be reduced to the utmoſt point of Deſpair.

The General, who conceived greater Diſquiet, and Torment of Mind, than the others, yet putting a good face upon the matter, cheared them all up, and encouraged them with hopes of better Fortune; telling them, that they ought like Spaniards to bear with equality of Mind theſe Labours, and yet greater, if any thing could be worſe; that the more Danger, the more Honour, and the greater would their Renown be in Hiſtories, which ſhould declare their Adventures to future Ages. That ſince it was their Fortune to become the Conquerours of that Empire, that they ſhould act like Men whom the Divine Providence had choſen for the accompliſhment of ſo great a work. The Souldiers obſerving ſuch chearfulneſs in their Captain General, who had more cauſe to reſent thoſe Evils than any other, took Heart and Courage, and proceeded on their Voyage by the Banks of the River, ſometimes on the one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, according to the turnings and windings of the Land.

But we cannot expreſs the great Difficulty there was to carry the Horſes upon the Floats, for there ſtill remained about one hundred and fifty of their number which they had brought from Quitu: In like manner almoſt two thouſand Indians were ſtill alive, which came with them from Peru, who, like Sons, ſerved their Maſters with ſuch Faithfulneſs and Affection, as was admirable; for in their great extremities of Hunger they brought them Herbs, and Roots, and wild Fruit, with Toads, Snakes, and other kinds of Inſects which were found in thoſe Mountains; all which went down with them, and were digeſted by the Spaniards with a good Stomach; for without them they could not have ſubſiſted.

Gonzalo Piçarro conſiders of returning to Quitu; and thoſe of Chili plot and contrive how they may kill the Marquis.

IN this Miſery and Want they proceeded another hundred Leagues down the River, without appearance or hopes of finding a better Countrey, every place ſeeming worſe and more barren than the other; all which being conſidered, and debated by the General and Captains, they agreed to return again to Quitu, (if it were poſſible,) for now they were at a diſtance of four hundred Leagues from thence: But in regard it was impoſſible for them to return againſt the Force of the Stream, they reſolved to take another way by the North ſide of the River, for they had obſerved in their coming, that there were not ſo many bogs, and Lakes, and mooriſh places, on that ſide, as on that by which they came. So now entring within the Mountains, and making their way with Bill and Hatchet, which cuſtome would have made leſs grievous, had good nutriment preſented to corroborate and ſuſtain their Nature in it; but we muſt leave them amidſt theſe Difficulties, to return to the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, and ſee what Accidents befell him, whilſt his Brother was engolfed in theſe immenſe Labours. It ſeems that theſe renowned Perſons, who were born for great Actions, and Atchievements, were alſo deſtinated to inſuperable Difficulties and Misfortunes, which purſued them to the ultimate point of their Lives, which ended with the grief and compaſſion of all thoſe who had the Honour of their Acquaintance.

For ſo it was, that the Marquis having made a Diviſion, and ſhared out the Provinces of the Charcas to the Conquerours of that Kingdom, and reformed and ſetled ſome things of importance in Cozco, which the late Diſſentions between his Party and that of Almagro had cauſed; with which having left all things in Peace and Quietneſs, he returned to the City of los Reyes, to advance and encourage that new Colony. We have mentioned formerly that Almagro the Younger was ſent by Hernando Piçarro, ſoon after the Execution of his Father, to be kept Priſoner in that place, where when the Marquis arrived, he diſcovered that divers of the Almagrian Faction were frequently in company with him, whom he fed and maintained out of the Eſtate which he enjoyed in right of his Father, being a large Inheritance, and Command over Indians; the which Bounty he liberally diſpenſed to them, becauſe that their own Eſtates were forfeited, and confiſcated, as it were for Treaſon, and for their Loyalty and Affection to Almagro.

The Marquis, who was of a noble and generous Nature, endeavoured to gratifie thoſe Gentlemen with Largeſſes, and Summs of Money, and to procure for them Offices and Employments in matters of Juſtice, or about the King's Revenue. But theſe Perſons expecting that Vengeance and Puniſhment would befall the Piçarriſts for that unjuſt Death and Bloud of Almagro, and for thoſe horrid Cruelties, committed at the Battel of Salinas, and after it, refuſed all the Offers that were made them of Gratuity and Kindneſs; that ſo neither their Malice, nor Rancour, might abate, and be mollified, which they had conceived againſt the Marquis and his Adherents; nor that it might ever be objected againſt them, that they had received or accepted Gifts from the adverſe Party, at the ſame time that they were contriving and plotting againſt them.

Thus did the Almagrians ſuccour and aſſiſt each other, rejecting all ſubſiſtence and Kindneſs from the Piçarriſts, notwithſtanding the urgent, and extreme neceſſities to which they were reduced. The which being obſerved, and conſidered by the Miniſters and Counſellours of the Marquis, they, like ill Inſtruments, adviſed him, that ſince that party could not be won by fair means to any Terms of Friendſhip, that he ſhould compell them thereunto by want and neceſſity. The Marquis (though much againſt his own nature) was perſuaded to follow this rigorous and ſevere Advice of his Miniſters, and to take away the Eſtate of Almagro, by which all the party had their ſubſiſtence, ſo that not finding a ſupport, they might be compelled to depart from thence, and ſeek their livelyhood in other Countries: But this was much againſt the humour of the Marquis, who naturally abhorred to doe any thing of ſeverity, or unkindneſs, whatſoever. But this Act, inſtead of mollifying and ſubjecting the ſtiff nature of Almagro, incenſed him to a higher degree of Rage; for Tyranny, with unjuſt dealings, operate little on the Minds of Men, who eſteem themſelves innocent. And ſo it was with the Almagrians, who being reduced to a neceſſitous condition, reſolved not to abandon the City, but inſtead thereof diſpatched a Narrative in Writing, of the ſtate of their caſe, to all places where any of thoſe lived, who were inclined and devoted to the Almagrian Party, inviting them to repair to the City of los Reyes, to abet their Party, and to aſſiſt them in their pretenſions. This Faction was then become very conſiderable, for beſides thoſe who had been actually engaged in the Battel, there were divers others who had taken an Affection to that ſide, as it commonly happens in Civil and inteſtine Diſcords.

Upon theſe Summons above two hundred Souldiers reſorted to the City of Los Reyes, from parts above three and four hundred Leagues remote, who being joined in ſuch numbers together, took the Liberty to talk boldly, and in a publick manner to arm themſelves; for untill then they were not permitted to carry any Weapons, living in the nature of Priſoners. The gentle Treatment which the Marquis uſed towards them, encouraged them to higher Attempts, and to treat of the manner how the Death of Don Diego de Almagro might be revenged by the Bloud of the Marquis; for though Hernando Piçarro, after his return from Spain, was the great Incendiary and the real Authour of all thoſe Evils that had hitherto enſued, yet the Revenge for all was to refund on the Head of the Marquis. But theſe private Cabals and Conſpiracies were not contrived and carried on ſo ſecretly, but that they were made known to the Counſellours of the Marquis, who inſtantly urged him to diſturb thoſe Meetings, and puniſh the Malecontents, by taking off the Heads of the Chief Leaders, and by baniſhment of the others, before their Plot was ripe, and become too ſtrong to be ſuppreſſed. Carate, in the fourth, fifth, and ſixth Books, declares the matter to be thus.

" The Marquis (ſaith he) remained ſo confident and ſecure, being of a Diſpo" ſition not inclined to Jealouſie, that in Reply unto what they adviſed, he " made Anſwer, that there was no need to fear or apprehend Danger from Men,
" in that poor and forlorn condition, who had Difficulties ſufficient, in conten" ding with Poverty. Almagro and his Complices growing more confident by this " Inadvertency and Goodneſs of the Marquis, proceeded at length to that degree,
" as to lay aſide all reſpect towards his Perſon, and not ſo much as to take off " their Caps, or make any other demonſtration of Honour, as he paſſed by them.
Thus far Carate.

And indeed ſuch was the Want and Indigency they ſuſtained, that Almagro made a Conſortſhip with ſeven Souldiers, who lodged in the ſame Chamber together; amongſt which they had but one Cloak, and that not new, but old and patched; with this worſhipfull Garment they took their turns to go abroad, the others ſtaying at home, whilſt the Cloak was employed, and till it returned. They alſo made a common Purſe, putting the Money which they gained at play, or otherwiſe, into the hands of John de Rada, whom they made their Treaſurer, and common Steward, to buy and dreſs their Victuals.

As was their Poverty, ſuch was their Boldneſs and Impudence, which preſumed on the good Nature and Gentleneſs of the Marquis ſo far, as to act many ſhamefull things in affront to his Perſon; amongſt which, one was this: By night they fixed three Ropes on the Pillory, which was erected in the Market-place, one whereof they ſtretched, and tied to the Houſe of Antonio Picado, Secretary to the Marquis, another to the Window of Doctour Velazquez, Chief Juſtice, and the third to the Houſe of Piçarro himſelf; which was ſuch a piece of Inſolence, as would have provoked any thing below the Patience of the Marquis to have hanged them all with the ſame Cords; but ſuch was the ſoft and generous Nature of this good Man, that he not onely neglected all Examination and Enquiry into this daring and impudent Action; but rather inclined to form Excuſes for them, ſaying that they were low, unhappy, and provoked thereunto by their Misfortunes, which were a ſufficient puniſhment, and needed no other Revenge by the way of Juſtice.

When this tameneſs of the Marquis was publiſhed in Chili, their Spirits were not mollified thereby, but became farther outrageous and unſupportable, till they proceeded to touch the Bloud, and Life of the Marquis himſelf, as we ſhall ſpeedily ſee in what is to follow.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Mutiny in which the People of Chili killed the Marquis, and what occaſion provoked them thereunto.

THough the Almagrians had by ſeveral open Actions evidenced a reſolution to kill the Marquis, yet they could not agree on the manner, how that Villany was to be committed; for ſometimes they were of opinion, that the beſt way was to expect the Imperial Warrant from His Majeſty, which could not long be wanting, to put him to Death; for that, as we formerly intimated, Diego de Alvarado was then actually in Spain, accuſing the Family of Piçarro, and had ſo far proceeded in his Evidence, as to procure a ſpecial Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer to be held at Cozco, on this very matter; but then they conſidered, that this very Power which the Judge was bringing, was limited, and without other Authority, than onely to examine the matter of Fact, and to report it back again into Spain, and that thereupon His Majeſty would farther determine, what other Proceedings ſhould be made, and ſentenced againſt the guilty.

The Almagrians were not a little ſcandalized and troubled at this kind of Commiſſion; for they were onely for cutting off of Heads, right or wrong; and expected Judges, who upon their Informations and ſuggeſtions, ſhould hang up the Bodies, and confiſcate the Eſtates of as many as they ſhould in a black Roll proſcribe. But not being aſſured, as yet, how far the Commiſſion of the Judge might extend, they agreed to expect his Arrival; and in caſe he immediately ſeized on the Perſon of the Marquis, and performed other pieces of exemplary Juſtice, agreeable to their own Expectations and Humours, that then they would acquieſce, and ſide with, and aſſiſt him in his proſecution of Juſtice; but if his Commiſſion was ſhort and faulty, that then they themſelves would become the Executioners, and both revenge the Bloud of Almagro, by the Death of the Marquis, and the remiſneſs of the Emperour, eſpecially in a Cauſe ſo black, and ſo foul as this; both which they ſecretly plotted to perform by a General Inſurrection of all the Countrey, as will more at large appear by the Sequel of this Hiſtory.

This

This Plot was so publickly talked of over all the City of Los Reyes, and that the people of Chili designed to kill the Marquis, that his Friends gave him fair notice and warning of the Treason intended, to whom, as Carate reports, he made this Answer.

" That the Chief Heads of that place would guard his; and so little did he " seem to be concerned for his own safety, that he would frequently walk " abroad, attended onely with a single Page, to certain Mills, which he had set " up without the City. And when he was asked why he took not his Guards " with him, he replied, he would not have the World believe that he apprehended any fear, or intended to secure himself from the Lawyer Vaca de Castro, " who was coming, as was reported, with Commission to sit in Judgment upon " him; for which reason, and farther to amuse the Marquis, the people of " Chili gave out, that Vaca de Castro was dead.

" It happened one day that John de Rada, with some few Attendants, went " and made a visit to the Marquis, whom finding in a Garden, he asked him " the reason why his Lordship intended to put him and his Friends to Death: " Whereunto the Marquis made Answer, with an Oath, that he never had any " such intention; but that on the contrary, it might rather be suspected that " they designed to kill him, since they had bought Arms to that purpose; to " which John de Rada made Answer, That it was not strange, that since his Lord- " ship had bought Lances, if they should provide themselves with Coats of " Mail for their Defence. To which bold Saying he was encouraged, in con- " fidence of fourty Men, which he had then lying in wait not far from him, and " well armed. And farther he added, That in case his Lordship was jealous of " their practices, he desired onely leave for Don Diego de Almagro, and his Com- " panions, to retire out of the Countrey. The Marquis being far from taking " those Words in the worst sense, or conceiving suspicion thereby, but com- " passionating their condition, he assured him with mild and obliging Words, " that those Lances were not bought with design or bad intention against them: " With which gathering some Oranges, he presented them to John de Rada, " which were esteemed for a curiosity at that time, being the first, and the most " early fruit, and with all told him in the publick hearing of those then present, " that he should consider, and acquaint him with what he stood in need, and it " should be provided for him. John de Rada kissing his Hands for the favour, " left the Marquis well assured of his true and honest meaning, and without jea- " lousie, or the least suspicion of a Plot against his Life, and so retired to his " Lodging, where he met with the principal Conspiratours, and with them " agreed, that since they had missed of their Design to kill him on Midsummer " Day, that it should now be perpetrated on the Sunday following. Thus far Carate, the which is confirmed by Lopez de Gomara in this manner.

" The good Marquis (says he) was as careless of his Safety, and as little ap- " prehensive of any Mischief from the people of Chili, as they were intent and " solicitous to commit the Act. Howsoever they thought fit to defer the Execution untill the coming of the Judge, and had seen the manner whereby he intended to proceed.

This Delay of the Almagrians gave time to Antonio Picado, Secretary to the Marquis, to evidence his Resentment with rage and Indignation against those of Chili, for the impudent affront offered to the Marquis, and himself, by the Ropes which they had fastened to the Pillory, as we before mentioned; but since this was rather a matter of Threatning, and an Indication of what they designed to act, had not their Fear and Cowardise restrained them, the Secretary in scorn and contempt of what they were able to perform, took out of his Cap a certain Medal of Gold, richly enameled, with a Finger scornfully pointing, with this Motto, Thus much for those of Chili. With which these angry Souldiers were so far incensed, that they resolved to precipitate the Design, and to kill the Marquis before the arrival of the Judge; so that now they acted more publickly than before; by which means the Plot coming to the knowledge of a Priest, he gave notice to the Marquis of the manner how, and of the time when this Assassination was to be committed; all which the Marquis communicated to Doctour Velazquez, the Chief Juſtice, and to Picado his Secretary; but they were ſo far from being concerned, or allarmed herewith, that they ſlighted the report, and told him that no Danger could be apprehended from ſuch poor and inconſiderable Wretches, whom Famine and Poverty provoked to complain and threaten. Howſoever the jealouſie hereof made ſuch Impreſſion in the Mind of the Marquis, that he forbore to go to Maſs unto the Great Church on that Day, which was the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, in the Year 1541. being the Day appointed for the Execution of that Murther. The like caution he uſed on Sunday following, being the 26th. of June, on pretence of ſome Indiſpoſition of Body, intending to ſhut himſelf up for ſome days, that he might the better conſult with his Party and Friends concerning the means to ſecure his own Perſon, and ſuppreſs thoſe bold and daring Seditions, which were arrived at the higheſt degree of Inſolence. The principal Officers of the City miſſing the Marquis at Maſs, went to enquire the cauſe, and the ſtate of his Health; and having made their Court and Viſit, they returned again to their own Houſes, onely Doctour Velazquez, and Francis de Chaves, his true and intimate Friend, remained with him.

The Conſpiratours of Chili obſerving that the Marquis began to grow cautious how he expoſed his Perſon, and that many of the principal Perſons of his party made him frequent viſits, they ſuſpected that ſome Plot and Deſign was contriving to cut them off; with which apprehenſion becoming deſperate, on that very Sunday, about the hour of Dinner, and when the Marquis had ſcarce dined, a party of the Aſſaſſinates appeared at a corner of the Market-place, on the left hand of the Cathedral Church, which joins to the Lodging of Don Diego de Almagro the younger; where meeting the principal of the Conſpiratours, they paſſed clear over the Market-place, which is very large, and wide, and went directly to the Houſe of the Marquis, of which they were thirteen in number, twelve of which Gomara particularly names, not ſpecifying of what Countrey they were, but ſets them down in this manner following.

John de Rada, the Chief Leader, Martin de Bilbao, Diego Mendez, Chriſtopher de Soſa, Martin Carrillo, Arbolancha Hinogeros, Narvaez, S. Millan, Porras, Velazquez, Francis Nunnez, and Gomez Perez; which are all that Gomara mentions. Theſe went over the Market-place with their Swords drawn, crying out with loud voices, May the Tyrant Traitour periſh, who hath murthered the Judge whom the Emperour ſent to execute Juſtice upon him. The reaſon which induced them ſo publickly to own their Fact, was, that the People of the City, who were then in their Houſes, might imagine that the Conſpiratours were more in number, than they really were; and therefore might be cautious how they left their Houſes for ſuccour and aſſiſtence of the Marquis. Indeed it was a bold and raſh Attempt, to act in ſuch a publick manner; but ſuch was the Fate of the Marquis, that the Almagrians gained their point, and ſucceeded in the Revenge intended, by the Death of the Marquis, as will appear more at large in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Death of the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro; and his poor Funeral and Enterment.

THE Indians, who were Servants to the Marquis, hearing the noiſe and outcry which the Faction of Chili made in the Streets, immediately ruſhed in and acquainted him of the Tumult, and of the manner with which they were coming. The Marquis being then in Diſcourſe with Doctour Velazquez, the Chief Juſtice, and with Captain Franciſco de Chaves, who vvas his Lieutenant General, and vvith Franciſco Martin Alcantara, his half Brother by the Mother ſide, and about tvvelve or thirteen Servants of his Houſhold ſtanding by, vvas greatly allarm'd hereat, eaſily ſuſpecting vvhat the matter vvas; vvherefore he gave order to Franciſco de Chaves, to run and ſhut the Door of the Hall, and of the Dining-Room, vvhere they ſate, that he and his Friends might have time to buckle on their Armour. But de Chaves imagining that this diſturbance vvas no other than ſome quarrel amongſt the Souldiers, vvhich the Authority of his Preſence might appeaſe, inſtead of ſhutting the Doors, as he vvas ordered, he ran out to them, and met them upon the head of the Stairs; and being novv troubled at this unexpected Encounter, he asked them vvhat their pleaſure vvas; vvhereunto he vvas anſvvered by a Stab; and finding himſelf vvounded, he laid his Hand upon his Svvord, but before he could dravv it, he received another, vvith ſuch a ſlaſh on his Neck, that, as Gomara ſaith, in Chap. 145. his Head hanged onely by a piece of the Skin, and therevvith they threvv his Body dovvn the Stairs. The Servants of the Marquis, vvho vvere in the Hall, came running to ſee vvhat the matter vvas, and finding Franciſco de Chaves dead, they fled like poor ſpirited Servants, and got out of the Windovvs, on the Gardenſide; amongſt vvhich Doctour Velazquez vvas one, vvho holding his vvhite Wand in his Mouth, ſuppoſed that that Badge of his Authority vvould give a reſpect to his Perſon, and ſo ran as faſt as his Legs and Arms could carry him.

The Aſſaſſinates finding the Hall empty, went to the Door of the Dining-room, where the Marquis hearing them ſo near at hand, and perceiving he had not time to brace on his Arms, haſtily took hold of his Buckler and Sword, and together with his Brother Martin de Alcantara, and two Pages, who were grown up to be Men, one of which was named John de Vargas, Son of Gomez de Tordoya, and the other Alonſo Eſcandon, neither of which had time to put on their defenſive Arms, all theſe poſted themſelves at the Entry of the Door, which they ſtoutly defended for a great while, the Marquis ſtill calling out with great Courage, Let us kill theſe villanous Traitors. Thus whilſt both ſides fought very valiantly, the Brother of the Marquis was killed, into the place of whom one of the Pages ſtepped, and he and his Maſter ſo ſtoutly defended the Door, that the Aſſaſſinates began to fear, leſt whilſt they were gaining Entrance, they ſhould be ſurpriſed by Aſſiſtence from without, and that then they ſhould be encompaſſed on all ſides; wherefore John de Rada made one effort for all, and taking Narvaez in his Arms, thruſt him in at the Door before him, in whoſe Body whilſt the Marquis had employed his Sword, the others had opportunity to enter in; ſome of which engaged with the Marquis, and others with the Pages, who fought ſo valiantly, that before they were killed, they ſorely wounded four of their Enemies. The Marquis being the onely Perſon remaining, they all ſet upon him at once, and encompaſſed him on all ſides; but he ſo well defended himſelf, that he dangerouſly wounded three of the Ruffians: But in regard there were ſo many to one, and that he was above the Age of ſixty five Years, he began to grow faint, ſo that one of the Villains making a Paſs at him, ran him through the Throat, with which falling to the Ground, he cried out with a loud voice for a Confeſſour; but time not being given for Confeſſion, he made a Croſs with his Right Hand, Hand, which clapping to his mouth, he kiſſed it, and ſo expired his laſt Breath; ſo dyed that famous Don Franciſco Piçarro, the moſt renowned amongſt the Worthies, who hath ſo much enriched, and made great, and ſtill by the Riches and Treaſure he hath acquired, continues greatneſs, and Riches to the Crown of Spain, and to all the World, as appears by what hath been already declared, and what is manifeſted by the effects in theſe our days. And yet not withſtanding all this vaſt Treaſure and Greatneſs, he died poor and forſaken, having no Friend ſo much as to wind him in a ſheet, or lay him in his Grave; by which it may appear, that all the favour and proſperity which Fortune had been beſtowing on him, during the whole courſe of his Life, was ſnatched away on a ſudden, in leſs than the ſpace of one hour. To confirm which Carate, in the 8th Chapter of his 4th Book hath theſe Words.

" In this manner he reſigned his Soul unto God, and with the Marquis two of " his Pages were killed; of the Faction of Chili four were killed, beſides others " that were dangerouſly wounded. So ſoon as this news was ſpread through the " Town, above two hundred Men appeared in favour of Don Diego de Almagro; " which, though armed and in a readineſs, yet durſt not declare themſelves, un- " till they ſaw how the matter ſucceeded, and then they diſperſed themſelves " over all parts of the City, ſeizing and diſarming thoſe whom they believed to " be well affected to the party of Piçarro.

" The Aſſaſſinates having done their work, came out of the Houſe with their " Swords drawn, and bloudy; and John de Rada cauſing Almagro to mount on " Horſe-back, conducted him through the City, proclaiming him Governour " over all Peru, and ſole King thereof. Then they plundered the Houſes of the " Marquis, and his Brother, and of Antonio Picado; and cauſed the Corporation " of the City to receive Don Diego for Governour, by virtue of that Capitula- " tion and Charter, ſigned by his Majeſty at the time of the firſt Diſcovery of " theſe Countries, whereby the Government of the new Toledo was granted to " Almagro, and his Heirs, or to ſuch Perſon or Perſons as he ſhould aſſign. Af- " ter which they put ſeveral to Death, whom they knew to be Servants and De- " pendants on the Marquis, which cauſed great Cries through the whole City, " the Women weeping and wailing to ſee their Husbands murthered, and their " Houſes plundered.

" All which time none durſt touch the Body of the Marquis, to beſtow decent " Burial thereupon, unleſs ſome few Negroes, who rather dragged than carried " it to the Church, untill John de Barbaran, and his Wife, who were Inhabitants " of Truxillo, and had been Servants to the Marquis, having firſt obtained leave " of Almagro, buried him and his Brother in ſuch decent manner as they were " able. The which they were forced to perform with ſuch haſte, that they had " ſcarce time to cloth his Body with the Habit of St. Jago, of which Order he " was a Knight, and to put on his Spurs, before they were told that thoſe of Chili " were coming in great haſte to cut off his Head, and to place it on the Gallows. " So that Barbaran was forced to ſlubber over the Funeral and Offices for the " dead with great haſte, defraying the Charges of the Torches, and other Duties, " at his own Expence. And having laid the Body in the Grave, they immedi- " ately endeavoured to ſecure his Sons, who lay privately concealed; for the par- " ty of Chili were now become Maſters of the whole City.

" Hence we may learn the variety of Fortune in this World, if we conſider " in how ſhort a time a Gentleman was brought to nothing, who had diſcovered, " and governed, and poſſeſſed ſuch a vaſt Extent, and Tract of Land, and King- " doms; and had beſtowed a greater Revenue, and Riches on others, than the " moſt powerfull Prince in the World was able to have done; and how in a mo- " ment he was made to periſh, without time given him to confeſs, and prepare " for his Soul, or ſettle his Eſtate; and that he ſhould be aſſaſſinated by the " Hands of twelve Men onely, at Noon-day, and in the midſt of his City, " where the Inhabitants were all his Servants and Creatures, Kinſmen and Soul- " diers, and all had eaten of his Bread, and ſubſiſted by his Bounty; and after " this, that none ſhould dare to come unto his Succour, but rather fly from him, " and abandon his Houſe. And moreover, that his Burial ſhould be ſo obſcure, " that of all the Riches and Greatneſs he poſſeſſed, there ſhould not be left ſo " much as to defray the Charge of the Wax-Candles, and other Expences of his

Funeral;

" Funeral; the which, and other Circumſtances, preceding his Death, by which " (as we have ſpecified) he would take no warning, are ſo ſtrange, as can be at- " tributed to no other cauſe than to the unſearchable Judgments of Almighty " God. Thus far are the Words of Carate.

In which place he makes a compariſon between the Death and Burial of Almagro, and this of Piçarro; the circumſtances of whoſe Life and Death were in all things agreeable. They were companions, and had ſworn Friendſhip, and entred into Articles to gain and conquer that Empire, and it is ſtrange to conſider with what equality Fortune balanced the courſe of their Lives, and the circumſtances of their Deaths. As the ſame Carate reports in the Chapter following.

" Many Years after, ſaith he, that the Wars were ceaſed in that Kingdom, " the Bones of this brave and worthy Gentleman were taken up out of the " Grave, and with ſuch decent Solemnity as became them, were put into a Coffin, " and interred in a Vault of the Cathedral Church, on the Right hand of the " High Altar: Where it remained in the Year 1560. when I came for Spain: The Death of the Marquis happened on the 26th of June, in the Year 1541.

Carate, who was a good Hiſtorian, imitated the method of the great Plutarch, comparing the Lives of theſe two famous Heroes, who were unhappy Spaniards, and ill rewarded by the World. Howſoever he judges them ſo worthy, that he could never expreſs ſufficient wherewith to exalt their Praiſes; and comparing their Lives, Cuſtoms and Death together, fills a whole Chapter with that Subject, which is the 9th of the 4th Book, which being transferred into theſe our Commentaries, ſhall ſerve for the 8th Chapter of the 3d Book of our Second Part; the Words whereof verbatim are theſe.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Actions and Qualities of the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, and the Lord Deputy Don Diego de Almagro.

IN regard that the Diſcovery and Conqueſt of this Province, (which is the " Subject of this Hiſtory,) had its Original from theſe two Captains of " whom we have hitherto diſcourſed, namely, the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, " and the Lord Deputy Don Diego de Almagro, we are obliged in juſtice to their " memories to deſcribe the Qualifications and Actions of theſe two Worthies, in " compariſon of each with the other; imitating herein the method of Plutarch, " who having wrote the Lives of two great Captains, he in the next place compares " them together, ſhewing wherein they were equal, and wherein they differed.

" As to what concerns their Parentage, and Families, we have already diſ- " courſed; as to other matters, they were both couragious in their Perſons, " bold and daring, patient of Labour, vertuous and friendly, being ready to per- " form all good Offices, though at their own Charge and Expence. They re- " ſembled each other in their natural Inclinations, particularly in their condition " and ſtate of Life, for neither of them was married, though when they dyed, " the youngeſt was arrived to the Age of ſixty five Years.

" They were both inclined to War, though Almagro having for the chiefeſt " part of his Life no occaſion to exerciſe himſelf in Arms, applied his mind with " much earneſtneſs to heap and gather Riches.

" They were both of good Years when they firſt entred upon the Conqueſt of " Peru, in which their Labours were as great as we have formerly deſcribed; " though the Marquis ſuſtained more of Danger therein than the Deputy had " done; becauſe that whilſt the one expoſed his Perſon in the firſt Diſcovery, " the other continued in Panama, to provide all neceſſaries required thereunto, as " hath been before declared.

" They were both of great Minds, and entertained high Thoughts, which they " were enabled to put into practice by their extreme Patience, joined to that " affable and obliging Behaviour which they uſed towards their Souldiers.

They

" They were both liberal and generous in their Gifts, but if either excelled the " other, it was Almagro, becauſe he was ambitious to have his Liberality and " Gifts known and publiſhed to the World; but the Marquis on the contrary, " was ſecret, and modeſt in his Gifts, deſiring rather to conceal them, than ſound " his Trumpet; being more willing to provide for the neceſſities of the poor, " than to make an Oſtentation of his Charity.

" An Example we have in his kindneſs to a Souldier, whoſe Horſe happened " to dye; to repair the Loſs whereof, he came to a Pall-Mall belonging to his " Houſe, expecting to find the Souldier, that he might with his own hand pre- " ſent him with a ſmall Ingot of Gold, of ten pounds weight; but the Souldier " not being then come, he in the mean time plaid a match in the Mall, with his " Coat on, that he might conceal the Gold; at length (which was three hours " after) the Souldier came, when calling him aſide, he privately gave him the " Gold, and told him, that he had rather have given him three times as much, " than to have endured what he did, by ſo long an expectation and attendance for " him. Many other Inſtances might be given of this nature, for the Marquis never " gave any thing but with his own hand, endeavouring to conceal his Liberality.

" For which reaſon Almagro was always eſteemed the more generous, becauſe " he contrived how his Preſents might be given with greater oſtentation, and " with the beſt appearance to the World. Howſoever in this Vertue of Munifi- " cence they may well be equalized, becauſe (as the Marquis himſelf alledged) all " came from their common Purſe, whereof being partners, the moiety of what " one gave belonged to the other; ſo that he who conſented to the Preſent, was " as generous as he who delivered it.

" They were both in their Life-time the richeſt Men in ready Money, and in " Revenue, that have been known in many Ages, and were the moſt powerfull of " any under the Degree of Crowned Heads; and yet they dyed ſo poor, that no " mention is made of the Eſtates they left, or of their Money wherewith to pay " the Charges of their Funeral Expences; reſembling Cato, and Silius, and other " Roman Captains herein, who were interred at the Coſt of the Publick.

" They were both extremely kind to their Servants, and obliging to their Soul- " diers, endeavouring to enrich and advance them, and to reſcue them in all times " of Danger; in which piece of Gallantry the Marquis was prodigal beyond com- " pariſon; as appears by what happened in paſſing a River, which they call Bar- " ranca, where one of his Indian Servants being carried down by force of the ſtream, " the Marquis leaped in, and ſwam after him, and catching him by the Hair of " his Head, buoyed him up above the Water, and with great hazard of his own " Life, ſaved his, which none of the moſt adventurous of his Army durſt have " attempted; and when his Captains reproved him for his raſhneſs, he anſwered, " that none of them knew of what prevalency his Love was unto a Servant.

" Though the Marquis governed longer, and in greater peace, yet Almagro was " much more ambitious, and deſirous of Rule. They both affected antiquity, and " would never change the faſhion of that Habit to which they had been accuſto- " med from their youth, eſpecially the Marquis, who never wore other than a Jer- " kin of black Cloth, with Skirts down to his Ankles, with a ſhort Waſte a little " below his Breaſts; his Shoes were made of a white Cordivant, his Hat white, " with Sword and Dagger, after the old Faſhion; ſometimes upon high Days, at " the inſtance and requeſt of his Servants, he wore a Caſſock, lined with Martins " Furrs, which the Marquis de Valle ſent him from Spain; but when he returned " home from Maſs, he ſtript them off, and remained in cuerpo; and about his " Neck he commonly caſt a Towel to wipe the Sweat from his face, when he plaid " at Bowls, or at Pall-mall, which were his common Exerciſes in the time of peace. " Both theſe Captains were men well enduring labour and hunger, which the Mar- " quis eſpecially evidenced by the Paſtimes we have mentioned, to which he was " ſo intent, that no young men could hold out ſo long as he. He vvas much more " given to gaming than Almagro, for he vvould many times play the vvhole day at " Bovvls, not conſidering vvith vvhom he plaid, vvhether he vvere Mariner or " Miller, nor vvould he ſuffer them to give him up his Bovvls, or uſe any other " Ceremonies tovvards him, vvhich belonged to the Dignity of his Perſon.

" Not every ſort of buſineſs could divert him from his game, eſpecially if he loſt; " but if in caſe there happened any Inſurrection or Rebellion amongſt the Indians, " he vvould then lay all aſide, and immediately brace on his Arms, and taking " his Lance and Target in his hand, vvould run vvith all haſte to the place

" where the mutiny was ariſen, not expecting untill his people came, though they " followed him with all the haſte they were able.

" Both theſe Captains were ſo ſtout and expert in their Wars againſt the Indi- " ans, that either of them being ſingle, would break through a Body of a hun- " dred Indians. They were both very intelligent perſons, and of great judgment " in all matters, whether Martial or Civil, eſpecially conſidering that they " were illiterate Men, and neither knew how to write or reade, or ſo much " as to form their Names; which in perſons of their degree, and of that ſphere " wherein they moved, was a remarkable defect, conſidering the buſineſs and " negotiations which they treated: And though their Virtues, and other En- " dowments, gave them an appearance of Noble Perſonages, yet their ignorance " in letters was a plain demonſtration of their mean Parentage and Extraction.

" The Marquis was ſo confident, and aſſured of the faithfulneſs of his Ser- " vants and Friends, that in all the Diſpatches which he iſſued out either rela- " ting to Orders of Government, or to Aſſigning over to each perſon his ſhare " and diviſion of Lands; his manner was to make two lines with the Pen, in the " middle of which Antonio Picado his Secretary formed the Name of Franciſco Pi- " çarro. But for his excuſe herein, we may ſay the ſame which Ovid did for Romu- " lus, That he was better verſed in the knowledge of Arms, than Aſtrology; and " applied his mind rather to conquer his Neighbours, than to underſtand Letters.

" They were both extremely affable and familiar with the people of the " City, making them viſits at their own Houſes, and not refuſing to Dine with " ſuch as firſt invited them. They were equally abſtemious in Eating and Drink- " ing, and refrained their inclinations towards the Caſtilian Women, upon a " principle, that they could not make uſe of their Wives or Daughters without " ſome prejudice and diſhonour to their Neighbours: As to the Indian Women " of Peru, they were more free, though of the two, Almagro was the more conti- " nent; for unleſs it were with the Woman by whom he had his Son, he enter- " tained little or no converſation with any. The Marquis conſerved a particular " affection for an Indian Lady, who was the Siſter of Atabaliba, by whom he had " a Son called Don Gonzalo, which dyed at the Age of fourteen years, and a " Daughter called Donna Franciſca; by another Indian Woman of Cozco he had a " Son called Don Franciſco: And as to this Son of Almagro, who killed the Mar- " quis, he was born of an Indian Woman at Panama.

" Both of them had received Favours and Honours from his Majeſty; Piçarro, " as we have ſaid, was honoured with the title of Marquis, as before related, and " was made Governour of New Caſtile, and veſted with the Habit of St. Jago. " Almagro was rewarded vvith the Government of the Nevv Toledo, and dignified " vvith the title of Lord Lieutenant of that Countrey.

" The Marquis in a particular manner was devoted to his Majeſty, and had " ſuch an awe and reverence for his Name, that he would often deny himſelf the " exerciſe of his Authority in many lawfull matters, leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſtretch " his Power beyond his Commiſſion. Many times as he was ſitting on his Chair " in the Melting-houſes, he would ariſe, and take up the ſmall granes, or drops of " Gold and Silver which were fallen aſide from the Sciſſers, with which they cut " the King's Fifths, ſaying, That when hands failed, wherewith to amaſs and " heap up the Treaſure which belonged to the King, they were to doe it with " their mouths. Thus as they reſembled one the other in their Lives, ſo did " they not differ in the manner of their Deaths; for as the Brother of the Mar- " quis killed Almagro, ſo the Son of Almagro killed Piçarro.

" The Marquis was very induſtrious to improve his Land, and cultivate his " Plantations; he built ſeveral very fair Houſes in the City of los Reyes; and on " the River he made two Sluces to ſtop the Water to drive his Mills; in which " projects and buildings he employed all his leiſure times, that he might over-ſee " the Workmen, and haſten them in their labour.

" Moreover, he was very diligent and zealous in erecting a great Church for " the City of los Reyes, and Monaſteries for the Orders of St. Domingo, and the " Merceds; for a Revenue unto which, and to keep thoſe Buildings in repair, he " gave and ſet out Lands with Indians to manure them. Thus far Carate.

In the following Chapter we ſhall declare what this Authour farther ſaith on this Subject, to which we ſhall add ſeveral other Excellencies of this Worthy Perſon, whoſe Praiſes we can never ſufficiently extoll.

CHAP. IX.

Of the affable Nature of the Marquis, and his Intentions to ſuccour and relieve thoſe whom he believed to be in want.

THE Marquis had one Son, and one Daughter, and no more, and Gonzalo Piçarro, as we have mentioned in the 38th Chapter of his 9th Book, had one Son; but Carate makes them all three to be the Children of the Marquis. The Mother of the Son of the Marquis was Daughter, and not Siſter of Atahualpa; but his Daughter he had by a Daughter of Huayna Capac, whoſe Indian Name was Huayllas Nuſta, but afterwards her Chriſtian Name was Donna Beatriz, as we have at large ſpecified in the aforementioned Chapter.

And farther, this Authour confirms what we have formerly ſaid; namely, that though theſe two Governours were ſo vaſtly rich, yet they died ſo poor, that of all their Wealth there was ſcarce ſufficient to bury them. And indeed there was nothing remaining, ſo that they were buried of mere Charity.

Almagro was buried by one that had been his Slave, and the Marquis by another, who had been his Servant, as the ſame Authour alledges. And thoſe who carried both one and the other to their Burial, were Negros and Indians, as both Authours agree. And thus much ſhall ſuffice to ſhew in what manner the World rewards thoſe who have been ſo uſefull and deſerving in their generation.

The Marquis was ſo generally kind and obliging in his carriage, that he never gave an ill word to any perſon whatſoever. When he plaid at Bowls, he never would ſuffer any to give him up his Bowls from the ground; but in caſe any one was ſo courteous as to doe it, he would take it, and throw it inſtantly far from him, which went for a caſt. It happened once, that taking up a Bovvl, he dirted his hands vvith ſome filth which ſtuck to it, and preſently lifting up his foot, he vviped it off vvith his Buskins: For I remember then, and many years after, that it vvas the faſhion and gallantry of Souldiers to vvear a ſort of Buskins made vvith Pack-thread, and not Shoes. On vvhich occaſion a certain Favourite to the Marquis ſeeing him to vvipe his hands on the Buskin, came and offered him his Handkerchief; to which the Marquis ſmilingly replied, I proteſt your Linen is ſo white, that I dare not touch it.

One day being at Bowls with a certain Souldier called Alonſo Palomares, a well-conditioned Man, and of a chearfull humour; and the Marquis loſing almoſt at every end, he quarrelled and curſed at every caſt which was plaid; and herein he was ſo eager and concerned that all the ſtanders-by took notice, that either he was troubled at his own ill play, or otherwiſe for the eight or nine thouſand Crowns which he loſt by the game. Some days paſſing, that the Marquis paid not the Money, the Winner took the confidence to ask him for it; and being afterwards troubled with the importunity, the Marquis forbad him to ask any more, for that he was reſolved never to pay him: To which Palomares replied, If your Lordſhip be reſolved never to pay me, what made you quarrel, and be ſo angry the other day, when you loſt? The Marquis was ſo well pleaſed with the Anſwer, that he gave order he ſhould be immediately paid. He would play at all Games, and with all ſorts of Perſons; and when he knew any one to be neceſſitous and wanting, he would invite him to play with him, with intention and purpoſe to loſe to him; thinking it a more noble and generous way to relieve a perſon in want, than by direct Alms, which to a haughty Spaniard is a kind of an affront; but when he gains by advantage of play, he not onely rejoyces in the gain, but triumphs in the Honour of being a better Gameſter than the Marquis, and to receive his Money rather as a due, than given as a favour. When he bowled with ſuch perſons as theſe, he would either caſt ſhort, or beyond, that the other might win. And when he plaid at Cards, at which his Game was commonly Primera; he would often vye with his worſt Cards; and if he had the fortune to have Fluſh or Primera, he would ſhuffle up his Cards, and not ſhew them, ſeeming to be angry or diſpleaſed at his ill luck: by ſuch ways as theſe he gained himſelf ſo much good-will and affection, as were due to his Worthy and Heroick Merits.

Gomara treating of the Death of this Prince (nay more than a Prince; for, in reality, I know no title upon Earth ſufficient to expreſs the Grandure and Merits of this Hero) ſaith that which follows in the Chapter 145.

" He was the Baſtard Son of Gonzalo Piçarro, Captain in Navarre, was born at " Truxillo, and laid in the Church Porch: he ſucked a Sow for ſeveral days, till " another Nurſe was provided for him. Afterwards his Father acknowledged " him, and employed him in keeping Hogs, ſo that he was never educated in any " learning. One day it happened, that the Flies did ſo bite the Hogs, that they " all ran away, and were loſt; upon which he durſt not return home again for " fear, but attended ſome Travellers to Sevil, from whence he embarked himſelf " for the Indies; and being arrived at St. Domingo, he went with Alonſo de Hojeda " to Vraua, and with Vaſco Nunnez de Balboa, to diſcover the Sea of Sur, and " thence with Pedrarias to Panama; at length he diſcovered and conquered that " Countrey which they call Peru, &c. which are the very Words of this Authour.

Upon which one might make (if it were lawfull) many reflexions both in reference to him who wrote it, as well as to him who related it; for if the things had been true, yet it had not been convenient or decent to report ſuch mean and low things of a Gentleman, whoſe Triumphs and great Actions he had wrote with ſuch wonder and applauſe; much leſs was it fit to mention them, ſeeing that they were doubtfull, and admitted onely of a probability.

I would know of him, who gave this relation, how he came to the knowledge of ſuch particulars, which related to the Birth of a poor child, that was expoſed in the Porch of a Church, and was ſuckled by a Beaſt, for want of a better Nurſe? When things of this nature happen to the Sons of great Kings and Princes, it is difficult to learn the particular circumſtances thereof; how much leſs of a poor boy thrown at a Church door? And then to ſay, after he was acknowledged by his Father, that he was ſent to keep Swine, muſt be a piece of envy and malice, and nothing elſe; for 'tis not probable that ſuch a principal perſon as Gonzalo Piçarro, Captain of his Majeſty's Troops in Navarre, ſhould ſend his Son after he had acknowledged him to keep Swine. Nor is it probable that the Flies ſhould take the Hogs in ſuch manner as to make them ſtray, where they could never more be found; and therefore that he durſt not return home for fear: To confute which, I have particularly enquired of ſome Paiſants, or Countrey people, whoſe buſineſs it was to breed up Hogs, whether the Fly doth bite them at any time in ſuch manner, as to cauſe them to ſtray abroad; and they have generally aſſured me, that ſuch a thing cannot be.

But Envy in Countries where parties and factions prevail, doth often raiſe reports of this nature to eclipſe the glory of Worthy Men; for finding they are not able to deny, or darken the luſtre of their mighty Actions, which are manifeſt and apparent to all the World, as were thoſe of the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro; they feign and invent ſome mean paſſages relating to their Birth and Education, which being obſcure, are not eaſily refuted.

The truth of all is this: The Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, who was Conquerour and Governour of that great Empire called Peru, was the Natural Son of his Father and Mother, and acknowledged by them at the inſtant of his Birth.

Afterwards his Father Captain Gonzalo Piçarro Married her, who was Mother to our Marquis, and one by extraction of an ancient Family of Chriſtians, unto a certain Countrey Farmer of good repute, called Goodman ſuch a one------of Alcantara, by whom he had a Son named Franciſco Martin de Alcantara, whom Gomara ſaith was the half Brother to the Marquis Piçarro, and was killed with the Marquis, as we have before declared.

Wherefore I conclude, that though ſuch reports as theſe ſhould have ſomething of probable truth in them, yet they ought not to be related to the prejudice of ſuch a Prince, whoſe fame may be equalized with thoſe of higheſt renown.

And ſince we are not able to extoll his praiſes to that degree which they deſerve, we muſt refer the defect of our Expreſſions to be ſupplied by his own Acts and Conqueſts, which ſpeak themſelves. And ſo we ſhall paſs forward in our Hiſtory.

CHAP. X.

Don Diego de Almagro Adminiſters an Oath of Allegiance to all Officers, cauſing them to ſwear Fealty to him as Governour of Peru ; and ſends his Warrants into divers parts of the Kingdom, which are oppoſed and reſiſted.

THE Marquis being thus ſlain, as before related, cauſed chiefly by the over-confidence of Franciſco de Chaves ; for had he ſhut the doors, as he was ordered, the Marquis, and ſuch as were with him, might have had time to have armed themſelves, whilſt the Aſſaſſinates were employed in breaking open the doors ; and perhaps in that manner they might have prevailed over their Enemies : For if the Marquis, and his Brother, and two Pages, were able without their defenſive Arms to kill four of thoſe Ruffians, as ſome Authours report, beſides thoſe who were wounded by them ; what may we imagine they would have done, had they been in a readineſs, and well appointed ? And had thoſe who leaped out of the Windows ſtood to it, and joyned with their Maſters, 'tis very probable they might have been able to have reſiſted, and overcome them ; but when a miſchief once comes with ſurprize, it is hardly prevented by humane Counſels. That Negro which Gomara ſays, vvas killed by theſe Villains, vvas one vvho hearing the buſle, came up the ſtairs to help his Maſter, or to dye vvith him : but vvhen he came to the door, he underſtood that he vvas already killed ; vvherefore he intended to have locked and barred the door, ſo as to have kept them in untill he could have called the Juſtice : But as the Negro vvas ſhutting and faſtning the doors, one of the Aſſaſſinates happened to come out, and gueſſing at the intention of the Negro, fell upon him, and ſtabbed him to death with his Dagger. There were ſeven killed on the ſide of the Marquis, amongſt which the Servant of Chaves was one ; ſoon after which the faction of Almagro went out into the Market-place, and publiſhed their Victory. This was the fate of that good Marquis, who periſhed rather by the negligence and obſtinacy of his own People, than by the power and ſtrength of his Enemies. Upon the news of his Death a great tumult was raiſed through the whole City ; ſome cried out, they have wounded the King by the Death of the Marquis, others with a loud voice proclaimed, the Tyrant is dead, and the Murther of Almagro revenged. With this manner of noiſe and confuſion many of theſe different parties, both of one ſide and of the other, ran out from their Houſes to favour their reſpective Factions ; upon which quarrels and diſputes ſeveral were killed and wounded ; but ſo ſoon as it was known that the Marquis was killed, all his party retired, and the point was decided. Then thoſe of Chili brought forth Don Diego Almagro, Junior, proclaiming him King of Peru. The tumult of that day being ceaſed, he was ſworn by the Corporation of that City to be Governour of that Countrey, none daring to contradict, or queſtion, whatſoever that prevailing party required. In purſuance hereof, the late Miniſters and Officers of Juſtice were all diſplaced, and others appointed in their ſteads. The rich and powerfull Men were all impriſoned, and thoſe of any Eſtates in los Reyes, which were ill affected, were all ſeized, and their Goods confiſcated. Then they took all the Fifths belonging to the King, which being already gathered, amounted to a vaſt ſum. In like manner all the Goods and Eſtates of ſuch as were dead, or abſent, and eſteemed Malignants, lignants, or ill affected, were seized, and converted to the use of their own party, who being poor, (as we have before mentioned) had need thereof to repair their fortunes.

John de Rada was the Person nominated for General: John Tello de Guzman, a Native of Seville, and Francis de Chaves, a near Kinsman of the other Francis de Chaves, who was killed with the Marquis, were made Captains; for it is one of the essential miseries of Civil War for Brothers to fight against Brothers. Likewise Christopher Sotelo received a Commission to be a Captain, and others were nominated for other Offices. At the news of these alterations, all the idle Spaniards and Vagabonds, which were void of employment in Peru, came flocking to the City of los Reyes; so that in a short time Almagro had composed an Army of more than eight hundred Men: In confidence of which force, he dispatched his Orders and Commands to Cozco, and all the Cities of Peru, namely to Arequepa, to the Charcas, and to all places along the Sea-coast of Truxillo, and to the Inland Countries of the Chachapoyas, to receive and acknowledge him for absolute Lord and Governour over all the Empire. One or two Cities complied and obeyed, rather out of fear than love, because they had not power to make resistence against fifty Men, which were sent against them: but other Cities refused to submit, as will presently appear.

It is a common phrase in the Language of Peru to say, Up the Coast, and down the Coast; not that upon the Sea, which is a Plain, there can be Up or Down; but it is a term used in the New Navigation, in respect to the South-wind which always blows Trade, or the same way in those Seas, Panama lying to Lee-ward of Peru; so on the contrary those who Sail from Panama to Peru must turn to Wind-ward, which is, as it were, up-hill, as the other is down.

John de Rada, as we have said, having had a great hand in the late Revolution, took upon him to Issue out all Commissions in the Name of Almagro, without communicating the sense or substance thereof to his other Companions, who had been equally concerned with him in the Murther of the Marquis; which was the cause of much spleen and malice amongst the principal Men, so that they began to bandy amongst themselves, and contrive ways in what manner to kill him.

The Plot being discovered, Francisco de Chaves endured the Wrack, and afterwards was hanged, being the Ring-leader of this Conspiracy; several others were likewise for the same cause put to death, amongst which Antonio de Orihuela, a Native of Salamanca, was one, though lately come from Spain, having on the way from thence said, that the party which now ruled were a company of Tyrants; after which rash saying, he was ill advised to adventure his life in their hands.

Garcia de Alvarado was one of those Officers whom Almagro employed to take possession of Towns and Plantations for his use, and to levy Souldiers, and to plunder Horses, and to disarm all those of the contrary party who had command over Indians, or any power, being esteemed for Enemies to the Government. Accordingly he went to Truxillo, where he discharged Diego de Mora from being Judge of that place, though he had been deputed in that Office by Don Diego de Almagro; but having kept a correspondence with Alonso de Alvarado, who was of the contrary faction, he was esteemed for one disaffected, and not fit for that employment.

In the City of St. Michel he put Francisco de Vozmediano, and Hernando de Villegas, to death, besides other Outrages: And in Huanucu he killed Alonso de Cabrera, who had once been Steward to Francisco Piçarro, because he had made a party to joyn together, and fly to the King's Forces.

Another instrument or Officer they had procured, named Diego Mendez, who went to the Town of Plate in the Charcas, which they found without people, because they had all dispersed themselves by several ways to meet at Cozco, and to declare for the King, as will presently appear. Howsoever, Diego Mendez took great quantities of Gold in that Town, which the Spaniards had with privity of the Indians hidden and concealed; but such was the cowardise of that poor-spirited people, that upon the least threat they immediately made a discovery.

Moreover, he made a seizure of sixty thousand Pesos of refined Silver, digged from the Mines of del Porco, for as yet those of Potocsi were not discovered; and confiscated to the use of Almagro all the Indians Riches and Wealth, which belonged to the Marquis Don Francisco Piçarro, which amounted to a vast sum: the like he did of the Plantations of Captain Diego de Roja of Perançurez, of Graviel

de

de Rojas, of Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and of all other the Inhabitants of that Town, whom he knew well affected to the party of Piçarro.

Another Meſſenger was ſent into the Province of Chachapuyas, which Alonſo de Alvarado had kept in peace and quiet; and who having ſeen and read the Declaration of Don Diego, which promiſed great rewards to ſuch as obeyed him, and threatned ſuch as oppoſed him; he notwithſtanding ſeized on the Meſſenger, and perſuaded a hundred that were with him to follow him and ſerve his Majeſty; to which they having yielded a chearfull aſſent, he declared for the King, and ſet up his Standard. And though Almagro wrote him very kind Letters, endeavouring to allure him to his party; he refuſed all his Offers, proteſting, that he would never own or acknowledge him for Governour, untill ſuch time as he had ſeen his Majeſty's expreſs Commiſſion, and Commands for the ſame; which as he knew his Majeſty would never grant, ſo he did not doubt, but with the help of God, and the Valour of his Souldiers, to revenge the bloud of the Marquis, and puniſh the contempt which he had put on the Authority of his Majeſty. All which Alvarado adventured to ſay and act, truſting to the advantage of the ſituation of that Countrey, which, as we have ſaid in ſeveral places, was very Mountainous; by help of which, he hoped to ſecure his ſmall force, untill ſuch time as recruits and greater numbers of thoſe who were Piçarriſts could come in to joyn with him; being well aſſured that all that party, and the people inhabiting along the Coaſt, would readily aſſiſt, and ſerve the Emperour. Where now we will leave them for a while to treat of others, who followed the ſame courſe.

The Officers and Inſtruments of Almagro, which were diſpatched with his Commiſſion to Cozco, durſt not proceed with the like rigour there, as in other places; for they well knew, that as there were many well-affected perſons in that City, ſo thoſe, who were rich and principal Men there, and had power over the Indians, were all devoted to the ſervice of his Majeſty. And that the contrary party conſiſted onely of ſome poor, indigent Souldiers, and ſuch as were newly come into that Countrey, who hoped by ſuch diſturbances and alterations to make their fortunes. Thoſe who were the Chief Juſtices at that time in the City were Diego de Silva, (whom we have formerly mentioned under the Name of the Son of Feliciano de Silva, a Native of the City of Rodrigo,) together with Francis de Carvajal, who afterwards was Major-General to Gonzalo Piçarro.

Theſe perſons having ſeen the Orders, did not think fit to irritate the contrary party by a flat and down-right denial of all compliance; but having conſulted the Jurats, and the Community of the City Council, returned anſwer, That in an Act of ſuch great weight and importance, it was neceſſary that Don Diego ſhould ſend a more ample power than that which he had already done, which ſeemed ſhort and defective in many particulars; upon tender of which they promiſed to receive him for their Governour: But this was ſaid, not with any intention to comply, but onely to amuſe them, and ſpin out time untill they could unite their forces, which were, for the moſt part, diſperſed in their poſſeſſions, and employed in the Gold Mines, of which moſt of the Inhabitants of that City of Cozco had ſome ſhares allotted to them.

CHAP. XI.

What the Inhabitants of Cozco acted in order to the King's Service. What also was done in favour of Don Diego. Vaca de Castro nominated in Spain for Judge to determine the quarrels and differences in Peru.

Gomez de Tordoya, who was a principal Citizen, and Chief of the Common Council of that Corporation, was not then present, when the Orders and Commission of Almagro were brought to Cozco, having been in the Countrey for six or seven days to divertise himself with Hawking and other sports; so soon as he had read the Letters which advised him of the Tragical Death of the Marquis, for whom he conceived a particular esteem, being his particular Friend and Confident, he was much grieved, and shrinking up his shoulders, turned his head toward the Hawk he carried, saying, It is now more seasonable for us to prepare for a War, with Fire and Sword, than to attend to our sports, and our Countrey recreations; for being a judicious Man, he well foresaw all those miseries and calamities, cruel deaths and revolutions, which would be the certain consequences of the late successes. Hereupon he immediately returned to the City, and not to give any occasion of jealousie or offence to the contrary party, he came in by night; and having discoursed with several of the Corporation, he told them, that it was necessary to convene the people of Arequepa, of the Charcas, and of the parts lying Southward from Cozco, and to assemble the Spaniards, which were dispersed about the Countries: To which end he advised them to dispeed Messengers, of which he offered himself for one. This resolution being taken, he departed that very night from Cozco, and went in search of Captain Nunno de Castro, who then resided at his Plantation, which was about fifteen or twenty Leagues from the City, where being arrived, they both dispatched Messengers to Pedro de Ançures, and to Garçilasso de la Vega; and having informed them of the late successes, they required them as good and loyal Subjects, to repair to Cozco, there to perform such Services as their duty to his Majesty required. After these Messages were dispatched, Gomez de Tordoya went in all haste to seek out for Captain Pedro Alvarez Holguin, who with a hundred Spaniards was marched to the East of Collao to conquer the Indians of those parts, who as yet had not been subdued; and travelling with all diligence and haste, at length he over-took him, and gave him a relation of the Death of the Marquis, and how Don Diego de Almagro pretended to govern the Empire. Wherefore he desired him to take this business to heart, and to interest himself so far in this service of God and the King, as to become Captain and Chief Leader of the people, who had joyned in this League and Association together; and farther to oblige him, he offered to serve under him in quality of the meanest of his Souldiers.

Pedro Alvarez being sensibly touched with the Justice of the cause, and pleased with the Honour so freely offered to him, accepted the Command and Charge, and immediately set up a Standard for his Majesty, sending Messengers to the Charcas, and to Arequepa, to publish his Declaration, containing his Reasons and Intention of this War; farther giving them to understand, that he would march fair and softly with the people that were with him towards Cozco, that so those who were in the rere might have time to come up and joyn with him before he entred the City. The Countrey was by this time all in an uproar upon the confused report of the Death of the Marquis; so that the Messengers sent to Arequepa, and the Charcas met the people already on the way coming to joyn with Pedro Alvarez Holguin, and accordingly the several Bodies being united, their Numbers amounted unto almost two hundred Men. The news of their March being known at Cozco, allarum'd the Almagrian Faction in such manner, that about fifty of them fearing fearing ſome rigorous puniſhment for their demerit, ſtole ſecretly out of the Town by night, and fled, with intention to joyn with Don Diego; but of this number there was not one perſon of Note or Quality amongſt them. Captain Nunno de Caſtro, and Captain Hernando Bachicao having notice hereof, purſued them with twenty Harquebuſiers, which beating up their Quarters in the Night, by ſurprize took and brought them back again to the City without any hurt or other miſchief. In the mean time Alvarez Holguin, with his Souldiers, arrived at the City, to whom alſo many principal perſons of condition flocked from all parts, and were received by the Corporation of the City with much joy and contentment. After which, their firſt buſineſs was to Elect a General, for Alvarez Holguin having performed that charge hitherto, was deſirous to be diſmiſſed from that Office. In this point therefore was ſome diverſity in Opinions, which occaſioned delay; not that any Emulations or Parties obſtructed the progreſs of affairs, but the many perſons, which for their Quality and Abilities were deſerving of that Honour, cauſed the Election to be with more difficulty determined. At length, by the common conſent of all thoſe in the City, the choice fell upon Pedro Alvarez Holguin, who was accordingly ſworn Captain-General, and Chief Juſticiary of Peru, untill his Majeſty's farther pleaſure ſhould be known therein. The which Act was legally done, for it was in the power of the Government of this City (as the Head of the Empire) to nominate a Chief, with other Officers both Military and Civil, whenſoever the lawfull Magiſtrates ſhould fail, and the ſame ſo to continue, untill his Majeſty ſhould confirm them, or Commiſſionate others. Gomez de Tordoya was appointed for Lieutenant-General, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and Pedro de Ançures, were made Captains of Horſe, Nunno de Caſtro, and Hernando de Bachicao Captains of Foot, and Martin de Robles was appointed Enſign to carry the Royal Standard.

Hereupon War was declared againſt Diego de Almagro, and the Citizens of Cozco obliged themſelves to make good unto his Majeſty whatſoever Alvarez Holguin ſhould expend in proſecution of this War out of the Royal Exchequer in caſe his Majeſty ſhould not allow the ſame: To the performance of which, not onely the Citizens of Cozco, but the Inhabitants of Charcas and Arequepa did bind both their Perſons and Eſtates; and ſuch was the chearfulneſs and affection towards his Majeſty's Service, that in a ſhort time they compoſed a Body of three hundred and fifty, all choice and ſelect Men, both Officers and Souldiers; of which number there were about a hundred and fifty Horſe, a hundred Harquebuſiers, and the reſt Pikemen. In the mean time News came to Alvarez Holguin, that Alonſo de Alvarado had ſet up his Standard for the Emperour in the Chachapuyas, which occaſioned great joy, becauſe they greatly feared, that all that Countrey from Rimac to Quitu was well affected to Almagro. Much about the ſame time likewiſe intelligence came, that Don Diego was marching towards Cozco with an Army of above eight hundred Men, with intention to give them Battel; which being conſidered at a Council of War, it was agreed not to ſtay, and expect his coming to Cozco, but to march forth and joyn with Alonſo de Alvarado; and that paſſing by way of the Mountains and narrow places, they might eaſily avoid the Engagement with Almagro, untill they were better recruited, and reinforced by ſuch as were loyal and well-affected to their cauſe, which (as they were adviſed) were coming to them from all parts, by ſecret ways of Woods and Mountains. With this reſolution they departed from Cozco, leaving ſuch behind as were uſeleſs, and not fit for ſervice; and that the City might ſtill keep a face of being theirs, Officers were appointed to maintain the Government, and diſtribute Juſtice. In their March they uſed all due caution, ſending their Scouts before to diſcover the Enemy, reſolving to avoid fighting with Almagro, unleſs they could ſurprize him with advantage.

In the mean time, whilſt things were thus ordered in Cozco, Almagro and his Complices were not idle or negligent in the City of los Reyes, where they received ſecret intelligence of all that paſſed at Cozco, and how they intended to march by way of the Mountains to joyn with Alonſo de Alvarado, and with his to ſtrengthen their Forces, which as yet were not ſufficient to give him Battel. Upon theſe Advices Almagro, with concurrence of his Captains, reſolved to meet them; and in order thereunto he recalled Captain Garçia de Alvarado, who was buſily employed along the Coaſt of Truxillo, levying Men, and providing Horſes and Arms for this ſervice: And though he intended to have fallen upon Alonſo de Alvarado, who who was then in Chachapuyas, becauſe he believed himſelf to have an advantage in his numbers; yet having been re-manded by Orders from Almagro, he obeyed them, and relinquiſhed his deſign. Garçia de Alvarado being returned, Almagro departed from los Reyes, and marched towards Cozco with intention to fight Alvarez Holguin, the force of Almagro conſiſted of three hundred Horſe well appointed, of an hundred and twenty Harquebuſiers, and about a hundred and ſixty Pikemen, which being almoſt ſix hundred, were all choice and approved Men; amongſt which there were many Perſons of great Quality, and rich, whom Almagro had ſeized, when he killed the Marquis.

And leſt after his departure any party ſhould make an Inſurrection againſt him, and ſerve him, as thoſe who were Enemies to his Father had done to him, he took Order to ſend all the Children of the Marquis, and of Gonzalo Piçarro, out of the Countrey. And now firſt to find out whether the Marquis had left any ſecret Treaſure, not diſcovered, he put the Queſtion to Antonio Picado, Secretary to the Marquis, upon the Rack; and not being able to extort any thing from him, he ſent him to the Gallows, and hanged him up; and ſo he paid the Medal with his own Coin, which he had ſtamped for the Faction of Chili. After which he marched towards Cozco, keeping in his way due martial Diſcipline and Order with much ſeverity; where we ſhall leave both him, and Alvarez Holguin, to render an account of what his Imperial Majeſty ordained in Spain; after he had underſtood the great Commotions which had happened in Peru untill the Death of Don Diego de Almagro the Elder.

To appeaſe which, and to examine the true ſtate of all matters, his Majeſty was pleaſed to give Commiſſion to Dr. Vaca de Caſtro, one of His Privy Council, to examine all matters concerning the Death of Don Diego de Almagro, without making any alteration in the Power and Government of the Marquis; but in caſe the Marquis ſhould be dead before his Arrival, then by a proviſional Commiſſion he was conſtituted Governour in his place. This worthy Perſon (for ſo his Actions ſhew him) was a Native of the City of Leon, and of the Families of the Vacas de Caſtro, and Quinnones, which are noble Houſes, amongſt many others which flouriſh in that Royal City.

Vaca de Caſtro embarked at Sevil for Peru, and after many Difficulties and ſtormy Weather, to which that Northern Sea is ſubject, he arrived at Nombre de Dios much later than was expected, from whence he went to Panama, where he again embarked for Peru, upon a Ship not ſo well provided for ſuch a Voyage, as was requiſite, eſpecially ſince it was to execute a Commiſſion of ſuch great importance; for the Ship being defective, had not proceeded many Leagues on her Voyage, before ſhe was detained on the Coaſt by contrary Winds; by force of which having loſt one of her Anchors, ſhe was carried by the Current into that Bay which is called the Bay or Gulf of Gorgona, which is a bad place, and very hard for any Ship to get out, which is bound to Peru. Wherefore Vaca de Caſtro encouraged the Mariners to uſe all the diligence they were able, but finding all ineffectual, and to little purpoſe, he reſolved to go by Land, ſince he could not avail to go by Sea. But the Journey was long, difficult and tedious, by reaſon of the craggy Mountains, the great Rivers and Deſarts which they were to paſs, with want of thoſe Proviſions which were good and wholſome. This long delay gave opportunity to Almagro to revenge the Death of his Father, of which he was impatient, ſeeing that the Juſtice which His Majeſty had promiſed was ſo long deferred.

At length, after various chances of a difficult Journey, Judge Vaca de Caſtro came to the Frontiers of Quitu, where Pedro de Puelles reſided in Quality of Deputy to Gonzalo Piçarro. So ſoon as he found himſelf within the Limits of his own Countrey, and had been rightly informed of all matters which had paſſed in Peru, and of the Practices and Deſigns of the ſeveral Factions, he wrote unto all parts, giving them advice of his Arrival, and of the Commiſſion he brought with him from His Majeſty; by virtue of which he required them to receive him for their Governour. And whereas he had thereby a power to ſubſtitute other Officers, he diſpatched his Commiſſions to all the Cities of Peru, conſtituting ſuch Men Judges thereof, who (as he was informed) were moderate Perſons, and not intereſted or engaged in either party.

CHAP. XII.

The People of Rimac, and other parts, receive Vaca de Caſtro for Governour. Peralvarez, and his Complices, contrive a Strategeme of War againſt Almagro, and join with Alonſo de Alvarado.

AMongſt the Commiſſions which Judge Vaca de Caſtro diſpatched to ſeveral places; that for the City of Los Reyes was directed to Friar Thomas de St. Martin, Provincial of the Order of the Dominicans, and to Francis de Barionuevo, and to Geronimo de Aliaga, giving them power and authority to ſuperintend the Government of that City, and of the parts thereunto belonging, untill he himſelf arrived there in Perſon.

Theſe Commiſſions were brought and delivered in the Convent of St. Dominick, ſome few days after the departure of Almagro, and in the abſence alſo of the Father Provincial, whom Almagro had carried with him, to countenance his Enterpriſe with the preſence of ſuch a Perſon. Howſoever the Mayor and Aldermen of the City aſſembled in the night, and having opened the Commiſſion, they with common conſent obeyed it, and received Vaca de Caſtro for Governour of that Empire, and Geronimo de Aliaga to be his Deputy, as the Commiſſion ſpecified. So ſoon as the Citizens had paſſed this Act, they fled to Truxillo; fearing the return of Almagro, who as yet was not advanced ſo far on his march, but that upon the News of this Revolution he was ready to have returned with full intent to avenge this ſudden deſertion on the City with Fire, and Sword, and other Cruelties; but then fearing leſt this delay ſhould give an advantage to Alvarez Holguin, he reſolved to proceed, and to purſue his Deſign, which vvas of greateſt importance. Hovvſoever in the Execution thereof many croſs and unfortunate Accidents occurred; for ſo ſoon as it vvas knovvn in the Army, that a Governour from His Majeſty vvas arrived in the Countrey, many of the principal Men revolted, and deſerted him; amongſt vvhich vvere the Father Provincial, John de Saavedra, the Agitant Ylen Suarez de Carvajal, de Aguero, and Gomez de Alvarado. Hovvſoever in deſpight of all theſe diſcouragements Almagro reſolutely purſued his Point and Deſign, though to his great diſappointment and prejudice his Lieutenant General, John de Rada, fell ſick, by reaſon of vvhich he vvas greatly confuſed vvithin himſelf vvhat courſe to take; for in caſe he left him behind, he vvas in danger of falling into the Hands of the Enemy, nor did the Extremity of his Sickneſs admit of any motion; hovvſoever for his ſake he leſſened his days journies, and marched very ſoftly, knovving that his principal buſineſs vvas to overthrovv Alvarez Holguin.

Pedro Alvarez being informed that the Enemy vvas dravving near, to vvhom his Force vvas much inferiour, he thought it no-vviſe prudent to adventure the ſucceſs of Affairs on the hazard of a Battel, conſidering that the ſubſiſtence of his Army vvas of great importance to the Service of his Majeſty; vvherefore to ſupply that vvhich vvas vvanting in ſtrength by ſome Strategeme of War, it vvas agreed by a Council of War, to detach a Body of tvventy choice Horſe to ſerve for Scouts, and to uſe all their endeavours to take ſome of the Souldiers of Almagro, vvhich accordingly happened out; for theſe Horſe took three Spies belonging to the Enemy, vvhich being brought to Alvarez, he hanged up tvvo of them, and the third he ſaved, making him great promiſes of Revvard for the future, and in hand beſtovved on him three thouſand Peſos of Gold, conditionally, that he ſhould return to the Camp of Almagro, and there perſuade ſeveral of thoſe vvhom he knevv to be vvell affected to him, to revolt from Almagro, and aſſiſt him in the Fight, for that he deſigned the next day, by tvvilight of the morning, to aſſault the Army of Almagro on the Eaſt-ſide of the Camp, vvhich, by reaſon that that it bordered on the Skirts of the ſnovvy Mountain, he imagined vvould be the worſt guarded, and that therefore little or no proviſion would be made on that part againſt any Attempt. And farther they gave him inſtructions to aſſure ſuch Friends as ſhould join herein of the ſame Rewards; and ſhould be more amply repaid according to thoſe great Services, which thereby they would perform to the Emperour, his King and Maſter; and to ſecure the Souldier's Faith in this matter, they tendered an Oath to him, whereby they cauſed him to ſwear never to diſcover this ſecret to any perſon whatſoever, ſaying, that having eſteemed him for a good Friend they had entruſted to him the greateſt ſecret in the World. The Souldier returning, told his Story, how that his two Companions were hanged by the Enemy, and he alone was ſaved and ſet at Liberty, upon which Almagro reflecting a while, imagined that ſome uſe was to be made of this Souldier, who without any apparent reaſon was better treated than the other; to diſcover which he ſeized on the Souldier, and put him to the torment. The Souldier being on the Rack, confeſſed the ſecret committed to him, and how Peralvarez deſigned to attack him on the Quarter which was next to the ſnowy Mountain, by reaſon that that ſide being eſteemed almoſt inacceſſible, would lie the moſt open and undefended. By which Confeſſion Almagro finding that the Souldier intended to act in a treacherous manner againſt him, gave order to have him hanged. Howſoever giving ſome credit to his Words, he fortified that ſide of his Camp, which bordered towards the ſnowy Mountain, where for the ſpace of three days he endured much cold; howſoever by theſe means Alvarez got the ſtart, and marched at a good diſtance before him; Almagro followed him for ſome Leagues, but finding that it was impoſſible to overtake him, he returned into the high Road, which leads to Cozco. Alvarez proceeding on the way he intended, joined his Forces with thoſe of Alonſo de Alvarado, at which meeting there was great joy and triumph, becauſe that the greateſt number of them conſiſted of ſuch as had entred that Countrey with Don Pedro de Alvarado, which was the firſt original of Friendſhip and Aſſociation which was commenced between them.

Theſe Forces being thus joined, Letters were written by common conſent to the Judge Vaca de Caſtro, giving him to underſtand of all matters that were paſt, and deſiring him to haſten with ſpeed to them, for that his preſence was neceſſary in that conjuncture for better countenance of their Affairs. So ſoon as theſe Letters came to hand, Caſtro de Vaca haſtened to the City of Quitu to recruit his People with the Forces which were in that place. When he came near, Lorenzo de Aldana, who was Lieutenant Governour for the Marquis in Quitu, went forth to meet and receive him, as did alſo Pedro de Puelles, who was the Deputy of Gonzalo Piçarro, and Captain Pedro de Vergara, not to be faulty or remiſs in paying the ſame reſpect, though otherwiſe employed in the Conqueſt of that Province, which is called Pacamuru, and by the Spaniards Bracamoros, went alſo to receive Judge Vaca de Caſtro; and deſerted the place, which he had already fortified, that he might be better enabled to defend himſelf, and ſend his Forces againſt Almagro; but before Vaca de Caſtro thought fit to leave Quitu, he diſpatched Pedro de Puelles before to Truxillo, to make ſuch proviſions in that City, and in the Countrey thereabouts, as the War required. He likewiſe diſpatched orders to Gomez de Rojas, a Native of Cuellar, to repair with his Forces in all diligence to Cozco, and there to perſuade the People to receive him for Governour; who accordingly made ſuch ſpeed, that he arrived at Cozco before Almagro, who was detained in his way by the ſickneſs of John de Rada, who dyed afterwards in that Province. Gomez de Rojas was well received in Cozco, and his Orders and Inſtructions obeyed, and accordingly Caſtro was acknowledged for Governour; for that City remained loyal and obedient to His Majeſty in ſuch manner as it had been left by Alvarez Holguin. In the mean time Vaca de Caſtro departed from Quitu, and went to Truxillo, and by the way was met with many Noble Perſons, who had been diſperſed about the Countries, and by many Souldiers, who being deſirous to ſerve His Majeſty, went forth to receive him. Pedro Alvarez, and his people, who then reſided at Truxillo, agreed to ſend two perſons to meet him on the way, and in the name of them, and of the whole City, to make tender of their Obedience and Service to him, as Governour by Commiſſion from His Majeſty, by which Title we ſhall diſtinguiſh him hereafter; the Perſons nominated for Envoyes on this occaſion were Gomez de Tordoya, and Garcilaſſo de la Vega; with ſight of whom the Governour was greatly rejoiced, being much encouraged to ſee his party daily encreaſe to ſuch numbers, that when he entered Truxillo, he brought with him above 200 Souldiers, beſides ſeveral which fled from Almagro, amongſt which the principal Perſons were the Father Provincial, Ylen Suarez de Carvajal, Gomez de Alvarado, John de Saavedra, and Diego de Aguero. Being arrived at Truxillo, he was received with ſuch ſolemnity as was due to a Governour, that is, in a military pomp, with ſound of Drums, and Trumpets, and Vollies of Shot; for as yet matters were in a ſtate of War, and not prepared for a reception according to the formalities of Peace.

CHAP. XIII.

The Governour makes choice of Captains. Sends his Army before. Provides all things neceſſary for the ſervice of His Majeſty. Chriſtopher de Sotelo is killed by Garcia de Alvarado; and Garcia de Alvarado by Don Diego de Almagro.

Pedro Alvarez Holguin, and his Captains and Souldiers, who had profeſſed Submiſſion and Loyalty to the Governour in his abſence, did now upon his arrival teſtifie their actual Obedience by a publick Declaration in Writing, under their hands, and ſolemnly reſign the Command and Power of the Army into his hands, the Captains and Officers delivering up their Commiſſions, and laying their Enſigns at his Feet; the like was followed by the Governours and Juſtices of the City of Truxillo, all which the Governour received in ſuch manner as was fitting, and renewed them again in the name of His Majeſty, confirming every perſon in his Office, either Civil or Military, reſpectively as before. He gave ſix Commiſſions to Captains of Horſe, namely, to Pedro Alvarez Holguin, Alonſo de Alvarado, Pedro Anzures, Gomez de Alvarado, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, and to Pedro de Puelles. The Captains of Harquebuſiers were Pedro de Vergara, Nunno de Caſtro, and John Velez de Guevara, who was a Scholar, as well as a Souldier, and ſuch a Mechanick, that he directed the making all the Muſquets for his own Company, and was ſo active and induſtrious, that he divided his time between Letters and Arms in ſuch manner, that both in this preſent ſtate of Affairs, as alſo on occaſion of the Troubles cauſed by Goazalo Piçarro, as we ſhall hereafter relate, he was ordained and conſtituted in quality of a Judge; ſo that all the morning, untill noon, he clothed himſelf in the Robes of a Lawyer, in which he heard Cauſes, and determined Differences; then afterwards in the afternoon he changed his Habit to appear like a Souldier, with Breeches and Dublet of divers colours, richly embrodered with Gold, and very gallant with his plume of Feathers; and buckling on his Coat of Mail, with his Muſquet on his Shoulder, trained his Souldiers in ſhooting, and other Exerciſes of War. Thus far are the Words of Carate in the 15th Chapter of his 4th Book; by which it appears, that the ſame Perſon may be both a Souldier and a Scholar; and the Qualities of one ſo conſiſtent with that of the other, as to be both uſefull in their proper times and ſeaſons. But to proceed.

Hernando Bachicao was named for Captain of the Pikemen, and Francis de Carvajal was made Sergeant Major, who was afterwards Major-General to Gonzalo Piçarro. Gomez de Tordoya was made Lieutenant General; and the Royal Standard he reſerved for himſelf, with which he performed the Office of General. Thus having ſetled his Forces, he diſpeeded them before him, under command of their reſpective Officers, which in all compoſed an Army of 700 Men, of which 370 were Harquebuſiers, 160 Pikemen, and the reſt were Horſe. Pedro de Puelles was commanded to march before, with a Detachment of thirty Horſe, to diſcover the Enemy and other Obſtructions in the way; having Inſtructions to go by way of the Mountain, but not to paſs Sauſſa; but there to expect the coming up of the Main Body, becauſe their reſolution was to march along the coaſt to the City of Los Reyes. In the mean time Diego de Mora was appointed Deputy Governour, and Commander in Chief of the Forces which remained behind.

Los

Matters being in this manner diſpoſed, the Governour marched to the City of Los Reyes, where he received into his Poſſeſſion, and under his Command the Arms, and Souldiers, which flocked to him from all parts; and having left Franciſco Barionuevo his Deputy in that place, and made and conſtituted John Perez de Guevara Admiral of the City, he parted thence to Sauſſa, to follow his Army; leaving Orders, that in caſe Don Diego de Almagro ſhould come to the City of Los Reyes, that Captain Perez de Guevara, and his Deputy Barionuevo, ſhould take care to embark on board the Ships then in Port all the Women and Children, and infirm and uſeleſs People, that ſo they might not fall into the hand of the Enemy to be ill treated by them; and that upon advice thereof, he would march to their Relief.

But let us here leave him in his way, to treat of what in the mean time paſſed amongſt the Almagrians in Cozco; where Diſcord was not ſatisfied with the fire of Diſſention, blown into a Flame between the two Parties; but Emulation and Envy ſtirred up Strife in thoſe of the ſame ſide, which proceeded to effuſion of the Bloud of thoſe who were of the chiefeſt Rank and Quality amongſt them. For Almagro marching towards Cozco, made choice of Chriſtopher de Sotelo, and Garcia de Alvarado, for his Counſellours, and chief Confidents, in the place of John de Rada, who (as we have ſaid) dyed on the way, and gave to them the chief Authority and Command in the Army. Chriſtopher de Sotelo was diſpeeded before to Cozco, with a certain number of choice Men, to take poſſeſſion of that City, and to reduce all things to the Service and Devotion of Almagro, that when he arrived there, he might be received without any oppoſition. Sotelo accordingly performed his Orders, finding no Force to make reſiſtence againſt him; ſo that without any difficulty he removed all the Officers of Juſtice, which Pedro Alvarez had ordained there, and ſupplied their places with others of his own party. Moreover he gathered all the Proviſions he was able from the parts round about, that when the Enemy came near, they might periſh with Want and Famine. Soon after which Almagro arriving at Cozco, made great quantities of Gunpowder, of the ſtrongeſt and fineſt ſort, by means of the Salt-Petre, which in thoſe parts is better than any in Peru; and by the help and art of certain Levantines, (the Greeks ſo called in the Indies,) he caſt ſeveral pieces of Cannon, of which People many came into thoſe parts out of good-will and reſpect unto Pedro de Candia, who having (as we mentioned before) been diſobliged by Piçarro, followed afterwards the Party of Almagro; that Countrey abounding with Copper, and other Metalls, fit for making Cannon, they founded many Pieces, the Command of which was given to Pedro de Candia, with Title of Maſter of the Artillery. In like manner the Greeks, with the aſſiſtence of the Indian Silver-ſmiths, made many Helmets, and Corſlets of Silver, mixed with Copper, which proved admirably good. The Prince Manco Inca, who had for long time voluntarily baniſhed himſelf into the Mountains, calling to mind the ancient Friendſhip he had entertained with Almagro the Father, was pleaſed to revive the ſame by his kindneſs to the Son, which he knew not in what other manner to teſtifie in his low condition, then by preſenting unto him the Coats of Mail, Armour, Swords, and Saddles; which had been the Spoils which the Indians had taken from the Spaniards, whom they had killed, during the Siege of Cozco; of which there was a ſufficient quantity to arm two hundred Men.

But whilſt matters ſucceeded thus proſperouſly on the ſide of Almagro, above his hopes and expectations, an unhappy controverſie fell out between Chriſtopher de Sotelo, and Garcia de Alvarado, who being the Chief Commanders, and leading Men of the Army, proved very unfortunate, conſidering the circumſtances of Affairs which at that time required Union and Communication of Counſels, when on the contrary whatſoever was propoſed by one, was diſliked and oppoſed by the other; and in this manner Malice boiled in each other's Breaſt to ſuch a degree, that one day being together in the Market-place, and happening to quarrel about a trivial matter, Garcia de Alvarado killed Chriſtopher de Sotelo; and whereas theſe two were the Chief Commanders of the Army, they could not want friends on each ſide to maintain the Quarrel; ſo that many coming in to intereſt themſelves as ſeconds in that Rencounter, much Bloud had certainly been ſhed, had not Almagro interpoſed, and with fair and gentle Words appeaſed the Tumult, which was raiſed between the different Factions. Howſoever he could not forbear to reſent the Death of Chriſtopher de Sotelo, who was a perſon of an obliging deportment towards him, and ever forward to perform his Commands; but as yet it was requiſite to diſſemble, and reſerve the puniſhment till a more ſeaſonable occaſion. Notwithſtanding which Almagro knew not how to conceal his Anger ſo well, but that Alvarado ſuſpected his evil Intentions towards him; and conſidering that no gentle remedy offered, or could poſſibly be applyed, wherewith he might ſoften his mind, and reconcile his Affections, but that he would ſooner or later take his revenge, he concluded that the onely means to ſecure his own ſafety, was to kill Almagro, deſigning by his bloud to make a ſacrifice of Atonement to the Governour, whereby to obtain pardon for himſelf, and his Complices; and having conſulted hereupon with ſome of his Friends and Confidents; the means agreed to compaſs this deſign, was to invite Almagro to a ſolemn Banquet, at which being preſent, and without ſuſpition in his Houſe, he might ſet upon him, and kill him. Accordingly an invitation was made unto Almagro, who to avoid the appearance of all ſuſpition and Jealouſie relating to what he feared, he accepted the Offer: The day being come, and he more confirmed in the certainty of what he formerly ſuſpected, feigned himſelf ſick, and much indiſpoſed; and unfit to be preſent at a Banquet. And here Carate proceeds on his ſtory, and ſays,

" Garcia de Alvarado finding himſelf diſappoi ıted, after he had diſpoſed and pre" pared all matters in order to the execution of his Deſign, determined to go with " a great Train of Friends to importune. Almagro to accept the Invitation; and " being on his way thither, he met with Martin Carillo, and told him where he " was going, to which he made anſwer, that in his opinion, he did not doe well, " being aſſured that he would be there killed; another Souldier alſo confirmed
" the ſame, all which was not ſufficient to diſſuade him to the contrary; ſo in he " went to the Chamber, where he found Almagro lying on his Bed, having ſe" cretly conveyed certain armed Men into an inner Room. So ſoon as Alvarado
" and his Complices came in, Come my Lord, ſaid he, ariſe, and give not way to a " little Indiſpoſition, it will be good for you to walk, and diverti ſe your ſelf; and though
" you eat but little, yet your preſence will chear up the Company, and the other Gueſts. Al-
" magro told him that he would go, and ariſing called for his Cloak, for he was " laid on the Bed in his Waſtecoat, with his Sword and Dagger; and being " about to go forth, the People in the room went out firſt, and juſt as Alvarado, " who was immediately before Almagro, was ready to go out, John de Rada, who " kept the door, clapt it to on a ſudden, and then cloſing with Garcia de Alva- " rado, You are my Priſoner, ſaid he; with which Almagro drawing his Sword, ran " him through the Body, ſaying, You are not onely a Priſoner, but a dead Man; with " which John Balſa, Alonſo de Saavedra, Diego Mendez, Brother of Rodrigo Orgonmos, " and others, which lay concealed in the inner Room, ruſhed forth, and gave " him ſo many wounds, as deprived him of his Life. The news hereof being re" ported abroad, began to cauſe great Tumults in the City, but Almagro appeaſed
" all with his preſence, ſo that the miſchief proceeded no farther, onely the " Complices of Alvarado thereupon fled to the Governour. Thus far Carate;
the which is confirmed by Lopez de Gomara. The name of the Souldier which Carate ſays, adviſed Alvarado not to goe, was Auguſtine Salado. And whereas it is ſaid, that John de Rada was he who ſhut the Door, is a miſtake, and ſlip of the pen, for as is before mentioned, he dyed at Sauſſa; but he who clapt the door to was Peter de Onnate, for which piece of Service ſo opportunely performed, Almagro made him his Lieutenant General.

CHAP. XIV.

Don Diego de Almagro marches forth to meet the Governour; and Gonzalo Piçarro, after having paſſed moſt incredible Difficulties, finds his way out of the Cinnamon Countrey.

SOme days after that matters were quieted, which had been put into a fermentation and diſturbance by the Death of Alvarado. Almagro reſolved to proceed with his Army againſt the Governour Vaca de Caſtro, who, as he had received intelligence, was departed from the City of Los Reyes, to meet and fight him. On which occaſion Almagro reſolved to give him to underſtand, that he did not fear his Force, eſteeming himſelf the more formidable of the two; for that his Souldiers, being ſeven hundred Spaniards in number, were all brave and ſtout fellows; amongſt which two hundred were Harquebuſiers, two hundred and fifty Pikemen, and of them many armed with Halberds, the reſt conſiſted of two hundred and fifty Horſemen, all armed with Coats of Mail, and Back and Breaſt of Iron, many of which were made by themſelves; and, as Gomara ſaith in Chapter 149. were better Men, and better armed than any of thoſe belonging to the Armies either of his Father, or of Piçarro. Moreover, he had a great Train of Artillery, to which he truſted very much, beſides a number of Indians, &c. Theſe are the Words of Gomara, to which he farther adds, That John Balſa was his General, and Peter d'Onate his Lieutenant-General.

With theſe Souldiers, and with theſe Proviſions and Equipage Almagro marched to meet and give Battel to the Governour, Vaca de Caſtro, and having proceeded fifty Leagues, he entred into the Province of Villca, where he received information, that the King's Army was thirty Leagues diſtant from thence.

But let us for a while make a digreſſion from both theſe Parties, and return to Gonzalo Piçarro, whom with his Companions we left engolfed in the moſt inextricable Difficulties and Neceſſities, which humane Nature was capable to ſuſtain; for they were to contend with deep and rapid Rivers, with Bogs and mooriſh Grounds, which were unpaſſable; and were to travel over Mountains of incredible height, on which grew Trees of an immenſe magnitude, as Gomara in the end of his eighth Chapter reports, upon the authority of Vicente Yanez Pinçon, who was one of the Diſcoverers, and who having related what had befaln him in thoſe parts, concludes at length with the ſtrange Prodigies of that Countrey, of which he gives a Narrative in theſe following Words.

" The Diſcoverers brought with them the bark of certain Trees, which ſeemed " to be Cinnamon, and the Skin of a Beaſt which put its young ones into its " Breaſt; and they related for a ſtrange Story, that they had ſeen Trees which " ſixteen Men could not fathome, or encompaſs with their Armes, &c.

But beſides the many Difficulties with which Gonzalo Piçarro and his Companions were to ſtruggle, the moſt irreſiſtible of all was Hunger, that grievous and cruel Enemy of Man and Beaſt, which hath been ſo fatal to both in that uninhabited Countrey. We have ſaid before that Gonzalo Piçarro reſolved to return unto Peru, and therefore leaving the River, he took his way Northward, and paſſed through Lands and Mountains no leſs difficult than the former, being forced to open a way and path with Bills and Hatchets, and to feed upon Herbs and Roots, and wild Fruit; which were ſo ſcarce, that when any plenty thereof happened, they eſteemed themſelves fortunate in that Days journey; when they came to Lakes and mooriſh Grounds, they carried their ſick and infirm people on their Shoulders, in which work none took more pains than Gonzalo Piçarro, and his Captains, who by their Example gave courage and chearfulneſs to all the reſt. In this manner they had travelled three hundred Leagues through all the Difficulties we have related, and more than can be expreſſed; for who can fanſie or imagine the Labours they had ſuſtained in the Journey of four hundred Leagues outwards; and in that of three hundred Leagues back, and yet after all, there was no proſpect of an end, though they had killed their Horſes, and eaten them one after another, till they had made an end of all. At firſt they eat their Grey-hounds, Spannels, and Maſtiff-Dogs, which (as we have mentioned in our Hiſtory of Florida) were of great uſe and ſervice to them in the Conqueſt of the Indies; and of theſe they made their Delicacies, ſo long as they laſted. At length, as Gomara ſaith, Chapter 144. the Spaniards were ready to eat thoſe which dyed, according to the Cuſtome of thoſe barbarous Indians, who inhabit thoſe Mountains, &c.

So ſoon as the Horſe-fleſh failed, which being divided amongſt ſo great numbers was inconſiderable; many Indians, as well as Spaniards, were ſtarved with Hunger, for the force of Herbs was not alone able to ſuſtain Nature, ſo that they began then to faint and droop; ſo being forced to leave the Indians and Spaniards by three and four in a company, abandoning them to the Woods, and to the Mountains, there to periſh, and dye without comfort; in the ſame manner as we have related in the Journal of Garcilaſſo de la Vega, where they were expoſed to the like Miſery, not being able to travel, and keep company with their Fellows.

But the want of Salt was none of their leaſt needs, for that in their Travels of four hundred Leagues, as Carate ſaith in the 5th of his 4th Book, they found not one grane thereof; for the Countries being uninhabited, they neither found any, nor people to inform them what they uſed in the place thereof; for want of which they became weak in their joints, faint, and ſcorbutick, ſtinking, and almoſt rotten alive, in the ſame manner as we have related in the Hiſtory of Florida, where is demonſtrated how much Salt is neceſſary for conſervation of humane Life.

By reaſon of the continual Rains, and moiſture of the Earth, their woollen Cloths and linen being always wet, became rotten, and dropped from their Bodies, ſo that from the higheſt to the loweſt every Man was naked, and had no other covering than ſome few Leaves, with which they hid their privy parts both before and behind. And though that warm Climate did not require much clothing, yet it had been a good Defence againſt the Thorns and Buſhes of thoſe rough Mountains, over which they could make no other way than by Bills and Hatchets, and yet the Briers and Brambles tore their Skins, that they ſeemed all over raw, and half flead.

So great, and ſo unſupportable were the Miſeries which Gonzalo Piçarro and his Companions endured for want of Food, that the four thouſand Indians which attended them in this Diſcovery, periſhed with Famine, and amongſt them a certain Indian greatly beloved by Gonzalo Piçarro, who took the Lances from the two Cavaliers, as we have before related; for which piece of bravery he was lamented by him with as much ſenſe of Grief, as if he had been his Brother, as he often declared. Likewiſe of the three hundred and forty Spaniards which entred on this Diſcovery two hundred and ten dyed, beſides the fifty which were carried away by Orellana. Thoſe eighty which remained alive, after having paſſed three hundred Leagues of Mountain, entred at length into a more open Countrey, and a more dry Climate, where they found Birds, Deer, and other wild Beaſts, which they killed with their Croſs-bows, and Guns, by the help of a ſmall quantity of their Powder, which they had reſerved. Of the Skins of theſe Beaſts they made themſelves ſhort Breeches, onely ſufficient to cover their Nakedneſs, for they would not reach farther, their Swords they carried without Scabbards, all covered with ruſt, and they walked barefoot, and their Viſages were become ſo black, dry, and withered, that they ſcarce knew one the other; in which condition they came at length to the Frontiers of Quitu, where they kiſſed they Ground, and returned Thanks to Almighty God, who had delivered them out of ſo many and ſo imminent Dangers. And being come now to a place of Food, and ſuſtenance, they were ſo greedy thereof, that they were forced to lay a reſtraint upon their Appetites, and ſtint themſelves to a certain proportion, leſt they ſhould ſurfeit with exceſs; ſome of them, who were of a more weak Conſtitution, and accuſtomed to Faſtings, and Abſtinence, were not able to endure repletion, their Stomachs rejecting the Food and Nutriment, adminiſtred to them.

And

And now approaching near to the City of Quitu, they gave notice to the Inhabitants of their condition; but the place being almoſt diſpeopled by reaſon of the Wars raiſed by Almagro, and by the abſence of its principal Citizens, and by the few Merchants which were therein; they were ſo poor, that all the Cloathing they could make was not ſufficient to ſupply the wants of Piçarro and his company: All the ſtock which the City could make, being onely ſix Suits of Apparel, contributed by ſeveral perſons; one brought a Cloak, another a Coat, another a Waſtcoat, another a pair of Breeches, another a Hat and Shirts, and all of ſeveral Pieces and Colours, which ſerved to cloath Gonzalo Piçarro, and his other five principal Officers; for it was impoſſible to provide ſufficient furniture for them all.

In the whole Town there were onely twelve Horſes left, for all the reſt were ſent to the Wars in Service of his Majeſty; on theſe they laded Proviſions, and food for them, and would have ſent all the delicacies in the World, had that place afforded them; for Gonzalo Piçarro was the moſt beloved Man in Peru; and indeed his Nature was ſo affable, and his Deportment ſo obliging, that he rendred himſelf acceptable to Strangers, whereſoever he came; and how much more to Friends and Companions?

Twelve of the moſt ſubſtantial Citizens were appointed to carry the Preſents, and therewith travelled thirty Leagues from the City before they met with Gonzalo Piçarro. It is not to be imagined how much joy and ſatisfaction was expreſſed at this meeting, accompanied with ſuch a floud of tears upon rehearſal of the dolefull Story, that it is hard to determine which paſſion either of joy or ſorrow was the moſt prevalent; for Piçarro and his Companions were tranſported with an Exceſs of joy and comfort to ſee themſelves delivered from thoſe dangers and miſeries out of which they once believed it impoſſible to eſcape. The Citizens on the other ſide grieved and lamented to ſee in what a miſerable and ſqualid condition Gonzalo and his Friends returned, and to hear the dolefull ſtory of thoſe who periſhed with Famine, and in what manner they had left many of their Companions alive in the Mountains, and expoſed to dye with hunger. But at length conſidering that there was no remedy for what was paſt, they comforted each other, drying up their Tears, which little availed.

CHAP. XV.

Gonzalo Piçarro being entred into Quitu, writes to the Governour, offering his Perſon and his People to ſerve him. The Governour's Anſwer thereunto; and what Conditions the Governour offered to Don Diego de Almagro.

Gonzalo Piçarro, and his Captains and Souldiers, received the relief which was brought them with gratefull acknowledgment: But whereas they perceived, that the Garments which were provided, were onely ſufficient to cloath the Chief Commanders, they refuſed to accept them, or (as Carate ſaith in the 5th Chapter of the fourth Book) to change their Habits, or mount on Horſe-back, enduring and ſuffering equally with their common Souldiers; and ſo in this manner, which we have mentioned, they entred one morning into the City of Quitu, and went directly to the Church to hear Maſs, and to return thanks to Almighty God, who had delivered them out of ſo many, and ſo great miſeries.

Thus far is the Relation given by Carate; to which may be added, what I have underſtood from the teſtimony of thoſe who were Eye-witneſſes of what farther paſſed in this matter; which was this: The twelve perſons which brought the Preſents to Gonzalo Piçarro, perceiving that neither he, nor his Captains, would accept of the Cloths which were brought them, nor yet make uſe of their Horſes, but choſe to enter the City bare-footed, and naked; they agreed all to put themſelves in the ſame guiſe and faſhion to participate of the Honour, Fame and Glory, which theſe perſons had acquired by their patience and ſufferings, by which they had overcome ſo many, and ſuch immenſe labours; the City applauded their Ambaſſadours for their conformity thereunto; in which manner, after the Entry was made, and Maſs was ſaid, the people congratulated the Arrival of Piçarro with all the joy they were able to expreſs, but yet attempered with ſome grief and pity to ſee them in that lamentable condition. This Entry was made about the beginning of June in the year 1542, having ſpent in this Enterprize two years and a halfs time, though a certain Authour by miſtake ſays, that they were not more than a year and half both in their going out, and in their return home. During the time that they remained in the City, every one provided for himſelf the beſt he was able. And Gonzalo Piçarro receiving informations of what had paſſed ſince his departure, was given to underſtand what Revolutions had lately happened, namely the Death of his Brother the Marquis, the Inſurrection of Don Diego de Almagro, his diſobedience and rebellion againſt his Majeſty, the Arrival of Doctor Vaca de Caſtro for Governour of that Empire; and that he was then on his march againſt Almagro with an Army, in which all the friends and party of his Brother the Marquis were joyned. All which being conſidered by Gonzalo Piçarro, he thought it not fit for him to be backward in that Service to his Majeſty, in which all thoſe Gentlemen who had been his Comrades and Companions, had been engaged. Wherefore he wrote to the Governour, giving him a relation of the Hardſhips he had ſuſtained and ſuffered in his Journey; and laſtly, made tender of his Perſon and People to ſerve him in quality of Souldiers under his Command.

In anſwer whereunto, the Governour aſſured him of his kind acceptance of the good will and affection which he demonſtrated to his Majeſty's Service, and returned him thanks for the aſſiſtence he had offered both by his own Perſon, and with thoſe Forces which had ſo long been trained up in Military Diſcipline, and inured to the Sufferings and Hardſhips of War. Howſoever, he intreated him as from himſelf, and required him in his Majeſty's Name to continue ſtill in Quitu, and there to refreſh himſelf after the miſeries he had ſuſtained, untill ſuch time as he he ſhould by Orders from him be employed on thoſe affairs, which may beſt conduce to his Majeſty's Service.

It was not for want of good aſſurance, which the Governour conceived of the Loyalty of Gonzalo Piçarro, that he enjoyned him to remain in the parts where he was untill farther Orders; but becauſe he hoped not to need his aſſiſtence, in regard his deſign was to bring matters between him and Almagro to ſome conditions of Accommodation; which he believed to be the much more prudent courſe, for conſidering that the Animoſities were very high and inveterate between the two parties, it would neceſſarily follow that the Battel would be fought with much obſtinacy, and end with great effuſion of bloud; and therefore to avoid ſuch mortality and deſtruction, he endeavoured to make a right and good underſtanding between himſelf and Almagro.

The Governour alſo farther conceived, that in caſe Gonzalo Piçarro were actually preſent in the Army, that the peace with Almagro would be effected with much more difficulty, and give Almagro occaſion of jealouſie, and diſtruſt, and fear, to put himſelf into the hands of the Governour, leſt Piçarro ſhould machinate or plot any ſecret revenge againſt him; of which he was the more apprehenſive, when he conſidered the great intereſt which Piçarro had made in the Army.

This certainly was the true intention and meaning of the Governour, but other ill-natured and malitious Men put him farther in the head, that the preſence of Piçarro in the Army was not to be admitted on other ſcores, leſt the Souldiery, which had conceived a great affection to him for his Proweſs and Valour, and experience in Military affairs, ſhould by common conſent make choice of him for their General.

In obedience to the Governour's Command, Gonzalo Piçarro remained in Quito untill the end of the War. Moreover, the Governour gave order to thoſe who had the care and tuition of the Sons of the Marquis, and of Gonzalo Piçarro, that they ſhould ſtill continue their reſidence in the Cities of St. Michael and Truxillo, and not to remove them to los Reyes, untill they ſhould receive other inſtructions; declaring, that they were much more ſecure at that diſtance, than nearer hand; though ſome diſcontented Men interpreted this Order to be a deſign he had to eſtrange himſelf from them, and to proceed from a principle of jealouſie he conceived of them, though as yet they were but Children.

Matters being thus diſpoſed, (as we have ſaid) the Governour marched towards Huamanca, upon a report that Almagro was come near to that City, and that his deſign was to poſſeſs and fortifie it, becauſe it was eſteemed a place naturally ſtrong, being environed on all ſides with broken cliffs, and inacceſſible ways: Wherefore he diſpeeded Captain Caſtro before with his Company of Harquebuſiers, to take poſſeſſion of a craggy Hill which lyes in the way, which the Indians call Farcu, and the Spaniards Parcos: But whilſt he was in his march thither, he received intelligence, that Almagro had already entred, and taken poſſeſſion of the City, which troubled the Governour very much, conſidering the diſadvantage he received thereby, and that a great part of his own Forces were not as yet come up, but marched ſlowly, and in ſeveral parties. Hereupon he diſpatched Alonſo de Alvarado back to haſten them, who with the diligence he uſed, ſpeedily brought them all the other Companies in a body to joyn with the Army: To perform which, ſome marched four, others five and ſix Leagues in a day; with which long marches, though very much tired, yet the Enemy (as was reported) being within two Leagues of them, they were forced to remain all the night on the Watch drawn up in Battalia; but other intelligence coming in the Morning, which gave them advice, that Almagro was removed at a farther diſtance from the City: They drew off, and marched forward to Huamanca, where they took a convenient repoſe; and having refreſhed their Men, they enlarged their Quarters, and removed their Camp into a more open Plain; for the Countrey where they then were, was encloſed, and ſo ſtraitned with Mountains, that in caſe of a Fight, their Horſe could not come to engage, and doe ſervice; which would be of great diſadvantage to them, conſidering that their Horſe was the Nerve of their ſtrength, being more numerous, and better armed, than thoſe of the Enemy. Wherefore leaving the City, he drew up his Army in the Plains of Chupas, from whence he diſpatched two perſons to Almagro, one called Franciſco de Ydiacaez, and the other Diego Mercado, who informed him, that they were ſent to him from the Gover-nour to offer unto him, and all his Souldiers and Followers, in the Name of his Majeſty, a general Pardon for whatſoever was paſſed, provided he returned to his Obedience, and liſted himſelf under the Royal Standard; and that having Disbanded his Army, he promiſed to confirm this Pardon with Honours and Preferments. Almagro readily made anſwer, that he accepted the Conditions, provided the Pardon might be General both to himſelf and his Aſſociates, and that the Government of the New Kingdom of Toledo, the Mines of Gold, and all the Lands and Juriſdiction over the Indians, which his Father poſſeſſed, ſhould be reſtored and ſetled upon him.

Almagro was moved to make this extravagant demand, upon an aſſurance which a certain Clergyman gave him, who ſome few days before was arrived from Panama, and told him, that all the talk and news there was, that the King had ſealed his Pardon, and given him the Government of the New Toledo in which Cozco was compriſed; of which he gave him joy, and asked a reward for his good news.

Moreover, he informed him, that Vaca de Caſtro had but a ſmall number of Souldiers, and thoſe ill armed and diſcontented: the which News, though hardly to be believed, yet Almagro entertained with ſome aſſurance, becauſe it was in his favour; and was thereby encouraged to make thoſe high demands to the Governour, whoſe weakneſs, as he ſuppoſed, would cauſe him to yield unto all the Articles he could propoſe.

After Vaca de Caſtro had ſent away the two Meſſengers before mentioned, he diſpatched a Souldier called Alonſo Garcia with ſeveral Letters to the Captains and principal Gentlemen of Almagro's Army, promiſing them pardon for whatſoever was paſt, and a reward of great and large poſſeſſions and juriſdiction over the Indians. This Meſſenger went in the Habit of an Indian, for his better diſguiſe, and took a by-way out of the Road, that he might not be ſeized or intercepted in his Journey: But the misfortune was, that it had Snowed that day, ſo that the Scouts of Almagro diſcovering the impreſſion which he had made in the Snow, tracked him by his footing, and ſo followed, and took him, and carried him with all his Letters and Diſpatches to Almagro; who, as Gomara reports in Chapter 150th, and Carate in the 16th Chapter of the 4th Book, was highly incenſed, and angry at the double dealing of the Governour, who at the ſame time that he was in treaty with him, was making Diviſions and Mutinies in his Army: At which he was ſo greatly enraged, that he immediately cauſed the Souldier to be hanged, both becauſe he came in a diſguiſe, and brought Letters of Treaſonable importance; and in the ſight and preſence of the two Meſſengers cauſed his Army to be drawn out, and ranged in a poſture ready to engage, promiſing to whomſoever ſhould kill the Governour, to beſtow on him his Lands, his Wife, and all his Eſtate: And ſo he returned anſwer to the Governour, that he would never own or obey him ſo long as he was aſſociated with his Enemies, who were Pedro Alvarez Holguin, and Alonſo de Alvarado, Gomez de Tordoya, John de Saavedra, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Ylen Suarez de Carvajal, Gomez de Alvarado, and all the other Gentlemen who had ſided with Piçarro.

Thus much Almagro uttered with intent to diſcourage the Governour from attempting any more the way of dividing his people by ſeparate Treaties, or indeed to put him out of all hopes of attaining any thing by way of Accommodation; for if one of his Conditions was to caſhier all thoſe who were of Piçarro's party, he muſt be contented to remain without Army or People, which he knew could never be aſſented unto. And moreover, he ſent him word that he would doe well to leave off that way of ſeducing his people from him, for he might be confident there was none of them which would be tempted to forſake his party, but would all unanimouſly joyn in Battel to defend that Countrey againſt him, and all the World, which he would ſpeedily verifie by marching out immediately to meet and fight him; Almagro was as good as his word, and accordingly marched againſt the Governour with courage and reſolution to give him Battel; the which was confirmed by an unanimous conſent of all his Souldiers, who generally diſdained and reſented the ſecret and treacherous dealing of the Governour, and cauſed them to adhere more cloſely to the party of Almagro; concluding within themſelves, that he who would be falſe towards their Captain, might very well be ſuſpected of the like perfidiouſneſs and breach of Faith towards them.

Whence

Whence it was agreed on all ſides to dye fighting, and hearken no farther to any Articles of Treaty. It is believed, that had it not been for this Action, Almagro would have inclined to a Peace, upon the Pardon of his Majeſty, which was already ſigned and ſealed, and in the hands of the Governour.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Order that Vaca de Caſtro, and Don Diego de Almagro obſerved in drawing up their Squadrons. The beginning of the Battel, and the Death of Captain Pedro de Candia.

UPon this Anſwer which Almagro had given, the Governour obſerved a ſtrange unwillingneſs and diſſatisfaction in his Souldiers to an Engagement; who declared, that ſince his Majeſty was ſo ill pleaſed with the late Battel of Salinas, that he committed Hernando Piçarro to Priſon for it; they ought to be wary and cautious how they incurred his Majeſty's diſpleaſure by any offence of the like nature. Wherefore the Governour, to ſatisfie this ſcruple ariſen in the minds of his Souldiery, recounted to them the crimes and offences of Almagro, how he had killed the Marquis, and murthered many other perſons; that he had confiſcated the Goods and Eſtates of other Men, and converted them to his own uſe; that he had made a diviſion of Indians, and reparted them amongſt his friends without any Commiſſion from his Majeſty; that at preſent he came with an Army againſt the Standard-Royal, and gave defiance to the Governour, who was eſtabliſhed by the King's Commiſſion. And farther to juſtifie his cauſe, he did there in hearing of all his Army, by virtue of the Power committed to him by his Majeſty, pronounce ſentence againſt Almagro, proclaiming him Rebel and Traytor, and for his crimes did condemn him to die, and loſe all his eſtate both real and perſonal; requiring all the Captains and the whole Army to be aiding and aſſiſting to him in the execution of this Sentence, which he declared by virtue of a Commiſſion from his Majeſty, whereby he was conſtituted and appointed Chief Miniſter and Governour of that Empire.

The Sentence being given, Vaca de Caſtro concluded, that according to the Anſwer of Almagro, which evidenced a reſolution to perſiſt in his rebellion, there was no farther place to hope for Peace by way of Treaty: Wherefore he put his people into a poſture of defence, having received intelligence that Almagro and his Army were approaching near.

Having drawn his Forces into the Field, he made them a Speech, telling them, That they were to conſider who they were, from whence they came, and for whom, and for what cauſe they were to fight; that the poſſeſſion and enjoyment of that whole Empire was held up to them for a reward and prize to the Conquerours; if they were overcome, neither he nor they could eſcape death; and if on the contrary they won the Field, they would be for ever happy; for beſides the duty and obligation incumbent on them, as true and loyal Subjects to ſerve their King, they would remain Lords, and Poſſeſſours of all the Diviſions of Land, which had been already made with the vaſt Wealth and Riches thereof, and for ever to enjoy the ſame in peace and quietneſs. And ſo to thoſe who were not as yet ſo well provided with poſſeſſions, he did promiſe them in the Name and Word of his Majeſty, to divide and ſet out Lands to them, for reward of their Loyalty and Service to their King. In ſhort, he told them, that he knew there was no need of long Speeches and Exhortations to incite Courage in ſuch Noble Cavaliers, and Valiant Souldiers; and though he was well aſſured they would be for-forward in action, yet they ſhould ſee him their Leader, to be the firſt who ſhould break his Lance in the Front againſt his Enemies. Anſwer was made hereunto with common voice, that they would all dye, rather than be overcome; and ſince every Man eſteemed himſelf equally concerned in this Enterprize, they earneſtly intreated the Governour not to hazard himſelf in the Front of the Battel, but rather conſerve his own Perſon, on whoſe ſafety the Welfare of the whole Army did greatly depend; and that he would pleaſe with a Guard of thirty Horſe to retire to ſome place in the Rere, from whence he might ſee how the Battel went, and accordingly order and apply Succours to that part which he judged to be moſt hardly beſet and oppreſſed; in compliance with the importunity of his Captains, the Governour conſented to take his ſtation in the Rere, in which poſture they expected the coming of Almagro, whoſe Quarters were about two Leagues from thence; and the day following the Scouts returned with news, that the Enemy was come within half a League with deſign to give them Battel.

Hereupon the Governour immediately drew out his Forces into Battalia; On the right hand of the Infantry he placed the Royal Standard, defended by Alonſo de Alvarado, and carried by Chriſtopher de Barrientos, Native of Ciudad-rodrigo, and Inhabitant of Truxillo, where Pedro Alvarez Holguin was poſſeſſed of a great Eſtate and Juriſdiction over the Indians: Gomez de Alvarado, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, and Pedro Ançures, who were Captains of Horſe, flanked the Foot on the left Wing. Carate ſaith in the 18th Chapter of his fourth Book, "That theſe Commanders "marched very orderly, keeping their Colours and Companies in an equal line, "they themſelves being in the firſt rank; and that the Infantry, Commanded by "the Captains, Pedro de Vergara, and John Valez de Guevara, marched between the "two Wings and Squadrons of Horſe; and that Nunno de Caſtro, who Commanded the Harquebuſiers, was placed in the Van, to begin the Fight, and being "repulſed to retire into the main Body.

"Vaca de Caſtro remained with his thirty Horſe in the Rere, at ſome diſtance "from the main Body, from whence he might be able to obſerve all that paſſed, "and accordingly apply ſuccours and relief where occaſion did moſt require. Thus far Carate.

Pedro de Alvarado wore over his Arms a Coat of white Satten, ſlaſhed and pinked, ſaying, That when Archers ſhoot at Butts, there are very few which hit the white Mark. In this poſture they remained in expectation of the coming of Almagro, who by this time was entred the Plain, and encamped on the ridge of a Hill ſo far diſtant from the Royal Army, as was out of Cannon-ſhot. Pedro Suarez, Serjeant-Major, who had been long a Souldier in Italy, and trained up to the War, ſoon perceived the advantage they had of the ground, and drew up his Squadrons in form and manner to anſwer thoſe of the Enemy. His Infantry he flanked on one ſide and the other with Wings of Horſe Commanded by his Captain-General John Balſa, and Major-General Pedro d' Onnate; and the Captains were John Tello de Guzman, Diego Mendez, John de Onna, Martin de Bilbao, Diego de Hojeda, and Malavez: All which were brave fellows, and well reſolved to conquer the Empire, and acquire Dominion over the poor Vaſſals of that Countrey. The Serjeant-Major placed all the Artillery in the Front, (of which Pedro de Candia was chief Maſter or Captain) bearing directly on that ſide of the Enemy, where it was poſſible for them to be attacked: And then he went to Almagro, who with a Guard of eight or ten Men was placed in the midſt between the Horſe and Foot; and ſaid to him in this manner: Sir, your Lordſhip hath now all your Forces ſo advantageouſly drawn up under the defence of your Cannon; that if you pleaſe but to continue in this order, and not to move from it, you may overcome your Enemies either without puſh of the Lance, or ſtroke of Sword: For let the Enemy come which way they will, you muſt break and deſtroy them with your Cannon, before they can come within ſhot of Muſquet. But by that time that things could be thus ordered and diſpoſed, it was towards the Evening, when the Sun was onely two hours high.

Vaca de Caſtro and his Council were much divided in their opinions, whether they ſhould engage that day or not. Franciſco de Carvajal, who was Serjeant-Major, and an experienced Souldier, was of opinion, that by no means the Battel ſhould be deferred that day, though they fought part of the night; for that were to give courage to their Enemies, and a check to the forward reſolution of their own Army, and might, perhaps, give time and occaſion unto ſeveral of them to revolt unto Almagro. Hereupon the Governour resolved immediately to give them Battel, wishing he had had the power of Joshuah to command the Sun to stay his course.

Herewith the word was given to march directly against the Squadrons of Almagro, who upon their first motion ordered his Cannon to play upon the Enemy, and to startle them in the first onset; but Francisco de Caravajal observing, that if they kept a direct course upon the Enemy, they should receive much damage from their Cannon, which were many, and very good; directed them another way under the covert of a Hill: But having passed this shelter into the open Field, so that they remained exposed to the Enemy's Cannon, Pedro de Candia, who commanded the Artillery, shot over them, so that they received no damage; which when Almagro saw and observed, he immediately fell upon Pedro de Candia, and killed him with his Lance upon the very Cannon; and being full of rage and anger for this piece of treachery, he leaped from his Horse, and mounted on the nose of one of the Guns, and with the weight of his body lored it in such manner, as to make it bear on the Enemy; and then ordering the Cannonier to give fire thereunto, he placed his shot amidst the Squadron of Vaca de Castro, which raking them from the Front to the Rere, as Carate confirms in the 18th Chapter of his fourth Book, and Gomara in Chap. 150. but do not say how many were slain thereby, which were seventeen Men; which unlucky shot, had it been followed by others with the like success, they had needed no other force, but had secured the Victory according to the assurance which Suarez the Serjeant-Major had given; but all was lost by that treachery which Pedro de Candia had acted. For we must know that Captain Pedro, having considered that Hernando Piçarro, who was the Person that had affronted and injured him, was imprisoned in Spain, (as we have formerly mentioned,) and that by reason of him he had sided with the party of Chili. And that the Marquis, who by his Power and Greatness had much oppressed him, was now dead, he judged himself sufficiently revenged both of one, and of the other: And that now since there was a new Governour, it was his best course to return unto the Obedience and Service of his Majesty, that he might not utterly lose all the hopes and merit he had acquired by being usefull in the Conquest of that Empire. And on this Motive it was, that he sent secret intelligence to the Governour not to fear the Cannon, for he would so order it, that he should not need to apprehend any damage or hurt from thence. On confidence of which promise the Governour resolved not to delay the Battel, though Pedro de Candia did not attain the end he designed.

CHAP. XVII.

The Relation of the cruel Battel of Chupas is continued. A disagreement amongst the People of Almagro. The Victory of the Governour; and the Flight of Almagro.

THE Serjeant-Major, and the other Captains of his Majesty, observing what a Lane was made through their Squadron by the Enemy's shot, and that their Foot was daunted therewith, they presently clapt within the void place, and caused their ranks to close up, and without stop or any delay to make up directly upon the Enemy; and to have no cause of retardment, they left and deserted all their own train of Artillery. The Captains of Almagro not well considering their case and advantage, and as people not much used to such kind of emergencies; observing the Enemy to advance upon them, cried out with a loud voice, Let not our Enemies gain honour by our cowardise, they see us stand still as not daring to oppose them: Let us to them, let us to them, for we are not able longer to endure this affront. Herewith they forced Almagro to advance with his Squadron, and with so little consideration, that they made him to interpose between the Enemy and his own Cannon; which when Serjeant-Major Suarez observed, he went to Almagro, and with a loud voice told him, saying, Sir, had you kept the order which I directed, and had followed my counsel, you had been victorious; but since you take your measures from others, you will lose the honour of this day; and since your Lordship is not pleased to make me a Conquerour in your Camp, I will make my way to it on the side of your Enemies. And having repeated these words, he set Spurs to his Horse, and passed over to Vaca de Castro, advising him immediately to close with the Enemy, and to give them no time, for that there was great disorder and confusion in their Counsels.

Vaca de Castro observing this good advice which Suarez had given him, commanded his Forces to march directly up in face of the Enemy; with which Francisco de Carvajal was so encouraged, and assured of victory, by reason of the unskilfulness of their Foes, that he threw off his Coat of Male, and his Head-piece, and cast them on the ground, telling his Souldiers, That they should not be affrighted at the Cannon; for that if he who was as fat and big as any two of them, was not fearfull of them, much less ought any of them who were but half the mark that he was.

At this time a certain Gentleman who was of Noble Bloud, and rode with the Horse, observing both sides within Musquet-shot, and that there was no other remedy but that he must engage; he on a sudden passed forth from the Squadron of the Governour, and said, Sirs, I declare my self for the party of Chili, for all the World knows, that at the Battel of Salinas I was then on the side of Almagro the Elder; and since I cannot now be for them, there is no reason but that I should stand neuter, and not be against them. Herewith he sallied out of his rank, and separated himself at some distance, where a certain Priest remained called Hernando de Luque, who was a Kinsman to that School-master of Panama, that was the Companion and Associate of Almagro and Piçarro. With this Priest there was another Gentleman also, who being sick, was excused from the Fight; but the retreat of this Gentleman was interpreted by all the Army to be an effect of down-right cowardise, and that therefore he durst not engage on either side. The Harquebusiers of Castro de Vaca would have fired upon him, but the haste they were in prevented their intention; and when they understood the reason for which he desired to stand a Neuter, they then were willing to spare their shot. I had once an acquaintance with him, and left him alive in a certain City of Peru, when I departed thence; and I know and remember well his Name, though I think fit to conceal it in this place, and onely recount the fact in general to the end, that such a piece of cowardise may be hated and scorned by all Persons of Quality and Worthy Souldiers.

In

In ſhort, the Souldiers of Vaca de Caſtro made ſuch haſte, that without much hurt they mounted the Hill, where the Squadrons of Almagro were drawn up, being much diſordered, and removed out of that good poſture in which they were firſt placed. Howſoever the Harquebuſiers received them with ſuch a Volley of Shot, that they killed many of the Foot, and wounded the Major General, Gomez de Tordoya, with three Bullets, of which he dyed two days afterwards. Nunno de Caſtro was alſo deſperately wounded, beſides many others who were ſlain, which being obſerved by Franciſco de Carvajal, he commanded the Horſe to charge them, for they were the chief Force to which he truſted, being more in number than thoſe of Almagro; accordingly the Horſe engaged, and both ſides maintained the Fight with ſuch bravery, that the Victory for a long time remained doubtfull. Pedro Alvarez Holguin was killed with a Muſquet-ſhot; for being clothed in white, and by his Colour and Habit known to all, he became the common Mark, every one aiming to hit ſo famous a Perſon. On the other ſide the Infantry of Vaca de Caſtro charging the Enemy, came valiantly up to the very Cannon, which were now of no uſe, in regard that by the ill diſcipline and diſorder of Almagro's Commanders, they had interpoſed their own Souldiers between their Cannon and the Enemy. Howſoever both ſides fought with ſuch animoſity and bravery, that they continued fighting in the night, which when it was ſo dark and obſcure, that they could not ſee each other; they then made uſe of the words Chili and Pachacamac to make their diſtinctions, whereby the Piçarriſts and Almagrians knew their parties; the greateſt ſlaughter was amongſt the Horſe, who after the uſe of their Lances, coming to a cloſer Fight, killed each other with their Swords and Pole-axes. The ſucceſs of this Battel being of high concernment, animated both ſides with a reſolution to dye, or gain the victory; being well aſſured, that as the Dominion of that Empire, and the Riches depended on this Victory; ſo being overthrown, there remained no other reward for them, but death or ſlavery. It was now above two hours in the night, and yet the Fight continued with equal ſlaughter, being full four hours ſince it firſt began. At length the Governour charged the left wing of the Enemy, which was ſtill entire, and not as yet broken, ſo that the Battel ſeemed to be again renewed: Howſoever, at length the Governour routed and defeated them with the loſs of ten or twelve of his Guard, amongſt which were Captain Ximenez, formerly a Merchant in Medina, and Nunno Montalvo. By this time both ſides began to think themſelves ſecure of Victory, and yet ſtill the Fight continued: At length the Forces of Almagro ſeemed to grow faint; which when he obſerved, he put himſelf into the head of them, and being ſeconded by thoſe few which were his Life-guard, he entred amidſt the thickeſt of his Enemies with that valour and reſolution, that he performed Miracles by his own Perſon, being deſirous to be ſlain on the place; but being unknown, and well armed, he eſcaped with his life, and without a wound; fighting bravely, as Gomara reports of him in Chapter 150.

And now Victory began to incline to the ſide of the Governour; which when Almagro and his chief Officers obſerved, they called out aloud, and ſaid, I am ſuch an one; it was I who killed the Marquis; and ſo they fought with fury and deſpair untill they were ſlain and cut in pieces. Many of Almagro's people eſcaped by favour of a dark night, having taken off their white Ribbons, and placed the Colours of Vaca de Caſtro in their ſtead, with which they ſupplied themſelves from thoſe who were ſlain on the other ſide. Almagro himſelf ſeeing that there was no hopes of Victory left, and that Death fled from him, he eſcaped out of the Battel with ſix Companions, namely, Diego Mendez, Bergan, and John de Guzman, and three others, whoſe Names I have forgotten. Thence he fled to Cozco, where he met that Death which he could not receive from his Enemies, by the hands of thoſe Men whom he had there conſtituted in Offices of Juſtice and Military Employments: For ſo ſoon as they underſtood that he had loſt the day, Rodrigo de Salazar, who was a Native of Toledo, and deputed by Almagro for his Governour in that place; and Antonio Ruyz de Guevara, who was Commiſſionated alſo by him to be chief Juſticiary, immediately laid hands on him, and made him Priſoner; and to conſummate this cruelty, they took thoſe alſo who were his Companions, and attended his Perſon: To confirm which particular, Carate in the 19th Chapter of his fourth Book, hath theſe Words which follow.

" Thus ended the Reign and Government of Don Diego de Almagro, who was " one day Commander in Chief of all Peru, and the day following was seized " by an Officer, whom by his own Authority he had conſtituted chief Juſticiary " of Cozco. This Battel was fought the 16th of September 1542. Thus far Carate; and herewith he concludes the Chapter aforeſaid.

This Victory was in part obtained about nine of the Clock at night, but not completed, for the noiſe of fighting and claſhing of Arms was heard in ſeveral places of the Field: And leſt Almagro ſhould again rally, and in the Morning renew the Battel, (for as yet his flight and eſcape was not known) the Governour commanded his Serjeant-Major to ſound a retreat to his Army, and put them again into a poſture of Battel, placing the Horſe and Foot in their reſpective ſtations, with Orders to ſtand to their Arms untill the Morning, when the light would diſcover the ſtate of their Victory: Which being accordingly executed, they continued on their Guard, and in a readineſs to receive whatſoever ſhould occur.

CHAP. XVIII.

Wherein thoſe Principal Commanders are named, who were preſent at this Battel; the Number that was ſlain; the Puniſhment of the Rebels; and the Death of Don Diego de Almagro.

THE Governour paſſed a great part of the Night in diſcourſe to his Souldiers, praiſing the courage and reſolution which his Captains, Cavaliers and Souldiers had ſhewed in that days Engagement; he applauded and admired their bravery which they had made appear in the Service of his Majeſty. He then recounted ſome particular Actions performed by ſuch and ſuch, naming them by their Names; whereby he acknowledged the fidelity, love and friendſhip, which they had evidenced to the Memory of the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, for whoſe ſake, and in revenge of whoſe Death, they had expoſed their own lives to all the hazards and perils in the World. Nor did he omit to mention the bravery of Almagro, whereby he had ſignalized himſelf to revenge the Death of his Father, having therein performed above what could have been expected from his years, not having paſſed above the Age of twenty: Nor did he forbear to commend the Courage of ſeveral Captains of the contrary party, who had carried themſelves bravely in the Action of that day. In a particular manner he took notice of the ſtout reſolution, and Military behaviour of Franciſco de Carvajal, who without fear either of the great or ſmall Shot, marched boldly at the head of his Men, being ever intent and ready to apply his ſuccour and relief, where it was moſt required: Of all which Actions the Governour was the beſt Judge, and could give the beſt account of them, in regard he was retired to a place from whence he could have a proſpect of all that paſſed. The principal Perſons on his Majeſty's ſide, who ſignalized themſelves in this Engagement, were the Major-General Gomez de Tordoya, the Agitant Yllen Suarez de Carvajal, and his Brother Benito de Carvajal, John Julio de Hojeda, Thomas Vaſquez, Lorenço de Aldana, John de Saavedra, Franciſco de Godoy, Diego Maldonado, who afterwards obtained the Sir-name of the Rich, John de Salas, Brother of the Arch-biſhop of Sevile, Alonſo de Loayſa, Brother of the Arch-biſhop of los Reyes, Geronimo de Loayſa, John de Pancorvo, Alonſo Maçuela, Martin de Meneſes, John de Figueroa, Pedro Alonſo Carraſco, Diego de Truxillo, Alonſo de Soto, Antonio

Antonio de Quinnones, and his Brother Suero de Quinnones, and his Couſin Pedro de Quinnones, who had been an old Souldier in Italy, and were all three near in Kindred to the Governour, Gaſpar Jara, Diego Ortiz de Guzman, Garcia de Melo, who loſt his right hand in the Battel, Pedro de los Rios a Native of Cordova, Franciſco de Ampuero, Don Pedro Puertocarrero, Pedro de Hinojoſa, John Alonſo Palomino, Don Gomez de Luna, the Elder Brother of Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Gomez de Alvarado, Gaſpar de Rojas, Melchior Verdugo, Lope de Mendoça, Juan de Barbaran, Miguel de la Serna, Geronimo de Aliaga, Nicolas de Ribera, and Geronimo de Ribera, who for diſtinction ſake we have in the other part of this Book called Ribera Senior, and Ribera Junior.

All which, and many others, whoſe Names we cannot call to mind, did that day in the Battel ſignalize their Valour in an extraordinary manner, for fighting in the front of their Companies, moſt of them were wounded. In ſhort, there was not one Man of note in all Peru, as Gomara affirms, but was engaged in the Battel of that day on his Majeſty's ſide. On the King's party three hundred Spaniards were ſlain, many alſo were killed on the other, though not ſo great a number; the Battel was very bloudy; the ſlaughter fell much upon the Captains, of which moſt of them were killed; four hundred were wounded, of which moſt dyed with cold that night, it happening to freeze very ſharply. Theſe are the Words of Gomara, and therewith he ends the 150th Chapter of his Hiſtory.

Of Almagro's ſide two hundred were ſlain, ſo that Gomara with much reaſon terms it a bloudy Battel; for of fifteen hundred Men on both ſides, five hundred were ſlain, and five hundred wounded; of which laſt, four hundred were of the King's ſide, and but one hundred of Almagro's.

There was one of the King's Souldiers ſo cruel, that after the Battel was ended, he killed eleven of the Almagrians in cold bloud; of which evil Act he made great boaſt, ſaying, that in ſuch a place they had robbed him of eleven thouſand pieces of Eight, in revenge of which he had killed eleven of them.

Many other things of this nature paſſed that night; and the reaſon why ſo many of thoſe wounded were frozen to death, was, becauſe the Indians finding them unable to help and defend themſelves, made bold to ſtrip them of all their cloathing, leaving them naked, and expoſed to the weather, without regard to either ſide or party, of which there could no diſtinction be made in the night; and if there had, yet the Indians, whoſe buſineſs it was to pilfer, would not have forborn on any ſmall conſideration, or complement to either ſide. Nor could the Conquerours for the preſent take that due care of their wounded, becauſe the Carriages with their Tents not being come up, they were all forced to lodge in the open Air; onely they made a ſhift to ſet up two Tents, wherein they made an Accommodation for Gomez de Tordoya, Pedro Ançures, Gomez de Alvarado, and Garçilaſſo de la Vega, who were all mortally wounded; others who had received ſome ſlighter hurts, endured the open Air, which cauſed their wounds ſo to ſmart, that it was grievous to hear the groans, ſighs and cries which they uttered. Nor did the Indians ſpare thoſe who were fled out of the Battel, taking the courage to purſue and aſſail Men in their flight; ſo that they killed John Balſa on the way, with ten or twelve others of his companions, without any regard or reſpect to his Quality or Character of Captain-General; in like manner they killed many other Spaniards, who fled out of the Battel in divers parts: But ſo ſoon as it was day the Governour ſent abroad to bring in the wounded, taking care to have their wounds dreſſed: And as for the dead, they buried them together, in four or five large Graves, which were made for them, into which they caſt them all without diſtinction, excepting onely Pedro Alvarez Holguin, and Gomez de Tordoya de Vargas, with ſome other noble and principal Perſons, whom they carried to Huamanca, and there celebrated their Funerals with what decency they were able. Above a hundred Horſe, and fifty or ſixty Foot, fled from the Battel, and eſcaped to the City of Huamanca; but being purſued by thoſe few who remained Maſters of the Field, were again defeated, they yielding up their Horſes and Arms upon conditions of Quarter for their lives. And as that day they performed an Act of Charity in the burial of the Dead, ſo likewiſe they performed an Act of Juſtice in puniſhment of the Offenders; for having found the Bodies of Martin de Bilbao, and Arbolacha, and Hinojeros, and Martin Carillo amongſt the Dead, who cried out in the Battel on purpoſe to be killed, that they were the perſons who had Aſſaſſinated the Marquis; and though they were then cut in pieces, yet according to a new form of Juſtice, they were afterwards drawn and quartered, the Cryer at the ſame time publiſhing their offence: the like piece of Juſtice was executed on other inſolent and rebellious perſons. The day following the Governour went to Huamanca, where he underſtood, that Captain Diego de Rojas had killed Captain John Tello de Guzman, and Pedro d' Onnate, who was Major-General to Almagro: the puniſhment of other Offenders was referred by the Governour to Judge de la Gama, who condemned all the principal Leaders of the Almagrian party to dye, who were taken and impriſoned at Huamanca, ſuch as Diego de Hoces, Antonio de Cardenas, whoſe throats he cauſed to be cut; and hanged John Perez, Franciſco Peces, John Diente, and Martin Cote, and thirty others of the moſt culpable or chiefeſt Offenders; others who were pardoned for life, were baniſhed into the remote parts of that Kingdom.

Whilſt the Governour was thus employed in doing juſtice at Huamanca, he received intelligence that Almagro was taken and impriſoned at Cozco; wherefore haſtning to that place, and arriving there, he immediately cauſed the Sentence to be executed, which he had paſſed upon him before the Battel, not being willing to ſpend more time in new Proceſſes. Carate ſaith, that they cut his throat in the ſame place, and by the ſame Executioner, who put his Father to death, and who ſtripped him, and took his Cloaths in the ſame manner as he had done his Father's, onely ſome friends agreed for his Breeches, Waſtcoat and Shirt, which were conſerved to him; his Body was laid out, and expoſed the whole day to publick view; afterwards they carried it to the Convent of our Lady of the Merceds, and there buried it by the ſide, or in the very Grave of his Father, without Winding-ſheet or other Shroud than his own Cloaths, onely out of charity ſome few Maſſes were ſaid for his Soul.

This was the end of Don Diego Almagro Junior, which was ſo like to that of his Father, that fortune ſeemed to make the circumſtances of their lives parallel in every thing; for beſides that they were Father and Son, and had the ſame Name; they were endued with equal courage and conduct in War, and with the ſame prudence and counſel in Peace; and if there was any thing of excellency more in one than in the other, it appeared in the Son, who from his youth had been trained up in good literature, in which by help of his good parts both for judgment and quickneſs of fancy he made great improvement: they reſembled each other in their Deaths, which happened in the ſame place, and almoſt in the ſame manner; their Funerals were much alike, for having been rich and powerfull, they died ſo poor, that their Burial-charges were paid upon charity; and to render the circumſtances of their lives in all things agreeable, the Battels they fought and loſt were both upon a Saturday.

Thus poor Don Diego Almagro Junior, concluded the Scene of his Life, who had been the braveſt Meſtizo (that is, one begot by a Spaniard on the body of an Indian Woman) that ever this new World produced, had he taken the right ſide, and obeyed the Governour, who was conſtituted by Commiſſion from his Majeſty. He was a Man who had a handſome ſeat on Horſe-back in both Saddles, either riding with his legs at length, or ſhort, as is the faſhion on the Gennet: At laſt he died like a good Chriſtian with great repentance for his ſins. Almagro being dead, they hanged up John Rodriguez Barragan, and Enſign Enriquez, with eight others, who adventured to follow Almagro unto Cozco. Gomez Perez, and Diego Mendez, and another companion of theirs, made their eſcape out of Priſon; but finding no ſecure place wherein to conceal themſelves in all Peru, they fled to the Mountains, where Prince Manco Inca remained in retirement, and were followed by five others, who went alſo to hide, and cure themſelves of their wounds in that place: All which were received with great kindneſs, and with as good entertainment by the Inca, as he was able to give them; but in what Coin they again repaid him, will appear by the ſequel, for he was killed by one of them in requital for his favours and kindneſs towards them.

CHAP. XIX.

The good Government of Vaca de Caſtro; the peace and quietneſs of Peru; the cauſe and original of other Troubles.

DOn Diego Almagro Junior, being dead, and all the Complices and Heads of that party being either put to death, or baniſhed, the whole Empire of Peru began to enjoy peace and ſettlement, the name and intereſt of that Almagrian Faction being totally extinguiſhed. Judge Vaca de Caſtro being a prudent, and a diſcreet Perſon in all his actions, governed with much Equity and Juſtice, to the great ſatisfaction and contentment both of Spaniards and Indians, having eſtabliſhed ſeveral Laws ſo advantageous to the Welfare of both Nations, that the Indians themſelves rejoyced in ſuch happy conſtitutions, and eſteemed them equal to thoſe which had been made by their Incas. Likewiſe the Governour beſtowed ſuch Plantations of Indians, which were void and forfeited for Rebellion, on perſons who had well deſerved for their Services to his Majeſty in the late War: He alſo encreaſed the Poſſeſſions of others, or exchanged them for thoſe which were better in other places, or Cities, where they were moſt pleaſed to chuſe their habitation. At that time many of the Inhabitants of Charcas tranſplanted themſelves and Families to Cozco, amongſt whom my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega was one, who (as we have ſaid formerly) had left the Province Tapac-ri to ſettle himſelf in the Province Quechua, which belongs to the Nation Cotanera, and Huamampallpa. And though the Governour in the Diviſions he made proceeded with all the equality and caution imaginable, as was apparent to all the World, yet many were diſcontented for want of having Lands, and Plantations of Indians allotted to them, which they believed and preſumed to be due for all their Services and Labours they had ſuſtained in the Conqueſt of Peru. Amongſt theſe diſcontented perſons there was a certain Gentleman called Hernando Mogollon, born at Badajoz, of whom we have made mention in the third Chapter of the firſt Book of our Hiſtory of Florida. This Gentleman preſuming that he had well deſerved and performed great Services in the Conqueſt of theſe new Countries, and particularly at the Battel of Chupas, where he ſignalized his bravery in an extraordinary manner, of which Vaca de Caſtro himſelf was a Witneſs; for which finding he had no reward, or Lands, or Indian Servants divided to him, he went and applied himſelf to the Governour, and told him plainly:

Sir, In this Countrey, as your Lordſhip well knows, all People eat from the Labours of Mogollon, and he alone ſtarves with hunger. And in regard that he was one of thoſe who diſcovered Florida, and was forward and active in other important Conqueſts which have been acquired to the Crown of Spain; and laſtly, was preſent in the Battel of Chupas, where he fought under your Lordſhip's Standard; it is but reaſon that ſome remembrance ſhould be had of him, who hath not forgotten his Duty and Service to his Majeſty.

The Governour conſidering well the Merits of the Man, and that he asked nothing but what was very reaſonable, he beſtowed upon him a ſmall ſhare of Lands, inhabited by Indians. And as an expedient to quiet the minds of other complaining and indigent Souldiers, of which many were unrewarded; and to prevent a farther Mutiny, he imitated the example of Marquis Piçarro, who on the like occaſion diſpeeded ſeveral Companies with their Captains, to conquer and poſſeſs divers other parts of the Countrey; by which means enlarging their Territories, every Man might obtain ſome Inheritance and Dominion over the Indians. And accordingly he gave order to Captain Pedro de Vergara to return to his Province of Pacamuru, where he had made ſome progreſs in his Conqueſt, when he

he was recalled from thence to ſerve his Majeſty in the late War with his Men, who were very good and experienced Souldiers.

Diego de Rojas, Nicholas de Eredia, and Philip Gutierrez (a Native of Madrid) were ſent to the Province of Muſſu, called by the Spaniards los Moxos; with them were liſted a Company of brave Men, who had ſuſtained many great difficulties before they arrived at the River of Plate, of which we ſhall hereafter give a Relation. Gonzalo de Monrroy was ſent to the Kingdom of Chili to recruit and aſſiſt the Forces of the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, who then was employed in the Conqueſt of the Provinces and Nations belonging to that Kingdom. To another Province called Mullupampa he ſent Captain John Perez de Guevara, who had made a late diſcovery thereof, and had there received intelligence and intimation of other new Countries, and large Territories, which ſtretch themſelves Eaſtward between the Rivers called Orellana, Marannon, and the River of Plate: But that thoſe were Countries very Mountainous, and full of Moors, Fens and Bogs, and inhabited by few Indians, who lived in a beſtial manner, like brute Beaſts, without Religion, Laws or Civility, and were ſuch as ate one the other; and that the Climate being hot, they needed no cloathing, but went naked.

Thus the Governour Vaca de Caſtro having ridded his hands of the Souldiers, and cleared the Kingdom of Peru of the burthen of new Levies, having ſent them from Quitu to the Charcas, which are ſeven hundred Leagues diſtant each from the other, he remained much at eaſe, and freed from the daily importunities which diſturbed him; ſo that he attended to his Government in peace and quietneſs to the general ſatisfaction of all people. And that he might form and eſtabliſh Laws moſt agreeable to the nature and conſtitution of thoſe Countries, he informed himſelf of the Curacas, and ancient Captains; of the Order and Rules which their Incan Kings obſerved in their Adminiſtration of Juſtice, out of which he choſe and culled ſuch as he eſteemed moſt proper and agreeable to the conſtitutions of both Nations, whereby the Spaniards might be conſerved, and the Indians increaſed. Then he ſent Letters to Gonzalo Piçarro, who ſtill remained in Quitu to come to him; and having in the Name of his Majeſty, and in his own behalf, thanked him for all the Services he had performed to the Crown, and applauded the dangers and adventures he had run, which his Majeſty would in due time reward; he gave him leave to return to his own habitation, and to his Dominion in the Charcas over the Indians there, adviſing him to take care of his health, and attend to the improvement of his Eſtate. The Indians finding themſelves freed from the calamities and miſeries they had ſuſtained by the late inteſtine Wars, which had been carried on at the expence of their Lives and Eſtates; of which, as Gomara ſaith, the Spaniards had been ſo prodigal, that above a Million and a half of them were deſtroyed; at length being more at eaſe, they returned to their Countrey affairs, and to tillage and cultivation of their Lands, which by the induſtry and knowledge of the Spaniards in Agriculture yielded great plenty, and abundance of all Proviſions; and both ſides attending to their own quiet and eaſe, the Indians diſcovered ſeveral rich Mines of Gold in many parts of Peru; the richeſt of which were ſituated Eaſtward from Cozco in the Province of Collahuaya, called by the Spaniards Caravaya, from whence they digged great quantities of the fineſt Gold of twenty four Quilates; which Mines alſo yield ſome Gold to this day, though not in ſuch abundance as formerly. To the Weſtward of Cozco, in the Province of Quechua, which is well peopled with divers Nations ſo named; and on that ſide thereof which is called Huallaripa, other Mines of Gold were diſcovered; which though they yielded not their Gold ſo fine as that of Collahuaya, yet it amounted to twenty Quilats more or leſs in goodneſs; howſoever the quantity thereof was ſo great, that about nine or ten years after the Mine was opened, I remember to have ſeen ſome Indians bring home to their Maſter every Saturday night two thouſand Peſos of Gold Sand for his ſingle part or ſhare in thoſe Mines. We call that Gold Sand, or Duſt, which they gather like the Filings of Iron; there is alſo another ſort ſomething thicker, like Bran after it is ſifted from the Flour, amongſt which they find now and then ſome granes as big as the Seeds of Melons or Pompions, to the value of ſix or eight Ducats each grane. From ſuch conſiderable quantities of Gold as were daily brought to the Mint, or Melting-houſes, the fifth part thereof which appertained to his Majeſty, amounted to a vaſt Treaſure; for of every five Marks one, and of every five Peſos, one was delivered for the King's uſe, and exactly counted to the laſt Maravedis or Farthing.

Thus by the prudent and good management of this Chriſtian Governour, who was very much a Gentleman, prudent, wiſe and zealous for the Service of God and the King, that Empire began to flouriſh, and under many concurring circumſtances arrived to that high pitch of happineſs and felicity, that it daily increaſed and improved to greater benefits: But that which above all was conſiderable, was the propagation and increaſe of our Holy Catholick Faith, which the Spaniards with great zeal and labour preached over all thoſe Countries; the which was received by the Indians with the greater ſatisfaction and diligence, becauſe that many of thoſe Doctrines which were preached unto them, were the ſame Precepts and Commands which their Incan Kings had by the mere light of Nature delivered to them.

But whilſt the Goſpel grew and flouriſhed, and many were enlightned with the glorious Majeſty thereof, and that the Indians, as well as Spaniards, enjoyed in Peru both ſpiritual and temporal Bleſſings with peace and quietneſs: Behold, the Devil, that common enemy to Mankind, laboured to diſturb the happy progreſs of this proſperity: To deſtroy and overthrow which, he let looſe his Officers and evil inſtruments, ſuch as Ambition, Envy, Covetouſneſs, Avarice, Anger, Pride, Diſcord and Tyranny, to whom he gave Commiſſion in their ſeveral places to endeavour the ſubverſion of the Goſpel, and hinder the converſion of the Gentiles to the Catholick Faith, the advancement of which tended to the deſtruction of his Power and Kingdom; and God in his ſecret judgments, and for puniſhment of the ſins of Men, permitted thoſe devices of the Devil to ſucceed, in ſuch fatal manner, as we ſhall find by the ſequel. For ſome certain perſons, guided by a blind and miſtaken zeal for the common good of the Indians took falſe meaſures in the propoſals they made therein to the Royal Council; arguing in many Debates, that new Laws and Conſtitutions ought to be eſtabliſhed with peculiar reference and reſpect to the Governments of Mexico and Peru. The perſon who moſt warmly and earneſtly inſiſted on this point, was a certain Friar called Bartholomew de las Caſas, who ſome years paſt being a Secular Prieſt, had travelled over the Iſlands of Barlovento, and had been at Mexico, and in the parts adjacent; and having taken a religious Habit on him, he propoſed divers matters, which he alledged, were for the good of the Indians, and tended to the propagation of the Catholick Faith, and increaſe of the Royal Revenue; but what effect and ſucceſs his Councils had, Francis Lopez de Gomara, Chaplain to his Imperial Majeſty, relates in Chapter 152, and the ſame is confirmed by Carate, Accountant-General of the Royal Exchequer, in the firſt Chapter of his fifth Book.

The ſame is alſo related by a new Hiſtorian called Diego Fernando, a Citizen of Palencia, who recites the many diſturbances which the new Laws and Conſtitutions cauſed both in Mexico and Peru; this Authour begins his Hiſtory from thoſe Revolutions, and differs very little from the ſubſtance of thoſe particulars mentioned by the two others. Wherefore we ſhall repeat ſingly what each Authour writes; for conſidering the averſion I naturally have to all relations of fatal and dolefull paſſages, I unwillingly recount any thing of that nature; but being forced thereunto for declaration of the Truth, and for continuation of the Hiſtory, I judge it convenient to fortifie my diſcourſes with the teſtimony of the three foregoing Authours, that ſo I may not ſeem of my own head to have framed matters which have produced ſad and evil conſequences to the whole Empire, and which have proved ruinous to the ſeveral parties and factions of thoſe Countries: And leſt in the Quotation of theſe Authours, or citing them by Notes in the Margent, I ſhould be taxed of miſtakes, or of having added any thing of my own, I have rather choſen to follow my former method, by repetition of their words verbatim in thoſe particulars, which contain matter of reflexion, or blame on any perſon; though in other things my diſcourſes ſhall not be confined to their very words, but rather ſerve for a Comment, enlarging on many paſſages, and adding to what they have omitted; all which ſhall be performed with great reſpect to truth, founded on the teſtimony of thoſe who having been Eye-witneſſes, and Actors in thoſe Revolutions, have delivered undoubted Narratives thereof unto me without partiality or prejudice to any.

Wherefore

Wherefore now to proceed after this preamble, we ſay, That when the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela arrived in Peru, I was then about four years of Age; and afterwards in my riper years, I was acquainted with ſeveral of thoſe who are named in this following Hiſtory. In the firſt place therefore we will relate the many troubles which the new Conſtitutions cauſed in Mexico, and the good effects which in the end were produced by the prudent and wiſe management of the Judge, who was employed to put them in execution. After which we will return to Peru, and relate the many misfortunes, ſlaughters, and other miſeries which attended them, cauſed by the ſeverity, rigour and imprudence of that Vice-king, who was Commiſſionated to execute thoſe Laws, and govern that Empire. And though the Hiſtory of Mexico is foreign to our diſcourſe, yet I have thought fit to compare the ſucceſſes of one and of the other Kingdom, which had various and almoſt contrary effects, ariſing notwithſtanding on the ſame cauſes. That ſo Kings and Princes may by the examples and precedents of Hiſtory learn and obſerve how dangerous it is to eſtabliſh Laws, which are rigorous, and cauſe them to be executed by ſevere Judges, who for want of moderation incline the Subjects and Vaſſals to a deteſtation of their Government, whereby they loſe that reſpect, duty and allegiance, which is due thereunto. And indeed all Hiſtories, both Divine and Humane, hath from all antiquity averred the truth hereof; and the experience of theſe Modern times have given us to underſtand, that never was any Rebellion commenced againſt Kings, who were gentle and kind to their Subjects; but when cruelty, tyranny and oppreſſion by taxes, and heavy impoſitions prevailed, then all things ran to miſery and confuſion.

CHAP. XX.

Of the New Laws and Conſtitutions made in the Court of Spain, for the better Government of the two Empires, Mexico and Peru.

WE muſt underſtand that in the year 1539, a certain Friar called Bartholomew de las Caſas, came from New Spain to Madrid, where the Court reſided at that time, ſhewing himſelf in all his Sermons and familiar Diſcourſes extremely zealous for the good of the Indians, and a great Favourer and Protectour of them: In evidence of which, he propounded many things, and maintained them to be very reaſonable, and which in themſelves outwardly appeared holy and good, yet in the execution thereof they proved rigorous, cruel and difficult to be put into practice. The propoſals notwithſtanding of this Friar were offered, and laid before the Supreme Council of the Indies, where they were ill approved, and rejected by the prudence and underſtanding of Don Garcia de Loayſa, the good Cardinal of Seville, who was made of that Council, in regard that for ſeveral years he had been Governour of the Indies, and had more knowledge and experience of the affairs of thoſe parts, than any of thoſe who had been Conquerours and Inhabitants thereof: Wherefore diſſenting from the opinion of the Friar, his Propoſals were not entertained, but ſuſpended untill the year 1542, when the Emperour Charles the Fifth returned into Spain after a long Journey he had made through France, Flanders and Germany. His Majeſty, who was endued with great zeal and devotion for propagation of the Chriſtian Faith, was eaſily perſuaded to hearken to the gentle propoſitions of the Friar, which he inſinuated under the ſpecious colour of Conſcience, and with the guiſe of Religion, offered ſeveral new Laws and Conſtitutions to be enacted and put in force for the greater good and benefit of the Indians.

After

After his Imperial Majesty had duly heard and considered all that the Frier had to offer, he assembled his great Council, to which he farther added several grave and learned persons both Prelates and Lawyers; and, having laid before them the particular Laws and new Establishments, they were approved, and passed by the major part of the Assembly; notwithstanding many being of a different opinion dissented from the Majority, and declared their Votes to the contrary; amongst which were the Cardinal aforementioned, President of the Council, the Bishop of Lugo, Don John Suarez de Carvajal (with whom I was once acquainted) Francisco de los Covos, Secretary to his Majesty, Don Sabastian Ramirez Bishop of Cuenca and President of Valladolid, who formerly had been President in St. Domingo and Mexico; Don Garçia Manrique, Count of Osorno and President of Ordenes, who (as Gomara saith) had for a long time been Super-Intendent over the Affairs of the Indies, during the absence of Cardinal Garcia de Loaysa; all which having been long conversant, and Men of experience in the Affairs of the Indies, did dislike and disapprove the new Laws and Ordinances, which were 40 in number, as disagreeable to the natural Constitutions of those Countries and People. However the same were passed and confirmed by the Emperour in Barcelona, on the 20th of November, 1542. as Gomara, in Chap. 152. relates: and the Battel of Chupas was fought between the Governour Vacca de Castro, and Don Diego Almagro Junior, on the 15th of September, of the same year, being two months and five days before these Laws were signed and passed: by which it may plainly appear how much the Devil was concerned to disturb and hinder the propagation of the Gospel in Peru: for no sooner was one Fire extinguished, before another was in a Flame more fierce and terrible than the former, occasioned by those Discontents which arose from the new Constitutions; of which we shall mention onely four, which are laid down by the aforesaid Authours, as most pertinent to the present History, and are these which follow.

The first Law was this, That after the Death of the Conquerours and of those who had Plantations, and had built Cities, those who were in possession thereof should hold them of the King, for their Lives onely, without right of Inheritance descending to their Wives and Children; but that when any one died the King should succeed, giving to the Children such a proportion of the fruits thereof as might support and maintain them.

That no Indian should be charged with any Tax or Imposition unless in those Countries where the Indians paid not the same by bodily Labour; that no Indian should be forced to labour in the Mines or fish for Pearls; and that having paid a Tribute or Imposition on his Goods to the Lord of the Manour or Freehold, he should be discharged from corporal services.

That the Lands and Plantations cultivated by Indians, which Bishops or Monasteries, or Hospitals held in their own right, should be quitted by them, and vested in the King; and that all Governours, Presidents, Judges, Officers of Justice, and their Deputies under them; as also all the Officers of his Majesties revenue should renounce and disclaim all Title and Interest to such Lands and Plantations of Indians; and that no Officers of his Majesty should be capable of keeping Indian Slaves, though they should renounce their Offices to be capacitated thereunto.

That all such as have Lands in Peru, (which is to be understood of those who have command over Indians) and have had any concernment, or been interested in the late disturbances between Don Francisco de Pizarro and Don Diego de Almagro, shall lose and forfeit all their power and dominion over the Indians, as well one side as the other: by which Law and Constitution (as Diego Fernandez well observes) all People were comprehended, there not being one person in all Peru, who was capacitated either to hold Lands, or to enjoy an Estate in all that Country: and consequently all Persons of Quality as well in new Spain as in Peru were excluded not onely by this, but by the third Law; for all or most of them had been Governours, Justices, Deputies or Officers of the Royal revenue: so that both these two Laws were as Toiles which caught every person, being so comprehensive, as to take in every person in the Indies, and by virtue thereof excluded them from all their Possessions: but for the better understanding of these Acts, Laws and Constitutions, and the grounds thereof, we shall mention and declare the Motives and Reasons which the Legislators produced and alledged for constituting and establishing the same. And as to the first Act or Ordinance we must know, that in recompence and reward to the first Discoverers and Conquerours of the Indies, a Grant was made to poſſeſs and enjoy the Lands they had gained for two Lives, that is, for their own, and the life of their eldeſt Son, and to the Daughter, in caſe a Son ſhould be wanting.

Afterwards a Command was given, That every one ſhould marry, upon ſuppoſition, that men being married would deſire to be quiet, and apply themſelves to cultivate and improve their Lands, and not be mutinous and deſirous of Novelties; and upon this Conſideration, and for the encouragement of Marriage, it was ordained, that the Wife for want of Children ſhould enter into the poſſeſſion, and enjoy it for her Life. The reaſon of the ſecond Law or Conſtitution, exempting the Indians from payment of Taxes or Impoſitions was grounded on a ſuggeſtion; that the Spaniards paid or allowed nothing to the Indians for their pains or labour in their ſervices: perhaps this might be particularly true in relation to ſome Spaniards of evil conſciences and tyrannical diſpoſitions; but as to the generality, it could not be made good; for that many Indians were entertained in the ſervice of the Spaniards, and as Day-labourers hired themſelves out to hew or ſaw timber, receiving their wages and hire for their labours: and therefore to ordain that the Indians ſhould not be charged with labours or employed in work, was to cut off their bread and their gain: and therefore it had been much more political to have made a Law ſeverely to puniſh thoſe who withheld payment from the Indians, after they had done their ſervice and labour which deſerved it.

As to that Law, which forbids the Indians to be compelled to work in the Mines, I have nothing to ſay, but onely to referr my ſelf to the preſent practice, which is now uſed in this year 1611. when by order of the Government, the Indians are compelled to labour in the Silver Mines of the Mountain of Potoſci, and in the Mines of Quick-ſilver which ariſe in the Province of Huanca: in which, if the Indians were not employed, the quantities of Gold and Silver which are yearly imported from this Empire into Spain would greatly fail.

As to that particular Law which impoſes a Tribute or Quit-rent paiable by the Tenant to the Lord of the Manor, it was a matter ſo well eſtabliſhed, that it was received with general applauſe at that time when Preſident Pedro de la Garca proportioned the Tax in Peru, of which I was my ſelf an eye-witneſs: but as to the exemption of Indians from perſonal ſervice, they gave no good information, nor did they know how to make ſuch a roport as might be proper in that caſe. For the matter ſtood thus: Every Adventurer that was an Inhabitant had a certain number of Indians allotted to him in lieu of part of his Tribute, for maintenance of his houſe; ſo that every Lord, beſides his principal Manſion dwelling had ſome ſmall Cottages of about fourty or fifty in number, or ſixty at the moſt, ſet out to him, obliged to perſonal Services; that is to ſay, to provide his houſe with Wood, Water, and Hay or Graſs for his Stables, for at that time, they had no Straw; and, beſides this, they were obliged to no other Tribute or Service: and of this nature my Father was poſſeſſed of three little Villages in the Valley of Cozco; and in the parts adjacent, the Inhabitants of Cozco held divers ſuch like Cottages obliged to the uſe and ſervice of the City. And where it happened out, that the lot fell to any perſon, in places uninhabited, they preſently ſent to the Head-quarters to be ſupplied with Indians in part of the Tribute due to them; and accordingly the ſame was granted, and the Indians which were allotted to them, with great chearfulneſs and contentment followed and obſerved the impoſition of their Maſters: ſo that when the Preſident Gaſca came, and found this particular point ſo equally diſpoſed and eſtabliſhed, he approved thereof, and made no manner of alteration therein.

As to the third Precept, which retrenched the Biſhops, Monaſteries and Hoſpitals in thoſe large proportions of ſervices which former Governours had beſtowed upon them, over Indians: It ſeemed neither injurious nor unreaſonable wholly to take them away; for that the Intention of the Governours was not to grant them for a longer time than they were impowred by his Majeſties Commiſſion, which was only for two lives, which being expired, their right ceaſed; and herein Monaſteries, Biſhopricks and Hoſpitals, though of perpetual durance, yet could not pretend to a greater privilege than the Adventurers and Conquerours of thoſe Empires. The remaining part of this third and fourth Ordinance we ſhall declare hereafter, in the place where we give a relation of the Complaints which thoſe made who believed themſelves injured and damnifyed thereby.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Officers which were ſent to Mexico and Peru, to put theſe Laws into Execution. And a Deſcription of the Imperial City of Mexico.

WHen theſe Laws of the new Eſtabliſhment came over; It was farther ordered, that the Court held at Panama ſhould be diſſolved, and another new one erected in the confines of Guatimala and Nicaragua, to which Court the whole Terra Firma, or Continent, was to be ſubjected.

It was farther ordained, That another Court of Chancery ſhould be erected in Peru, conſiſting of four Judges and a Preſident, to whom the title ſhould be given of Vice-king and Captain General: And that a certain perſon ſhould be ſent unto New Spain with a power of Viſitation, to overſee the Government of the Vice-king, and the Proceedings in the Court of Mexico and of the ſeveral Biſhopricks, and to take an account from the Officers of the Royal Revenue, and of all the Juſtices of that Kingdom.

All which Regulations were iſſued forth with the aforementioned Ordinances, which, as formerly declared, were fourty in number. And whereas there reſided in the Court of Spain many Indians from all parts; divers Copies of theſe new Rules were tranſlated, ſent-over and diſperſed, which all and every particular perſon, inhabitants of thoſe two Empires, took out for his information, being of general concernment: but ſo diſpleaſing were theſe new regulations to the generality of thoſe People, that in high diſcontent they caballed together, and held publick meetings to contrive a remedy.

Some few days after the publication of theſe Orders, his Imperial Majeſty nominated Don Franciſco Tello de Sandoval, a Native of Seville, who had been Inquiſitor of Toledo, to be his Viſitor, for which Office he judged him the moſt proper perſon he could chuſe, in conſideration that he had formerly been a member of the Royal Council of the Indies, and a perſon of great probity and prudence, and for that reaſon, was well worthy of the emploiment, to ſee that the new Laws ſhould be put in execution as well in New Spain as in other parts of the Empire, and to that purpoſe, that he ſhould viſit all places, to ſee them actually performed and put into practice.

At the ſame time Blaſco Nunnez Vela, who was Surveyor General of the Forts of Caſtile was named Preſident and Vice-king of the Kingdoms and Provinces of Peru, concerning which matter Carate, in the ſecond Chapter of his fifth Book, hath theſe words following, " The great experience his Majeſty had " of this Gentleman, whom he had tryed and approved in other Governments " of Countries and Cities, namely, in Malaga and Cuenca; and having found " that he was a Gentleman of great probity and rectitude, executing impartial " juſtice unto all men without reſpect to perſons, and that he was ever zealous for " the Royal Intereſt, and that with great courage he performed the King's Com- " mands, and without failure in any thing; his Majeſty therefore judged him wor- " thy of this honourable emploiment. Thus far are the words of Carate.

Moreover Don Diego de Cepeda, a Native of Torderſillas, who had been Judge in the Iſles of the Canaries, and Don Liſon de Texada, a Native of Logronno, who had been Judge of the Marſhal's Court held at Valladolid, for deciding points of Honour, and Don Alvarez, who had been a Pleader or Advocate in the ſame Court, with Don Pedro Ortez de Carate, a Native of the City of Ordunna, formerly Mayor of Segovia, were all four put into Commiſſion, and appointed Officers in thoſe parts.

Moreover Auguſtine de Carate, who had been Secretary of the Privy Council, was appointed Auditor General of all the Accounts of thoſe Kingdoms and Provinces, and of that whole Continent. To whom, and to the perſons abovementioned, theſe Rules and Orders above-mentioned were delivered, with Command, That ſo ſoon as the Courts were ſetled and eſtabliſhed in the City of Los Reyes, where his Majeſty commanded they ſhould be held; the ſeveral Laws mentioned in the ſequel of the Commiſſions, ſhould be obſerved and maintained without any violation.

Thus much is reported by Diego Fernandez in the ſecond Chapter of his Book, and the like alſo is mentioned by Auguſtine Carate, almoſt in the ſame termes; and that theſe Laws were iſſued out and dated in the month of April, 1543.

And now, in the firſt place, we will briefly relate the happy ſucceſs of theſe matters in Mexico, from whence we will proceed to Peru, and there declare the ſad and dolefull effects thereof, which happened in that Kingdom as well to Spaniards as Indians.

In the month of November, 1543. the Vice-king, together with his Judges, Miniſters, and Chief Super-Intendent, Don Franciſco Tello de Sandoval, embarked at San Lucar upon a noble Fleet, conſiſting of about 52 Sail of good and tall Ships; and looſing from thence with a proſperous gale arrived in 12 days at the Iſlands of the Canaries; from whence having taken ſome refreſhments, they purſued their voyage; and then divided their Fleet, thoſe for New Spain ſteering their courſe to the right-hand, and thoſe for Peru unto the left; where we will leave our Vice-king in proſecution of his voyage, to relate the ſucceſs of the Viſitor or Super-Intendent in the Kingdom of Mexico. And paſſing by the many particulars of his voyage, which are mentioned by Diego Fernandez Paletino; we ſhall ſay, in ſhort, that in the month of Febr. 1544. he ſafely arrived in the Port of St. John de Ulva, and from thence proceeded to Veracruz; and in a ſhort time afterwards came to Mexico; being received in his way thither by all People with that reſpect, duty and joy, as was due to his Quality and Commiſſion.

But the People of Mexico, being informed of the Rules and Inſtructions he brought with him, reſolved to goe forth and meet him at ſome ſhort diſtance from the City; not with Muſick or Merriment, but as Diego Fernandez reports, clothed in Mourning, and with ſuch ſadneſs and ſorrow in their countenances, as might teſtifie their reſentments, fears and apprehenſions, they conceived at his entrance into the Government.

Which Intention being made known to the Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça, he preſently endeavoured to prevent the ſame, and to put the People into a better humour, commanding them to receive him with Joy and Mirth; and accordingly the Vice-king and Council, with the Officers of State, the Mayor and Aldermen of the City, as alſo the Clergy, with above 600 Gentlemen all richly adorned and well-armed, went forth to receive him at half a League diſtance from the City. The Vice-king and the Super-Intendent met, and entertained each other with much complement and ceremonies, and the like paſſed with all others: and then he proceeded to the Monaſtery of St. Domingo, at his entrance into which he was received by Father John Cumarrage, of the Order of St. Francis, Arch-biſhop of Mexico, and was conducted thither by the Vice-king, who having ſeen him there in his Lodging, he left him, and committed him to his repoſe. All which being thus far related by Diego Fernandez, he proceeds to give us a deſcription of the City of Mexico in theſe words.

" If it may be lawfull for me, who am an Indian, and for that reaſon may ſeem " partial to my own Countrey: I ſhould gladly repeat the words which he uſes in honour of that great City, which may be compared to the ancient greatneſs of Rome in its glory: His words are theſe. " This great City of Mexico is ſituated " in a plain, and founded amidſt the Waters like Venice; and therefore for the " better communication of the Inhabitants, it is furniſhed with a great number " of Bridges. The Lake in which this City is built, though it ſeems to be of " one ſingle Water; yet in reality it conſiſts of two, which are of different na- " tures; the one is of a bitteriſh and brackiſh ſort of Waters: and the other of " a ſweet taſte and wholeſome for the body: the Salt-water ebbs and flows; but " the Sweet-water doth not ſo, but being of a higher ſituation falls into the " Salt-water, and the Salt-water on the contrary doth not ariſe ſo high as to da- " mage the other.

" The Salt-water Lake is about five Leagues broad, and eight Leagues in " length; and the Sweet-water is much of the like dimenſion; upon theſe Lakes " about 200 thouſand ſmall Boats are emploied, which the Natives call Acales, " and the Spaniards, Canoes; they are all made of one piece of Timber, and are

" bigger

" bigger or leſs, according to the proportion of the Tree out of which they " were hewen.

" About this time this City contained 700 great and principal Palaces, well " built of Lime and Stone; the which were not covered with Tile or Slate, but " made flat with a Tarras, ſo that People might walk on the top.

" The Streets are very commodious, plain and ſtreight, and ſo wide that four " Horſemen may be able to ride a-breaſt with their Lances and Targets, without " touching one the other.

" The Town-houſe, where the Tribunals of Juſtice are held, hath nine ſeve- " ral Courts or Yards within it, together with a large Garden, and a ſpacious " place, where they exerciſed their Sports called the Feaſts of Bulls. Within " this Houſe the Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça kept his Court, and the Viſi- " tor or Super-Intendent Don Franciſco Tello de Sandoval, with three Judges and the " Accountant General were conveniently lodged. Within the Verge alſo of this " Town-houſe, the Royal Priſon was contained, and a Houſe and Office for " founding Bells and Cannon, as alſo the Mint for Coinage of Money.

" Upon one ſide of this Houſe the Street fronts which they call Tacuba, and " on the other ſide runs the Street of St. Francis, and behind is the Street called " the Chaſe, all which are Principal Streets; and on the Front of all is the open " Place where they bait the Bulls; and, in fine, this Palace is of that large Cir- " cumference, that it anſwers to the eighty Gates belonging to the Houſes of " Principal Inhabitants of that City.

" The Indians of this City live in two great Streets called St. Jago and Mexico; " the number of which are at this time reckoned to be 200 thouſand. The A- " venues to this City are four, one whereof is two Leagues in length, and is that " to the South-ward, by which Hernando Cortes made his entry.

Thus far are the words of Diego Fernandez, to which this Authour adds, That in thoſe days there were 700 great capacious Houſes, he might mean rather 700 large Streets, which may well be imagined, if we take the Meaſures thereof by the proportion of that vaſt Palace, wherein were contained the Vice-king's Houſe, the Viſitors Apartments, with the Lodgings of the Judges and other Officers of the Kingdom, as alſo the Priſon, the Mint, and the rooms wherein the Bells and Cannon were founded; all and every of which Offices were ſo large that each of them of it ſelf contained a whole Street; which this Authour confirms in the Deſcription he gives of this Houſe, ſaying, That this Houſe is ſo large that it anſwers to 80 great Gates belonging to the Houſes of Principal Citizens. In ſhort, we may poſitively affirm, that this Imperial City of Mexico is certainly one of the chief, if not the moſt conſiderable City in the World. The which I prove by the teſtimony of a Dutch Gentleman, who having out of curioſity travailed to ſee the moſt famous Cities of the Old World, did averre, that out of curioſity onely to ſee Mexico, he took a voyage into the new-found World; and that, beſides the pleaſure he took in the ſight thereof, he had gained 20 thouſand Ducats in his Countrey upon ſeveral wagers he had made, concerning the particulars he had related thereof; to prove which a man was purpoſely ſent to thoſe parts.

But not to make too long a Digreſſion upon this Subject, we ſhall omit many particulars which he related to me hereof, as alſo of his long Travails he made there, and the many years he ſpent therein, which to my beſt remembrance he told me were 14. Palentino reports, that when the Vice-king went forth to meet and receive the Viſitor or Super-Intendent, he was accompanied with the Privy Council, Judges and other Officers of State, as alſo with the Mayor and Aldermen of the City, and the Clergy, together with 600 Gentlemen all very richly attired and well armed; all which was no Romance nor more than the truth. For beſides other Grandeurs and pieces of Oſtentation belonging to Mexico; it is moſt certain, that 'tis common and uſual on Sundays, and other Feſtival-days, to ſee 5 or 600 Gentlemen riding through the Streets, not upon deſign of Matches or Horſe-races, or the like, but onely for common paſtime, and to take the Air: which for a ſubordinate Government without the preſence of a King, is very magnificent and extraordinary.

CHAP. XXII.

Perſons are appointed to petition againſt the New Laws; the ſame are publickly proclaimed. Of the Trouble and Mutiny which was cauſed thereby; and how it was appeaſed. And how matters flouriſhed in all the Empire of Mexico by the prudence and good conduct of this Viſitor or Super-Intendent.

BUT to return again to the courſe of our Hiſtory from whence we are digreſſed; we are here to declare, that the next day after the arrival of this Viſitor, there was a general mutiny and diſcontent in all the City of Mexico; ſaying, That this new Gueſt was come to put the new Laws in execution, and every one deſcanted on matters according to his own humour and fancy, ſo that there were ſeveral publick Cabals and Conſultations held in what manner to overthrow, and prevent this general agrievance, the reſult of which was with general conſent, that they ſhould petition againſt theſe Ordinances, and lay before the Viſitor their Objections againſt them; to conſider and perfect which the Corporation of the City and Officers of his Majeſties Exchequer ſpent that whole night and the Sunday following; and upon Munday morning, ſo ſoon as it was light, they convened together, namely, the chief of the Cabal with their Clerk who attended with a multitude of People, went to the Monaſtery of St. Domingo, where they delivered their Petition and Reaſons againſt the new Regulations: and though the Monaſtery was very ſpatious, yet the Croud of People was ſo great, that the place was not capable to contain them. And though the Viſitor was ſomething fearfull and apprehenſive of the rudeneſs and inſolence of the rabble, yet he put a good face upon the matter, and with much frankneſs declared unto them the Reaſons of his coming. Howſoever he gently reproved them with fair words, wondering that before he had opened his Commiſſion, or declared the cauſes and matters upon which he was employed, that they ſhould ſo eagerly offer their Complaints againſt agrievances which never touched them. Wherefore he deſired them to depart in peace with their multitude, and out of them to depute two or three of their principal Officers to repreſent their Complaints before him; and that they ſhould return to him in the afternoon, when he would treat with them, and give Anſwers to their Demands: with this Anſwer they all retired, and upon conſultation together, they appointed the Attorney General and two Juſtices of the Peace, and the Clerk of the Cabal, named Lopez de Legaſpi, to be their Deputies; who accordingly at two a clock in the afternoon went to the Monaſtery to offer their agrievances.

The Viſitor to outward appearance ſeemed to receive them with much cheerfulneſs; and having admitted them into an inward room, began ſharply to reprove them for the Tumult which they had raiſed in the morning, aggravating their Fault by the dangerous conſequences which might have happened thereupon, to the diſhonour of God, and the breach of the publick Peace. Moreover he aſſured them, that he came not to deſtroy or prejudice the Countrey, but to advance and improve it to the utmoſt of his power: he likewiſe promiſed to intercede with his Majeſty on their behalf, and repreſent the Inconvenience of the moſt rigorous Statutes, and that untill an Anſwer thereof were returned, he would ſuſpend the execution of them.

In fine, he ſo managed his diſcourſe, and ſo overcame them with good words and forcible Perſuaſions, that without enforcing the particulars on which they were deputed, they returned with full ſatisfaction, and appeaſed the unquietneſs and rage of the Tumult; and ſo the Mutinies of the People being abated for the

ſpace of ſeveral days, until Monday the 24th of March, when the new Statutes were publickly proclaimed, at which time the perſons who were preſent were, the Vice-king, the Viſitor, and all the Council. So ſoon as the Proclamation was ended, the Sheriff of the City broke through the Croud, and in a confuſed manner came up to the Viſitor, and delivered him a Petition which he had prepared, with ſeveral Reaſons againſt the new Statutes; the People at the ſame time murmuring, and ſeemingly reſolved to maintain their former liberties: Upon which the Viſitor, fearing the outrage of the People, began to excuſe himſelf, and with much earneſtneſs declared, that what he had done therein, was not of choice, but by compulſion: promiſing them with all the aſſurance imaginable, that whatſoever in that Proclamation tended to the prejudice of the Conquerours he would never enforce or execute; and that he would aſſuredly perform whatſoever he had promiſed to the Deputies of the Common Council of the People. And whereas they ſeemed to give no credence to his words, he much complained, and with vehement Aſſeverations vowed and ſwore to them, that he was infinitely concerned, and that they themſelves did not ſo much deſire the flouriſhing eſtate and condition of New Spain, as he did.

He moreover promiſed upon Oath to write unto his Majeſty in favour of the Conquerours and Inhabitants, beſeeching his Majeſty not onely to conſerve unto them their Eſtates and Revenue, Privileges and ancient Charters, but likewiſe, to confirm and enlarge the ſame, and to confer upon them thoſe other Lands to be equally divided, which lye waſte and without a Poſſeſſor. In like manner the Biſhop of Mexico, obſerving the general ſadneſs and diſcontent which appeared in the countenance of the Citizens, offered to engage his own Faith and Credit, that the Viſitor ſhould perform whatſoever he had promiſed; and for an evidence of his kindneſs, he invited all the People on the next day being the twenty fifth of March, and the great Feſtival of our Lady, to be preſent at the great Church, where he promiſed to give them a Sermon, and that the Viſitor ſhould celebrate Maſs.

With theſe Promiſes and Aſſurances, though their Minds were a little eaſed, yet they departed ſad and fearfull, doubting the performance of the many Promiſes which were made to them; and though they paſſed that night with fear and anguiſh of mind; yet in the morning they flocked to the great Church, where the Vice-king, the Judges and Officers of the Corporation of the City were preſent. The Viſitor having finiſhed the Maſs, the Biſhop of Mexico aſcended the Pulpit, and began his Sermon, in which he produced many Texts of Holy Scripture pertinent to the Affliction of the People, and enforced them with that zeal and fervour of Spirit as gave great comfort and conſolation to the People. After which their ſullenneſs began to vaniſh, and more cheerfulneſs appeared in their converſation and buſineſs: ſo that the Attorney General and Judges went to make their viſit to Don Franciſco Tello, contriving with him the form and method whereby they were to make their application to his Majeſty for a redreſs of theſe aggrievances which were deſigned againſt them: in purſuance of which, with the conſent and advice of the Viſitor, they named two Friers of good eſteem, and two Burgomaſters of the City Council, whom they deputed in behalf of the whole Kingdom to carry their addreſs into Germany, where the Emperour at that time reſided being employed in Wars againſt the Lutherans: with them the Viſitor ſent his Letters of recommendation, giving his Majeſty to underſtand, how much the ſuſpenſion of the late Statutes concerned the Service of God, and of his Majeſty: and the conſervation of the common peace and quiet of that Countrey; and on the contrary, what inconveniences, troubles and confuſions might reſult from the execution of them.

In all which particulars the Viſitor performed his word like a Gentleman. For in his Letters to his Majeſty, having in the firſt place given a relation of his voyage, and of what happened at his arrival in New Spain, he touched upon divers things relating to the execution of the New Statutes; remarking what in every Law might properly be reſtrained or enlarged: within this Letter he incloſed a paper containing 25 Heads, relating to ſuch conditions as were proper and tending to the welfare of the Indians, and in what manner they might be beſt conſerved, and the Natives increaſed: howſoever the Articles were all for the moſt part in favour of the Spaniards who were Inhabitants of thoſe Countries.

With theſe Diſpatches the perſons deputed to carry the Addreſs embarked for Spain, and with them ſeveral others who were willing to be abſent, to avoid the force force of these new Laws, howsoever some few days after they were published, the Visitor craftily and underhand began to insinuate and privately to put some of the new Regulations into practice. The most easie and safe way, as he thought, was to begin with the King's Officers, who could not reasonably complain of such Rules as their Master imposed on them; in pursuance whereof he acquitted the Indians of their services to them; in like manner he released them from all manner of service to Convents, Bishops and Hospitals; and hereof gave immediate advice to his Majesty.

In the mean time the Friers and Burgesses who were deputed to carry this Message, departed from New Spain, and, having had a fair wind, gained a prosperous passage, and arrived safe in Castile, from whence they hastned with all diligence into Germany to represent their cause before his Imperial Majesty, and in regard the Wars in Germany were very hot, and the persecution of Monasteries and religious Persons which the Hereticks exercised in those parts were very grievous; the Friers thought fit to change their habit, and accouter themselves in the fashion of Souldiers. In short, their negotiations at the Court were successfull, and speedily dispatched, having obtained his Majesties Royal hand for the ease and redress of their aggrievances, they, by the first Fleet, gave an account of the success of their affairs, and how prevalent the recommendations and report which the Visitor had given them were towards the relief and redress of their aggrievances.

So soon as these Dispatches arrived at Mexico, and that the Letters were read at the Common Council of the City; they all immediately repaired to the House of the Visitor, but in a far different manner, and with a more cheerfull aspect than when they first came to offer their petition, and considerations against the new Statutes: for now, without that sullenness of look which they formerly shewed, they now with smiles and pleasant looks returned him many thanks for the Letter which he had so kindly wrote in their favour; by virtue of which they had obtained the Royal Mandate, which they delivered to him, commanding the Visitor to suspend the execution of the new Laws, untill farther Order; and moreover it was therein added, that his Majesty would speedily give directions for dividing the Countrey among the Conquerours and the Inhabitants thereof: and accordingly in the very next Fleet his Majesty sent a Commission to Don Antonio de Mandoca, to make a distribution of such Lands as lay waste, and without any Possessour: all which gave such general satisfaction, that the Common Council of the City gave orders for a day of festivity and rejoycing to be solemnly celebrated; which was performed with Bull-baiting and other Sports and Pastimes in such manner as the like was never practised before: After which, all fears and jealousies vanishing, every man followed his pleasures and delights.

And farther, to confirm them in the Assurance that the new Laws should not be put in execution, an Instance was given them by the death of one of the Conquerours, who leaving a Widow without Issue; the Vice-king and the Visitor ordained, that the Indians who were his Subjects, and whom he held in villenage, should still continue in the same condition, subjected to the Widow of the deceased; the which action took away the remainder of the jealousie they apprehended concerning the Practice of the new Statutes.

Thus Don Francisco Tello having performed all matters in New Spain in the manner as we have related, and setled every thing according as he was commanded by his Majesty, he returned again to Castile, where he was preferred by his Majesty to be President in the Courts of Judicature in Granada and Valladolid, and made President of the Royal Council of the Indies: and in the month of December, 1566. his Majesty conferred upon him the Bishoprick of Osma.

Thus much shall serve to have said concerning the new Laws and Constitutions in Mexico: We shall now proceed to give a relation of the many sad misfortunes and calamities which were the consequences of them in Peru, where all things being managed in a different manner to those of Mexico, occasioned great Disorders in that Empire: the riches whereof being great, it was necessary to use the more severity and rigour to put the new Statutes in practice: whence proceeded so many slaughters, ruines, robberies, tyrannies and cruelties that we are not able to describe the tenth part of those Miseries which Spaniards and Indians of both sexes and all ages sustained in that great tract of Land where was nothing but Misery and Confusion for the space of 700 leagues together.

BOOK IV.

CHAP. I.

Of the Accidents which befell the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela ſo ſoon as he landed on the Continent and on the Confines of Peru.

IN the preceding Hiſtory we have given a Relation of the happy and proſperous State of Affairs in the Kingdom of Mexico, cauſed by the Moderation, Wiſedom and good Conduct of the Viſitor Don Franciſco Tello de Sandoval: We are now, on the contrary, obliged to make a Relation of the Ruines, Slaughters and other Calamities of the Empire of Peru, cauſed by the Rigour, Severity and Evil diſpoſition of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, who ſo obſtinately, againſt the opinion and ſenſe of all his Council and Officers, purſued the deſign of putting the new Statutes into practice, that for want of due conſideration of what might conduce to his Majeſties ſervice, he put the whole wellfare of the Empire into danger: We have formerly mentioned, how that the two Fleets bound for Peru and Mexico ſeparated each from the other in the Gulf or Bay of Las Damas; and ſteering thence a different courſe, the Vice-king with a proſperous Wind arrived at Nombre de Dios, on the 10th of January 1544. from whence he travailed to Panama, where he manumitted, or ſet at liberty great numbers of Indians, and freed them from their duty and ſervitude to the Spaniards, who had brought them from Peru, and cauſed them again to return thither; the which action was diſpleaſing and ill reſented on all ſides; for that the Spaniards were highly troubled to be deprived of the Vaſſalage of their Indian Servants whom they had inſtructed and taught to be induſtrious: and they themſelves being turned Chriſtians, and inured to the ſervice of the Spaniards, and domeſticated in their families, were unwilling to quit their Maſters. And though it was often inſinuated to the Vice-king that this action would prove to the diſſervice both of God and the King, to exempt the Indians from their ſervitude to the Spaniards; in regard that ſuch of them as had declared and profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians, could not long continue in that ſtate; but ſo ſoon as they returned to the power of their Caciques, would renounce Chriſtianity, and revert to their old principles and Sacrifices to the Devil. Moreover, they repreſented unto him, that though his Majeſty ordained that the Indians ſhould be ſet at liberty, yet he commanded, that they ſhould be free to reſide where they pleaſed, and not be forced againſt their own wills to return unto Peru, and with ſo little Proviſion and ill accommodation, that it was almoſt impoſſible for them to be ſuſtained, but that moſt of them muſt periſh in the voyage thither: To all which the Vice-king made no other reply than that ſuch was the expreſs command and pleaſure of his Majeſty, from which he was reſolved not to deviate in the leaſt tittle: and accordingly he ſent his Orders to all Maſters of Indians, that they ſhould immediately ſet their Indians at liberty, and furniſh them with proviſions for their voyage: in purſuance of which Command 300 Indians were embarked, and diſpatched away, but ſo ill accommodated and provided in the Ship, that many of them were ſtarved with hunger, and others being landed and left to ſhift for themſelves on the coaſt, periſhed with famine and the hardſhip they ſuſtained in that deſolate Countrey. Such perſons as undertook to diſſuade the Vice-king from putting the new Laws into practice, offered many Reaſons to the contrary, repreſenting unto him the many late unhappy Civil Wars which would eaſily be renewed by a People whoſe humours were already in a fermentation, and diſpoſed to make inſurrections.

Theſe Diſcourſes being diſpleaſing and ungratefull to the Vice-king, moved him to unhanſome expreſſions, and to tell them that ſuch Motions as thoſe were puniſhable, and that, were he in a place within his own juriſdiction, he would advance the Promoters thereof unto the Gallows: the which angry and rude Anſwer gave a check to all Addreſſes intended to be made to the Vice-king of this matter.

Blaſco Nunnez remained twenty days in Panama, during which time the Sheriffs and Juſtices of the City received ſeveral advices of the ſtate of Peru, in which two things were very conſiderable: One was, that upon the advice of the coming of the new Rules, the Conquerours of Peru were all in a Mutiny, and in great Diſcontent: And the other, that it was impoſſible to put the ſame in execution without great danger of ſubverting the whole Government: For that it being but lately ſince the Battel was fought, wherein Vaca de Caſtro overthrew Diego de Almagro the younger, with the Slaughter of 350 men: and that thoſe who ſurvived eſteemed that the dangers they had ſuſtained by the ſuppreſſion of this Rebellion was a piece of ſuch ſervice to his Majeſty as deſerved a high reward, rather than the leaſt diminution of their Eſtates and Privileges. Howſoever the Juſtices and Officers, being acquainted with the humour and diſpoſition of the Vice-king did not think fit to inform or preſs him farther, ſuppoſing that upon his arrival in Peru, having ſeen and obſerved the nature and conſtitution of thoſe Countreys, he would be more eaſily convinced, and more apt to receive the impreſſions of better Councils: but the Vice-king, being of a froward and petulant diſpoſition, eaſily moved with the leaſt occaſion, reſolved not to ſuffer the Judges to aſſociate or go in company with him; ſwearing, that before they came thither, he would effect and compaſs all matters, according to the Rules and Laws which were preſcribed.

Carate, who was then Governour of Panama, being at that time ſick and in his Bed, the Vice-king made him the Complement of a Viſit before his departure: when Carate told him, that ſince he was reſolved to depart without the attendance and company of the Judges, he earneſtly deſired and heartily admoniſhed him to enter into the Countrey in a mild and gentle manner, and not to propoſe or attempt to put any of the new Laws into execution or practice, untill the Courts of Juſtice were erected and ſetled in the City of Los Reyes; and till he was fully poſſeſſed of the Power and Authority of the Countrey; for before that time ſuch an enterprize would not be feaſible, nor prove honourable for his Majeſty; nor conduce to the welfare of the People or conſervation of the Government: And in regard that ſeveral of thoſe new Laws which he deſigned to put in execution were very rigorous and oppreſſive on the People; he adviſed him to ſuſpend them, untill he had given his advice thereupon unto his Majeſty, with his opinion of the miſchiefs which might accrue thereby; and that if, after all this, his Majeſty ſhould continue his Pleaſure to have them executed; it might then be more ſeaſonable to promulge and put them in practice, for that by that time he might be able to get into Power, and eſtabliſh himſelf in the Government. All which, and many other things, were declared to him by Carate; but he not reliſhing them, being contrary to his humour, ſerved onely to move his Choler, and cauſe him in a paſſion to ſwear, that he would, without other preamble or addreſs to the King for other Inſtructions, immediately execute the new Laws, without the help or aſſiſtence of the Judges; who upon their arrival in Peru, ſhould find that he had no need of their help to enforce thoſe Laws.

In this

In this manner, without other attendance than his own private Family, he embarked, and on the 4th of May he arrived in the Port of Tumbez, from whence he travailed over Land, and all the way he went, he publiſhed the new Orders, and cauſed them to be executed and obeyed, laying a Tax or Impoſition on the People according to the numbers of thoſe Indians they held, and taking them away from others, cauſed them all to be held as of the King.

In this manner he paſſed through Piura and Truxillo, proclaiming the new Laws as he went, and cauſing them to be executed, without admitting any Petition or Argument thereupon. And though the Inhabitants alledged that this method of proceeding was not juſtifiable without hearing the Objections they had to produce unto the contrary, and that the Laws were not to be enforced without knowledge of the Cauſe, or publication of his Power, or Commiſſion in a Court of Judicature; it being expreſly ſignified by his Majeſty that thoſe new Laws were to be publiſhed in Court in preſence of the Vice-king and four Judges. Howſoever the Vice-king, unmoved by any reaſons or perſuaſions proceeded reſolutely to execute them, threatning thoſe who refuſed to obey them, the which ſtruck great terrour and confuſion into the minds of the People, conſidering that the Laws were general and comprehenſive of all ſort of People without any qualification or reſtriction. And herein this Vice-king was ſo poſitive, that ſo ſoon as he was landed on the Coaſt of Peru, he diſpatched his Emiſſaries before him to the City of Los Reyes, and to Cozco; giving them to underſtand, that he being arrived within thoſe Dominions, the whole power and authority as Vice-king devolved upon him, and that thereupon the Commiſſion and Command of Vaca de Caſtro was ſuperſeded.

Some few days before theſe advices were brought to the City of Los Reyes, the whole tenure of the new Regulations diſpatched from the King by Blaſco Nunnez Vela were made known by the Copies which were diſperſed in all places; ſo that the Corporation of Los Reyes diſpatched away the Advices thereof to Antonio de Ribera and John Alonſo Palomino, deſiring them to make Vaca de Caſtro acquainted therewith; but he was not ignorant before of all that paſſed; for his Servant in Spain called James de Aller, being informed of the new Statutes and Regulations, ſpeedily poſted with them to his Maſter in Cozco, ſo that he was informed of every particular before the Vice-king arrived.

Thus far is reported by the Writings of Fernandez de Palentino, and generally all the Hiſtorians agree with him in the ſame Relation.

CHAP. II.

Judge Vaca de Caſtro goes to the City of Los Reyes, and diſcharges thoſe who went with him upon the way. The great noiſe and diſturbance which the Execution of the new Laws occaſioned, and the mutinous words which the People uttered thereupon.

THE Governour Vaca de Caſtro having received information of the approach of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and of the tenure of the Laws which he brought with him, and that he put them in execution with all the vigour imaginable, without hearing any man ſpeak or admitting any Petition to the contrary; he thought fit to ſecure his own intereſt and party by a due compliance with him; in order whereunto he went to the City of Los Reyes, there to receive him for Vice-king. And though the Corporation of the City of Rimac ſent their Emiſſaries Antonio de Ribera and John Alonſo Palamino to him, and alſo others from the City of Cozco and other parts, perſuading him not to goe in perſon to the Vice-king, but rather to ſend a Meſſage to him in the name of all the People, deſiring him to ſuſpend the execution of the new Laws. And whereas this Vice-king by reaſon of his rough and obſtinate humour, had rendred himſelf uncapable of Office by not giving ear to the complaints and aggrievances which his Majeſty's good Subjects offered to him; ſhewing nothing but fierceneſs in the execution of matters of the ſmalleſt moment, they were generally of opinion that he ſhould be rejected and not admitted to the Government; and that in caſe Vaca de Caſtro would not concurr with them herein, they did not doubt but to fix upon another perſon who ſhould join with them in the oppoſition which they intended to make.

By this obſtinacy and fierceneſs of the Vice-king all Peru was put into a flame, and the humours of the people into a fermentation: there was now no other talk or diſcourſe over all Peru than of the new Laws, the contents of which the Meſſengers of the Vice-king, whom he had ſent before to take up his quarters, had openly divulged in all places: and thereunto the rumour of the people, as is common in ſuch caſes, had aggravated the ſeverity thereof, the more to provoke and incenſe the people. Hereupon Vaca de Caſtro prepared himſelf for his Journey to Los Reyes; and being upon his departure from Cozco, he was accompanied with a numerous Train of Citizens and Souldiers; for being a perſon well beloved, there would not have remained ſo much as one perſon in the City if he would have accepted of their attendance; and, being on his way, he was met by Meſſengers from the Vice-king giving him to underſtand, that his Commiſſion for the Government was now ſuperſeded by his arrival in thoſe parts, and that he was to receive and acknowledge him for the chief Governour of that Countrey; to all which Vaca de Caſtro chearfully ſubmitted, and deſiſted from exerciſing the power of his Office: but before that time, by a Writing under his hand, he had beſtowed and ſettled ſeveral Plantations of Indians on certain perſons, who had by their ſervices and ſufferings well deſerved the favour and reward of his Majeſty, being ſuch of whoſe merits he had been an eye-witneſs, or at leaſt had received ſufficient Teſtimonials of their loyalty and good ſervices before he came to the adminiſtration of the Government. The Meſſengers which the Vice-king ſent before to provide for his entertainment, gave a relation in all places in what manner the new Laws were put in practice and how enforced; how he had freed the Indians in Panama from their duty and vaſſalage to the Spaniards, againſt whoſe will, and in deſpight of whom, he had embarked and ſent them away to Peru; how he had in Tumpiz, St. Michael's and Truxillo laid a Tax upon ſome Lands, and freed others, and ſettled them all in Capite to be held of the King, according to the rules preſcribed by the new Laws, without any conſideration of difference or diſtinction of caſes, but made all things equal without admitting of proviſoes, or reſervations, or hearing what any man had to alledge; but with an unſhaken reſolution pretended that ſo was his Majeſty's pleaſure. The which ſo much enraged the people who accompanied Vaca de Caſtro, that moſt of them returned back to Cozco without ſo much as taking their leave of the Governour, pretending that they could not appear before a man ſo fierce and arbitrary without danger of being by him condemned to the Gallows: Howſoever they gave out, that when the Auditours and Juſtices came, they would then appear to give in their plea and reaſons againſt ſuch proceedings; yet in the mean time they ſeemed to act like diſcontented perſons, profeſſing openly their aggrievances and diſſatisfaction: for when they came to Huamanca they took away all the Artillery which had been lodged there ever ſince the defeat of Almagro and carried them away to Cozco; the chief Authour of which enterpriſe was called Gaſpar Rodriguez, who, by the help of great numbers of Indians, carried them away to the diſſatisfaction of all thoſe who either ſaw or heard of the action. Vaca de Caſtro, having intelligence hereof, proceeded on his Journey, and by the way it was his fortune to meet with a certain Prieſt called Baltaſar de Loayſa, who out of kindneſs told him, that in the City of Los Reyes the people ſpake hardly of him; and therefore he adviſed him to be wary and to go well attended both with Men and Arms. Vaca de Caſtro making uſe of this information, deſired thoſe Gentlemen, who came in his company and entred into his attendance, that they would now be pleaſed to leave him and return to their own homes: and that ſuch who were unwilling ſo to doe, and were deſirous to continue with him; yet at leaſt, that they ſhould quit their Lances and Fire-arms; though it were the practice at that time, as well as many years after, to travel both with offenſive and defenſive Arms. Accordingly his Friends that accompanied him laid aſide their Weapons, and by ſhort journies arrived at length at Los Reyes: the perſons who were his aſſociates were Lorenço de Aldana, Pedro de los Rios, Benito de Carvajal, a civil Lawyer, Don Alonſo de Monte-Major and Hernando de Bachichao; whoſe arrival at the City of Los Reyes was ſolemnized with great joy, though much abated by the apprehenſions they conceived of the ſeverity of the new Statutes, and the inexorable and inflexible humour of the Vice-king, ſo different from the temper of his Predeceſſour. So ſoon as he was arrived he immediately diſpatched away from thence his Steward called Jeronimo de Serena, and his Secretary Pedro Lopez de Caçalla with Letters to the Vice-king, congratulating his ſafe arrival, with offers both of his life and fortune to ſerve both his Majeſty and his Lordſhip. Whilſt theſe matters paſſed on the way between Cozco and the City of Los Reyes, other more unpleaſing paſſages occurred in the Journey between Tumpiz and Rimac, where the Vice-king, without any difference or conſideration of circumſtances, put the new Rules into execution with all the rigour and fury imaginable, without giving ear to the defence or reaſons which the Conquerours and Gainers of that great Empire could make or alledge in their own favour and behalf, ſaying, that ſo was the King's will and pleaſure, which admitted of no delay or contradiction, or any thing beſides pure obedience: Hereupon all the Citizens and Inhabitants, being generally concerned, were inflamed and inraged; for as Fernandez ſaith, there was not a man amongſt them unconcerned; ſo that people began to talk loudly and ſcandalouſly againſt thoſe new Laws, ſaying, that this courſe was the effect of the pernicious Counſels of evil men, and of ſuch as being envious of the riches and power which thoſe Conquerours had acquired, had for their own ends put his Majeſty upon indirect means, and upon rigorours courſes very prejudicial to the publick welfare, and perſuaded him to ſee them executed by Officers inflexible and without reaſon: all which is fully reported by Gomara in the 155th Chapter of his Book, the Title of which is this,

The manner how Blaſco Nunnez treated with thoſe of Truxillo, and of the Reaſons and Objections which the People gave againſt the new Rules and Statutes.

" At length Blaſco Nunnez entred into Truxillo to the great diſcontent and general
" ſorrow of the Spaniards; for he immediately made Proclamation to impoſe a new
" ſort of Tribute, and to affrighten men from bringing the Indians under vaſſalage;
" forbidding all people from oppreſſing, or cauſing them to labour without pay or
" againſt their inclinations: in fine, the Indians were all brought under vaſſalage " to the King and no other. And though the people and ſeveral Corporations " petitioned againſt the moſt oppreſſive Articles of the new Rules, being willing " to admit of the Tributes and Taxes which were impoſed upon them, and to " free the Indians from their ſervices; yet the Vice-king would hearken to no
" terms of compoſition or moderation, but poſitively perſiſted in the execution " of the expreſs commands of the Emperour, without any Appeal: All that they " could get of him was this, that he would write and inform his Majeſty how ill
" he had been adviſed in the conſtitution and eſtabliſhment of thoſe new Laws.
" Notwithſtanding which fair words, the Inhabitants, who obſerved his inflexible
" diſpoſition, began to mutiny; ſome ſaid that they would abandon their Wives;
" others declared that thoſe Women or Wenches which, by command of the " Government, they had married and taken for Wives, they would renounce and " cut them off from alimony and maintenance; others ſaid it were better to have " no Wives or Children to maintain than to want the ſubſiſtence and benefit of " Slaves who might labour in the Mines for them, and in the works of Husbandry
" and other ſervile Offices, for their ſupport and eaſineſs of living; others requi" red money, and the price of their Slaves, for which having paid the fifths unto " the King, their brand and mark had been ſet upon them; others murmured and " complained that their Services were ill rewarded, and their time ill employed, " to have ſpent their youth and flower of their years in hardſhips and difficulties, " and at laſt to be deprived of their Servants and convenient attendances in their " old age; ſome ſhewed how their Teeth were fallen out with eating roaſted
" Mayz during the time of War in Peru, and others opened and diſplayed their " wounds and fractures of their Bones, and the bites of Serpents and venemous " Creatures received in the enterpriſes they undertook to gain that Empire; in " which alſo they had ſpent their Eſtates and ſhed their Bloud, and all to increaſe
" the Dominions of the Emperour, in reward for which he was pleaſed to de-

" prve

" prive them of thoſe few Vaſſals they had purchaſed to themſelves: and the " Souldiers huſt and muttered, that they would not concern themſelves farther in " new adventures, ſince they had no encouragement: but were reſolved to live " upon ſpoil and plunder on all hands.

" The King's Officers and Miniſters complained, that they were hardly dealt " with, to be deprived of the vaſſalage of the Indians whom they had ſo kind- " ly treated and uſed in their Services: and the Friers and Clergy declared, that " they ſhould be unable to ſupport and ſuſtain their Monaſteries, and Churches, " and Hoſpitals, without the neceſſary ſervices of the Indians. But none ſpoke " more daringly and freely, both againſt the Vice-king and the King himſelf, " then did Frier Peter Munnoz, of the Order of Merced, ſaying plainly, that his Ma- " jeſty had ill rewarded thoſe who had ſerved him well; and that thoſe new " Laws ſmelt rank of intereſt and ſelfiſhneſs rather than of equity; for it was an " intolerable injuſtice in the King, to take away thoſe Slaves whom he had ſold, " and yet not return the money for them, and the price he had received; and " that Monaſteries, Hoſpitals and Churches, and the very Conquerours them- " ſelves ſhould be diveſted of their ſervants and ſlaves, to make them vaſſals to " the King: And, what was moſt unreaſonable, in the mean time a double du- " ty and tribute was impoſed upon the Indians; which was intended for their eaſe " and relief, though in reality it proved their greateſt aggrievance and oppreſſi- " on. Thus far are the words of Gomara.

CHAP. III.

Of the Diſcourſe and Reports the People of Peru raiſed againſt the Promoters of the new Laws; and particularly againſt the Civil-Lawyer Bartholomew de las Catas.

SUch Liberty the People generally took in their Diſcourſes againſt all thoſe who had been Contrivers and Promoters of theſe new Laws, that they reported a thouſand evil things of them; and particularly of Frier Bartholomew de las Caſas, who being notoriouſly known to have had a chief hand in theſe new Regulations, fell under the ſevere laſh of their Tongues; for as Diego Fernandez, one of the firſt Adventurers and Conquerours of Peru, reports, they ript up a thouſand Miſdemeanours of which he was guilty before he entred into the profeſſion of a religious Life; and particularly how he had endeavoured to make himſelf the Conquerour and Governour of the Iſland in Cumana; and that he had been the cauſe of the deſtruction and ſlaughter of many Spaniards; by the falſe reports he had given to the Emperour of the State of Affairs in Peru; making great and large Promiſes of advancing the King's revenue, and of ſending vaſt quantities of Gold and Pearl to the Flemins and Burgundians, who reſided in the Court of Spain. Many of thoſe Spaniards who had been employed in the Conqueſt of the Iſles of Barlovento, were well acquainted with Bartholomew de las Caſas before he profeſſed himſelf a Frier, and were well informed of the effect and ſucceſs of the Promiſes he made touching the Converſion of the Indians in the Iſle of Cumana; of all which Lopez de Gomara, in the 77th Chapter of his Hiſtory writes ſo particularly that it is probable he might have received a Relation thereof from ſome of the Conquerours of that Countrey; in confirmation whereof, and for the better authority of this his Hiſtory; I will here inſert the very Chapter it ſelf, the Title whereof is as followeth.

Chapter the 77th, wherein is contained a relation of the Death of thoſe Chriſtian Spaniards who followed Bartholomew de las Caſas a Prieſt.

Bartholomew de las Caſas, a Prieſt was in that time at St. Domingo, when the Monaſteries of Cumana and Chirivichi were in their flouriſhing ſtate and condition; and having heard a good report of the fruitfulneſs of that ſoil, of the gentle and pacifick humour of the Natives, and of the great abundance of Pearl which that Countrey Countrey afforded; he ſailed into Spain; and demanded of the Emperour the Government of Cumana, promiſing to improve and increaſe the Royal Revenue, which was much abated by the frauds and abuſes of thoſe Officers who had it in managemet. But John Rodriguez de Fonſeca and Dr. Lewis Capatoa, and Secretary Lopez de Conchillos contradicted him in his report and repreſented him as a perſon uncapable of ſuch office and emploiment, in regard he was not onely a Prieſt, but a perſon of ill fame and reputation, and ignorant of the Countrey, and of the ſtate of thoſe affairs which he pretended to declare. Howſoever, upon the pretence of being a good Chriſtian, and of a new method he propoſed by a more ready way to convert the Indians, and upon promiſes of advancing the King's revenue, and ſending them ſtore of Pearls, he obtained the favour of Monſieur Laxao, Lord Chamberlain to the Emperour, and of ſeveral Flemins and Burgundians who were men of power and authority in that Court. At that time great quantities of Pearls were imported into Spain, ſo that the Wife of Xeures begged 170 * Marks of them which came on account of the King's fifths, and many Flemins and others begged great quantities from the King. He deſired to have Workmen and Artificers to be ſent with him, rather than Souldiers who were fit for nothing but to plunder and pillage, and to be mutinous and diſobedient to Commands: He deſired alſo to be accompanied with a new order of Knights, who ſhould wear a golden Spur and carry a red Croſs of different ſhape and faſhion to the order of Calatrava; which diſtinction, as it ennobled them, ſo alſo it was a teſtimony, that they went voluntarily, and of their own accord. Moreover, Orders were ſent to Seville to provide him with Ships and Seamen at the charge of the King: and with this equipage he arrived at Cumana in the year 1520, with about 300 Artificers, all wearing Croſſes; at which time Gonçalo de Ocampo reſided at New Toledo; who was much troubled to ſee ſo many Spaniards under the command of a perſon of that ill character, and tranſported thither by order of the Admiralty and Council, becauſe the Countrey was of a different nature to what it was reported to be in the Court. Howſoever, Bartholomew preſented and ſhewed his Commiſſion, requiring that, according thereunto, they ſhould quit the Countrey, and leave it free for him to plant his People, and to govern the place: Whereunto Gonçalo de Ocampo made anſwer, that with all ready obedience he did ſubmit thereunto; but howſoever he could not put thoſe matters into execution without firſt receiving directions from the Governours and the Judges of St. Domingo, by whoſe Commiſſion he was placed in that ſtation. And in the mean time he paſſed many a jeſt upon the Prieſt on certain occaſions which had formerly happened, for he was well acquainted with him, and knew his humour and his converſation: ſometimes he jeered his new Knights and their Croſſes, all which the Prieſt would put off with a Jeſt, though he was inwardly troubled to be taxed with ſo many Truths which he could not deny: And in regard they would not give him admittance into the Town of Toledo, he built himſelf a Houſe of Wood and Morter, near to the Monaſtery of St. Francis, which ſerved him for a Magazine wherein to lodge his proviſions, ſtores and inſtruments, during the time that he went to St. Domingo to make known his Complaints and ſeek a Redreſs. Gonçalo de Ocampo went alſo, I know not for what cauſe or reaſon, whether on this occaſion, or for ſome Law-ſuit he had with the People of that place; but certain it is, that all the Inhabitants followed him; ſo that the Town was abandoned by all excepting the Artiſans and Mechanicks which he brought with him: The Indians, who were glad to make their advantages of theſe differences and quarrels amongſt the Spaniards, took this opportunity to demoliſh their Houſes, and to kill all the golden Knights and others which remained there, excepting ſome few who made their eſcape in a ſmall veſſel, ſo that there remained not one Spaniard alive in all the Coaſt where the Pearl is taken.

65 Ryalls plate to every Marco.

So ſoon as Bartholomew de las Caſas was informed of the death of his friends and the loſs of the King's Treaſury, he entred himſelf a Frier amongſt the Dominicans; with which an end was put to all his great Actions; ſo he neither advanced the King's revenue, nor ennobled his Artiſans, nor ſent his Pearls to the Flemins and Burgundians, as he had promiſed: And thus far are the words of Gomara.

This and much more, to the prejudice and diſparagement of Bartholomew de las Caſas, was reported by thoſe who found themſelves aggrieved by the late new regulations: though Gomara endeavours to mince and diſguiſe much the matter: but but thoſe of Peru, who ſpeak more plainly of this matter, report, that he had turned Frier in diſcontent, becauſe he was fallen under his Majeſties diſpleaſure, and feared leſt he ſhould be called to account for the falſe relations he had given of matters which he had never ſeen nor underſtood of the Countrey of Cumana; and becauſe he was conſcious to himſelf that he had been a principal Contriver of the new Statutes, upon the ſpecious pretence of raiſing the King's revenue, and out of a zeal he ſhewed to the good and benefit of the Indians: but how real and ſincere all this was, may very well be judged by his actions, of which people ſpake and talked more at large than can be expreſſed in this Hiſtory. Diego Fernandes reports, that this Frier Bartholomew was by the Emperour created Biſhop of Chiapa, which is a Countrey in the Kingdom of Mexico, but he durſt not go to his See, by reaſon of the many miſchiefs which he had been the Authour of in the Indies. In the year 1562. I met him at Madrid, where he gave me his hand to kiſs; but when he underſtood that I was of Peru, and not of Mexico, he was a little more reſerved in his behaviour towards me.

CHAP. IV.

The Reaſons which the Complainants gave againſt the new Regulations. And the manner how they prepared to receive the Vice-king.

MUCH and many were the Reaſons which the Complainants produced againſt the new Regulations, as well thoſe of the City of Los Reyes as of all Peru. And the better to clear this point, we muſt obſerve, that both at Mexico and in Peru the Spaniards had then a Cuſtome amongſt them which continued untill 1560, (which was the year that I came from thence) to make choice of four Gentlemen of principal quality, in whom they could repoſe moſt confidence and truſt, to be Officers of the Royal revenue, to collect the fifths of the King's gold and ſilver, in what part ſoever it did ariſe; and this was the firſt Tribute which the Catholick Kings impoſed upon the new World. Theſe Officers of the revenue were Treaſurers, Accountants, Factours and Comptrollers: and to them was committed the care (beſides the fifths) to collect ſuch Tribute from the Indians as became due by the death of the Inhabitants, who all held their Eſtates of the King.

Beſides which Offices, the Spaniards every year, in all parts where they inhabited, made choice of two chief Conſtables in ordinary, one Judge and a deputy Judge, with 6, 8, or 10 Juſtices of the peace, more or leſs, according to the extent of the Countrey; and to them ſeveral other Officers were adjoined, to conſerve the ſafety and welfare of the Commonwealth.

Theſe Officers, as alſo all Governours, Preſidents, Judges and other Miniſters of Juſtice and their Deputies were concerned in the third ordinance: by virtue of which both they, and ſuch as had been employed in Offices, were commanded to quit all claim, intereſt and power in and over the Indians.

In oppoſition whereunto the Complainants made this Reply. We, ſaid they, at the hazard and expence of our Lives and Bloud, have gained this large Empire, which contains many Kingdoms and Dominions, the which we annexed to the Crown of Caſtile. In reward of theſe our ſervices and adventures the Indians, which we now poſſeſs and retain in our ſervices, were given and granted to us for two Lives: the which dominion and juriſdiction ought to be as firm and valid as the Seigniories or Lordſhips are in Spain. Now the reaſon why this privilege is taken from us is no other than becauſe we are choſen to be Commiſſioners of his Majeſties Royal revenue, and employed in the Offices of Juſtices of the peace and Judges.

If we have adminiſtred theſe Offices faithfully and without the prejudice or aggrievance of any perſon; what reaſon is there that we ſhould be deprived of our Indians, onely becauſe we are in the ſervice of his Majeſty, and bear our part in the

in the Government of the people. It had been better for us to have been Thieves, Adulterers, Homicides and Robbers rather than honeſt men, ſince that the Law is in force againſt the latter and not againſt the former.

With like liberty and freedom of ſpeech, did thoſe who were comprehended under the fourth Law vent their anger; namely, thoſe who had taken party with the two Factions of the Piçarriſts and Almagrians; by virtue of which (as Diego Fernandez obſerves) no perſon in all Peru could be maſter of Indians or Eſtates. What fault, ſaid they, had we who obeyed the Governours and Magiſtrates which his Majeſty had ſent us, as both thoſe were, and who acted by Commiſſion from his Majeſty: And if there aroſe private quarrels and animoſities amongſt themſelves, by the inſtigation of the Devil, to which men diverſly adhered; yet neither of theſe Parties acted againſt the Crown. And if one Party was in the wrong, and was guilty of Delinquency, yet the other acted for the King's ſervice; and why then ſhould they be equally puniſhed by confiſcation of their Goods and Eſtates with thoſe who have offended; which ſeems to be ſuch a piece of Injuſtice as is not to be parallel'd by the tyranny of Nero, and ſeems rather to proceed from an arbitrary Conſtitution, to ſatisfie the luſt and intereſt of certain perſons, than from a deſire tending to the welfare and good of the Subject.

To all which they added a thouſand curſes upon thoſe who had contrived theſe new Laws, or counſelled his Majeſty to paſs and ſign them, and to order the execution of them with ſuch ſeverity, on pretence that it was for his ſervice, and advancement of his Royal Crown.

If they (ſaid they) had been at the Conqueſt of Peru, and ſuſtained thoſe labours and hazards which we have done, they would have been of another mind than to make ſuch Laws; nay rather, they would have been the firſt to oppoſe them. In confirmation whereof, they quoted ſeveral paſſages in Hiſtory both ancient and modern, which might be compared to the civil Wars between the Almagrians and the Piçarriſts; and particularly ſaid they in the Wars of Spain, between thoſe two Kings, Don Pedro the Cruel, and his Brother Don Henrique, to whoſe parties all the Noblemen and perſons of Eſtates in Spain adhered on one ſide or the other, and actually ſerved untill the death of one of them determined the quarrel; if a ſucceeding King, after the Wars were ended, ſhould have deprived all thoſe who were engaged in this quarrel both of one ſide and the other, what troubles would it have created, and how would it have moved the ſpirits of all the powerfull men in Spain? The like which happened between the Houſe of Caſtile and that of Portugal might be brought into example; as namely the Party which held for Beltraneja, who was twice ſworn Princeſs of Caſtile, and in favour of her many of the chief Lords of that Countrey appeared; whom when Queen Iſabella called Rebels and Traitours, the Duke of Alva replied, pray God, Madam, that we may overcome them, for if we do not, I am ſure they will call us Traitours and prove us ſo too. To apply theſe particulars in Hiſtory to the preſent caſe; what will become of us, ſaid they, if the Succeſſour to this King ſhould ſeiſe on the Eſtates of thoſe who were concerned in this War. Beſides all which, they uttered many ſcandalous and ſeditious words, which we purpoſely omit not to offend the ears of the hearers; howſoever the contrary Party was highly incenſed thereat, and both ſides put into a fermentation, whence all thoſe miſchiefs were derived which afterwards happened.

But to return to the Vice-king, who was now on his Journey to Los Reyes; ſo ſoon as the Meſſengers from Vaca de Caſtro came to him, he received them to outward appearance kindly and with much reſpect, and gave them a ſpeedy diſpatch that they might return freely again to Los Reyes; where being returned, they rendred a ſad relation of the rigour and ſeverity wherewith the new Laws were put in execution, and of the rude and moroſe humour of the Vice-king, who admitted of no Pleas, or Petitions, or Appeals to the contrary; which ſerved to add new fuel, and blow all into a flame both in Los Reyes, Cozco, and in all that Kingdom.

So that now they began generally to diſcourſe, that they would neither receive this Vice-king, nor obey the new Laws which he was putting into practice; for that they were well aſſured, that the very day that he entred Vice-king into Los Reyes, and his Laws were publiſhed, they ſhould be no longer Maſters of their Indians nor of their Eſtates; and that beſides the point of taking their Indians from them, his Laws and new regulations included ſo many ſevere things, that all their Eſtates were confiſcated and their Lives endangered: for by the ſame rule that they took away their Indians from them, becauſe they had been engaged on one ſide or the other, with the Almagrians or the Piçarriſts, they might alſo take off their heads; which was a caſe intolerable and not to be endured, though they were reduced to the condition and lived under the notion of Slaves.

To ſuch a pitch of mutinous humour the whole City of Los Reyes was incenſed, that they had almoſt taken a reſolution not to receive the Vice-king; which they had certainly purſued, had not the Receiver General, named Suarez de Carvajal, and Diego de Aguero, who were principal men of that Corporation, and greatly eſteemed for their prudence and moderation, prevailed upon the people, and diſſuaded them from that raſh deſign: ſo that at length it was reſolved to receive him in ſtate, and with much ſolemnity, in hopes that by their ſervices and humility, they might incline his mind to ſome ſort of flexibility and good nature; at leaſt that he might lend a gentle ear to the Pleas which they made for themſelves, and in favour of thoſe Laws which the Catholick Kings, and the Emperour himſelf had made in favour of the Conquerours and of thoſe who had gained and ſubdued this new World, with particular reſpect to the people of Peru, who having acquired this rich Empire, ought more eſpecially to be cheriſhed and favoured, as perſons of higheſt merit and deſert.

It being thus determined to receive the Vice-king, all the people decked themſelves with their beſt ornaments and array, preparing themſelves againſt the day of his entry into this City; when in the mean time Ylen Suarez de Carvajal, and Captain Diego de Aguero were ſcandalouſly treated by the people, who always mutinied againſt them, whenſoever as any thing went croſs, or contrary to their humour; ſaying, that for their own intereſt they had ſolicited and perſuaded them to receive the Vice-king; namely one of them being Receiver General of the King's Treaſury, and the other having been in the late Wars; and both of them being Juſtices little eſteemed the loſs of their Indians, more in regard to their own intereſt than to the ſervice of the Emperour.

In the mean time the Vice-king purſuing his Journey, put the new Laws in execution in all places whereſoever he arrived, with his uſual ſeverity and rigour without admitting any plea to the contrary; giving them to underſtand, that he ſtood in fear of none, but as a good Miniſter and Servant to his Maſter, he was to obey his commands without reſpect or regard unto any.

At length he came to the Valley called Huaura, where at the Inn he neither found Indian nor Proviſions, nor any accommodation whatſoever; the which though in reality was cauſed by the default and omiſſion of the Inhabitants of Los Reyes, whoſe duty it was to take care of the Proviſions in the way for the Vice-king; yet he otherwiſe took it, and attributed the want thereof to Antonio de Solar, who was a Native of Medina del Campo, and a Citizen, becauſe he was the chief Proprietor of that Valley; for which reaſon he was highly incenſed againſt him, and more vehemently, when upon a white Wall of that Inn, which, as the ſaying goes, is the paper of bold and angry men, he ſaw this Motto written, He that will drive me from my Houſe and Lands, I will drive him out of this world if I can. The which Sentence being ſuppoſed to be written by Antonio Solar, or ſome other by his order, he conceived a mortal hatred againſt him, which though he concealed for a while, yet at length it burſt out, as hereafter will be declared.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

In what manner they received the Vice-king, the impriſonment of Vaca de Caſtro, and of the great trouble which it cauſed both to the Vice-king and the People.

THUS were the people diſcontented, ſad and enraged (though they endeavoured as much as was poſſible to conceal and diſſemble it) when the Vice-king arrived about three Leagues diſtant from Rimac, where he was met by ſeveral Gentlemen of Quality, and particularly by Vaca de Caſtro, and Don Geronimo de Loayſa, (Biſhop of that place, afterwards made Archbiſhop) who came thither to conduct him to the City. The Vice-king received them all with much kindneſs and humanity, eſpecially the Biſhop and Vaca de Caſtro, entertaining no other diſcourſe with them in the way as they travelled than what was of indifferent things, and of the pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs of that Valley.

When they came to the paſſage of the River, he was met by the Garcidiaz de Arias, who was elected Biſhop of Quitoo, who, with the Dean and Chapter of that Church and the reſt of the Clergy, remained there in expectation of his coming, and at their meeting there was much joy and chearfulneſs. And proceeding farther untill he came near to the City, he was met by the Jurats and Corporation of the City, accompanied with the Citizens and principal Gentry thereof; and, as all the three Authours do agree in their report, the Commiſſary of the King's Revenue, named Yllen Suarez de Carvajal, went forth in the head of them all; and being the chief of the Corporation, did in the name thereof offer an Oath to the Vice-king, whereby he was to ſwear that he would maintain the Privileges, Franchiſes and Immunities which the Conquerours and Inhabitants of Peru had received and did hold of his Majeſty; and that in the Courts of Juſtice he would receive their Petitions and give ear to the Reaſons they ſhould offer againſt the new Regulations.

The Vice-king would ſwear no otherwiſe than that he would perform all that which was conducing to the King's ſervice and to the benefit of the Countrey; at which many took exceptions, and ſaid that he ſwore with equivocations and what would admit of a double meaning. Thus far are the words of Diego Fernandez.

This Oath which the Vice-king took being onely in general terms, and which might admit of ſuch a ſenſe as he himſelf would be pleaſed to put upon it, was occaſion of much diſcontent both to the Clergy and Laity; ſo that all their mirth was daſhed, and every one turned ſad and melancholy; ſaying, that nothing could be expected of good from ſuch an Oath, which rather adminiſtred juſt cauſe to fear and ſuſpect that in a ſhort time they ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of their Indians and Eſtates, which was a hard caſe for men of their age, who were grown old and infirm by the labours and hardſhips they had ſuſtained in their youth to gain and conquer that Empire. Notwithſtanding all which they conducted the Vice-king with great triumph into the City, under a Canopy of Cloth of Gold, ſupported by the chief Magiſtrates of the Town, in their Gowns of crimſon Sattin lined with white Damask; the Bells of the Cathedral Church and of the Convents rang out, and all ſorts of muſical Inſtruments reſounded through the Streets, which were adorned with green Boughs, and triumphal Arches erected in various works and forms made of Ruſhes, in which, as we have ſaid, the Indians were very curious. But yet ſo much ſadneſs appeared in their countenances, that all the ſolemnity ſeemed rather a performance of ſome Funeral Rites than triumph for receiving a Vice-king; all their joy being forced and ſtrained to cover an inward grief which lay heavy upon their ſpirits.

In this manner they went in Proceſſion to the great Church, where having adored the moſt holy Sacrament, they conducted the Vice-king to the Houſe of Don Franciſco Piçarro, where he and all his Family was lodged.

Some few days after which, the Vice-king having notice of the great noiſe and ſtirs which were making in the Streets, by thoſe who were upon their return to Cozco with Vaca de Caſtro, he preſently ſuſpected, as Carate in the fifteenth Chapter of his third Book reports, and with whom other Authours agree; that Vaca de Caſtro had been the cauſe of all that noiſe and diſturbance; for which reaſon he ordered him to be ſeiſed and committed to priſon, and all his Eſtate to be ſequeſtred.

The people of the City, though they had no very great kindneſs for Vaca de Caſtro, yet they petitioned the Vice-king in his behalf, deſiring him, that ſince Vaca de Caſtro was one of his Majeſty's Council, and had been their Governour, that he would not be ſo ſevere upon him as to commit him to the common Priſon, ſince that a perſon of his Quality, though condemned the next day to looſe his head, might be ſecured in ſome decent and convenient Priſon; whereupon he was ſent to the Town-houſe, under bail of an hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, in which Sum the Citizens of Lima had engaged for him. With ſuch rigorous courſes as theſe the people being much diſguſted, many of them forſook the City, privately departing by few in a company taking their way towards Cozco, where the Vice-king had not as yet been received. Thus far are the words of Carate; the which is confirmed by Diego Fernandez almoſt in the ſame words, to which he adds, that Vaca de Caſtro remained a Priſoner in the common Gaol; his words are theſe which follow,

Such as remained behind in the City often met in ſeveral Caballs and Counſels, lamenting together the miſery that was come upon the Land and the Inhabitants of it, bidding adieu to all the Riches, Liberty and Juriſdiction which they as Conquerours and Lords of Indians had gained and acquired, which would be a means to unpeople the Countrey, and to cauſe an abatement of the King's Cuſtoms and other parts of his Revenue; and therefore they poſitively averred, that it was impoſſible that the King's Commands could be executed herein, or that ever there ſhould be any new diſcoveries made, or Trade and Commerce maintained for the future; beſides a thouſand other inconveniences and damages which they alledged. And with this fear and diſtraction of mind was every man poſſeſſed, when ſome of the moſt principal perſons, pretending to make a viſit to the Vice-king, in hopes that he, having proved and had ſome experience of the Conſtitution of the Countrey, might be induced to alter his humour, or at leaſt render it more flexible and eaſie; but ſo ſoon as any perſon touched on that ſtring, though with the greateſt gentleneſs and ſubmiſſion imaginable, he immediately put himſelf into a paſſion, and by his authority forbade all farther diſcourſe upon that point, obviating all objections with the name of the King's pleaſure and command; which abrupt manner of treaty gave great diſcontent, and excited in the minds of men rancour and malice againſt his perſon.

Some few days after the Vice-kings reception, three of the Juſtices which remained behind with Doctour Carate, who lay ſick at Truxillo, came then to Town; upon whoſe arrival he immediately cauſed a Court to be called, and appointed a place of Judicature to be erected in the Houſe where he himſelf was lodged, being the moſt convenient for his own accommodation, as alſo becauſe it was the moſt ſumptuous Chamber in all the City. He alſo ordered a ſtately reception to be made purpoſely for his Commiſſion under the Great and Royal Seal, which was put into a Caſe covered with Cloth of Gold, and carried on a Horſe decked with a Foot-cloth and Trappings of Tiſſue, the which was at each end held up by Judges of the City, clothed in Gowns of crimſon Sattin, and one of them led the Horſe by the Bridle; the which was performed with the ſame ſolemnity as they uſed in Caſtile to receive the perſon of the King.

So ſoon as the Court was ſate, they began to treat and enter upon buſineſs as well relating to Juſtice as Government, and herein he thought to render himſelf the more popular by favouring the cauſe of the poor, who generally are more pleaſed with revolutions and changes, than the rich. And now the Devil, who deſigned the downfall and ruine of this pernicious and evil Vice-king, began to diſturb and diſquiet all the Countrey, which was ſo lately ſettled after the troubles of an inteſtine War; the firſt commotion took its riſe from an ill underſtanding between the Vice-king and the Judges, and indeed of all the Kingdom; for that the Vice-king reſolving to carry on his work, in putting the new Laws in execuexecution, he little regarded the Petitions and Addreſſes which were preſented to him from the City of Los Reyes, of Lima and other ſmaller Corporations.

Thus far are the words of Fernandez Palentino, in the 10th Chapter of his Book. And this Authour, farther diſcourſing of the humour of this Vice-king, and the ſhame the Devil owed him for being the cauſe of all thoſe Commotions which were raiſed in the Countrey, and alſo that he was the occaſion of that diſcord which ruines Kingdoms and deſtroyes Empires, and which particularly proceeded not onely to a quarrel between the Vice-king and the Conquerours of that Kingdom, but alſo to ſuch a mortal feud between him and the Judges, as was not to be reconciled: And indeed herein the Judges had much advantage, for that they were men of great temper, diſcreet and unbiaſſed; who foreſeeing the many inconveniencies which the rumour onely, much more the execution of the new regulations would occaſion, diſſuaded thoſe raſh proceedings, wherein they were the more poſitive, in conſideration that this Kingdom, which was ſcarcely appeaſed and ſettled ſince the late Wars, and was ſtill in agitation and commotion, would never be able to ſupport ſuch extravagant oppreſſions which would certainly be the cauſe of the total ruine and deſtruction of that Empire.

Theſe plain repreſentations made to the Vice-king, with intention and deſign onely (if it had been poſſible) to attemper his angry and froward diſpoſition, ſerved to little purpoſe and effect; for that his humour being wholly bent on his own obſtinate reſolutions, he termed all thoſe who concurred not with him in the ſame opinion, rebellious to the King and enemies to himſelf. And farther, to widden theſe breaches, he ordered the Judges to remove from his neighbourhood in the palace, and to take other lodgings in other quarters for themſelves. All which, and much more, ſo inflamed the minds of both parties, that ſharp words and reparties frequently intervened between them: Howſoever, in regard the Judges for better adminiſtration of affairs, were obliged to keep fair with the Vice-king, they ſo concealed and diſſembled their reſentments, that their paſſions were not publickly made known. But becauſe the reſolution of the Vice-king to put in execution the new Laws, became daily more and more apparent and manifeſt; the Diſcontents and Quarrels aroſe daily to a higher degree, and thoſe who were injured and prejudiced thereby became uneaſie and impatient: And as Diego Fernandez, in his 10th Chapter, ſaith, that the Judges conſidering the obſtinate and inflexible humour of the Vice-king on one ſide to execute the new Regulations of the Emperour, to whom by reaſon of the diſtance of the place, no opportune or ſeaſonable applications could be made for a moderation or redreſs; and that on the other ſide, in caſe they ſhould condeſcend to be deprived of their Indians, it would be very difficult to recover that vaſſalage again: they were by theſe difficulties reduced to ſuch a kind of Dilemma, that they were all diſtracted, and knew not which way to turn or reſolve. Nor was the people onely confuſed and unquieted by theſe thoughts; but even the Vice-king found himſelf reduced to an inquietude and diſtraction of mind when he found the people mutinous, and turmoiled with a thouſand fancies, and reſolved to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes rather than to ſubmit tamely to their own deſtruction. As hereafter we ſhall find by the ſucceſs. And thus far are the words of Palentino, which we have extracted verbatim from his own Writings.

CHAP. VI.

The ſecret quarrel concealed between the Vice-king and the Judges breaks out in publick. Prince Manco Inca and the Spaniards who were with him write to the Vice-king.

NOR did the quarrel between the Vice-king and the Judges contain it ſelf within the limits of private reſentments, but burſt forth into the publick Streets and places of common Meetings: the which calling into the mind of the Vice-king that Motto or Sentence which he had read in the Inn of Huaura, belonging to Antonio Solar; and which he believed was either wrote by himſelf, or by his order; for which cauſe, as both Carate and Diego Fernandez report, ſending for him and diſcourſing with him in private, and having given him ſome very ſevere terms and reprehenſions, he gave order to have the gates of the palace ſhut, and calling his Chaplain to confeſs him, with intent to have him hanged on one of the Pilaſters of the Court-yard, which leads towards the High-ſtreet. But Antonio Solar refuſing to confeſs, his execution was ſuſpended till ſuch time as that his danger and caſe was divulged through the whole City, upon the rumour of which the Arch-biſhop and all the perſons of quality came to intercede for a pardon or ſuſpenſion of Juſtice; and after great interceſſions, all that they could prevail was for one day's reprieve, upon which he was committed to cloſe impriſonment. But the fury and impetuoſity of this choler paſſing over, he conſidered, that it was not convenient to put him to death, but rather to detein him in priſon, and accordingly he kept him under reſtraint without proceſs of Law, Endictment or any Accuſation whatſoever, for the ſpace of two months, untill ſuch time as the Judges going on a Saturday to viſit the priſons, were deſired by ſome of the friends of Antonio Solar to make their enquiry concerning the ſtate of his affair, with which though they were well enough acquainted before, yet, for form ſake, they asked him the cauſe and crime for which he ſtood committed; to which he replied, that he knew not any; and then calling for the books of the priſon to ſee what actions or proceſs had been made againſt him; and finding none, and that the Keeper of the priſon could aſſign no cauſe againſt him; the Judges, on the Monday following made a Report to the Vice-king, that having viſited the priſon, they found that Antonio Solar had been there committed; and upon examination of the books, no crime or cauſe was entered againſt him; onely that he was there impriſoned by his order: Wherefore, in caſe no crime were laid to his charge, his impriſonment was not juſtifyable; and therefore according to the rules of Juſtice they could not doe leſs, than to ſet him at Liberty.

Hereunto the Vice-king replyed, that he was committed by his order, and that he intended to have hanged him as well for that Motto or Sentence which was wrote on the wall of his Inn, as alſo for ſeveral other ſcandalous reports he had vented againſt his perſon. And though he had no witneſs to produce in this matter, yet by the authority and privilege of a Vice-king he had power not onely to impriſon him, but alſo to put him to death, if he ſo pleaſed, without rendering an account to any perſon whatſoever: to which the Judges replyed, that there was no Government but what was agreeable to Juſtice, and founded on the Laws of the Kingdom; and on theſe terms they parted, ſo that the Judges on the Saturday following freed Antonio Solar from the priſon, and confined him onely to his own houſe, and ſpeedily afterwards they ſet him at liberty. This manner of proceeding angred the Vice-king to the very ſoul, and provoked him to contrive ſome way of revenge, which he ſuppoſed he had effected in this manner, which was this; It ſeems that theſe Judges with their Servants were lodged and dieted in the houſe of one of the richeſt Citizens in the whole town; and had been there lodged and boarded by order of the Vice-king for a ſhort time, untill they could otherwiſe provide for themſelves. And now the Vice-king, thinking to doe them a diſcourteſie, recalled the aforeſaid Order, forbidding the Citizens to entertain them longer upon pretence that it was not ſuitable to the King's honour nor to their own quality to lodge upon free-quarter, or to keep company with Citizens and

To Merchants.

To which the Judges gave for anſwer; That, as to their lodging, they could find no other convenient place, untill ſuch time as they could hire a houſe by leaſe for ſome term of years; that for the future they would pay for their diet. And for matter of their converſation with Merchants, it was not unlawfull or prohibited; but, on the contrary, it was practiſed in Caſtile by all thoſe who were of the King's Council, as being beneficial to them to underſtand by information from trading men all the tranſactions and buſineſſes of the World. In this manner both parties remained at variance each with other, which was apparent at all times whenſoever occaſion offered. In purſuance whereof one day Dr. Alvarez made Affidavit before a Maſter of Chancery, that he had paid a certain ſum in Gold to Diego Alvarez, who was brother-in-law to the Vice-king to have him nominated and preferred to an Office by the Vice-king; the which depoſition he highly reſented. Thus far are the words of Carate, and the ſame is again confirmed by Diego Fernandez, almoſt to the ſame purpoſe.

For in this manner, ſaith he, the Vice-king and the Judges ſeemed like two different factions and parties; to increaſe which, ſo ſoon as Antonio Solar was ſet at liberty, he went privately about raiſing mutinies and diſcontents in the minds of the people againſt the Vice-king; to increaſe and inflame which they reported abroad many bad things which the Vice-king had ſaid and done. And though all was ſo far from being true, that nothing of that nature did ſo much as enter into the thoughts or imagination of the Vice-king: yet by reaſon that Blaſco Nunnez was hated and deteſted by the people, all the evil that was ſaid of him found eaſie admittance, and he appeared as black as common fame could make him; for ſuch indignation the people conceived againſt him, that the name of Vice-king became as odious (though the firſt that ever governed Peru) as the name of King was to the Romans after they had expelled Tarquinius Superbus and his Family. Thus far are the words of Diego Fernandez Palentino.

Alſo Dr. Gonçalo de Ylleſcas, in his Pontifical Hiſtory of the Popes, having occaſion to treat of the affairs of Peru, gives this Character of the froward and uneaſie diſpoſition of Blaſco Nunnez Vela.

After theſe things, ſays he, Vaca de Caſtro, for the ſpace of a year and a half, quietly and peaceably governed all matters, untill ſuch time as he was ſuperſeded by Blaſco Nunnez Vela, a Gentleman of good quality, of Avola, who was ſent thither with Character of Vice-king; bringing with him many ſevere Rules and Laws which he put in execution; over and above which he put in practice others for which he had no Commiſſion; the which this Doctor Ylleſcas declares in a few words, and ſays more than all our Hiſtorians durſt to ſay or write upon this particular ſubject.

Whilſt theſe diſturbances happened in the City Los Reyes the like mutinies or greater aroſe in other Towns and Corporations of leſs conſideration. Howſoever, the like ſpirits of Ambition, Envy, Tyranny and Deſire of Government did not ſo far prevail as they did in that City of Los Reyes.

And now diſſention and quarrels over-ran all, and amidſt theſe Turmoils, the poor Prince Manco Inca had the misfortune to be killed, though he remained content and quiet in his retirement, and became a voluntary exile, whilſt other men ſtriving for his Empire committed many murthers and ſlaughters, as appeared in the late Wars, and we might apprehend others more bloudy yet to come, in caſe it were poſſible for any to be more bloudy and cruel than thoſe which were paſt.

And here it is to be noted; That Diego Mandez and Gomez Perez, with ſix other Spaniards whom we formerly nominated, and mentioned to have made their eſcape out of priſon, where they had been confined by the faction of the Piçarros, and by the Juſtice of Vaca de Caſtro; and having taken refuge with this Inca, they by his means came to know and receive all the Informations and Advices concerning the new Troubles and Diſſentions ariſing upon the execution of the new Laws: for whereas it was reported that the Vice-king came to turn all things upſide down, and to change and alter all the Conſtitutions of the Countrey; the Inca, who was encompaſſed within the craggy and lofty mountains, was informed by his Subjects of all theſe revolutions which he thought might be of benefit and concernment to him.

With this news Diego Mendez and his Companions were highly pleaſed, and perſuaded the Inca to write a Letter to the Vice-king, deſiring his Licence to be enlarged from his retirement, and appear in his presence, and serve his Majesty in any thing, as occasion should offer: the Inca was induced at the persuasion of the Spaniards to make this Petition, who told him, that it might be a means to open a way to his recovery of the whole Empire, or at least of the best part of it. The Spaniards also wrote as from themselves desiring a pardon for what was past, and a protection or safe conduct in the attendance of his Lordship, to perform their duty to him.

Gomez Perez was the person appointed and elected to be Ambassadour from the Inca, attended with 10 or 12 Indians, who by command of the Inca were ordered to doe him service; and being come to the Vice-king, he presented his Letters of Credence to him, giving him a large relation of the State and Condition of the Inca, and of his true and real designs to doe him service. The Vice-king joyfully received the news, and granted a full and ample pardon of all crimes, as desired. And as to the Inca he made many kind expressions of love and respect, truly considering that the Interest of the Inca might be advantageous to him both in War and Peace. And with this satisfactory Answer Gomez Perez returned both to the Inca and to his own Companions, they provided to be gone, and with all convenient speed to attend the service of the Vice-king; but Blasco Nunnez Vela was not so fortunate as to obtain and enjoy so great a good, for now ill success attended him in every thing, as will appear in the following Chapter.

CHAP. VII.

Of the unfortunate Death of Prince Manco Inca, and of the Mutinies which arose amongst the Spaniards by reason of the new Laws.

THE Inca, to humour the Spaniards and entertain himself with them, had given directions for making a bowling-green; where playing one day with Gomez Perez; he came to have some quarrel and difference with this Perez about the measure of a Cast, the which often happened out between them: for this Perez, being a person of a hot and fiery brain, without any judgment or understanding, would take the least occasion in the world to contend with and provoke the Inca; who notwithstanding being a very discreet person and of good temper, did moderate and disguise his passion, and would not refuse to play with him, as he did with other Spaniards, who were more obliging, and less offensive in their gaming: but Gomez Perez, being puffed up with the late favours he had received from the Vice-king, and with the hopes he had in a short time to disengage himself from that place, became more rude and insolent towards the Inca than he had formerly been; treating him with the same terms that he did those poor Indians who were his servants and slaves. At length Gomez Perez became so intolerably insolent, that, playing one day with the Inca, he so affronted him, that, being no longer able to endure his rudeness, he punched him on the breast, and bid him to consider with whom he talked. Perez, not considering in his heat and passion either his own or the safety of his Companions, lifted up his hand, and with the Bowl struck the Inca so violently on the head, that he knocked him down: The Indians hereupon, being enraged by the death of their Prince, joined together against Gomez and the Spaniards, who fled into a house, and with their Swords in their hands defended the door, the Indians set fire to the house, which being too hot for them, they sallied out into the Market-place, where the Indians assaulted them and shot them with their Arrows untill they had killed every man of them: and then afterwards, out of mere rage and fury they designed either to eat them raw, as their custome was, or to burn them and cast their ashes into the river, that no sign or appearance might remain of them; but at length, after some consultation, they agreed to cast their bodies into the open fields, to be devoured by Vulters and bird birds of the air, which they ſuppoſed to be the higheſt indignity and diſhonour that they could ſhow to their Corps.

This was the fate and unhappy deſtiny of the poor Prince Manco Inca, to periſh by the hands of one whom he had protected, and nouriſhed, and entertained with all the hoſpitality he could ſhow: thus we ſee, when a man's time is come, that neither his voluntary exile, nor the inacceſſible rocks to which he was fled for refuge, were able to defend him from the ſtroke of a raſh fool and mad-man, who was deſtitute of all ſenſe and reaſon. Franciſco Lopez, in the 156th Chapter of his Book touches upon this particular point, though he differs ſomething in the relation of the manner and circumſtances of his death: but I have informed my ſelf very perfectly from thoſe Incas, who were preſent and eye-witneſſes of the unparalled piece of madneſs of that raſh and hair-brained fool; and heard them tell this Story to my Mother and Parents with tears in their eyes, relating in what manner they came out of thoſe mountains in company with Inca Sayri Tucac, ſon of that unfortunate Prince, by order of the Vice-king Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça Marquis of Cannete; all which we ſhall (God willing) relate when we arrive at the due and proper place.

The Devil, who is the mortal enemy of mankind, being always vigilant and intent to take his advantages, did now make uſe of this opportunity to give a ſtop to the propagation of the Goſpel in that great and opulent Empire of Peru; and to promote and further his deſign herein, he diſpeeded his Emiſſaries into all parts, who inſinuated jealouſies, and fears, and diſcontents into the minds of the people; which ſo prevailed, that a ſtop was given to the preaching and ſpreading of the Goſpel: and all that peace, concord and good correſpondence which flouriſhed during all the Government of Vaca de Caſtro, was now totally ſubverted and brought to confuſion. But this Sedition, by the endeavours of evil ſpirits, was blown into a flame, and highly increaſed in the City of Cozco, where being above eighty families of principal Citizens, more concerned than any others in the vaſſalage of Indians; the new Ordinances became more grievous to them than to others, whoſe intereſt was not ſo great: howſoever the diſcontent was general over all Peru, for the Conquerours were ſenſible of their loſs, ſeeing themſelves deprived in one day of all their Indians, fortunes and eſtates.

Theſe Mutinies and Diſcontents of the People incenſed the hot and violent ſpirit of the Vice-king to a higher degree; ſo that he rejected all Petitions and Addreſſes from particular Cities, Boroughs and Corporations; for which reaſons, the four Cities, namely, Huamanca, Arequepa, Chaquiſaca and Cozco reſolved to join together in the Addreſs, wherein they thought they might be the more plain, in regard the Vice-king had not as yet been received in any of thoſe places: and to promote their deſires declared in that Addreſs, they made choice of a General Solicitour, who was not onely to repreſent the Caſe of the four Cities, but alſo thereby included the common concernment of the whole Empire, inaſmuch as Cozco was the head and capital City of Peru. The whole matter was negotiated by an intercourſe of Letters, and by common conſent Gonçalo Piçarro was the perſon fixed upon as the moſt proper perſon to act in this affair; both becauſe he was brother to Marquis Franciſco Piçarro, and a man of great intereſt, having been a chief Actour in the Conqueſt, and ſuſtained therein all the hazards and hardſhips we have before, though in brief and imperfectly, expreſſed: he was moreover as to his extraction noble, in his condition vertuous and generally beloved: beſides all which, had he not been elected and appointed thereunto, yet he had a right to this Office, in reſpect to the Title he had of being the Protectour and Defender of all the Indians and Spaniards in that Kingdom. Upon theſe Conſiderations general Letters were wrote from the Corporations of the four Cities to Gonçalo Piçarro, who was then at his Plantation in the Charcas, deſiring him to come up to Cozco, to conſider with them what courſe was to be taken in this Conjuncture for the good and ſafety of the common welfare; and to move him hereunto, they acquainted him that he was moſt concerned of any in this affair; for, beſides the loſs of his Indians, he was in danger of his Life; for that the Vice-king had often ſaid and declared, that he could produce a Command from his Majeſty to take off his head. Piçarro having received theſe advices, gathered what money he could make of his own Eſtate, and of what belonged to his Brother Hernando Piçarro, and with ten or twelve Friends in company travelled to Cozco, where, as Carate in the fourth Chapter of his fifth Book, the whole City went forth to meet and welcome him, being overjoyed at his coming; and every day people fled from Los Reyes to the City of Cozco, reporting ſad ſtories of the practices of the Vice-king, which ſerved to enflame and ſtir up the minds of the People and Citizens to Sedition. Many Meetings and Conſultations were now held by the Magiſtrates of the Town, where the Judges were aſſembled with the generality of the chief Citizens. And coming to treat upon the matter, how they were to treat and receive the Vice-king when he ſhould come thither, ſome were of opinion that they ſhould not refuſe to receive and entertain him; but as to the new Statutes and Laws, they ſhould not be admitted untill they had by their Meſſengers repreſented their Caſe unto his Majeſty, and received his farther pleaſure thereupon. Others were of a contrary ſenſe, and ſaid, that having once admitted of thoſe Laws, and ſuffered themſelves to be deprived of their Indians, they ſhould with much difficulty retrieve them again. In fine, It was agreed and reſolved, that Gonçalo Piçarro ſhould be the perſon elected for the City of Cozco, and that Diego Centeno, who was conſtituted Plenipotentiary for the City of Plate, ſhould delegate his power to Piçarro, whereby being authorized and endued with a general and common power from ſeveral Cities; he might with greater confidence and aſſurance appear at the City of Los Reyes in preſence of the Vice-king. But before the matter was concluded there aroſe many debates upon the point, whether Piçarro were to be attended with Souldiers and Guards for his perſon; and after ſome diſpute it was agreed, that he ought to be guarded and defended with Souldiers; for which many reaſons were produced; as firſt, that the Vice-king had already beat up his Drums in Los Reyes, and had declared, that he would march againſt thoſe who had ſeized the great Guns and carried them out of the Fort, and puniſh them as Rebels to the King: and moreover, conſidering the moroſe and angry temper of the Vice-king, who was inflexible in his humour and reſolved never to admit the Addreſſes of thoſe, who petitioned for a ſuſpenſion of the new Laws; which he put in execution without the concurrence and aſſent of the Officers of the King's Court, which was contrary to his Inſtructions from his Majeſty. And likewiſe conſidering what he had often declared, that he had his Majeſty's Command to cut off the head of Gonçalo Piçarro, as an Actour and evil Inſtrument in the late unhappy Wars, and a Conſpiratour in the Murther of Don Diego, and therefore they ought to appear open faced, and defend themſelves with Armes; but others, who were more moderate men, would not allow that a Guard ſhould be granted on the reaſons aforeſaid, but rather on pretence that there was need and occaſion thereof to defend the perſon of Piçarro on the way in his travails to Los Reyes, being to paſs a dangerous Countrey infeſted with Wars and Souldiers belonging to the Inca. But others who would ſpeak more plainly, and not mince the matter, declared openly that the Souldiers were deſigned to defend their Agent or Meſſenger from the implacable ſpirit of the Vice-king, who obſerving no Laws of juſtice or reaſon, there could be no ſecurity for any man to treat with him: And as to other proceedings by way of Witneſſes and Informations, little could be effected, having to deal with Proctours and Clerks of his own; who would confound all buſineſſes, and make them to turn according to his own will and pleaſure; ſo that being deprived of all ways of Law and Juſtice, there was no other means left, than to have recourſe unto Arms, and to repell force with force; and that a Judge who availed himſelf on violence and on law, was to be ſet at defiance and openly reſiſted. The matter being thus reſolved; Gonçalo Piçarro ſet up his Standard, to which the Citizens flocked in great numbers, offering both their perſons and eſtates and vowing to dye in maintenance of that quarrel.

Thus far are the words of Auguſtine Carate in the fourth Chapter of the fifth Book of his Hiſtory of Peru. That which now follows, are the words of Francis Lopez de Gomara in the 157th Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

The Diſſentions and Troubles are increaſed. The four Cities write to Gonçalo Piçarro, and elect him to be Procuratour or Agent General of all Peru. He raiſes men to march with him to the City of Los Reyes.

Gonçalo Piçarro living quietly and in retirement in the Charcas, was ſo ſolicited by the conſtant Letters which came to him from particular perſons, who had attained to conſiderable eſtates, that he was at length perſuaded after Vaca de Caſtro was gone to Los Reyes, to leave his dwelling, and repair to Cozco. Many of thoſe who feared a deprivation both of their eſtates and vaſſalage of their Indians flocked to him; which numbers were increaſed by many who affected novelty; howſoever liberty was pretended and protection from the violent deſigns of Blaſco Nunnez, who refuſed to incline to reaſon, to admit appeals, or to hearken unto any addreſſes; ſo that they were forced to have recourſe to Arms, and to make choice of Piçarro for their Chief, whom they would follow and defend: but Piçarro, who was deſirous to prove them and juſtifie himſelf, told them, that they would doe well to conſider firſt, what they did, for to oppoſe the Commands and Ordinances of Regal Power, though by way of Petition, was to contradict the Authority of the Emperour himſelf. That War was a matter of great moment, and not lightly to be undertaken; that the management was laborious and painfull, and the ſucceſs doubtfull; that he could not gratifie their deſires in things which were contrary and in oppoſition to the King's ſervice, or accept the charge of Procuratour or Captain for them: but they on the other ſide inſiſted on the juſtice of their cauſe, and the lawfulneſs of the enterprize; arguing that, if the deſign of conquering the Indians were juſtifiable, then likewiſe it was lawfull to bring them into vaſſalage; that it was not in the power of the Emperour to deprive them of the people and ſlaves which he once had given them, or recall his donation, having beſtowed them on ſeveral perſons in conſideration of marriage. That it was as lawfull for them to defend the vaſſals which they had gained, and privileges; as for the Gentlemen of Caſtile their liberties, which were granted to them by the Kings, for having been aiding to them in the Wars againſt the Moors, and on the ſame terms might they inſiſt who had wreſted thoſe dominions out of the hands of Idolaters. In fine, they concluded, that they were not reſolved to trouble themſelves about theſe Laws, or ſupplicate or intreat againſt them, for that they found no obligation in the leaſt to acknowledge or receive them; notwithſtanding all which, there were ſome who maintained the honour and the Loyalty which was owing to the King, and declared the folly of theſe men, who, upon pretence of maintaining their own rights and immunities, contradicted and oppoſed that Loyalty to which they were all engaged, and made themſelves Stateſ-men in matters of which they were all ignorant: but all this was to no purpoſe, to inculcate matters unto men who were deaf, and reſolved not to hear or underſtand: but this raſh language ſtopped not here, but proceeded to farther extravagances, and Souldiers began to ſpeak ill of the Government, and reflect upon the Emperour himſelf, imagining that ſuch threats would mollifie his diſpleaſure, and incline him to favour towards ſuch brutes as themſelves. To aggravate all which, they reported, that Blaſco Nunnez was an unexperienced perſon in affairs, obſtinate, an enemie to the rich men, an Almagrian, who had hanged a Prieſt in Tumbez, and hanged and quartered a ſervant of Gonçalo Piçarro, becauſe he was an enemie to Diego de Almagro, for having brought the command for putting Piçarro to death, and for the puniſhment of thoſe who had joyned with him in the battel of Salines. And to accompliſh all the evil ſayings which could be alledged againſt him, they reported, that he prohibited wine, and to eat ſpices and ſugar, and to wear ſilk cloaths, and to travail with Hamocks or Bedding.

And thus, with theſe reports, ſome true and ſome falſe, Piçarro made his ends and advantages, being willing and ready to take hold of any pretence to ground his Title of Captain General or Procuratour General, ſuppoſing that he might, according to our Proverb, be enabled hereby, To enter in at the ſleeve, and come out at the collar.

Thus was Piçarro choſen and elected Procuratour General of Cozco, which was the Metropolis of Peru; in like manner the Corporations of Guamanga, the Town of Plate, and other places concurred in the ſame choice, and the Souldiery gave him the Title of their Captain General, with full and ample Authority to be their Agent and Plenipotentiary, promiſing to ſtand to whatſoever he ſhould agree and conſent unto in their names: And on the other ſide he took the uſual Oath which is commonly adminiſtred on ſuch occaſions.

After this Piçarro ſet up his Standard, beat up his Drums, and ſeized all the Gold in the Exchequer belonging to the King: and there being a good Magazine of Arms at Chupas, he made uſe of them, and armed 400 men therewith both of Horſe and Foot. Thoſe perſons who were concerned in the Government, namely, Altamirano, Maldonado, Garçilaſſo de la Vega and others, conſidering farther of this matter, did upon ſecond thoughts begin to repent of the power they had paſſed over unto Gonçalo Piçarro; knowing how faſt he had them by the hand, when they onely had hold of him by the finger; howſoever they thought not fit to revoke their power, though privately, and in their hearts, they wiſhed that they could handſomely have retracted it.

Thus far are the words of Franciſco Lopez extracted verbatim from his own Writings. But, to explain the meaning of theſe Authours, who write ſomething confuſedly upon this point, and ſeem to deſcribe the minds of theſe people, as if they were overmuch prompted to rebellion, which afterwards too manifeſtly appeared by the ſucceſs. Howſoever we are to underſtand that when Gonçalo Piçarro was by conſent of the people elected and choſen Procuratour or Adjutant General, they entertained no imagination or thought of vindicating their rights and privileges with the Sword; but their meaning onely was in an humble and plain manner to make their Addreſs and lay their caſe before the Chief Governour, repreſenting, as Loyal Subjects, their great merit in the conqueſt of that Empire, and annexing of it to the Crown of Spain: ſuppoſing that in caſe the Vice-king would onely vouchſafe to hear them; their cauſe was ſo juſt as could not be rejected even at the Bar or Judicature of the moſt barbarous Nations of the World.

This was certainly the true meaning and original intentions of the four Cities at the beginning, when they diſpatched their Agents with full and ample power to ſignifie their concurrence in the election and choice of Gonçalo Piçarro to be their Repreſentative: but ſuch was the rude and turbulent ſpirit of the Vice-king, and the rumours and reports which every day filled the City of Cozco, concerning the extravagances which he acted; that Gonçala Piçarro thought it not fit to truſt the ſafety of his perſon to bare Papers or the dead letter of Laws, though never ſo much in his favour; but rather to provide in prudence to ſecure his perſon with Arms and a forcible defence, as we ſhall underſtand by the ſequel of this Story.

And indeed herein Gonçalo Piçarro wiſely conſidered, that he had to doe with a wild brute Beaſt, rigorous and poſitive to execute the new Laws; againſt whom there was no defence but power, for the Vice-king had often declared, that he brought with him a Command from the Emperour to take off his head; to ſecure which, he reſolved to goe attended with a company of about two hundred Souldiers appointed for a guard to his perſon; but that he would neither carry Enſigns or Colours, or name Captains, leſt it ſhould look too much like a martial force, or favour of a rebellion. And this doctrine was notified and interpreted by the Judges of every City, declaring that their intention was nothing, but to act by way of Petition for conſervation of their own rights, which being ſo reaſonable, they could not doubt but to obtain favour from their King and Prince therein; and upon this ground they adviſed Piçarro to diſpoſe himſelf to act in form and manner of one who was by way of Addreſs to repreſent the ſtate and condition of the peoples aggrievances; in regard they entertained no other thoughts and intentions than ſuch as became loyal and obedient Subjects. To which Piçarro made anſwer, that ſince they were well acquainted with the implacable ſpirit of the Vice-king, who had often boaſted that he brought a Commiſſion with him to take off his head; he could not but wonder, that they ſhould ſend him bound to the hands of the Executioner; and with the glorious title of their Repreſentative to

ſtand with his hands in his pockets untill the other ſhould cut his throat. And therefore rather than go in ſuch manner on this errant, he would chuſe to return unto his own houſe and retirement, and there expect his fate, than to anticipate his death by going to the place of execution.

The Citizens ſeeing the reſolution of Piçarro, and conſidering the reaſons which he alledged, could not but concurr with him in his opinion as reaſonable, and therefore permitted him to raiſe Men, under notion onely of his Guard and to defend him, as ſeveral Authours averr, in his paſſage through thoſe Mountains, wherein the Prince Manco Inca had fortified himſelf. And with this licenſe, and under this colour for raiſing Men, he increaſed his numbers to four hundred men, as Gomara ſaith, both Horſe and Foot; and as ſome ſay to many more: which when the City obſerved, they began to repent them of their Election and Deſign, which put on the face of a Rebellion rather than the humble guiſe of Petitioners; againſt which way of proceedings many made their proteſts, and particularly the three before named, as Gomara reports. Howſoever Gonçalo Piçarro purſuing his deſign, wrote very inſtant and urging Letters unto all parts, where Spaniards inhabited, and not onely to the three Cities before mentioned, but to the Plantations of Indians; addreſſing himſelf to them all particularly with ſuch endearing terms as might beſt affect them, offering to them his Life and Fortune to ſpend in their Service, either upon the preſent emergencies or upon any other occaſion which ſhould occurr for the future: by which his deſign was no longer under a dubious ſenſe or diſguiſe, but became clear and evident, as the three Hiſtorians write, for that he ſet up a claim and title to the ſole Government of Peru, by virtue of an ancient Patent from the Emperour to his Brother Franciſco Piçarro, conſtituting and appointing him chief Governour, and after him whom he ſhould nominate to ſucceed him during life; ſo that the Government was given for two Lives, as was alſo the diſtribution of Indians, and thoſe held by vaſſalage for two Lives, according to the original Grants given to the firſt Conquerours.

CHAP. IX.

Gonçalo Piçarro, having named and appointed his ſeveral Captains and Officers, departs from Cozco. The Vice-king in like manner aſſembles his People, and appoints Captains, and impriſons Vaca de Caſtro, and other principal men of note and quality.

WITH this ſpecious pretence Gonçalo Piçarro proceeded in raiſing Men, ſo that now it ſeemed rather an open War than an Addreſs by way of Petition for relief againſt Oppreſſions; and to make his deſigns yet more manifeſt, he ſent Franciſco de Almendras (who was my Godfather) into the great Road leading to the City of Los Reyes, with a party of twenty Men beſides Indians, carefully to intercept all perſons that paſſed, not permitting any to travel thither, either from Cozco or Rimac. All the Gold and Silver which was in the King's Treaſury he ſeiſed, as alſo the Eſtates of perſons deceaſed, and Monies depoſited; which he took up by way of loan, and to re-pay the ſame again with intereſt; all which he made uſe of for payment of his Souldiers, and carrying on his deſign. The Cannon which Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Companions tranſported from Huamanca to Cozco, and which were many and very good, he ſeiſed upon, and took with him for his Train of Artillery; for the ſupply of which he gave order to make great quantities of Gun-powder, for compounding which they wanted not Salt-peter in abundance; for in the parts near Cozco the beſt Salt-peter is digged in all that Kingdom. The Captains named for his Army were Alonſo de Toro Captain of Horſe, who had formerly been Major General to Don Pedro Porto Carrero, Pedro Cermenno was appointed Captain of the Harquebuſiers, John Velez de Guevara, and

and Diego Gumiel were made Captains of the Lances, and Hernando Bachicao was made Maſter of the Ordnance, of which there were twenty excellent Pieces. Moreover Carate, in the Fifth Chapter of his Eighth Book, tells us, that he provided both Ball and Powder, and all ſort of Ammunition neceſſary and required to his Cannon: And having thus prepared every thing in order to his evil intent, he then profeſſed openly, that he and his Brothers having diſcovered that great and vaſt Continent, and by their Adventures, Hazards and Atchievements reduced the ſame with the help and authority of his Majeſty's Commiſſion under his Royal Power, in return whereof he had remitted vaſt quantities both of Gold and Silver to his Majeſty's Exchequer, as might evidently appear upon the Liſt and Regiſter. And that whereas after the death of the Marquiſs, his Majeſty was ſo far from ſettling the Government upon his Son or himſelf, as was confirmed by the Letters Patents, that in lieu thereof he ſent to make ſeiſure of their Eſtates, from which no perſon is exempted, who by one matter or the other is not concerned and brought within the compaſs of theſe Rules and new Regulations; and to mend the matter, an obſtinate perſon, one Blaſco Nunnez Vela, was employed to put them into execution, who would neither receive Petitions, nor hearken to Reaſon, treating the people with injurious and ſevere terms, as might be eaſily proved by good and ſufficient Witneſſes; and likewiſe that he had ſent a Commiſſion to take off his Head, who had never diſſerved his Majeſty, but on the contrary, as was manifeſtly known, had been loyal, faithfull and a good Subject, as was apparent to all the world. For which reaſons as aforeſaid he was reſolved, with the conſent and approbation of the City, to make a Journey to Los Reyes, there to complain in the publick place of Judicature of the aggrievances of his Majeſty's good Subjects; after which they would diſpatch Meſſengers to the King in the name of the whole Kingdom, to inform his Majeſty of the truth of all that had paſſed, with their humble offers for a redreſs, not doubting but his Majeſty would yield a gentle and a gratious ear thereunto; and when they had performed this their duty, and could receive no relief, they would then contentedly acquieſce, and with humble reſignation ſubmit unto his Majeſty's pleaſure. And whereas they could not eſteem themſelves ſafe and ſecure from the deſigns and menaces of the Vice-king, who was marching againſt them with a Body of Men, they agreed, that this their Plenipotentiary ſhould likewiſe be attended with a Body of Men, merely for the ſecurity of his Perſon, and to remain onely on the defenſive part. And with this deſign onely and no other, he exhorted the Souldiers that they would keep Order and Military Diſcipline to avoid ſurpriſe, and that he and the other Gentlemen who were his Aſſociates would maintain and pay them as was reaſonable, in regard they were employed for conſervation of their Lives and Eſtates. And with ſuch fair pretenſions as theſe, he perſuaded the people to joyn with him in the juſtification he had made of his cauſe, which being generally approved, they freely offered their Services to defend him to the laſt drop of their bloud: and in this manner he departed from Cozco, attended with the Citizens and Inhabitants as before mentioned. Thus far are the words of Carate.

With theſe preparations before-mentioned, which amounted unto five hundred Souldiers, and twenty thouſand Indians to attend the Camp; for twelve thouſand onely were requiſite to draw and manage the Cannon and Artillery, Gonçalo Piçarro departed from Cozco to march unto the City of Los Reyes, giving out that his deſign was no other than onely to petition and to treat; and being marched as far as Sacſahuana, being four leagues diſtant from the City, we ſhall leave him there a while and return to the Vice-king, to declare how matters paſſed between him and his Subjects in Los Reyes and other parts.

Though Blaſco Nunnez Vela was ſettled in the ſeat of his Authority, and received for Governour of that Empire, yet he was uneaſie and unable to reliſh the ſweetneſs of Power, by reaſon of thoſe diſcontents and jealouſies which the people conceived in execution of the new Rules of Regulation; wherefore to ſecure his Perſon from any treaſonable attempt, and as a mark of his Authority and State, he gave order to Captain Diego de Urbina to raiſe and arm fifty Archebuſiers to be his Life-guard, and attend his Perſon on all occaſions, (as Gomara reports in the 158th Chapter of his Book.) And now none durſt open his mouth to him, for ſuſpending the practice of the new Laws; as Carate ſaith in the Fifth Chapter of the Fifth Book: And though a Petition had been preferred to him in open Court from from the Corporation of that City, where it had been publickly debated, yet he refuſed to hearken thereunto; and though he plainly confeſſed himſelf, that thoſe Laws were prejudicial to the intereſt of the people, and could not be put in execution without diſ-ſervice to his Majeſty, and that if thoſe perſons who formed and ordained them were here preſent, and had obſerved the difficulties and inconveniences that attended them, they would never have perſuaded his Majeſty to have conſtituted or enacted the ſame: and that though for theſe reaſons he was reſolved to ſend his Commiſſioners together with theirs to ſupplicate his Majeſty that he would be pleaſed to recall thoſe Ordinances, as inconſiſtent with the good of his People, howſoever in the mean time he could not ſuſpend the execution, having Inſtructions and Commands from his Majeſty to the contrary. Thus far are the words of Carate, who, with other Writers, proceeds in this manner.

During this time the Road from Cozco was ſo ſtopped that all intelligence was intercepted, ſo that none was brought either by the Spaniards or Indian Meſſengers, more than that Gonçalo Piçarro was come to Cozco, where the people, who were fled from Los Reyes and other parts, flocked to him upon the news that there was like to be a Civil War. Whereupon the Vice-king and the Judges diſpatched their Orders to the Citizens of Cozco, giving them to underſtand that their duty was to receive Blaſco Nunnez for their Vice-king, and therefore thoſe preſent Letters were to ſummon them to appear forthwith at Los Reyes with their Horſe and Arms. And though theſe Orders were intercepted on the Road, yet ſome Copies of them were brought to Cozco by ſome perſons who came by by-ways, the which ſo wrought upon ſeveral of the Citizens, that they accordingly came and made their appearance at Los Reyes to ſerve the Vice-king; as ſhall hereafter be declared.

Affairs ſtanding upon theſe terms; certain intelligence came to the Vice-king of all that had paſſed at Cozco, which ſo alarm'd him that he gave immediate Orders to increaſe his Army; to raiſe and maintain which having occaſion for a good ſum of Money, he cauſed the Money, being an hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, laden by Caſtro de Vaca on board a Ship for account of his Majeſty, to be brought a-ſhore, and employed for the uſe and ſervice of his Army.

The perſons to whom he gave Commiſſions of Captains to command the Horſe, were Alonſo de Monte Major and Diego Alvarez de Cuero his Brother-in-law; of the Infantry were Martin de Robles, Paul de Meneſes; and Captain of the Arquebuſiers was Gonçala Dias de Pinnera: his Brother Vela Nunnez was made Captain General, Diego de Urbina Lieutenant General, and John de Aguire Sargeant Major. His whole Army beſides Natives conſiſted of ſix hundred Souldiers, of which there were an hundred Horſe, two hundred Fire-arms, and the reſt were Pikes and Lances.

He cauſed great ſtore of Fire-arms to be made, ſome of Iron, and ſome of Bell-mettle; for he gave Orders to take down the Bells of the great Church, and to caſt them into Muskets: he alſo made great quantities of Halberts. And becauſe he ſuſpected the affection and reality of the peoples good will towards him, he cauſed ſeveral falſe Alarms to be given, that ſo he might try in what manner the Souldiers and People would behave themſelves if occaſion were. And becauſe he was jealous of the practices of Vaca de Caſtro with his Servants, and others of his Party to whom he had given the liberty of the City, under a confinement not to exceed the bounds thereof; he one day about Dinner-time cauſed an Alarm to be given, that Gonçalo Piçarro was near at hand, and had entred the Market-place with his Army: upon which occaſion he gave Orders to Diego Alvarez de Cuero to ſeiſe on the Perſon of Vaca de Caſtro, who with other Officers took alſo Don Pedro de Cabrera, Hernan Mexia de Guzman his Brother-in-law, as alſo Captain Lorenço de Aldana, Melchior Ramirez, and Baltaſar Ramirez his Brother, and carried them all together to the Sea-ſide, and embarked them upon a Ship belonging to the Fleet, commanded by Captain Jeronimo de Curbano, a Native of Bilboa: in a few days after which, he ſet Lorenço de Aldana at liberty, and baniſhed Hernan Mexia to Panama, and Melchior and Baltaſar de Ramirez to Nicaragua; but he continued Vaca de Caſtro in the Ship, without making any Proceſs by Law, or legally laying any Fault or Crimes to their charges, or receiving any information againſt them. Thus far are the words of Auguſtine de Carate in the ſixth Chapter of his Book.

CHAP. X.

Two of the Inhabitants of Arequepa revolt to the Vice-king, with two of the Ships belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro, and the Citizens of Cozco desert his Army.

WHilſt the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez was troubled with theſe thoughts and fears, a lucky accident happened much to his advantage and ſatisfaction; for two perſons which belonged to the City of Arequepa, one of which was called Jeronimo de Serna and the other Alonſo de Carceres, ſeiſed upon the two Ships in that Port belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro, which he had bought with his own money, with intent to ſhip his Ammunition and Proviſions thereupon, and with them to be Maſter of thoſe Seas, which was of great and high concernment to him: theſe two perſons, as we have ſaid, corrupted the Mariners, and perſuaded them to ſail the Ships to Los Reyes, where the Vice-king reſided, who received them with great joy and contentment; for thereby perceiving that the Forces of his Enemy were wavering, and enclining to his ſide, he took it as a good Omen of his following ſucceſs.

In the mean time it happened out in the Army of Gonçalo Piçarro, which we left in Sacſahuana, that the Citizens which belonged to Cozco, reflecting within themſelves upon the deſign in which they were engaged, and conſidering how unbeſeeming and improper a matter it was to petition for Juſtice with Arms in their hands, which ought to be performed in a more humble and ſubmiſſive manner; it was agreed amongſt the principal men amongſt them, (as was before privately diſcourſed) to deſert the cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro and return again to their own habitations.

The chief and leading men in this deſign were Graviel de Rojas, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, John de Saavedra, Gomez de Rojas, Jeronimo Coſtilla, Pedro del Barco, Martin de Florencia, Jeronimo de Soria, Gomez de Leon, Doctour Carvajal, Alonſo Perez de Eſquivel, Pedro Piçarro, and John Ramirez.

Theſe are all particularly mentioned by the two Authours, Carate and Diego Fernandez; but beſides theſe, there were ſeveral others not named by them, as John Julio de Hojeda, Diego de Silva, Thomas Bazquez, Pedro Alonſo Carraſco, John de Pancorvo, Alonſo de Hinojoſa, Antonio de Quinnones, Alonſo de Loyaſa, Martin de Meneſes, Mancio Serra de Legnicamo, Franciſco de Villa Fuerta, John de Figueroa, Pedro de los Rios, with his Brother Diego, Alonſo de Soto, and Diego de Truxillo, Gaſpar Jara, and others whoſe names I have forgotten, who were in all about forty in number, with many of which I had a perſonal acquaintance.

All theſe having deſerted the cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro, returned to their own homes at Cozco; where having provided themſelves with ſuch conveniences as were neceſſary for their Journey, they with all diligence took their Journey to Arequepa, with deſign to ſeiſe the two Ships belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro, which they knew lay at that place, and embark themſelves thereon, and ſail to Los Reyes, eſteeming it for a great piece of ſervice to the King, and a means to ingratiate themſelves with the Vice-king; but herein they were diſappointed, for that the Captains Alonſo de Carceres and Jeronimo de la Serna had foreſtalled them in their deſign, having carried the Ships away to Los Reyes before their arrival.

And being thus diſappointed of their hopes, they conſidered of the ſecureſt way they were now to take to get to the Vice-king; for they knew that Gonçalo Piçarro had ſtopped all the Roads and Paſſages over the Plains and Mountains; wherefore they agreed to build a great Boat or Veſſel, and thereon to take their paſſage by Sea to Los Reyes: the building of this Veſſel took up forty days time to little purpoſe; for the Carpenters being both unskilfull in building, and the Timber green and unſeaſoned, no ſooner was the Veſſel lanched, and her Proviſions laden upon her but ſhe ſunk down to the bottom in the very Harbour. Wherefore finding that there was no other way now left them, they reſolved to hazard themſelves on the Land, which ſucceeded according to their deſires, for the Road being being clear'd of their Enemies, they arrived ſafe at Los Reyes; but when they came thither, they found that the Vice-king was made a Priſoner, and embarked and ſent away into Spain. As we ſhall underſtand more particularly in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

This delay of forty days in building the Veſſel, was the cauſe of all the miſchief which enſued; for during that time the Vice-king was made a Priſoner, which had otherwiſe been prevented had thoſe Gentlemen opportunely arrived: for had it been known that perſons of that Quality had revolted from Piçarro, and were come from Cozco to joyn with the Vice-king, it would have brought ſo great a reputation to his affairs, that none would have dared to have touched the Vice-king, or declared for the Party of Piçarro. And as ſome Authours report, the people ſeiſed on the Vice-king and put him on Ship-board, onely out of fear to ſecure him from Gonçalo Piçarro, who they heard was on his march with intention to kill him. But theſe Gentlemen of Cozco, finding, contrary to all expectation, that the Vice-king was ſent away, every man ſhifted for himſelf as well as he could; ſome of which remaining in the City, we ſhall have occaſion to diſcourſe of them hereafter.

On the other ſide, Gonçalo Piçarro, perceiving that thoſe who were men of the greateſt intereſt and power in the Army had relinquiſhed his intereſt, he gave himſelf over for loſt, and, as the Hiſtorians report, reſolved to return to the Charcas, or to retire into Chile with about fifty of the moſt faithfull of his Friends and Comrades, who, he was aſſured, would ſtand by him to the laſt: but whilſt he was meditating of theſe matters, Pedro de Puelles came to him, and brought the news of the departure of the Vice-king, which was ſo much to the advantage of Piçarro, that he with new courage and triumph returned to Cozco. The Indians which belonged to thoſe who revolted he appropriated to his own ſervice, onely thoſe who were in vaſſalage to Garçilaſſo de la Vega he beſtowed on Pedro de Puelles, and gave up his Houſes to be plundred by the Souldiers, one of which afterwards intended to have ſet fire to them, having a fire-brand in his hand to that purpoſe, and had certainly effected it, had he not been prevented by another of a better and a more mild temper and diſpoſition, who ſaid to him, What hurt have theſe Houſes done you? if the Maſter were here we might revenge our ſelves upon him, but what evil have theſe Walls deſerved? This word gave a ſtop to his intention and ſaved the Houſe; howſoever they plundred it from the top to the bottom, not leaving any thing in it which was worth one farthing; and turned out the Indian Servants both Men and Women, charging them not to come within the Walls upon pain of death: howſoever they permitted eight perſons to remain therein, namely my Mother, and Siſter, and a Maid-ſervant, as alſo my ſelf, (for my Mother would rather have died than have been without me) and John de Alcobaça my Tutour, with his Son Diego, and his Brother, and an Indian Maid, which they would not deny me the ſervice of.

John Alcobaça, being a perſon of a good life and exemplary piety, void of paſſion and worldly intereſt, gained that reſpect and favour amongſt them, that they would not take away his life; the friendſhip we had amongſt ſeveral of them, ſaved us alſo; for many of thoſe who adhered to Piçarro were yet Friends to my Father, and would ſay, turning to us, what have theſe Children and old People done, or what puniſhment have they deſerved for the faults of another? Howſoever after this we had certainly periſhed with hunger, had not the Incas, and ſome Ladies of their Family, who were related to us, ſent us ſecretly and by private ways, ſome Food wherewith to ſupport our ſelves; but ſuch was the fear and dread they had of theſe Tyrants, that the Proviſion was ſo little as was ſcarce able to ſuſtain us.

A certain Cazique, who was under the command of my Father, called Don Garcia Pauqui, who was Commander over two Plantations, which are ſituated on the Banks of the River Apurimac ſeven leagues diſtant from the City, one of which is called Huayllari, was more kind and faithfull than all others relating to us; for he, not fearing the threats they had given, adventured with danger of his life to relieve us, and came one night to our Houſe, to give us notice that we ſhould ſit up and watch the night following, for that about ſuch an hour he would ſend us in twenty five Buſhels of Mayz, which he accordingly did; and about ſeven or eight nights after he ſent us in the like quantity, which was a ſufficient proviſion to relieve us during the eight months of our famine and reſtraint, untill the time that Diego Centeno entred into Cozco, as we ſhall relate hereafter. I have thought fit to mention this particular paſſage to ſhew the faithfulneſs and loyalty of this good Curaca, and record the ſame to the honour of him and thoſe who deſcend from him.

But beſides the Charities we received from this good man Pauqui, I received ſome other relief from a noble Perſon, called John Eſcobar, who at that time had no command over Indians, though ſome years afterwards Doctour Caſtro bequeathed ſome to him, upon an intermarriage between him and the Daughter of Vaſco de Guevara, begotten on the body of Maria Enriquez, both Perſons of Honour and Quality.

This worthy Gentleman John de Eſcobar, who lodged in the Houſe of Alſonſo de Meſa, in a certain Street built in the midſt of my Father's Rents, very much compaſſionating our wants and penury, deſired my Tutour to give me leave to come every day to dinner, and at night to ſupper with him; we accepted very kindly the dinner, but as to the ſupper, we thought it not convenient to keep our doors open at that time of the night; for we were hourly in fear of being maſſacred, for which we had good grounds, being always threatned by them; and none put us into more fear than Hernando Bachicao, who was Maſter of the Ordnance; for though he went not out with them, yet he mounted ſome Cannon at his own Houſe and made a Battery upon ours, which, in the Map or deſcription we made of the Town, juſt fronted with his, nothing being between us but onely the two Market-places of the City, which he had certainly levelled to the ground, had not ſome Friends and Relations interceded for us: Nor did the Relations of thoſe others who revolted fare better than we; though they evidenced a more particular malice and anger againſt my Father, as one who had more ſignally been concerned in this revolt than any other. Graviel de Rojas was as deeply engaged as he, but having his Houſes and Poſſeſſions in Chuquiſaca the City of Plate, they had not the ſame opportunity to be revenged on him.

Having thus vented their anger upon the Houſes of thoſe Citizens of Cozco who had revolted from their cauſe, they returned again into the Road of Los Reyes to meet Pedro de Puelles and the people who followed him; but they were very tedious in their march to Huamanca, by reaſon of the great Incumbrance of their Cannon which followed the Camp. Jeronimo de la Serna, and Alonſo de Carceres, who had revolted with the two Ships to Los Reyes, reported amongſt other things to the Vice-king, how that Gonçalo Piçarro was elected General Repreſentative of the whole Empire, and that he was raiſing Men, and providing Ammunition and Artillery to march unto Los Reyes.

This report being brought to the Vice-king and the Juſtices, which as yet was news to them; for (as we have ſaid before) the Roads being all ſtopt, they had received no other intelligence of Gonçalo Piçarro than that he was come from Cozco to the Charcas: but ſo ſoon as they underſtood that he was raiſing Men, they immediately diſpatched away Orders to the four Cities, requiring and commanding them to receive Blaſco Nunnez Vela for Vice-king by Commiſſion from his Majeſty. And that in caſe they had any aggrievances they ſhould ſend their Commiſſioners to the City of Los Reyes, there to repreſent their Complaints and demand Juſtice in thoſe matters wherein they judged themſelves aggrieved. And in order hereunto, as Gomara ſays, the Vice-king ſent Friar Thomas de San Martin to aſſure Gonçalo Piçarro, that he had no Commiſſion to his hurt or prejudice, but rather Inſtructions from the Emperour to reward and gratifie him for his many labours and ſervices performed towards his Majeſty: And therefore deſired him, that laying all fears and jealouſies aſide, he ſhould diſmiſs his people, and come freely and frankly to him to converſe and treat upon affairs. Thus far Gomara. Now we will proceed to the Rebellion of Pedro de Puelles.

CHAP.

CHAP. XI.

Wherein is related, how Pedro de Puelles rebelled againſt Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and revolted to Gonçalo Piçarro; and how others whom the Vice-king ſent after them to fetch them back, did the like, and joined with the contrary Party.

BEſides the Orders which the Vice-king ſent to the four Cities, and the Meſſage which he had diſpatched to Gonçalo Piçarro; he likewiſe ſent his Summons to Pedro de Puelles to come and ſerve his Majeſty, the ſucceſs of which we may find written by Diego Fernandez, in the ſixteenth Chapter of his Book, and by Auguſtine de Carate, in the tenth Chapter of his fifth Book, who give a relation thereof, almoſt in the ſame words.

When the Vice-king was firſt received in the City of Los Reyes, Pedro de Puelles, a Native of Seville, came to kiſs his hands, being at that time Deputy Governour for Vaca de Caſtro in the Town of Guanuco: And having lived long in the Indies, he was highly eſteemed by the Vice-king for his great experience; ſo that he gave him a new Commiſſion to be Deputy Governour of Guanuco, enjoyning him to get the People of that City in a readineſs, that in caſe neceſſity ſhould require, they might at an hour's warning appear with their Horſe and Arms. Pedro de Puelles obeyed the Commands of the Vice-king; and not onely put his own Citizens into a poſture to march, at the firſt Summons; but alſo retained ſeveral other Souldiers, who came from the Province of Chapapoyas in company with Gomes de Solis and Bonifaz, to attend the Commands of the Vice-king, for their march: and accordingly upon his Orders diſpatched by Jeronimo de Villegas, a Native of Burgos. Pedro de Puelles immediately marched away with intention to join with him.

But being come as far as Guanuco, they began to lay their heads together and conſider of the iſſue and event of affairs, in caſe they ſhould ſubdue and overthrow Gonçalo Piçarro and his party; and having concluded moſt certainly, that in that caſe, the Vice-king would make uſe of his Victory, to put in execution the new Laws without controll, to the great damage and ruine of the People; and that no man, as well Souldiers as others ſhould be able to enjoy the ſervice and vaſſalage of their Indians, which would diſennable many from paying the taxes for maintenance of the Army: they all unanimouſly reſolved to revolt unto Gonçalo Piçarro's party; and ſo marched another way to join with him in ſuch place where it ſhould be their fortune to meet him.

The Vice-king, having ſpeedy intelligence thereof by an Indian Captain called Yllatopa, greatly reſented the ill-ſucceſs; but howſoever, taking courage, he immediately diſpeeded his brother Vela Nunnez with a Detachment of fourty light Horſe and thirty Arquebuſiers, under the command of Captain Gonçalo Dias, which for better expedition were mounted upon ſo many Mules, which coſt twelve thouſand Ducats taken out of the King's treaſury; and to them were added ten other Souldiers, who were the kindred, friends and relations of Vela Nunnez, ſo that the number of the Foot were made equal to the Horſe, and had Orders to intercept Pedro de Puelles in his march, and to get before him, and diſpute the firſt paſs with him. Being thus provided with all things neceſſary, and being on their march as far as Guadachile (which is about twenty Leagues from the City;) it is ſaid, that they agreed to kill Vela Nunnez and revolt to Gonçalo Piçarro; and that ſome of the Scouts being advanced about four Leagues from Guadachile happened to meet with Frier Thomas, the Provincial of St. Domingo, whom the Vice-king had ſent to Cozco, with Commiſſion to treat and accommodate matters with Gonçalo Piçarro: and being met, one of the Souldiers who was born at Avila, taking him aſide, diſcovered to him the deſigns the Souldiers had to kill Vela Nunnez; that ſo he might fore-warn him thereof, and adviſe him to take ſome courſe for his ſecurity, for otherwiſe he would be killed that night by the Souldiers.

The Provincial made great haſte in his journey, and with him the Scouts alſo returned upon the advice he had given them, that Pedro de Puelles was two days march before him, and had paſſed the Xauxa, ſo that it was impoſſible for them to overtake him: And being come to Guadachile, he told the People the ſame Story, and that it would be to no purpoſe to goe in purſuit of him: and taking Vela Nunnez on one ſide, he privately whiſpered to him the Danger in which he was, adviſing him to make uſe of this Information for his own ſafety. Vela Nunnez revealing the treachery againſt him to four or five of his kinſmen who were with him, they privately towards the glimps of the Evening, ſtole on horſe-back, as if they intended to give their horſes water, and having the Provincial for their guide, they made their eſcape under the protection of the night. So ſoon as their flight was known, John de la Torre, Piedra Hita, George a Grecian, and other Souldiers who were concerned in the Conſpiracy ſeized upon the Guard in the night, and clapping their fire-locks to the breaſts of the other Souldiers, ſwearing to kill them, if they reſolved not to goe and join with them. Whereupon every one almoſt freely declared, that they would be of their ſide, and particularly Captain Gonçalo Dias; and though they affrighted him with the ſame terrour as did the others, and bound his hands behind him, and in appearance offered many other affrighting things to him, yet it is believed that he was in the Conſpiracy, and the principal in the Plot; and ſo it was believed and went for currant amongſt all the People of the City; for it could not be imagined, that he who was a kinſman and ſon-in-law to Pedro de Puelles, could be of a contrary party to him, there having been no quarrel or cauſe of difference between them. And thus all of them getting up and mounting their Mules which had coſt ſo dear, they travailed towards Gonçalo Piçarro, whom they met near Guamanga, where Pedro de Puelles and his men being arrived two days before them; found ſuch diſcouragement in the Camp of Piçarro, by reaſon of the ſlow motion and coldneſs of Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Aſſociates; that had Pedro de Puelles and his men ſtayed onely three days longer before they had come up, the whole Camp of Piçarro had moſt certainly broken up and been diſperſed: but the arrival of Pedro de Puelles put ſuch life and ſpirit again into them, both by his recruits and by his words; that they reſolved to proceed in their enterpriſe; for he told them, that in caſe Gonçalo Piçarro would retract, and not think fit to proceed, he notwithſtanding was reſolved to undertake the deſign, not doubting but to be able with his own men to take the Vice-king and rid the Countrey of him, conſidering that he was generally hated, and that all the people were diſaffected to him. Pedro de Puelles had little leſs than fourty Horſe with him, and about twenty Muſquetiers; but when Gonçalo Dias and his men were come up and joyned with them, then all parts were encouraged, and reſolved without any fear or doubt to proceed: by this time Vela Nunnez was arrived at Los Reyes, and had acquainted the Vice-king with all that had paſſed; who, as we may believe with reaſon, reſented this ill beginning as ominous, finding his affairs every day to fall into a worſe eſtate. The next day Rodrigo Ninno, who was ſon of Hernando Ninno, Mayor of Toledo, returned to Toledo with three or four more who refuſed to follow Gonçalo Dias, nowithſtanding all the affronts and abuſes they could put upon them; for they took from them their Arms and Horſes, and ſtript them of their Cloaths; ſo that Rodrigo Ninno came onely in querpo, with a pair of old Trunks, without Hoſe, or Shoes, or any thing on his Feet, unleſs a pair of pack-thread Sandals, walking all the way on foot with a Cane in his hand. The Vice-king received him with all the kindneſs imaginable, and praiſing his Loyalty and Conſtancy, told him that, conſidering the Cauſe for which he ſuffered, the Habit in which he was, ſeemed more becoming than if he were veſted in Cloth of Gold. Thus far the two Authours agree in the ſame ſenſe, and almoſt in the ſame words: To which Diego Fernandez Palentino adds, as follows:

When news was brought to the Vice-king of theſe ill Succeſſes, he greatly reſented them, clearly now perceiving that his Affairs went croſs, and that the affections of the people were tainted with rebellion: Howſoever, that he might in ſome manner revenge the diſloyalty of Captain Gonçalo Diaz, who had ſo ignominiouſly broken his faith and word with him, and ſince he could not inflict a puniſhment on his perſon, he cauſed the Colours or Enſign of his Company to be trailed along through the Market-place in the ſight and view of the Captains, Souldiers, and of all the City; and commanded the Serjeants and Enſign of the Company

pany of Gonçalo Diaz, and of all the other Companies, to run the points of their Lances into his Colours, and tear them in pieces in diſhonour, and to the ignominy of the abſent Captain; but Gomez Eſtacio, who was Enſign to that Company, and other the Aſſociates, who were to ſupport the Colours, were not a little nettled at this Affront, as if it had in ſome manner reflected upon themſelves: and more particularly Gomez Eſtacio found himſelf aggrieved, becauſe the Vice-king had commanded him to trail the Colours with his own hand; and from that time he became diſaffected to the Vice-king, and a friend to the Cauſe and Party of Gonçalo Piçarro. And though it be granted that many did approve the action of Gonçalo Diaz, and did agree that the diſhonour ſhewed to his Colours was but juſt, and no more than what his infidelity deſerved: Howſoever they were well enough pleaſed to ſee the power of the Vice-king weakened, whoſe ruine and down-fall they deſired by the better fortune and ſucceſs of Gonçalo Piçarro. Thus did nothing thrive which the Vice-king acted, but all turned to his prejudice; of which he was ſenſible, though he ſtrove to conceal his inward trouble, and put the beſt face upon it that he could. Thus far are the words of Diego Fernandez.

And now men who were diſaffected began to blame the Council which was given to the Vice-king, to ſend Gonçalo Diaz againſt his Father-in-law; and, as other Authours ſay, it was much wondered that the Vice-king ſhould be ſo much overſeen as not to conſider the inconvenience of engaging the Son-in-law againſt the Father, between whom there had been no quarrel or ground of diſpleaſure. And in like manner reflecting on the concernment of Gomez Eſtacio, Enſign of Gonçalo, divers were of opinion, that it was an Affront given him without any Cauſe; and that it was improperly done to command him who had in no manner been engaged in the Treaſon of his Captain, to be an Executioner of a diſgrace which could not be acted without great reflexion on himſelf. Thus did the hatred which men had conceived againſt the Vice-king turn all the actions he did to a bad interpretation.

CHAP. XII.

A Pardon and ſafe Conduct is given to Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Friends. His death, and of divers others.

NOW to ſet forth what theſe Authours report of Gaſpar Rodriguez, whom Carate ſometimes mentions by the name of Gaſpar de Rojas; we are to obſerve that he was a brother of the good Capain Perançures de Campo rotondo, who was ſlain in the battel of Chupas, and after his death he came to the inheritance and poſſeſſion of his Indians, which Vaca de Caſtro beſtowed upon him by ſpecial Grant. This was the Gentleman who raſhly and without conſideration ſeized upon the Cannon which were at Huamanca, and carried them to Cozco, and was greatly engaged in the deſigns of Gonçalo Piçarro: but obſerving that many of the principal Citizens who had taken part with Piçarro, had relinquiſhed his Cauſe, and fled from him; he alſo reſolved to follow their example, and revolt to the Vice-king: but being conſcious of his Crime in carrying away the Cannon; he thought it beſt and moſt ſecure to obtain a Pardon for the ſame, both as to life and eſtate, before he truſted himſelf in the hands of the Vice-king, whom he knew to be a man of a moroſe and ſevere diſpoſition, and one who would not ſpare him, in caſe he fell into his hands, without ſuch a Precaution: and to make his acceſs and pardon the more eaſie by an appearance of ſome ſignal ſervice, he treated with ſome friends of his, perſuading them to paſs over to the other party, following the example of thoſe other noble Citizens who had lately done the like: and with them he ſo prevailed, that they reſolved on the point, and as a preparation thereunto, to demand their Pardon firſt, and to receive a Protection or Letter of ſafe conduct freely to come and offer their ſervice.

But

But whilſt theſe Matters were in agitation Pedro de Puelles (as the Authours report) arrived very opportunely; for, had his coming been delayed but three days longer, it is the general opinion, that all the Army of Gonçalo Piçarro had of themſelves been diſperſed and disbanded. Howſoever, theſe new recruits did not alter and remove the intentions of Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Companions from their former purpoſe; in purſuance of which they communicated their deſign to a certain Prieſt, a Native of Madrid, called Baltaſar de Loayſa, with whom after I was acquainted in Madrid, in the year 1563. I cannot ſay that I knew him before, being very young; though he knew me very well when I was a child, being a friend of my father's, and one who had a general acquaintance with all the noble families of that Empire.

Gaſpar de Rodriguez and his friends treated with this Prieſt (who was more fit for a Souldier than a Prieſt) and perſuaded him to take a journey in their behalf to Los Reyes, and to obtain a Pardon for them, with a Letter of Licence for their Security; and with that occaſion, that he ſhould give an account of the number of thoſe who were come lately to join with Piçarro and of thoſe who were gone off; and to aſſure him, that the Affairs of Piçarro ſtood on that uncertain foundation, that ſo ſoon as he and his accomplices were gone off, that all the other Forces of Gonçalo Piçarro would ſpeedily disband.

With this Meſſage Baltaſar de Loayſa privately departed from the Camp; of which ſo ſoon as Piçarro had notice, he immediately ſent after him to fetch him back; but having taken a by-way out of the common road, they miſſed of him, and he got ſafe to Rimac where the good news he brought, made him welcome to the Vice-king; for the intention of Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Companions was of great importance to him: the joy whereof the Vice-king not being able to ſuppreſs, and eſteeming it neceſſary to be divulged for the encouragement of his people; the ſecret took air and was made publick; which being with all expedition wrote back to Gonçalo Piçarro, Gaſpar Rodriguez was ſeized with his Companions, and were all afterwards put to death. Howſoever, before that was known Baltaſar de Loayſa was diſpatched with the Pardon and Letters of ſafe-conduct, which he deſired; which was no ſooner done, but it was divulged over all the City (as Carate reports, whoſe authority we rather follow in theſe paſſages, than any other, becauſe he was preſent at theſe tranſactions) and thereupon the Citizens, and other perſons who were inclined and ſecretly well-affected to the Cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro and his Party, did really imagine that in caſe he were deſerted by Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Accomplices, it would ſtrike ſo great a damp to Gonçalo Piçarro and his Souldiers as would cauſe them to diſperſe and break up their Camp, as deſpairing of their deſign; and then the Vice-king would remain triumphant, to execute his new Laws without any contradiction or reſtraint upon him: to prevent which ſome of the Citizens and Souldiers reſolved amongſt themſelves to ſend a party of light Horſe after him; hoping ſpeedily to overtake him.

It was in the month of September 1544, when Loayſa with one perſon onely in his company called Hernando de Cavallos left the Town; and the next night afterwards was purſued by twenty five light Horſemen, the principal of which were Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla, the Son of Count Gomera, Lorenço Mexia, Rodrigo de Salazar, well known for his crouch-back, and was the perſon famous for taking Don Diego de Almagro Junior in Cozco; there were alſo with them Diego de Carvajal, ſurnamed the Gallant, and Franciſco de Eſcobedo, Franciſco de Carvacal, Pedro Martin de Cicilia aliàs Pedro Martin de Don Benito, with others to the number of twenty five, all which company together travailed with ſo much expedition and diligence, that in leſs than fourty Leagues diſtance from Los Reyes they overtook Loayſa, and took all his papers and diſpatches from him; and ſent them away by a Souldier, who croſſing the Countrey came by a ſhorter cut than the common road to the Camp of Piçarro, and acquainted him with the whole matter, who at firſt ſecretly communicated it to Franciſco de Carvajal, who was lately made his Major General in the place of Alonſo de Poro, who was fallen ſick: then he imparted it to other Captains and Perſons of quality, who were not privy nor concerned in the Confederacy: and having conſidered of the matter amongſt themſelves, they all generally agreed, ſome from a principle of particular enmity, others from envy, others from covetouſneſs, fearing to loſe their Indians and their Poſſeſſions; that it was neceſſary for example unto others, and to deter them from the like perfidiouſneſs, to puniſh this act of Treachery with the greateſt teſt ſeverity: and accordingly it was concluded amongſt thoſe who were unconcerned in this ſafe Conduct and Pardon; to kill Gaſpar de Rojas, Philip de Gutierez, the ſon of Alonſo de Gutierez, who was Treaſurer to his Majeſty and born at Madrid, and alſo Arias Maldonado a Gentleman of Galicia, who, with Philip Gutierez, had loitered two or three days Journey behind in Guamanga, upon pretence of certain buſineſſes to be done there in order to their Journey; but during their ſtay at that place Gonçalo Piçarro diſpeeded Pedro de Puelles with a party of Horſe to take off their Heads: but the execution of Gaſpar Rodriguez was more difficult, for he was then a Captain in the Field, and actually at the head of almoſt two hundred Lances, and being a perſon very rich, of great intereſt, and very popular, they could not act their deſign publickly upon him, and therefore they had recourſe to this Strategeme. Gonçalo Piçarro commanded an hundred and fifty Harquebuſiers of Captain Cermenno's Company to be in a readineſs, and having given out to each of them private Arms, and placed the Artillery in good order, he called the Captains to come to him, telling them that he had certain advices, which he had lately received from Los Reyes, to communicate to them. And being all come, and amongſt the reſt Gaſpar Rodriguez, Gonçalo Piçarro ſtept out of his Tent, which was well guarded with Cannon, and pretending as it were ſome other buſineſs, in the mean time the Major-General Carvajal comes to Gaſpar Rodriguez, and laying his hand on the hilt of his Sword, drew it out of the Scabbard, adviſing him to call for a Prieſt and confeſs, for that he was to die immediately: Gaſpar Rodriguez reſiſted a while, pretending to be innocent, and to clear himſelf of thoſe accuſations which were againſt him; but that would not ſerve his turn, for immediately they cut off his head.

The execution of theſe men terrified the whole Camp, and more particularly thoſe who were conſcious to themſelves of being Complices in the ſame Action for which thoſe were put to death; and theſe acts of ſeverity were the more affrighting becauſe they were the firſt which Gonçalo Piçarro had committed ſince the uſurpation of his tyrannical Power. Some few days afterwards, Don Baltaſar and his Comrades came to the Camp bringing Baltaſar de Loayſa and Hernando Cavallos, (as we have ſaid) Priſoners; but the day before he knew that they were to enter into the Camp, he ſent his Major General Carvajal before him, with orders that whereſoever he met them he ſhould put them to death: but ſuch was the good fortune of Loayſa and Cavallos, that they miſtaking their way, the Major General was diſappointed of his prize, and the Priſoners were brought to the Camp, where ſo many interceſſours appeared in favour of the two Delinquents, that Loayſa was releaſed and ſent away without any proviſion made for him, but Hernando de Cavallos was continued, and carried away with the reſt of the Army. Thus far is the account given by Carate in the fifth Book and the eleventh Chapter.

In fine, they killed Gaſpar Rodriguez and his Accomplices, whoſe death was haſtened and occaſioned by their applications to the Vice-king for a Pardon and a ſafe Conduct, which he and his adherents demanded for ſafety of their lives, as Gomara confirms in the 164th Chapter of his Book; The Vice-king's Pardon and a ſafe Conduct was general for all, Piçarro, Franciſco de Carvajal, Benito de Carvajal and ſome few others onely excepted; at which Piçarro and his Major-General were ſo much offended, that they immediately hanged up Gaſpar Rodrigues, Philip Gutierez with the reſt; which are the words of Gomara. In this manner this poor Gentleman Gaſpar Rodriguez de Campo Rotondo ended his days; for being of an unquiet ſpirit, he was neither well with thoſe who were called Tyrants and Rebels, nor with thoſe who were eſteemed for Loyaliſts.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Death of Agent Yllen Suarez de Carvajal, and of the great mutiny and diſturbance he cauſed in Peru.

DUring all theſe troubles and ſlaughters in the Camp of Gonçalo Piçarro, there happened an accident ſad and tragical in the City of Los Reyes, which Gomara in the 159th Chapter of his Book relates to have been in this manner. Lewis Garcia San Manes, who was Poſtmaſter in Xauxa, brought certain Letters which were wrote in Cyphers by Benito de Carvajal to the Agent Yllen Suarez his Brother: the Vice-king preſently took a jealouſie upon the Cypher, and a ſuſpicion of the Agent's faithfulneſs, and ſhewing them to the Judges, demanded their opinion, whether they were not ground ſufficient to put him to death: to which the Judges replied, that it were convenient firſt to know the contents of them. Hereupon the Agent was called for, who coming, did not ſeem, as they ſay, to be ſtartled or change his countenance, though he was ſeverely treated with ſharp words; but took the paper and read it without heſitation, Doctour John Alvarez noting the words which he read: the ſum or ſubſtance of all the Cypher was, the number of Souldiers that were with Piçarro, and what his intentions were; who were in his favour and who not; and in fine declared, that he would watch his opportunity to ſlip away, and come to the ſervice of the Vice-king ſo ſoon as he could diſengage himſelf, according to the Counſel which the Agent had given him. After which the Key of the Cypher was called for, and the matter being thereby diſcloſed, it was found to agree with the interpretation given by the Agent, and to verifie the truth thereof Benito Carvajal came to Lima two or three days after Blaſco Nunnez was ſeiſed, not knowing any thing of the death of the Agent. Thus far are the words of Gomara.

Howſoever there ſtill remained upon the mind of the Vice-king ſuch a jealouſie of the Agent, that like an evil Spirit it ſtill haunted and followed him, never ſuffering him to be at reſt untill at laſt the direfull effects thereof broke out in the very Chamber of the Vice-king, where the Agent was aſſaſſinated without any cauſe or reaſon for it, which ſtruck a greater terrour into the minds of the people on this ſide than was the late conſternation in the Camp of Gonçalo Piçarro, ſo that neither Party was free from Tragedies of their own. And particularly here happened out one the night following, occaſioned by the flight of Baltaſar de Caſtilla and others afore-mentioned. The three Authours report this Hiſtory almoſt in the ſame manner: and firſt we ſhall repeat what the Accountant Auguſtine Carate ſays upon this Subject, and then we ſhall add that from the others which he hath omitted. That which he relates in the eleventh Chapter of his fifth Book is as follows, and herewith we will return to the Subject of our Hiſtory.

Some few hours after Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla and his Companions were departed from the City of Los Reyes in purſuit of Loayſa as is before-mentioned, the matter was not ſo ſecretly carried but that it came to the knowledge of Captain Diego de Urbina, who was Major-General to the Vice-king; for he going his Rounds in the night through the City, and calling at the Houſes of ſome of theſe who were fled, neither found them at home, nor their Arms, nor Horſes, nor the menial Indian Servants which belonged to them; upon which ſuſpecting what was faln out, he directly went to the Vice-king's Lodgings, who was then in Bed, and told him that he had reaſon to believe that the greateſt part of the people had deſerted the City.

The Vice-king was greatly troubled (as was reaſon) at this report, and ariſing from his Bed gave immediate order to ſound an alarm, and that every man ſhould ſtand to his arms; and calling his Captains, gave them order to go from Houſe to Houſe and make enquiry who were abſent, that ſo he might be informed of the number of thoſe who were departed. And having accordingly made ſearch, and found that Diego de Carvajal, Jeronimo de Carvajal and Franciſco de Eſcobedo were miſſing, who were Kinſmen of Agent Yllen Suarez de Carvajal, it was inſtantly believed that he was engaged in the Plot, and in favour of Gonçalo Piçarro; for it could could not be imagined that his Kinſmen could have acted herein without his conſent, or at leaſt without his knowledge, in regard they all lodged under the ſame Roof, and onely had two different Doors to each Apartment: but for better aſſurance of what was ſuſpected, the Vice-king ſent his Brother Vela Nunnez with a guard of Muſquetiers to bring the Agent before him, and he being in Bed they cauſed him to riſe and dreſs himſelf, and ſo carried him to the Lodgings of the Vice-king, who having not ſlept all night, was laid upon his Bed with his Arms on, to take ſome little repoſe. And the Agent being introduced by way of the Court-yard-gate; thoſe who were then preſent report that the Vice-king preſently aroſe and ſaid, Is it ſo, Traitour, that thou haſt ſent away thy Kinſmen to ſerve Gonçalo Piçarro? To which the Agent made anſwer, I beſeech your Lordſhip not to call me Traitour, for in reality I am not ſo: then replied the Vice-king, I ſwear by God, that thou art a Traitour to the King. I ſwear by God, ſaid the Agent, I am as good a Servant to the King as your Lordſhip. At which words the Vice-king became ſo enraged, that coming in his fury to him, he ſtabbed him in the breaſt with his Dagger; though the Vice-king denied to have done it himſelf, but that his Servants and Halbardiers of his Guard, hearing how inſolently he anſwered, gave him ſo many wounds with their Halberts and Partiſans, that he dyed upon the place without ſo much time as to confeſs or ſpeak one word: And leſt, being a perſon generally well-beloved, the manner of his death ſhould cauſe ſome mutiny and diſturbance amongſt the Souldiers, of which an hundred every night kept watch within the yard of the Houſe; the Vice-king gave order to have his Corpſe conveyed away by a certain private Gallery leading to the Market-place, where ſome few Indians and Negroes received it, and buried it in a Church near thereunto, without other Shroud or Winding-ſheet than onely his own Scarlet Cloak which he uſually wore.

Three days after which, when the Judges ſeiſed on the perſon of the Vice-king (as we ſhall relate hereafter) one of the firſt things they laid to his charge was the death of the Agent; and the Preamble to their Proceſs was, that being carried about midnight into the Houſe of the Vice-king, he never ſince that time appeared; and it was proved, that they had wounded and buried him. So ſoon as this murther was made publick, it occaſioned much talk and murmuring in the Town; for every one was aſſured that the Agent was a true Friend to the Vice-king and his Cauſe, having been the chief Inſtrument to perſuade the Town of Los Reyes to receive him, againſt the ſenſe and opinion of the major part of the Judges. Theſe matters happened out upon Sunday at night, being the thirteenth day of September, 1544. Thus far are the words of Carate, which are confirmed alſo by Diego Fernandez, who in the ſeventeenth Chapter of his Book, adds this farther;

They conveyed, ſays he, his Corpſe by a certain Gallery, and buried them in a corner or nook of the great Church near adjoining thereunto; but ſome few hours after that his anger grew cool, and that the Vice-king began to reflect with reaſon upon what he had done in his paſſion: it is moſt certain that he repented of this raſh act, and bewailed it with tears from his eyes. Howſoever ſo ſoon as the death of the Agent was made publick in the Town, the Vice-king ſent to call the principal Citizens to him, telling them, in excuſe for what he had done, that the inſolent words of the Agent had drawn his death upon himſelf; adding, that none ought to take offence thereat, for whether he had done well or ill, he was accountable to none but God and the King; which words more angred and diſpleaſed the people than before: ſo that after the revolt of the ſeveral men before-mentioned, which was followed by this bloudy Tragedy, which cannot be excuſed from the imputation of arbitrary Tyranny without any ground or foundation for it, a reſolution was taken to impriſon the Vice-king: though it is moſt certain that he much lamented this unhappy fate, ſaying, that the remembrance of the death of Ylen Suarez made him often diſtracted; and therefore curſed his Brother Vela Nunnez, calling him fool and beaſt, for that knowing his choler and paſſion, he had yet brought him to his preſence at a time when he knew that he was raving and inflamed therewith: for had he been, ſaid he, a man of diſcretion, he would have deferred the execution of thoſe commands, and not have ſuffered Suarez to appear untill he had ſeen his anger pacified. Thus far Diego Fernandez, to which Gomara adds, and ſays,

That the Agent going to juſtifie himſelf, the Vice-king ſtabb'd him twice, crying out with a loud voice, kill him, kill him; upon which his Servants came in and diſpatched him, though ſome of them threw Clothes upon him to keep off the blows: which are the words of Gomara in Chap. 159. with which he concludes, and ſays, that the death of the Agent, who was a principal perſon and of great eſteem, cauſed great commotions and heart-burnings in thoſe parts, and ſuch fear and apprehenſions that the Citizens of Lima were afraid to lie in their Houſes at night: and Blaſco Nunnez himſelf confeſſed to the Judges, that he had committed a great errour in that Fact, and that he believed it would be an occaſion of his ruine, &c. And ſo indeed it proved to be the down-fall of the Vice-king; for his very Friends, and ſuch as were really of his Party, did hereby conceive ſuch fear and dread of his paſſionate and violent humour, that they fled and hid themſelves, not daring to appear in his preſence; at which his Enemies took great advantage and courage to maintain their cauſe againſt him.

CHAP. XIV.

The various reſolutions which the Vice-king took upon the news he received of the march of Gonçalo Piçarro towards Los Reyes; and how the Judges openly oppoſed the Vice-king.

Gonçalo Piçarro being thus re-inforced by the coming in of Pedro de Puelles and others who were revolted to him from the Vice-king, proceeded forward with greater aſſurances than formerly, though very ſlowly and with ſhort marches, by reaſon of the great incumbrance of the Cannon, which being carried on the ſhoulders of the Indians and over rocky and ſharp ways, it was not poſſible to make greater haſte. The Vice-King in the mean time being alarm'd by the nearer approach daily of his Enemy, and conſidering how much his own people were diſſatisfied, and that thoſe who outwardly ſeemed moſt affected to him, proceeded faintly and coldly in his ſervice, and that the general diſſatisfaction of the people was now plain and evident, and that his condition every day became worſe than other; he reſolved, though too late, to change his Counſels, and to publiſh at length a ſuſpenſion of the new Laws untill his Majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be farther known thereupon, hoping that upon ſuch a Declaration the minds of the people would be quieted, and that Gonçalo Piçarro, having no farther ſubject of complaint, his Army would conſequently disband, and every one return peaceably to his own home.

Now let us hear what Gomara ſays, Chap. 158.

Blaſco Nunnez, ſays he, was much troubled to underſtand that Piçarro was ſo well provided with Arms, Cannon and Souldiers ſo well affected to his cauſe and intereſt: wherefore, ſeeing no other remedy, he declared that he would ſuſpend the execution of the new Laws for two years, untill they ſhould receive other Orders from the Emperour; though at the ſame time he made his Proteſt againſt it, and noted it in his Table-book that he was compelled to that ſuſpenſion by force, and that ſo ſoon as the Countrey was again in quietneſs, he would reaſſume the old pretenſions, and put them in practice as before; all which ſerved to inflame that hatred which the people conceived againſt him. He alſo proclaimed Piçarro a Traitour and thoſe alſo who were with him and of his Party; promiſing to thoſe that ſhould kill him or them, to beſtow their Houſes, Lands, Riches and Eſtates on them for a reward; at which Declaration thoſe of Cozco took great offence, as did alſo thoſe of Lima: and in the mean time he actually confiſcated the Eſtates of thoſe who had revolted to Piçarro. Thus far Gomara.

Though this ſuſpenſion of the Laws came late, howſoever it would have had ſome good effect towards pacifying and quieting the minds of the people, and have opened ſuch overtures towards an accommodation, but that unluckily at

ſame time that the Suſpenſion was publiſhed; the News was, that the Vice-king had made his Proteſt againſt it, as an Act to which he was compelled, and that he would again return to the execution of the new Laws ſo ſoon as the Countrey was appeaſed, and the diſturbances allayed; which more incenſed the minds of the people than ever; and confirmed them in a belief, that the Vice-king was obſtinate and a perſon inexorable, and not to be treated with, whence ſo much miſchief enſued, as by the ſequel will appear; and which ſerved to confirm the people in their pretenſions and reſolutions either to dye or obtain their deſires.

The Vice-king ſeeing that the means he uſed to pacifie the people inflamed them the more, and that his own people became greatly diſcouraged; and many of them inclined to favour Gonçalo Piçarro for the Gallantry they obſerved in him, who had ſo freely ſacrificed himſelf for the publick good; he thereby meaſuring the weakneſs of his force, thought it not ſafe to meet Piçarro in the field, but to defend himſelf within the Walls of the City.

In purſuance of this deſign he fortified the City, ſet up Poſts and Chains in every Street, made loop-holes on the Walls for ſmall ſhot, and laid in proviſions for a ſiege: but News coming daily of the great force with which Piçarro marched againſt them, and the reſolved mind of his Souldiers; the Vice-king thought it not ſafe to confine himſelf within the Walls of Los Reyes; but to retreat to Truxillo, which is about eighty Leagues diſtant from thence. And contriving how to diſpoſe of the Inhabitants, he deſigned to tranſport the Citizens Wives by Sea, in ſuch Ships as were then in Port, and the Souldiers were to march by Land along the Sea coaſt: And for the City it ſelf, he reſolved to diſmantle it and demoliſh the Walls, break down the Mills, and carry all things away which might be for ſubſiſtence of the Enemy, and drive the Indians from the Sea-coaſt into the in-land Countries; ſuppoſing that Piçarro coming thither with his Army, and finding no ſubſiſtence, muſt either disband, or his men periſh. The Vice-king having communicated theſe his Intentions to the Judges, they boldly and openly oppoſed him, telling him plainly, that the Royal Courts of Judicature could not remove out of the City, for that their Commiſſions from his Majeſty obliged them to act in that place; and therefore they deſired to be excuſed, if they refuſed to accompany his Lordſhip or to ſuffer their houſes to be demoliſhed. Herewith an open quarrel aroſe between the Judges and the Vice-king, declaring a different intereſt to each other, the Inhabitants inclined to the ſide of the Judges in oppoſition to the Vice-king, poſitively refuſing to commit their Wives and Daughters into the hands of Seamen and Souldiers. Hereupon the Vice-king aroſe from the conference he held with the Judges, without any determination. Howſoever, as to his own perſon, he reſolved to embark himſelf, and to go by Sea, and that his Brother Vela Nunnez ſhould march away by Land; and in order thereunto he commanded Diego Alvarez Cuero, as Carate reports in the eleventh Chapter of his fifth Book, to guard the Children of Marquis Don Franciſco Pi arro with a Party of Horſe to the Sea-ſide, and there to put them on board a ſhip; together with Vaca de Caſtro, after which he was to remain Admiral of the Fleet, and to take charge of them as his Priſoners; for he was jealous that Antonio de Ribera and his Wife, who had the Guardian-ſhip of Don Gonçalo and his Brothers, would convey them away. But this matter created a new diſturbance amongſt the people, and the Judges much diſliked it, eſpecially Doctour Carate, who made it his particular requeſt to the Vice-king in behalf of the Lady Franciſca, that he would be pleaſed to cauſe her to be again returned aſhoar; for that being a young Maid marriageable, beautifull and rich; it was not decent and agreeable to her modeſty to commit her into the hands of Seamen and Souldiers: but nothing could avail with the Vice-king to diſſuade him from his purpoſe; for being ever obſtinate in all his Reſolutions, he declared his Intentions were to retire and begon, contrary to the opinion of all others. Thus far Carate.

And now to abbreviate and ſum up all that hath been ſaid by the aforeſaid Authours; it is moſt certain, that the Judges gave command to Martin de Robles, though one of the Vice-king's Captains, to make the Vice-king a Priſoner: but he, deſiring to be excuſed by reaſon of the ill conſequences which might enſue; they aſſured him, that it was for the Service of his Majeſty and quiet of that whole Empire; and a means to ſuppreſs all thoſe Mutinies and Troubles which the ill Government of the Vice-king had cauſed. Hereupon Martin de Robles proffered to doe it, howſoever he required a Warrant under the hands and ſeals of the Judges for his ſecurity and diſcharge, the which they readily granted, and gave order to have it drawn up and kept as a Secret, untill the deſign was ready to be put in execution. And farther, they forbad the Citizens and Inhabitants to obey the Vice-king in any of his Commands, or to deliver up their Wives and Children to be tranſported, or to leave and abandon their Houſes, requiring all perſons of what quality or condition ſoever, to be aiding and aſſiſting to Martin de Robles in ſeizing the perſon of the Vice-king, and deteining him priſoner; for ſo his Majeſty's ſervice required it, and the common good and welfare of the publick. But whilſt theſe Matters were contriving, the people were diſtracted and in confuſion, not knowing which ſide or what courſe to take; the duty and obedience which they owed to their Sovereign Lord the King inclined to take part with the Vice-king; but when they conſidered their Intereſts and Eſtates of which they ſhould be deprived in caſe the Vice-king ſhould prevail, they then reſolved to adhere unto the Judges who oppoſed Blaſco Nunnez in execution of the new Laws. Thus did the people remain a whole day in ſuſpence: and the Vice-king, to ſecure himſelf againſt the attempts which the Judges might make againſt him, ordered his Captains and Souldiers to put themſelves in a poſture of defence, in which they remained untill mid-night. The Judges, on the other ſide underſtanding that the Vice-king had ordered his Souldiers to ſtand to their Arms, and that he had above four hundred men with him; and fearing that it was with intention to ſeize and ſecure them, they called many of their particular friends to their aſſiſtence, but ſo few appeared, that they eſteemed their force unable to avail againſt the Vice-king, and therefore they fortified themſelves as well as they could in the Houſe of Judge Cepeda, with intention to defend themſelves if they were aſſaulted.

Amidſt this fear and conſternation, a certain perſon whom Gomara calls Franciſco de Eſcobar, a Native of Sahagun, made a Speech to them, and ſaid; What make we here? Let us goe out in a body into the open Streets, where we may dye fighting like men, and not cooped up like hens, &c.

To this bold Propoſal they all agreed, and the Judges in a deſperate manner ſallyed forth into the Market-place, rather with deſign to deliver up themſelves, than with hopes to prevail: howſoever matters ſucceeded much contrary to their expectation. For the Vice-king who had for a long time, untill the night came on, remained in the Market-place, was perſuaded by his Friends and Captains to retire to his Lodgings: which he had no ſooner done, but the Souldiers and Captains finding themſelves freed from that awe and reſpect which his preſence obliged them unto; revolted with their Companies to take part with the Judges, the firſt of which, who led the way were Martin de Robles and Pedro de Vergara who were followed by others, and ſo by others, untill there was not one perſon remaining to keep guard at the gate of the Vice-king; unleſs about a hundred Souldiers who remained within the houſe and of whom he had made choice for the Guard of his perſon.

CHAP. XV.

The Impriſonment of the Vice-king, and the various Succeſſes which happened thereupon both by Sea and Land.

THough the Judges had the good fortune to have the people revolt to their ſide, and that every hour more came in to join with them: yet howſoever they were ſomewhat wary how they made ſeizure of the perſon of the Vice-king; for it was told them, that he was actually in the Market-place, with a good force, and that he reſolved to aſſail them. Notwithſtanding which they ſallied out into the Market-place, there to defend their cauſe, and the better to ſummon people to their aſſiſtence; they cauſed the Commiſſion given to Martin de Robles to be proclaimed, though by reaſon of the noiſe and tumult of the people little was underſtood. Carate in the eleventh Chapter of his fifth Book reports, that he

he was preſent when the Vice-king was made a priſoner; and that the Judges being in the Market-place, upon break of day ſome Musket-ſhot were made upon them from a Gallery of the Vice-king's houſe, at which the Souldiers who were with the Vice-king were ſo incenſed, that they reſolved to enter his houſe by force, and kill all thoſe who oppoſed them: but the Judges pacified them with good words, and ſent Father Gaſpar de Carvajal, ſuperiour of the Order of St. Dominick, and Antonio de Robles, Brother of Martin de Robles, to let the Vice-king know that they had no other intention than onely to conſerve themſelves from being tranſported and ſhipped away by force, againſt the expreſs Command of his Majeſty. And that if he pleaſed without farther conteſt to come into the great Church, they would there attend him; otherwiſe he would put himſelf into manifeſt danger, with all thoſe who adhered to him. Whilſt theſe Meſſengers were gon to the Vice-king, the hundred Souldiers who were of his Guard forſook him, and revolted alſo to the Judges; and then the Souldiers, finding the entrance open and eaſie, began to plunder the Servants Chambers which were in the Court-yard. About this time Dr. Carate, coming out of his Chamber to joyn with the Vice-king, met the Judges in the way, and ſeeing that he could not have entrance, he went into the Church with them. The Vice-king, having received his Meſſage, and finding him abandoned by all thoſe in whom he had placed the greateſt confidence, he went voluntarily into the Church, and there delivered himſelf up into the hands of the Judges, who brought him to Licenciado Cepeda's Houſe armed as he was with his Coat of Mail and Gantlet; and ſeeing Carate in company with the reſt; What, ſaid he, Carate, are you alſo of this Party? are you come alſo to take me, in whom I repoſed ſo much confidence? To which he replyed, Whoſoever hath told you, that I am of that number lies; for it is notoriouſly known who are the perſons who took you, and who keep you Priſoner. Then Orders were given, that the Vice-king ſhould ſpeedily be embarked upon one of the Ships, and ſent into Spain; leſt Gonçalo Piçarro, coming thither, and finding him in cuſtody, ſhould kill him, or that the Relations of Agent Suarez ſhould deſign the like in revenge for the Murther of their Kinſman; and that what miſchief befell him of that kind, the fault of all would be objected unto them: and farther they conſidered, that in caſe they ſhould ſend him away without ſome force or reſtraint upon him, he might return aſhore, and fall upon them again: what to doe herein they knew not, or what to reſolve, ſo that they ſeemed to repent of what they had already done. Howſoever there was no other remedy now but they muſt proceed; and ſo they made Licenciado Cepeda their Captain General, who, with a ſtrong Guard, conducted the King to the Sea-ſide, with intent to put him aboard a Ship; but herein they found ſome difficulty: for Diego Alvarez Cuero, who was at that time Admiral of the Fleet, ſeeing great numbers of people on the ſhoar, and that they were bringing the Vice-king priſoner, ſent Captain Geronimo Curbano in his Long-boat armed with Small-ſhot, and ſome Petrero's in the head, to command all the Boats belonging to the Fleet to come aboard the Admiral; and with them he went to require the Judges to ſet the Vice-King at liberty: but this action produced little effect, onely ſome Shot were interchanged between the Sea and the Town, and ſo the Admiral returned again to his Ship. After which the Judges ſent off a Boat to Cuero, to require him to ſurrender the Fleet to them, with the Children of the Marquis, and that then they would deliver the Vice-king into his hands to be carried away with one of the Ships; and if not, that he muſt expect the ſequel thereof. This Meſſage was carried with conſent of the Vice-king by Friar Gaſpar de Carvajal, who at the Ship ſide openly declared it, in the preſence of Vaca de Caſtro, who was then a Priſoner on board; which when Diego Alvarez Cuero heard; and conſidered the danger the Vice-king was in, he preſently landed the Children of the Marquis in the Boats belonging to the Fleet together with Don Antonio and his Wife; which being done, the Judges farther required a ſurrender of the whole Fleet, or otherwiſe they threatned to cut off the Head of the Vice-king. During this Treaty, Vela Nunnez, Brother of the Vice-king went to and fro with Meſſages between the Admiral and the Judges; and ſeeing that the Captains of the Ships reſolved not to abandon their Charge, they returned with the Vice-king to the City under a very ſtrong Guard. Two days after which, the Captains of the Fleet received intelligence, that the Judges and Souldiers were contriving means how to ſurprize the Fleet by ſending a ſtrong Party of Muſquetiers in Boats to attack them:

for in regard they found that they could not prevail on Geronimo Curbano, nor corrupt him by the great Offers they made to him; and that the Seamen and Souldiers being Biſcayners were faithfull to Cuero their Commander; the Judges then reſolved to reduce them by force: which when the Captains underſtood, they reſolved to make ſail out of the Port, and paſs their time upon the Coaſt, untill his Majeſty's Orders came to direct ſuch courſe as might tend to a Settlement, of thoſe diſturbances. Farther they conſidered, that aſwell in the City as over all the Kingdom there was a Party well affected to the Vice-king, who had not been concerned in his impriſonment: and that many of the true and loyal Subjects to his Majeſty came daily in to their ſide, and flocked aboard the Ships. That the Fleet was indifferently well provided, having ten or twelve rounds of Iron Shot and four of Copper, and above fourty quintals of Gun-powder: moreover they had four hundred quintals of Biſket, five hundred buſhels of Mayz, and a good ſtock of ſalt Victuals, which Proviſion would ſerve for a long time; and then of Water they could not be hindred, that being to be had along the Coaſt in all parts and places: but then in regard their force was weak, not having above twenty five Souldiers on board, and that the number of their Mariners was not ſufficient to manage ten ſail of Ships, they ſet fire to four of the leſſer Veſſels, and alſo to two Fiſher-boats which lay on the ſhoar, and ſo with the ſix remaining Ships they made ſail into the Sea. The four Ships burned down to the Water, becauſe there was no poſſibility of going out to quench them; but the two Boats were in a manner ſaved, for being taken in time, the Fire was put out, and they received no damage but what was eaſie to be repaired. The ſix Ships ſailed away, and made for Port Guaura, about eighteen leagues to the lee-ward of Los Reyes, where they provided themſelves with Wood and Water, as their neceſſities required; and with them they carried Licenciado Vaca de Caſtro; and being at Guaura they attended to hear the News of what had been the Iſſue of the Vice-king's impriſonment. The Judges having advice hereof; and conſidering that it was not probable the Ships ſhould ſail at a far diſtance whilſt the Vice-king was in ſuch danger of his Life; they reſolved to ſend Forces both by Sea and by Land to ſurprize the Fleet by ſome way or other; in purſuance of which deſign they gave it in charge to Diego Garcia de Alfaro, an Inhabitant of that City, and who was well experienced in maritime Affairs, to repair the Boats which were ſaved on the ſhoar: which being accordingly fitted and lanched into the Water, they armed them with thirty Muſquetiers, and ſailed with them along the Coaſt to lee-ward: and in the mean time John de Mendoça and Ventura Veltran were ſent away by Land with another Detachment, and both theſe Parties having an eye to each other, they obſerved that the Fleet was at an Anchor in Guaura, which when Diego Garcia ſaw, he privately in the night conveyed himſelf behind a rock in the Port, not far diſtant from the Ships, where they could not be ſeen; in the mean time thoſe who were aſhoar began to fire ſome Guns; which they on board taking to be ſome Signal aſhoar which thoſe of the Vice-king's Party had made who were fled, and were deſirous to embark with them; Vela Nunnez was ordered in the Boat to go aſhoar, to diſcover what the matter was; and being juſt at the ſhoar ſide, but not landed, he was purſued in the rere by Diego Garcia and his men; ſo that being cut off from the reſt of the Fleet, Vela Nunnez was forced to yield himſelf and Boat into the hands of the enemy; after which they ſent to ſummon Cuero, telling him, that unleſs he yielded, the Fleet into their hands, they were reſolved to kill both the Vice-king and Vela Nunnez: which Cuero fearing, ſurrendred up his Ships againſt the conſent and opinion of Geronimo Curbano, who, with the ſingle Ship he had commanded, ſet ſail and made towards the firm Land: for that two days before Diego Garcia came thither, Cuero had commanded him to ſail down the Coaſt, and ſeize all the Ships they met, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the Judges: who, from the very time that the Fleet departed from Los Reyes, reſolved to tranſport the Vice-king to a certain Iſland about two Leagues diſtant from that Port, there to ſecure him from the violence of the Agent's kindred who had attempted to kill him; and therefore they ſent him away with a Guard of twenty men upon a ſort of Boats made of dry Ruſhes, which the Indians call Henca. And, having advices of taking the Fleet, they determined to ſend the Vice-king to his Majeſty, in the condition of a Priſoner, with all the Informations and Depoſitions made againſt him which Licenciado Alvarez, one of the Judges, was to carry; and for his reward, and to bear his charges, charges eight thouſand Pieces of Eight were paid him; the which Depoſitions and Proceſs againſt the Vice-king were ſigned by all the Judges, Carate onely excepted. The Ships being then at Guaura the Vice-king was carried thither by Boat, but Alvarez went by Land, where the Vice-king being committed to his charge, he ſailed away with three of the Ships, and was ſo much in haſte that he would not ſtay for the diſpatches from the Judicature, but made Sail without them; and as to Vaca de Caſtro he was carried back to Los Reyes upon one of the Ships which were lately ſeiſed. Thus far are the words of Carate ſpecified in the eleventh Chapter of the fifth Book, whoſe authority in this relation we ſhall more particularly follow, in regard he was preſent and a party concerned in all theſe tranſactions; ſo we ſhall omit the ſayings of other Authours in this matter, unleſs ſomething ſingular occurs on which Carate doth not touch.

CHAP. XVI.

The ſad misfortunes of the Vice-king. A Conſpiracy in Rimac againſt the Judges, and what was done thereupon. The Vice-king is ſet at liberty.

ALL that is before declared is confirmed by Gomara, though in a confuſed manner; who farther proceeds in this manner in the 160th Chapter of his Book, wherein he ſets forth the ſad misfortunes of the unhappy Vice-king.

When the Admiral, ſays he, refuſed to ſurrender up the Ships to ſave the life of the Vice-king, they then treated him with opprobrious words, telling him, that a man who brought ſuch Laws as thoſe deſerved the reward he now received; whereas if he had come without them he had been honoured and adored; but now the Tyrant is taken and our liberty reſtored: with ſuch reproaches as theſe they returned him again into the hands of Cepeda, where they kept him diſarmed in cuſtody of Licenciado Ninno: howſoever he did always eat with Cepeda, and lodged in the ſame Bed with him: but Blaſco Nunnez fearing at this time to be poiſoned, asked Cepeda upon the word of a Gentleman, when they firſt did eat together, whether he might freely and without danger eat with him? the which queſtion was put to him in preſence of Chriſtopher de Barrientos, Martin de Robles, Ninno and other principal perſons; to which Cepeda returned anſwer, am I, ſaid he, ſo mean a ſpirited Raſcal, that if I had a mind to kill you, I could not doe it without ſome ſecret treachery? Your Lordſhip, ſaid he, may eat as freely as if you were at the Table of my Lady Donna Brianda de Acumna, meaning his Wife; and to free you from all jealouſie I will be your Taſter, the which he obſerved all the time that he remained in his Houſe.

One day Friar Gaſpar de Carvajal came to him and told him, that by order of the Judges he was come to confeſs him: the Vice-king asked whether Cepeda was there, and it being anſwered that he was not, and that there was no others than the three afore-mentioned, he cauſed him to be called, and complained to him of his hard fate; but Cepeda comforted him, and aſſured him that there was none had power to take away his life but himſelf onely, the which he ſpake on aſſurance of what had been agreed amongſt them; and then Blaſco Nunnez embraced and kiſſed him on the Cheek in preſence of the Friar. Thus far are the words of Gomara, which we have extracted verbatim: and indeed if we conſider it, 'tis a ſad paſſage, That one elected to be a Prince and Governour of an Empire ſo great as Peru, ſhould be reduced to ſuch miſeries as he was by his own Creatures and Confidents.

This Father Gaſpar de Carvajal was the Friar of whom we made mention formerly in the ſtory of Franciſco Orellana, in what manner he oppoſed him in his treacherous deſign againſt Gonçalo Piçarro, when they were upon the diſcovery of the Cinamon Countrey; and how he was left upon the Trinity Iſland, and returned ned afterwards to Peru, where he declared the many hardſhips they had ſuſtained in that diſcovery.

And upon this occaſion I take leave to report a ſtrange accident, which befell a certain Gentleman named Don John de Mendoça, of whom me made mention in a former Chapter, and whom I knew an Inhabitant in Cozco; which ſtory, becauſe it is curious, and perhaps not rarely happening in the world before, 'tis fit it ſhould be known, and the memory thereof conſerved. This Gentleman, I ſay, upon a ſolemn Feſtival, throwing the Dart on Horſeback in the Market-place of Mexico, before he paſſed to Peru; for he was one of thoſe Gallants who accompanied the famous Don Pedro de Alvarado, and running with his Horſe full ſpeed, juſt as he was riſing on his ſtirrups to throw his Dart with all his force, his Horſe on a ſudden made a full ſtop, and he being a tall and a ſlimm man, and weak in the knees, was caſt over the Horſes head, with his feet hanging in the ſtirrups, and his hands on the ground to ſave his face; in which condition he had ran great hazard of his life, had not ſome Friends who were near him, (amongſt which my Lord and Maſter Garçilaſſo de la Vega was one) come timely to his aſſiſtance. Pardon this ſhort digreſſion for the ſtrangeneſs of the accident; and ſo we ſhall return again to our Hiſtory.

Tirar cannos is a ſport in Spain much uſed on Horſeback, and which the Spaniards learned from the Moors, uſed alſo by the Turks.

During the time that the Vice-king remained a Priſoner at the Iſland, which is diſtant about two leagues from the Port, Don Alonſo de Monte-mayor (as Auguſtine de Carate reports in the twelfth Chapter of his fifth Book) together with thoſe who were ſent in purſuit of Father Loayſa returned, ſome of which the Judges ſeiſed upon and impriſoned, and others of them they diſarmed, and impriſoned them with ſeveral others who came from Cozco in the Houſes of Captain Martin de Robles and of other Citizens; and being thus ill-treated, they laid a Plot to kill the Judges and ſet the Vice-king at liberty, reſtoring him to his power and authority, which they contrived in this manner: It was ordered that in the night ſome Muſquets ſhould be fired in the Houſe of Martin de Robles, which ſhould be a ſignal to Serjeant Francis de Aguirre, who then kept Guard in Licenciado Cepeda's Houſe to kill him, and immediately to poſſeſs and keep the avenues and corners of every Street with Souldiers, and ſend a Party into the Market-place, which giving an alarm to Doctour Texada and Licenciado Alvarez, 'tis probable they would come forth to relieve Cepeda, when they would be ready to kill them, and then they would immediately raiſe the City and declare for the King; the which had certainly ſucceeded accordingly, had not one who was a Native of Madrid, and appointed to act in the Plot, diſcovered all to Cepeda, about an hour before the deſign was to be put in execution. Immediately hereupon Cepeda iſſued out Warrants to ſeiſe the chief of thoſe who were concerned in the Plot, namely Don Alonſo de Monte-mayor, Paul de Meneſes a Citizen of Talavera, Captain Carceres, Alonſo de Barrionuevo, with others, who were Servants to the Vice-king; and having examined the matter Barrionuevo was condemned to die, but upon farther conſideration, his Sentence was to have his right Hand cut off, having been the firſt contriver in this Conſpiracy; and thus this inſurrection was ſuppreſſed. Thus far Carate.

To which we may farther add, That though the Judges found divers others guilty of that mutiny, whom they might juſtly have puniſhed with death, yet not to appear bloudy and tyrannical, which might be occaſion of new Plots and Conſpiracies, and alſo upon the interceſſion of divers principal Perſons of the City of Los Reyes, they altered the Sentence againſt Barrionuevo, as we have before declared, and baniſhed Alonſo de Monte-mayor and others his Complices from the City into divers parts Northwards from thence. All which afterward joyned with the Vice-king, and accompanied him in all his misfortunes, which proved the ruine of many of them. After which Carate proceeds on with the Hiſtory in this manner,

The news of theſe paſſages as they every day ſucceeded were carried to Gonçalo Piçarro, ſuppoſing that upon intelligence of theſe matters he would preſently diſband his Army: but he was far from that intention, becauſe he imagined that the rumour of the Vice-king's impriſonment was divulged with deſign to diſperſe his People, that being abandoned and deſerted by all, they might diſpoſe of his own Perſon at their pleaſure; which cauſed him to keep his Forces together, and to march more orderly and cautiouſly than before. But Licenciado Alvarez, who was embarked with the Vice-king, being conſcious to himſelf that he had been a chief promoter and actour in the deſigns againſt him, and in the puniſhment of

of those who had plotted to set him at liberty, and being desirous to reconcile himself to him, went the same day that he made Sail, and was at Sea, unto the Cabbin of the Vice-king, and there, to excuse himself, told him, that the Office he had undertaken was with intent to doe him service, and to free him out of the hands of Cepeda, and from the danger of falling into the power of Gonçalo Piçarro, whose arrival in those parts was shortly expected; and that he might be assured of his reality in this matter, he entirely resigned to him the command of the Ship, together with his liberty, and that he himself was at his disposal, and devoted to his service, beseeching him to pardon his past errours and faults which he confessed to have been great in his confederacy with others against him, and that the merit of restoring him to life and liberty might attone and satisfie for his former crimes; and accordingly he gave Orders to the ten men, whom he brought with him for Guards to the Vice-king, that they should henceforward observe and follow the commands of his Lordship. The Vice-king returned him thanks, and told him that he accepted the proffer, and accordingly took the command of the Ship and Arms, and carried himself fair towards him for a while; but this good humour lasted not long before he began to treat him with more rude terms, calling him Villain, Mutinier, and other opprobrious names, swearing that he would hang him, and though he reprieved him for the present, it was onely becaus he had occasion for his service. And this kind of deportment he used towards him, during the time they were in company together, sailing along the Coast to the City of Truxillo, where many things happened which we shall hereafter relate. Thus far Carate, whose words we have repeated verbatim, and who proceeds farther in this relation in the thirteenth Chapter of his Book.

CHAP. XVII.

The Summons which the Judges sent to Gonçalo Piçarro, and the misfortunes which befell those who deserted his Cause.

Alvarez having set Sail and at Sea, it was reported at Los Reyes that he and the Vice-king were agreed, to which they gave the greater credit, by some circumstances in his behaviour before he departed; and more especially because he did not expect the dispatches which the Judges were preparing, and which Carate had purposely delayed with pretence that they should be forwarded the day following. This matter much troubled the Judges, for that this Alvarez had been the chief promoter and instrument of the Vice-king's imprisonment, and had been more concerned therein than any of the others: but whilst they were doubtfull of the meaning and intention of Alvarez, it was thought fit to send a message to Gonçalo Piçarro, giving him information of what had succeeded, and to require him, by virtue of their Commission from the King, whereby they were authorised and impowered to administer Justice, and to order and command such things as tended to the peace and welfare of that Countrey, that he should immediately disband his Army and repair to the City, in regard they had already suspended the execution of the new Laws, which was the sum of the Petition for which they came, and had sent the Vice-king into Spain, which was a point of higher satisfaction than they had demanded or pretended unto before: wherefore in regard all matters were appeased, they required him to come in a peaceable manner without an Army; and in case he should desire to have a Guard for the security of his Person, he might, if he pleased, come attended with fifteen or twenty Horse. This command being dispatched away, the Judges would have seconded it by some Citizens for the better countenance of the matter, but there was none that would accept the Office, apprehending some danger might be in it; saying, that they might be blamed by Gonçalo Piçarro and his Party for taking upon them such a message to them, who pretended to come for the security of their Estates against ſuch as in general were enemies to them. Hereupon the Judges ſent Inſtructions to Auguſtine Carate, Accountant General of the Kingdom, that he together in company with Don Antonio de Ribera, an inhabitant of that City, ſhould go and ſignifie theſe matters, for which he was authoriſed by the Credentials which were given him: and accordingly they departed, and travelled as far as the Valley of Xauxa, where Gonçalo Piçarro was encamped; who being already informed of the meſſage which they brought, which he knew would be unwelcome to his People, for they apprehending that this meſſage was brought with intention to disband them, and thereby defeat them of the hopes they had to ſack and plunder the City of Lima, might probably thereupon fall into a mutiny; to prevent which Jeronimo Villegas, Captain of Piçarro's own Company, was diſpeeded away with thirty Muſquetiers mounted on Horſeback to intercept the meſſengers in their way; and having met them coming, they ſuffered Antonio de Ribera to proceed to the Camp; but they ſtopped Auguſtine de Carate, and took his diſpatches from him, and returned him back by the ſame way that he came, as far as the Province of Pariacaca, where they detained him Priſoner for the ſpace of ten days, with terrours and threats, unleſs he deſiſted from farther proſecution of his Meſſage; and in this condition he remained untill ſuch time as Gonçalo Piçarro arrived there with his Camp. Thus far are the words of Carate, which are again confirmed by other Authours, who proceed and ſay, That thoſe of the Corporation of the City of Los Reyes, made choice of Don Antonio de Ribera and Auguſtine de Carate Accountant General, becauſe they were both men acceptable to Gonçalo Piçarro, and the leaſt ſuſpected by him; for that Don Antonio was as it were his Brother-in-law, having married the Widow of Franciſco Martin de Alçantara, Brother to the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro, and Carate was a Perſon, who being a ſtranger in the Countrey, had no engagements or obligations in any part of the Countrey; for which cauſe, as we ſaid, they ſuffered Don Antonio to paſs, by reaſon of his alliance, but the Accountant Carate was ſtopped by them. Thus much is confirmed by Diego Fernandez, who adds farther in the twenty fourth Chapter of his Book. That at the Council held by Gonçalo Piçarro and his Captains, to conſider of the Anſwer which was to be returned to the Meſſage ſent by the Judges, they onely touched upon one point thereof, to which Franciſco de Carvajal like a great Officer and Souldier made this reply, That whereas the Judges did require that Gonçalo Piçarro ſhould come to them with a Guard onely of fifteen or twenty Horſe, they underſtood it to be ſo many in a Rank, to which interpretation all the Captains in the Council agreed, and concluded that it was neceſſary for the welfare of the Publick to create Gonçalo Piçarro chief Governour, and in all other things they would comply with the Judges, and that in caſe they ſhould refuſe to accept theſe Propoſals, they were reſolved to put the City to Fire and Sword, &c. Thus far Diego Fernandez Palentino.

But now to return to Graviel de Rojas, and Garcilaſſo de la Vega, and other Inhabitants and Gentlemen of Cozco, who deſerted Gonçalo Piçarro and were fled to Arequepa, whence not finding paſſage by Sea they travelled along by the Sea coaſt, and being at length arrived at Los Reyes, they found themſelves much at a loſs, for that the Vice-king, whoſe fortune they intended to follow, was already taken, and embarked by force for Spain; and whereas the Judges had a chief hand in this Conſpiracy againſt the Vice-king, and thereby ſeemed rather to incline to the Faction of Gonçalo Piçarro than to Blaſco Nunnez Vela, they were reſolved not to engage with them. Though if we impartially conſider of theſe matters, we ſhall find that the intention of the Judges was not as ill Tongues ſcandalouſly reported, but was to prevent worſe and more dangerous conſequences, proceeding from the Vice-king, who was abhorred and hated by all men of Eſtates and Intereſt in that Countrey, againſt whom he came chiefly to put the new Laws in execution. Howſoever theſe Gentlemen, looking with a prejudicial eye upon thoſe things which the Judges had acted, refuſed to joyn with them whom they eſteemed to be favourers of the cauſe of Piçarro. And whereas no Party appeared to ſet up the Royal intereſt, they knew not unto whom they might adhere; for they found themſelves in the power of their enemies, not being able to eſcape from them either by Sea or Land: for after the Vice-king's impriſonment all the Countrey declared for Piçarro; but the greateſt number of the contrary party remained in the City of Los Reyes, not having any other place whereunto to repair; others abſconded themſelves amongſt their Friends and Relations; for having been all engaged engaged in the conqueſt of that Kingdom, their mutual concernment for each other was ſuch as to favour one the other to their utmoſt power; but others who would not truſt themſelves in the Town removed far from it, and lived amongſt the Indians, the which proved the more ſecure courſe, for thereby they ſaved their lives, whilſt many others were put to death by the cruelty of the advers Party. And indeed this was the misfortune of Lewis de Ribera, and of Antonio Alvarez, and of twenty four or twenty five Gentlemen more, who were all Inhabitants of the City of Plate, which is about thirty Leagues diſtant from Los Reyes, who came with deſign to ſerve the King: and having paſſed and endured great hardſhips in their travails and difficulties to avoid falling into the hands of Piçarro and his people, they came at length near to Los Reyes, where they received the unwelcome News of the misfortunes of the Vice-king; how, and in what manner, he was impriſoned, embarked and ſent to Sea; with this ſad intelligence they gave themſelves for loſt; for neither durſt they adventure into the City, becauſe all the Countrey had declared for Piçarro, nor did they think it Prudence, voluntarily to truſt themſelves in the power of the enemy: Wherefore every one took his proper courſe and ſhifted for himſelf. The like many other Gentlemen did, who came to ſerve his Majeſty under the Vice-king, ſo that they were ſcattered and diſperſed over all the Countrey. And ſome not eſteeming themſelves ſafe in the Parts of Peru, fled to the Mountains of Antis, where they were famiſhed or devoured by Tigers; others were taken by the ſalvage Indians, not as yet conquered and ſacrificed to their Idols. Thus men out of fear of falling into the hands of their Enemies precipitated themſelves into deſperate Courſes, eſteeming Barbarians and wild Beaſts to have more Bowels of compaſſion than Tyrants. This direfull effect had the immoderate and ungoverned Paſſion of the Vice-king, for had he been a man of any temper, he had ſurmounted all his difficulties, and had been defended by the powerfull ſuccours of the Rich, Noble, and Perſons of the greateſt Intereſt, who were the Flower of Cozco, and the Charcas; when on the contrary, both he and his party were loſt, being expoſed to the Cruelties of War and to the mercy of their Enemies, who put many of them to death.

CHAP. XVIII.

Gonçalo Piçarro comes to the City of Los Reyes. Several Citizens of note are put to death, becauſe the Judges delayed to proclaim Piçarro Governour.

AND now Piçarro, taking ſhort marches towards the City of Los Reyes, by reaſon of the great Incumbrance of Cannon which he had with him, came at length to the Province called Pariacaca, where Auguſtin Carate was lately ſtopped and deteined; and there called him before him to relate the Meſſage which he brought to him; which Carate, in the thirteenth Chapter of his fifth Book, declares in theſe words, I, ſaid he, knowing the danger I was in of my life, did in the firſt place communicate the buſineſs I had in charge to Piçarro in private; who afterwards cauſed me to be introduced into the Tent, where all his Captains were aſſembled, and there commanded me to declare that which I had before imparted unto him. And Carate ſaith farther, that being informed of the mind of Piçarro, he made uſe of his Letters of Credence from the Judges, to declare in their behalf and in their names many things tending to his Majeſty's Service and for the good and benefit of the Countrey: particularly, that ſince the Vice-king was embarked, and ſent away, whereby their deſires were allowed and granted; That they ſhould make good unto his Majeſty the Treaſure which Blaſco Nunnez Vela had conſumed and ſpent, as they had already made known by their Letters: that a Pardon ſhould be granted to the Citizens of Cozco, who had revolted from his Camp to ſerve the Vice-king, which might eaſily be granted, conſidering the Juſtice of their Cauſe: And that Meſſengers ſhould be ſent to his Majeſty, to inform him of the ſtate of Affairs, and of all the paſſages which had occurred, and to excuſe whatſoever had paſſed, with many other things of this nature. To which Particulars no other Anſwer was given, than that he ſhould tell the Judges, that for the good of the Countrey, it was requiſite to make Piçarro Governour thereof; and when that was done, they would then take ſuch other Meaſures for the publick good, as ſhould be propoſed by them; and on the contrary, in caſe of refuſal, they would give up the City of Los Reyes to be plundred and ſacked by the Souldiery. With this Anſwer Carate returned to the Judges, who were troubled to receive a Meſſage ſo contrary to their expectations, and ſo plain and publick a Declaration of the mind of Piçarro, whom they once believed to be better inclined, and to have no other deſigns and pretenſions, than onely the expulſion of the Vice-king, and the ſuſpenſion of the new Laws; wherefore in anſwer to this demand they returned a meſſage to the Captains, giving them to underſtand, that having conſidered of their Propoſals, they knew not how to grant or treat on them, unleſs they were delivered in writing according to the uſual methods and way of proceedings in thoſe matters. When this matter was known, all the Repreſentatives of the ſeveral Cities which were going to the Camp returned back again, and joining with thoſe of other Corporations, who were then aſſembled at Los Reyes, gave in a Petition to the Judges ſitting on the Bench, deſiring a conceſſion of what was verbally required. The Judges conſidered hereof, as a matter of great concernment and dangerous, for they had no Commiſſion to warrant them in this Declaration, nor had they liberty or power at that time to refuſe it: for Piçarro had made by this time a very near approach to the City, and had poſſeſſed himſelf of all the ways and avenues thereunto: ſo that in this ſtrait and difficulty they reſolved to conſult with the perſons of greateſt power and authority in the City, and to deſire their opinion and concurrence with them, a memorial whereof they ſent to Friar Geronimo de Loayſa Archbiſhop of Los Reyes, to Friar John Salano Archbiſhop of Cozco, to Garcia Diaz Biſhop of Quita, to Friar Thomas de San Martin Provincial of the Dominicans, and to Auguſtine Carate Accountant, Treaſurer and Comptroller of his Majeſty's revenue, deſiring their opinion and ſenſe in this matter of high concernment; not that they were to ſeek or doubtfull in what could legally be done or required, or that they were at liberty to grant or refuſe what Gonçalo Piçarro and his Captains required, but onely that theſe perſons might bear their part in the burthen, and become Witneſſes that what they granted to Piçarro was extorted by force, and not yielded by a voluntary conſent.

Whilſt theſe matters were debating Gonçalo Piçarro advanced within a quarter of a League of the City, where he pitched his Camp and planted his Batteries of Cannon: and perceiving that they delayed to anſwer his Demands, he ſent the night following thirty Muſquetiers under the command of one of his chief Officers unto the City; who there ſeized upon twenty eight perſons who came from Cozco, and others, againſt whom he had a quarrel for taking part with the Vice-king: amongſt which were Graviel de Rojas, Garcilaſſo de la Vega, Melchior Verdugo, Dr. Carvajal and Peter del Barco, Martin de Florencia, Alonſo de Carceres, Peter de Manjaires, Lewis de Leon, Anthony Ruys de Guevara, with ſeveral other perſons of quality in that Countrey, whom he committed to the common Priſon; of which taking the keys and poſſeſſion, they turned out the Alcade, and took the whole power out of the hands of the Judges, who were not able to contradict or withſtand the Power which was againſt them; for in the whole City there were not fifty men of the Sword; for thoſe Parties which once declared for the Vice-king and the Judges were now revolted to the Camp of Piçarro, with which, and with the men he brought with him, he made up twelve hundred men, all well equipped and armed; in confidence of which force, ſome of the Captains came to the City, and plainly told the Judges, that unleſs they ſpeedily diſpatched their buſineſs and proclaimed Piçarro Governour, they would put all the City to Fire and Sword, and that they ſhould be the firſt with whom they would begin.

The Judges excuſed themſelves aſmuch as they were able, ſaying, That they had no power to doe any ſuch thing; whereupon Carvajal, the Officer that was ſent, immediately took four perſons of thoſe who were committed to Priſon; three of which, namely, Peter de Barco, Martin de Florencia, and John de Saavedra, and hanged them together on a Tree near to the City, reproaching them with opprobrious and bitter language at the time of their death, not giving to theſe three ſo much as half an hour's time to make their confeſſion and prepare their ſouls for death;

death; telling Peter del Barco particularly, who was the laſt of the three which he hanged; That in regard he had been a Captain, and one of the Conquerours of that Countrey, and was a perſon of quality, and one of the richeſt in thoſe parts, he would grant him this privilege at his death, to chuſe which of the boughs he pleaſed for his gallows. But to Lewis de Leon his Life was granted at the Interceſſion of a brother of his, who was a Souldier in Gonçalo Piçarro's Army, and who begged it as a ſpecial grace and favour unto him.

The Judges being terrified with this piece of Cruelty, and fearing leſt the like ſentence ſhould be executed on all the others who were then in priſon, and that the City ſhould be given up for a prey to the Souldiery, in caſe they deferred longer to perform their demands. They with all earneſtneſs ſent to the perſons to whoſe Counſels they had referred themſelves in this matter, that they ſhould immediately give in their opinions: whereupon every one, nemine contradicente, gave their Votes, that the Government ſhould be conferred on Gonçalo Piçarro; which the Judges inſtantly made known to him', ſurrendring up to him all the Power of that Province untill ſuch time as his Majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known therein: And hereupon they renounced their Commiſſions of hearing and determining Cauſes, and reſigned all into the Governours hands, giving ſecurity to reſide in the City, and ſit on the Bench, and hear all Cauſes and Actions of complaint which ſhould be brought before them. Thus far Auguſtine de Carate.

And here we will cut ſhort the Thread of this Diſcourſe, leſt we ſhould ſeem over tedious in this Chapter.

CHAP. XIX.

Gonçalo Piçarro is proclaimed Governour of Peru, His Entry into the City of Los Reyes. The death of Captain Gumiel. The Citizens of Cozco are ſet at Liberty.

THE execution of Pedro del Barco, Martin de Florencia, and John de Saavedra made a great noiſe, and was occaſion of much diſcontent and murmurings both in the City and in the Camp: for (as Diego Fernandez de Carvajal reports in the twenty fifth Chapter of his Book) the people apprehended, that as Franciſco de Carvajal had been ſo bloudy as to kill thoſe three, he would farther proceed in his Tragedy to the death of all the others who were impriſoned for the like cauſe: for which reaſon many of the Citizens of Rimac and Captains and Souldiers of the Army made their Addreſſes to Gonçalo Piçarro, beſeeching him not to ſuffer the effuſion of ſo much Noble Bloud, and of perſons who had been Inſtruments and engaged in the Conqueſt of the Empire; for ſuch an Act of Cruelty would render him odious to the whole World. Whereupon Gonçalo Piçarro, who was a perſon of a tender and flexible nature, gave immediately a very rich Medal and a Ring to be carried to Franciſco Carvajal (who well knew that both of them belonged to Piçarro) to ſerve for a token and ſign to him to deſiſt from farther ſpilling of Bloud.

But as to the particulars of what is related farther concerning the death of thoſe men whom Carvajal put to death; I have learned from thoſe who were then preſent, that thoſe Citizens were put to death ſolely by the will and authority of Carvajal, without the order, privity or knowledge of Gonçalo Piçarro. For all the Commiſſion which he had was this, that he ſhould goe, and quiet the people; for underſtanding that all the City being in great conſternation, were ready to abandon the place; he ſent him with Orders to pacifie them, that they might rejoice at his Arrival. Carvajal, who well enough underſtood his meaning, replied to him, ſaying, I promiſe your Lordſhip, that I will ſo order Matters, that they ſhall be obliged to goe forth and meet you: to perform and make good his word, (according to the Martial way of expreſſion) he hanged the three men in the way where Piçarro was to paſs, which he called the meeting of him, and ſaid, that this was the onely means to affright the Judges and the whole City, and to haſten them in their Votes to proclaim Piçarro Governour, as all the Repreſentatives of the Kingdom deſired. But the truth is Gonçalo Piçarro was much troubled to underſtand of the death of theſe three perſons, whom he cauſed to be taken from the Trees, before he paſſed that way; declaring that he had no hand in that execution, and that he neither commanded the ſame, nor knew thereof. And it is farther ſaid by Diego Fernandez in the twenty fifth Chapter of his Book, that the Decree proclaiming Gonçalo Piçarro Governour was generally pleaſing both to the City and to the Army; becauſe it was the common opinion of all, that in that conjuncture, nothing could tend more to the ſettlement and quiet of the Kingdom than that: And moreover, it was believed that his Majeſty would confirm him therein, in conſideration of the great ſervices which his brother, the Marquis had performed to the Crown; as alſo for other Cauſes which they alledged in favour and honour of Gonçalo Piçarro himſelf: For now fortune being of his ſide, the people began to ſpeak favourably of him; and he, carrying himſelf with pretences of reſtoring to them their Liberty, was generally cryed up and beloved of all; and eſpecially ſucceeding the Vice-king, who was hated and deteſted by all mankind. Thus far are the words of Diego Fernandez: After which Carate, in the thirteenth Chapter of his Book, proceeds, and ſays:

The Inſtrument for conſtituting Piçarro Governour being paſſed; he made his Entry into the City in State and triumph. In the firſt place, Captain Bachicao led the Van-guard with two and twenty Pieces of Cannon made for the field, which were carried on the Shoulders of ſix thouſand Indians (as we have mentioned before) with all the other train of Artillery and Ammunition thereunto belonging, and as they marched they fired the Cannon in the Streets; and for Guard to the Artillery thirty Muſquetiers and fifty Gunners were appointed.

After which followed the Company under command of Captain Diego Gumiel, which conſiſted of two hundred Pique-men, after which followed Captain Guevara with a hundred and fifty Muſquetiers; and then came the Company of Pedro Cermenno conſiſting of two hundred Harquebuſiers; immediately after which followed Gonçalo Picarro himſelf with three Companies of Foot, attending like Foot-men by his ſide, and he mounted on a very fine Horſe, and cloathed with a Coat of Mail, over which he wore a thin Coat of cloth of gold; after him marched three Captains with their Troops of Horſe, in midſt of which Don Pedro Porto Carrero ſupported the Royal Standard; on his right hand Antonio Altamirano carried the Enſign of Cozco, and on the left Pedro de Puelles carried the Colours in which the Arms of Piçarro were painted; after which all the Cavalry followed armed in form and point of War. And in this order they marched to the houſe of Licenciado Carate, where the other Judges were aſſembled, (which was a default on Carate's ſide, for he ought rather to have received him in the place of publick Judicature) but here Piçarro leaving his Forces drawn up in the open Market-place, went up into the Chamber where the Judges attended, and received him with due order and reſpect, and having taken the Oath, and given the Security which is uſual; he went to the Town-houſe, where the Mayor, Sheriffs and other Officers received him with the accuſtomary Solemnities; and thence he went to his own Lodgings; and in the mean time the Officers quartered the Souldiers both Horſe and Foot in the private houſes of the Citizens, giving order that they ſhould entertain them upon Free-quarter.

This entry of Piçarro into the City, and his reception there, happened towards the end of the month of October 1544, being forty days after the impriſonment of the Vice-king; and from that time forward Piçarro attended wholly to the management of his martial Affairs, and to matters relating thereunto, leaving all civil Cauſes and proceedings in Law to the Judges, who held their Courts in the Houſe of the Treaſurer Alonſo Riquelme. And then he ſent to Cozco for his Deputy Alonſo de Toro, to Arequepa for Pedro de Tuentes, to the Villa de Plata for Franciſco de Almendras, and to other Cities for the principal Governours thereof. Thus far are the words of Auguſtine Carate. To which Fernandez Palentino in the ſixteenth Chapter of his Book adds and ſays, That Diego Centeno having accompanied Gonçalo Piçarro in quality of Procuratour for the Town of Plate, as far as Los Reyes, he there found that Piçarro had preferred his great Friend Franciſco de Almendras to be Captain and chief Juſticiary of that Town; and therefore he deſired him to move Piçarro that he might be diſmiſſed and go along with him to the Villa de la Plata, becauſe becauſe his Houſe and Eſtate was in thoſe parts; which licenſe being obtained, they travelled together to the Charcas, where ſome time afterwards, when Diego Centeno declared for the King, he ſurpriſed and killed him: and though in excuſe hereof it may be alledged that it was done for the King's ſervice, yet he can never wipe off that blot of Ingratitude; for during the time of the Conqueſt, when Diego Centeno came very young into the Countrey, he was ſupported and provided for in all his neceſſities, and in the time of his ſickneſs, by Franciſco de Almendras, who was a rich, and a principal perſon of quality in thoſe days, and took the ſame care of him as if he had been his Son; the which benefits and kindneſſes Diego Centeno publickly owned, and when they were in private he called him Father, as Almendras called him Son: and therefore he ought for ever to be branded with Ingratitude, unleſs the publick concernment for his Prince be able to untie and aboliſh all other private obligations and endearments whatſoever.

Gonçalo Piçarro, finding himſelf now inveſted in his Power and Government, which he held both by virtue of the Royal Grant given to his Brother the Marquis, in whoſe right he pretended thereunto, and now by the conſent and election of the Judges, began to give out his own Commiſſion to Officers both Military and Civil, and to ſit and hear Cauſes, which he diſpatched with great readineſs, adminiſtring Juſtice with Reputation and Authority, to the contentment and ſatisfaction of the whole City; but theſe ſmooth and chearfull proceedings were mixed with their troubles and misfortunes. For Captain Diego Gumiel, who untill this time had always ſhewed himſelf zealous and paſſionate in the cauſe of Piçarro, began to alter his humour, and ſpeak againſt him, becauſe he had refuſed to grant him a piece of Land with a Command over Indians, which he asked of him in behalf of a certain Friend of his: and with that occaſion he railed againſt the Judges, ſaying, that they had unjuſtly taken away the Government from the Son of Marquis Franciſco Piçarro to whom it appertained by lawfull inheritance deſcended from his Father, in virtue of a Grant from his Majeſty, to confer it upon one who had no right nor title thereunto; and for that reaſon he declared, that he would uſe his utmoſt endeavours that the Son of the Marquis might recover his own Inheritance. Gumiel frankly diſcourſing at this rate, without regard to the place where, or the perſon to whom he vented his paſſion, at length the reports thereof coming to the ears of Piçarro, he gave his immediate Orders to his Major-General that he ſhould examine this matter, and take ſuch courſe as might reſtrain the licentious Tongue of that Captain for the future. It is certain, that the meaning of Piçarro was not to put Gumiel to death, though Carvajal put that interpretation upon it, and having asked ſome queſtions about the matter, and hearing them confirmed, went directly to Gumiel's Lodgings, where without more to doe he ſtrangled him, and drew his Body into the Market-place, ſaying, give way, Gentlemen, for Captain Diego Gumiel, who hath proteſted and ſworn that he will never ſay the like things again. And thus poor Gumiel ended his-days, having loſt his life by the intemperance of his Tongue, which hath been the ruine of many a man, but good to none.

CHAP. XX.

The Feſtivals and Rejoycings which were made for Gonçalo Piçarro. A general Pardon given to all thoſe who were fled away. The place where Garçilaſſo de la Vega was retired, and how he obtained his Pardon from Gonçalo Piçarro.

Piçarro and his Captains, being ſwelled with the vanity and oſtentation of being Governours and ſupreme Lords of Peru, appointed days of Feſtival to celebrate their Triumphs, after the manner of Spain; as namely the ſport of baiting ting Bulls, throwing the Dart, and Lotteries; in which latter many drew ingenious Mottoes, or Sayings, and others ſcurrilous Sentences, like Libels, of which though I remember ſeveral, yet I think it not convenient to repeat any of them in this place.

Upon the day of this ſolemn rejoycing, orders were given to ſet thoſe Gentlemen at liberty who were the Citizens of Cozco, committed to Priſon by Carvajal, as we mentioned before. Moreover he granted a general Pardon to thoſe who were not as yet come in, onely Licenciado Carvajal was excepted, becauſe he having been his intimate Friend, had deſerted him, and alſo Garçilaſſo de la Vega, as Diego Fernandez Palentino reports in Chap. 27th of his firſt Book, as alſo Auguſtine de Carate, but we muſt take leave to contradict theſe Authours, who have failed in this particular paſſage, of which we are able to give a more certain relation. Gonçalo Piçarro gave eſpecial order that no man ſhould go out of the City without his licenſe; which Rodrigo Nunnez and Pedro de Prado demanding they were both put to death, becauſe they gave evil example, and ſeemed to put jealouſies and fears into the minds of the people: and in this manner, we ſee, that there was no joy without a mixture of ſorrow, nor ſlaughters, nor effuſion of bloud without rejoycings; which in Civil Wars take their turns and changes.

But to come to the particulars of what happened at that time in the City of Los Reyes; we are to take notice, how that at that time Franciſco de Carvajal ſeiſed all the Citizens of Cozco who had deſerted his cauſe, excepting onely Garçilaſſo de la Vega, who eſcaped by a mere accident, as the Hiſtorians relate: For that very night when Carvajal knocked at the door to come in and take him, a certain Souldier went forth to open the door, whoſe name was Hernando Perez Tablero, a Native of the Town of Almendras in the Dukedom of Feria, Foſter-brother with Don Alonſo de Vargas my Uncle by the Father's ſide. This Hernando Perez, who as well for being of the ſame Countrey, being all of Eſtremennos, as alſo on ſcore of Relation, for both he and his Father and Grandfather had been Servants unto mine, and he at that time actually in ſervice of Garçilaſſo de la Vega, my Lord and Father; knowing Franciſco Carvajal by his voice, without making any anſwer returned immediately to my Father, and told him that Carvajal was at the Gate knocking to come in: whereupon my Father made his eſcape out of the Houſe as well as he could, and fled to the Convent of St. Domingo, where the Friars received and concealed him in a little private place, where he remained for the ſpace of four months.

Carvajal having ſome intelligence that he was abſconded in the Monaſtery, and the rather ſuſpecting it, becauſe it was near to his Houſe, took ſome Souldiers with him, and ſearched every private place and corner, that no place ſeemed to be undiſcovered, unleſs the whole Houſe had been thrown down; and herein they uſed all the diligence imaginable, for Gonçalo Piçarro conceived all the malice and deſpight againſt him that was poſſible, and therefore endeavoured to take him and put him to death: for he often complained of him, and ſaid, that they had been Comrades together in the conqueſt of Collao, and the Charcas, had eaten at the ſame Table, and ſlept in the ſame Chamber together, and by reaſon of ſuch obligations he ſhould never have deſerted and denied his cauſe, much leſs have been the Head of a Faction againſt him, and a means to perſuade others to forſake his Party.

Moreover Carvajal made four other ſearches after Garçilaſſo, and at one time he lifted up the hanging on the ſide of the High Altar, where was a nick or corner where they lodged the moſt Holy Sacrament, and there was a poor Souldier hid, and crouched up in a dark hole; but Carvajal perceiving that it was not the perſon for whom he ſought, let down the Hanging again, crying aloud, the perſon is not here for whom we ſeek. A while after came another of his Souldiers, called Porras, who being deſirous to ſhew himſelf more diligent and officious than ordinary, lifted up the Hanging of the High Altar, and there diſcovered the poor Souldier whom Carvajal had purpoſely over-ſeen: but Porras, ſo ſoon as he eſpied him, cried out, here is the Traitour, here is the Traitour. Carvajal was troubled that he was found out, but in regard he was a principal Leader of the Faction againſt Piçarro, he could not do leſs than take notice of him; and ſo drawing him forth from his retirement, cauſed him to be confeſſed by the Friars of the Convent, and then hanged him up: but Porras did not eſcape the vengeance of Heaven for this Fact, as we ſhall underſtand by the ſequel.

At

At another time it happened out, That Carvajal ſo unexpectedly came into the Monaſtery to make another ſearch, That Garçilaſſo de la Vega was altogether ſurprized, not knowing where to retire; but haſtily ran into an empty Cell, where was no Bed nor other furniture under which he might cover himſelf; onely ſome Shelves of Books covered with a Curtain juſt fronting to the Door, and a little diſtant from the Wall, ſo that a man might creep between the Shelves and that; and there my Father thruſt and crouded himſelf. Two or three of thoſe who came to ſearch this Houſe came into this Cell; and obſerving it be void and empty, and believing that the Shelves were faſtned to the Wall, ſo that nothing could enter between, they went out again, ſaying, he is not here: Many of theſe hazardous Adventures my Father ran, whilſt Gonçalo Piçarro was at Los Reyes, during which time his Friends, (of which he had many) interceded for him with Gonçalo Piçarro to obtain his pardon, and at length prevailed to have him pardoned as to his Life, upon condition that he ſhould not ſee him nor come into his preſence; ſaying, that he ought not to be admitted thereunto, who had violated all the Laws of Friendſhip, Society and relation of Countrey-men: but having thus far obtained his Pardon, he came out of the Monaſtery, and retired privately into a Chamber, where he remained ſeveral days, untill the importunity of Friends ſo far prevailed with Piçarro in his behalf to grant him a complete Pardon, and admittance to his preſence; after which he kept him always in his company, under the notion of a Priſoner, not ſuffering him to go out of his Houſe or eat from his Table, and when in the Field, not to lie out of his Tent; and in this condition he continued untill the day when the Battel of Sacſahuana was fought. And for this cauſe, in regard he was always as a Priſoner with Gonçalo Piçarro, none of the three Authours make any mention of him in their Hiſtories; but I who was ſo nearly concerned, knew all theſe particulars with the ſufferings of my Father, who being diſpoſſeſſed of his Eſtate for the ſpace of three years, both he, and I, and the reſt of my Brethren, being eight in number, were forced to live upon the Charity and Alms of well-diſpoſed perſons. This nearneſs which cauſed Gonçalo Piçarro to keep my Father to him, was to ſecure him that he ſhould not eſcape from him; and the reaſon why he entertained him at his Table, becauſe he knew that he had not wherewith to eat at any other place, and he was ſo generous as not to ſuffer him to have the obligation to any but himſelf. And ſuch was the neceſſity and want which my Father laboured under at that time, that, after the death of the Vice-king, being in the City of Peru, he bought a Horſe of a Souldier, who was called Salinas, and therefore they called the Horſe Salinillas, which proved to be one of the fineſt Horſes in all Peru, and coſt eight hundred pieces of Eight, which makes nine hundred and ſixty Ducats; and though he had not one farthing of his own to pay for him, yet, truſting to the kindneſs of his Friends, that they would either lend or give him ſo much money, he adventured to buy him; to which end a Friend of his, who had not more in the whole world, lent him three hundred pieces of Eight, but when Gonçalo Piçarro underſtood that he had bought this Horſe, he immediately gave order to pay the ſame out of his own Eſtate, knowing that Garçilaſſo had not wherewith to make ſatisfaction.

CHAP. XXI.

How and in what manner an irreverent impiety againſt the moſt Holy Sacrament, and other blaſphemous words were puniſhed. Piçarro and his Party nominate Meſſengers to be ſent into Spain.

IT remains now for us to relate the Judgment which befell Porras, which was this; Three months after the profanation he had made of the Holy Altar, he was ſent by Carvajal to Huamanca upon ſome certain occaſions, and paſſing a little Brook of Water not above two foot deep, he guided his Horſe, being tired and thirſty, to a place where he might drink, and having drank he laid himſelf down in the Water, having one Leg of his Maſter under him, and lay on that ſide where the Water was deepeſt; Porras endeavoured to clear himſelf of his Horſe but could not, and ſo lay ſtill a while, untill the Horſe ſtruggling to riſe, and the ſtream running ſwift upon him, he was at length drowned; but the Horſe keeping his head above Water, made a ſhift to keep himſelf from drowning, untill ſome Travellers paſſing that way helpt him out; but for Porras they found him dead, and buried him on the Bank of the ſtream. The which was eſteemed by all the Kingdom to have been a Judgment of Heaven for his irreverence towards the Holy Altar, as we have before mentioned.

We may here take notice of the Divine Judgments againſt ſuch, who were common Swearers and Blaſphemers of the Name of God in their uſual Converſation; who not contented with little petty Oaths, as Godsbodikins, or the like, but would ſay, God Damn me, or, God renounce me: ſuch men as theſe, I ſay, have been obſerved to die by wounds in their Mouths; and not onely hath this happened in Battels in Peru, but in ſingle Duels between Man and Man, in which ſuch Blaſphemers as theſe have been killed by ſhot of a Carbine in their Mouths, or the ſtroke of a Lance, or a ſtabb of a Dagger in that part. There is one Inſtance of this very remarkable in my time, which happened a year before I came from Cozco, and it was this; A certain Souldier called Aguirre, an ill-conditioned fellow, had a quarrel with John de Lira, a perſon of a far different temper, being naturally of a peaceable and quiet diſpoſition; this Aguirre, to fight with de Lira, armed himſelf with a Coat of Mail, Gantlet and Head-peace, and expected him near the Convent of St. Dominick, as he paſſed to his Lodging from the great Church, where, on a Friday in Lent, he went to hear a Sermon; de Lira coming was met and aſſaulted by Aguirre, and they both ſtruggled together for the ſpace of an hour by the Clock, none coming in to part them, at length John de Lira, cloſing in with Aguirre, ſtabb'd him in the Mouth with his Dagger, which came out at the nape of his Neck, and Aguirre, with a ſlaſh of his Sword ſtroke de Lira upon the Cloak which was folded on his left Arm, and cut eleven folds of it, and glancing along cut off his middle Finger; the ſame night Aguirre died of his wound in the Priſon, but John de Lira recovered and was cured, in the Monaſtery of St. Dominick where he was lodged; and there I viſited him, and ſaw how his Finger was cut off, and eleven folds his Cloak cut thorough.

The like Judgment befell other notorious Blaſphemers at the Battel of Salinas, where two or three were wounded in the Mouth, and dyed, as many in like manner at Chupas, as alſo four at Huarina, one of which was called Mezquita, and all of them incurred the ſame fate; which was ſo apparent a Judgment upon common Swearers and Blaſphemers, that many repented of that ſin, and were converted, and ſo particularly did this Judgment operate on the minds of the Spaniards in Peru, that they generally acknowledge it to have been a mercy of God towards them, and ſo abſtain from that ſin, that it is a diſparagement to any man to be guilty thereof. And ſo far hath this cuſtome againſt Blaſphemy prevailed, as to paſs from Peru into the Juriſdiction of Mexico, where it is accounted an infamous crime for any man to ſwear, eſpecially Souldiers; ſo that when any one unadviſedly ſwears, the Captains or Officers then preſent, cauſe him immediately to recall his Oath, and ask pardon for it, which indeed is a very laudable cuſtome and much to be commended in thoſe Officers who were the occaſion that the ſame was practiſed amongſt the Souldiery.

I cannot tax any of my own Relations by the Mother ſide with the ſin of this nature; for to the contrary I have heard from one of my own Kindred, who (as I believe) ſpake impartially of them, That in the ſtate of their very Gentiliſme they knew not what an Oath meant, nor to take the Name of God in vain, but as a thing (as natural to them as their milk) they learned to pronounce the Name of God on no other occaſion than of Prayers and Praiſes to him.

But whilſt Gonçalo Piçarro was ſolemnizing the Feſtival appointed in honour to his new Title of Governour, he did not forget his dependence on Spain; and therefore propoſed firſt to his Captains and Friends in private, and afterwards publickly to the Citizens of Los Reyes, that it was neceſſary to ſend Meſſengers to his Majeſty to render an account of all that happened unto that time, beſeeching his Majeſty in behalf of that whole Empire to confer the Government thereof upon Gonçalo Piçarro, repreſenting it as a matter much conducing to the ſervice of his his Majesty, and to the common peace and tranquillity both of Indians and Spaniards: And moreover, that Piçarro should dispatch a private Agent, as from himself, who should lay before his Majesty the many services and labours which he had sustained for the enlargement of the dominions of Spain in those parts: this Proposal was approved by the common consent of all, and generally the World was of opinion, that a Proposition of this nature, tending so much to the welfare of the people, to the increase of his Majesty's revenue and enrichment of his Subjects, would not be refused: onely Francisco de Carvajal (as Diego Fernandez Palentino relates in the twenty eighth Chapter of his Book) was of another opinion; and declared, that the best Agents to persuade in Affairs of this kind were a good body of Musquetiers, Horse and Arms: And though it was true that Subjects ought never to take up Arms against their King; yet when they had once drawn the Sword, they ought never to put it up again: and that for the present, if they would send Messengers, they should be the Judges themselves; who having been the persons that had imprisoned the Vice-king, they were the most able to render an account to his Majesty of the reasons and causes which moved them thereunto.

This opinion was seconded by Hernando Bachicao; but the votes of two men could not over-rule the sense of the whole Court, who decreed to send Doctour Texada and Francisco Maldonado (Usher of the Hall to Gonçalo Piçarro) into Spain, with instructions to represent unto his Majesty the present state and condition of their Affairs. It was also ordered, that these persons should embark on a Ship then in Port, besides which there was no other at that time, and whereon Licenciado Vaca de Castro was a prisoner, and stood committed by order from the Vice-king; and now remained in expectation, how the present Governours would dispose of him; not judging it fit to sail for Spain without the Orders of some over-ruling power.

'Twas further agreed, that Hernando Bachicao should have the Charge to provide the Ship with Men and Guns, and thereon to transport their Agents to Panama, of which Vaca de Castro being informed by a Friend and Kinsman of his called Garcia de Mont-alvo, he presently apprehended, that in case they brought him ashoar from the Ship, some mischief might ensue to him, or at least some treatment not beseeming his quality and condition, he resolved, with the assistence of his Kinsman Mont-alvo, and of the Servants then with him, to weigh Anchor, and set sail for Panama. The matter succeeded as was expected and desired; for there was not one person of Piçarro's faction then aboard; and the Mariners were all for Vaca de Castro, who was very well beloved and esteemed by the people of the Countrey: Piçarro was greatly troubled at this disappointment; for the sending of his Agents into Spain he esteemed to be the onely means to set matters right, and well understood at that Court.

CHAP. XXII.

How much Gonçalo Piçarro was troubled for the Escape of Vaca de Castro, and what disturbance it caused. Hernando Bachicao goes to Panama. The Vice-king sends abroad his Warrants to raise Men.

HEreupon (as all the three Writers agree) it was conceived, that this Escape of Vaca de Castro could not be contrived without a Conspiracy of several persons concerned therein: so that immediately an Allarum was given over all the Town; the Souldiers were put in Arms, and all those Gentlemen whom they suspected, as well such as were Natives or Citizens of Los Reyes, as those who had fled from Cozco, and those who were of the Vice-king's party, were all seized and committed to the publick prison: and amongst them Licenciado Carvajal was one; to whom Major General Carvajal ſent order, that he ſhould at that inſtant confeſs and make his laſt Will and Teſtament; for that it was decreed he ſhould preſently be put to death. Carvajal with all readineſs ſubmitted to the ſentence; and began to prepare himſelf for the ſame; the Executioner ſtood by him with his Halter and Gibbet, and urged him to finiſh his Affairs, howſoever he continued ſomething long in his confeſſion: no queſtion but he expected to dye without any reprieve: howſoever ſuch as conſidered the quality of his perſon and condition were of opinion, that he ought not to have been brought under thoſe circumſtances; but ſince it had ſo fallen out; it would be dangerous to ſuffer him to live: but then it was conſidered, that in caſe Carvajal were put to death, many of thoſe who were now in cuſtody would follow the ſame fate, which would be a great loſs to the Kingdom to be deprived of the moſt principal perſons thereof who had always been faithfull to the Intereſt of his Majeſty.

Whilſt Licenciado Carvajal remained under theſe ſad apprehenſions, certain ſober perſons went to Gonçalo Piçarro, and told him that it were well to conſider in this caſe how great an Intereſt the Licenciado Carvajal had in his Coutrey; and that the Agent Carvajal, who was his brother, was put to death by the Vice-king, for no other cauſe or reaſon, than becauſe his man followed the party and ſide of Piçarro, and therefore, for the very merit of his brother, and for the ſervices of this perſon, he ſhould ſpare his life who was and might be of great uſe and benefit to him for the future. And as to the eſcape of Vaca de Caſtro all the World was well ſatisfied, That neither Licenciado Carvajal nor the others who were impriſoned upon ſuſpicion were concerned therein; and that all this jealouſie did ariſe from the vain cenſures of ſome people, for which there was no juſt cauſe or ground.

To all which Declaration Gonçalo Piçarro anſwered little, but ſeemed angry and diſturbed, commanding that none ſhould move him farther in that matter. Hereupon Carvajal and his Friends reſolved to proceed another way; which was by means of the Major General, to whom they ſecretly preſented a Wedge of gold to the value of two thouſand pieces of Eight, and promiſed him much more; the which having accepted, he began to be a little backward and cold in the execution of the ſentence; and went and came ſo often, untill at length, both Carvajal and all the others who were impriſoned were ſet at liberty: So this matter being over, they began to contrive the manner, how Hernando Bachicao might be diſpatched away, as was agreed: for which there now happened an opportunity by the arrival of a Bregantine from Arequepa, which being freighted for this purpoſe and armed with ſome of the Cannon which Gonçalo Piçarro brought from Cozco; Bachicao embarked thereupon, and with him Doctour Texada and Franciſco Maldonado, with about ſixty Muſquetiers who offered themſelves voluntarily on that voiage. And thus coaſting along the ſhoar, upon information that the Vice-king was at Tumbez; he arrived early one morning in that Port; where being eſpyed by ſome people belonging to the Vice-king an Allarum was preſently given, that Gonçalo Piçarro with a ſtrong force was coming by Sea; which put them all into that affrightment and conſternation, that the Vice-king with all his force, conſiſting of about a hundred and fifty men fled away to Quitu; but ſome of them remained behind to receive Bachicao, who took two Ships which he found in the Port, and with them ſailed to Puerto Viejo, where, and in other parts he raiſed about a hundred and fifty men whom he embarked aboard his Ships; but the Vice-king without other ſtop or ſtay haſtened to Quitu. Thus far Auguſtine Carate, who hath made clear ſeveral Paſſages which were confuſed and obſcure in other Writers.

But now to return to the Ingot of Gold which Franciſco Carvajal received; It is certain that he made a Trade of ſuch Bribes as theſe, where the Accuſation was falſe, and then he would ſuſpend the Execution of the Sentence, untill means were made with Gonçalo Piçarro for a Pardon, and in this manner he got great ſums of money: but in caſe the crime objected were true, than nothing could prevail with him, neither Preſents nor Intreaties, to delay the ſpeedy execution of Juſtice: for he was zealous and faithfull to his Party, both in puniſhment of Enemies, and in the good treatment and reward of Friends and Abettours of his Cauſe: but Hiſtorians give him the Character of a moſt covetous and cruel perſon: 'tis true, he had both one and the other in his nature, but not in ſo high degree as is reported; for though he was guilty of great effuſions of bloud, yet it was for the advancement and ſecurity of his own party, which he acted in purſuance ſuance of his Office, being a Captain and a chief field Officer: of which hereafter in proſecution of this Hiſtory we ſhall give ſome inſtances of my own knowledge, and ſhall make ſome remarks upon the behaviour of ſeveral Captains of Piçarro's party which I received from the report of thoſe who were familiarly acquainted with their actions and perſons.

We have mentioned before, how Licenciado Alvarez procured the Liberty of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and how another Ship joined with them, whereon his brother Vela Nunnez was embarked, and that they ſailed together to the Port of Tumpiz, where they landed, and erected a Court of Juſtice, for that as the Hiſtorians ſay, he had a clauſe in his Commiſſion that he might hold a Court with aſſiſtance of one Judge or Co-aſſeſſour with him: by virtue whereof they diſpatched ſeveral Warrants, Orders and Manifeſts into divers parts; ſetting forth in the Preamble thereunto a relation of his impriſonment and of his eſcape, as likewiſe of the coming of Gançalo Piçarro to Los Reyes, with all other particulars which had happened untill that time; and in fine concluded, that all his Majeſty's loving and loyal Subjects ſhould come in and partake in this cauſe. In purſuance hereof he ſent divers Captains to Puerto Viejo to raiſe men, as alſo to Saint Michael and Truxillo; and upon the ſame errand Captain Jeronimo de Prereyra was ſent as far as Pacamuru, which the Spaniards call Bracamoros: And moreover he directed his Warrants over all the Countrey, to bring in Proviſions, and all the Gold and Silver which was found in the Exchequer, for that his Majeſty's ſervice required to have it employed againſt ſo many Enemies who were in rebellion againſt him: but in regard that in all the Cities and places to which thoſe Commands were ſent, there were different parties, and men ſtood variouſly affected; ſome whereof went to Piçarro; others, to fly from him, and not to join with his faction, betook themſelves to the mountains, and by ſecret and by-ways came at length to the Vice-king equipped with Arms, Horſes and Proviſions, according to every man's ability; which much rejoiced and comforted the Vice-king to ſee the affection of the people to him in the time of his diſtreſs: but this ſatisfaction continued not long, for, as ill fortune would have it, he was forced by Hernando Bachicao to retire into the In-land parts of the Countrey, by which means his Friends left him, and he himſelf ſuſtained great inconveniences and hardſhips untill the time of his death; as we ſhall ſee in its due place.

Gonçalo Piçarro having intelligence that the Vice-king was in Tumpiz, he thought it not convenient or ſafe to ſuffer him to reſt there; and therefore ſent ſome Captains with their forces to diſturb him and cauſe him to remove his quarters from thence. The Orders and Warrants which the Vice-king iſſued forth were for the moſt part betrayed into the hands of Piçarro, being brought to him by thoſe with whom they were intruſted; by means of which Piçarro received intelligence of all the deſigns of the Vice-king; which to prevent he diſpatched his Captains Jeronimo de Villegas, Gonçalo Diaz and Hernando de Alvarado, to ſcoure all the Coaſt along to the Northward, and intercept the people who were going to join themſelves with the Vice-king: and thereby he ſuppreſſed the forces of the Vice-king before they could get head, and overcame them without a Battel.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Actions performed by Bachicao in Panama. Licenciado Vaca de Caſtro comes to Spain, where an end is put to all his negotiations. The Vice-king retires to Quitu.

Hernando Bachicao, as we have ſaid, having ſurprized two Ships belonging to the Vice-king, and forced him to retire into the In-land parts of the Countrey, he purſued his Voiage to the Port of Panama; and in his way he met with two or three other Ships, but whoſe they were, and with what they were laden, for for brevity ſake we ſhall omit to mention; and becauſe Fernandez Palentino, in the twenty ninth Chapter of his Book, makes a long Diſcourſe thereupon, we ſhall refer our ſelves to him, and onely ſay, that he took thoſe Ships with him and ſailed from Port to Port, of which there are many in thoſe Seas, taking refreſhments at his pleaſure without fear or apprehenſion of any Enemies: when he arrived at the Iſlands of Pearles, which are about twenty Leagues diſtant from Panama, whereof ſo ſoon as the Inhabitants had notice (as Auguſtine Carate ſaith, in the ſixteenth Chapter of his Book) they ſent two of their Citizens to know of him with what intenſion and deſign he came thither, requiring him not to enter with his Souldiers within the precincts of their Juriſdiction. To which Bachicao made anſwer, That in caſe he came attended with his Souldiers, it was onely with intent to guard himſelf from the attempts of the Vice-king, without other deſign, to the damage or prejudice of their Countrey; for that his Commiſſion was onely to tranſport Doctour Texada, one of his Majeſty's Juſtices, into Spain, who by Inſtructions received from the Courts of Judicature was ſent to render an account to his Majeſty of all Matters which had paſſed of late in Peru; and that he would onely ſet him on ſhoar, there to refreſh himſelf for a while, and make ſuch Proviſions as were neceſſary for his Voyage.

Upon this aſſurance admiſſion was given him into the City: but ſo ſoon as he arrived, two Ships which were then in the Port, made ſail into the Sea; but one of them was chaſed by the Brigantine, and being taken, was brought back, and both the Maſter and his Mate hanged at the Yard-arm; which much offended the Town, and put them into a great conſternation, but it was now too late to defend themſelves, or repent of their folly, in truſting their eſtates and lives to the mercy of Bachicao, who was now entered the City, and there being no hopes of timely relief from Captain John Guzman, who was raiſing men for aſſiſtance of the Vice-king; which men afterwards revolted to Bachicao, who alſo ſeized on the Cannon which Vaca de Caſtro had brought thither, with the Ship on which he made his eſcape. Thus did Bachicao tyrannize over the people, ſeizing their eſtates with an arbitrary power, for none durſt to aſſert a right and title to what he poſſeſſed, in contradiction to his will and pleaſure: and during the time of his aboad here, he publickly put two of his Captains to death, who conſpired againſt him: and moreover he acted other pieces of like ſeverity by virtue of his own abſolute authority, cauſing the Cryers to proclaim openly before thoſe whom he put to death: So is the will and command of Captain Hernando Bachicao.

At this time Vaca de Caſtro was at Panama, where having intelligence that Bachicao was coming, he fled to Nombre de Dios, and embarked for Spain in the North-ſea, as did alſo Diego Alvarez Cueto, and Jeronimo Curbano, who were Ambaſſadours from the Vice-king: likewiſe at the ſame Port Doctour Texada, and Franciſco Maldonado took ſhipping for Spain and ſailed friendly together, though of three ſeveral Factions. Doctour Texada dyed in the Voyage, in the Chanel of Bahama: but Franciſco Maldonado, and Diego Alvarez arrived ſafe in Spain, and immediately took poſt for Germany, to render an account to his Majeſty reſpectively of the Affairs committed to their charge. Vaca de Caſtro touched at the Iſles of Terçeras, and thence ſailed to Lisbon, from whence he travailed to the Court; for he thought it not ſafe to goe by the way of Seville, where the Brothers and Relations of John Tello de Guzman lived, whom, as we ſaid before, he had cauſed to be put to death after the overthrow of Diego Almagro the younger, being arrived at the Court, he was by Order of the Council of the Indies confined to his Houſe, and an Accuſation brought againſt him: after which he was impriſoned in the Fort of Arevalo for the ſpace of five years, during which time his cauſe was depending. After which they appointed him a Houſe in Simancas, and thence, as the Court removed, they aſſigned him the Village of Pinto and the bounds thereof for his confinement, untill his buſineſs was fully determined. Thus far are the words of the Accountant General Auguſtine de Carate.

And here he breaks off, without telling us farther, what ſentence was given in his caſe, becauſe he had ended his Hiſtory before that time: And indeed by reaſon of the malicious informations and calumnies of his Enemies, which were all falſe, the determination of his cauſe was protracted for a long time; at which he was not much troubled becauſe he knew, that at length he ſhould come off with the honour and reputation of a good Miniſter and Governour of that Empire which accordingly ſucceeded; for he was reſtored to his former place in the

Royal

Royal Council of Caſtile, from which he was ſo long kept out, that when he came to be reſtored, he was then the moſt ancient Member of all that Council, and in this condition I found him when I was at the Court of Madrid in the year 1561. And beſides this favour of his reſtauration, he had other rewards given him in recompence for his hard uſages and ſervices performed in Peru in conſervation of the Imperial Authority; and to his Son Don Antonio Vaca de Caſtro, who alſo was a Knight of the Habit of St. Jago (as his Father was) there was a Rent given him of twenty thouſand pieces of Eight, out of ſuch Lots or Diviſions as he ſhould chuſe and eſteem of that value. I remember to have ſeen this Gentleman at Nombre de Dios, as he paſſed in the Retinue of the Count de Nieva (who was ſent for Vice-king of that Kingdom in the year 1560.) and went then to take poſſeſſion of that Eſtate, which was the reward of his Father, who, to ſpeak without flattery or partiality, was generally reputed to have been the beſt Governour that ever had paſſed into thoſe parts; as is agreed by all the three Hiſtorians in the characters which they give of him, there being not one ill action for which they blame him. And now let us return again to Peru, and relate what the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez was contriving all this time.

The Vice-king being retired (as Carate reports in the ſixteenth Chapter of his Book) with about an hundred and fifty men, at the time that Bachicao ſurpriſed the Ships in Tumbez, he marched with them as far as the City of Quitu, where he was chearfully received, and his Souldiers re-inforced to the number of about two hundred men, reſolving to remain in that Countrey which yielded plenty of proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his men, untill ſuch time as he received farther Orders and Inſtructions from his Majeſty: And taking good information of all things that paſſed from Diego Alvarez de Cuero, he kept ſtrong Guards, and Spies on all the high Roads to inform himſelf of all the actions that Gonçalo Piçarro was doing, though it is three hundred leagues diſtant from Los Reyes to Quitu; during which time four Souldiers, who were diſſatisfied upon ſome occaſion with Piçarro, ſtoal a Boat, and coaſted all along the ſhore from Los Reyes, by the help of their Oars, untill they came to a ſhore which was the neareſt Sea to Quitu; where being arrived, they informed the Vice-king of all paſſages; how the People of Los Reyes and other places were diſcontented with the Government of Piçarro, and with the tyranny which he uſed towards them, ejecting ſome out of their Houſes and Eſtates, impoſing Souldiers on free-quarter upon them, and other burthens which they were not able to ſupport; of which they were ſo weary that upon the leaſt appearance of any perſon who carried an authority from his Majeſty they would be ready to joyn with him, to caſt off the yoke of that tyranny with which they were oppreſſed. By which intelligence, and many other things which the Souldiers ſaid to him, the Vice-king being encouraged, reſolved with the Forces he had with him, to march from Quitu by the way of St. Michael's, and made Diego de Ocampo chief Commander thereof, who had from the very time that the Vice-king came to Tumbez adhered to his Party, and aſſiſted him with his Perſon and Eſtate, ſupplying him with all things convenient and neceſſary for his ſervice, wherein he ſpent above forty thouſand pieces of Eight. In all theſe Adventures Licenciado Alvarez accompanied the Vice-king, and held Courts with him by virtue of his Majeſty's Commiſſion, by which it was provided, that the Vice-king might hold Courts with the aſſiſtence of one Co-aſſeſſour untill ſuch time as the other Judges ſhould aſſemble and joyn with them; and it was thus provided by that clauſe in caſes of mortality or other accidents: and in purſuance hereof he cauſed a new Seal to be delivered to John Leon, one of the Juſtices of Los Reyes, whom the Marquis of Camaraſa, Lord High Chancellour of Caçorla, or of the Indies, had nominated and elected to be Chancellour of that Court wherein the Vice-king preſided, he being revolted to him from Piçarro; ſo that all Commiſſions, Warrants and Orders iſſued out from thence under the Name and Title of Don Carlos the Emperour, with the Royal Seal affixed to them, and counterſigned by Alvarez; ſo that now there being two Courts in Peru, one at Los Reyes and the other with the Vice-king, it frequently happened that two different Orders for the ſame buſineſs came to be ſerved at the ſame time. Thus far is related by Carate.

CHAP. XXIV.

Two Captains of Piçarro's Army kill three of thoſe belonging to the Vice-king; which is again revenged upon them. Gonçalo Piçarro embarks for the City of Truxillo.

Auguſtine Carate, proceeding forward in the courſe of his Hiſtory, ſaith, That when the Vice-king was ready to depart from Quitu he diſpatched away his Son-in-law, Diego Alvarez de Cuero into Spain to inform his Majeſty of all Affairs that had paſſed, deſiring him to ſend him ſome Succours whereby he might be enabled to make War upon Gonçalo Piçarro; and accordingly Cuero embarked on the ſame Fleet with Vaca de Caſtro and Doctour Texada, as we have before declared. In the mean time the Vice-king came to the City of St. Michael, which is about an hundred and fifty leagues from Quitu, where he reſolved to remain, untill ſuch time as he received his Majeſty's farther directions in theſe matters; making uſe of his Majeſty's Name and Authority in the ſtyle of all Letters and Orders which he iſſued: and this place he judged moſt proper for his reſidence, being advantageouſly ſituated in the common Road, through which all people muſt go, who come from Spain or other parts into Peru, and is a Paſs which cannot be avoided by ſuch who travel with Horſes or other Beaſts of burthen; ſo that by this conſtant concurrence or confluence of people his numbers every day increaſed. The Inhabitants of this Town were all very loyal and well-affected to the Vice-king, by which means, and by their kind reception and entertainment, his Souldiers increaſed to the number of five hundred Horſe and Foot, moſt of them indifferently well armed, and ſuch as wanted defenſive Arms made Corſlets of Iron, and Coats of Bulls Skins well dried and preſſed.

At the ſame time that Gonçalo Piçarro ſent Captain Bachicao with his Brigantine to ſeiſe the Fleet of the Vice-king, he alſo diſpatched two of his Captains by Land called Gonçalo Diaz de Pinera and Jeronimo de Villegas to raiſe Souldiers in the Cities of Truxillo and St. Michael, where they remained with a Body of eight hundred men, untill ſuch time as being alarm'd with the approach of the Vice-king, they quitted their Poſts and retreated within the Countrey, and quartered in a Province called Collique, which is about forty leagues diſtant from St. Michael, from whence they gave intelligence to Piçarro of the Vice-king's march, and the daily increaſe of his Army, to which a ſtop ought ſpeedily to be given before it proved too late. And whilſt theſe Captains reſided at that place, they had advice that the Vice-king had ſent a Captain called John de Prereyra to the Province of Chachapoyas, to raiſe what men that Countrey afforded; and by reaſon that few Spaniards inhabited in thoſe parts, Piçarro's Captains did imagine that Prereyra and his men would remain ſecure, and not dream of any danger; in confidence of which they marched the very ſame way after them, and one night ſeiſed on their Sentinels, and falling on them as they were ſleeping killed Prereyra and two other principal Captains, whoſe Heads they cut off; and then all thoſe who were with them, to the number of about ſixty Horſemen, revolted for fear, and declaring for Gonçalo Piçarro returned with his Captains to their Quarters.

The Vice-king, greatly troubled for this diſgrace and misfortune, reſolved ſpeedily to revenge it with the like return, and accordingly ſallied privately out from St. Michael's with about an hundred and fifty Horſemen, and fell in upon the Quarters of the Captains Gonçalo Diaz and Villegas at Collique; who having ſome few days before performed that late exploit, reſted ſecure from the apprehenſions of any ſuch return from their enemies. The aſſault which was made upon them was ſo ſudden that they had no time to provide for their defence, or to put themſelves in order to fight, but every one ſhifted for himſelf as well as he could; and ſo much were they ſcattered abroad, that Gonçalo Diaz fled with very few into a Province of the Indians, which was not conquered, where they aroſe up againſt him and killed him; Hernando de Alvarado incurred the like fate: but Jeronimo de Villegas, rallying his people, marched into the Countrey as far as Truxillo, whilſt the Vice-king reſided at St. Michael.

Gonçalo

Gonçalo Piçarro, having received advice of the defeat of his Captains, and that the Vice-king daily increaſed in numbers of his men, and ſtrengthened in Arms and Ammunition for War, concluded it neceſſary with all poſſible ſpeed to deſtroy his Forces, before greater aid came to him from Spain and other parts of the Indies, which would be landed at Tumpiz or at the Ports thereabouts, towards which places the Vice-king was drawing his Forces; and in the mean time he endeavoured to intercept all Packets of Advice from Spain, and from his Majeſty, the want of which would greatly diſcourage the minds of the enemy: with this reſolution, he prepared all things for a Battel, on the ſucceſs of which he intended to hazard his fortune in caſe the enemy would ſtand to it; and accordingly Orders were iſſued out to the Captains, the Souldiers received their pay, the Horſe were commanded to march before to Truxillo, and Piçarro himſelf with the chief of his Commanders remained behind to bring up the Rere.

About this time a Brigantine from Arequepa arrived in the Port of Lima, which brought an hundred thouſand pieces of Eight for account of Piçarro: at the ſame time alſo came in another Ship from the Continent, belonging to Gonçalo Martel, and which brought his Wife, Children and Family to be thence conveyed to Cozco where his habitation was. This happy accident ſo encouraged Piçarro and his Party, that they grew very high and inſolent thereupon, and, as if fortune had been on their ſide, they believed the whole world was their own. Thus far Auguſtine de Carate, to which Diego Fernandez adds, that they became ſo proud, and made ſuch vain boaſtings, that ſome talked as if Gonçalo Piçarro was to take upon him the Title and Crown of a King; arguing in his favour, that all Kings and Governours took their original and beginning by force; that the Nobility of the world deſcended from the haughty and unjuſt Cain, and the poor and meek from Abel: that it plainly appeared in Heraldry which blazes the Eſcutcheons of great men that their Arms contain nothing but Weapons of War and Tyranny. Franciſco de Carvajal was much of this opinion, and in confirmation hereof, he deſired that the Old Teſtament ſhould be reviewed, and the laſt Will of Adam there conſulted, whether therein he bequeathed the Kingdom of Peru to Charles the Emperour or to the Kings of Caſtile. All which Gonçalo Piçarro hearkned unto with much ſatisfaction, being pleaſed to hear the flatteries of his Abettors. Theſe are the words of Diego Fernandez, which I have extracted verbatim out of the thirty fourth Chapter of his firſt Book.

On the Veſſels which lately came into Lima Gonçalo Piçarro laded great quantities of Arms and Ammunition, and thereon ſhipped an hundred and fifty ſelect Souldiers. And to give the better countenance and authority to his Affairs, he carried Doctour Cepeda, one of the Judges, with him, as alſo John de Caceres the Accountant General, ſo that by the departure of Cepeda the Court of Juſtice was diſſolved, there remaining no other Judge at Los Reyes beſides Cepeda; and farther to prevent the coming forth of other Orders or Warrants, Piçarro carried the Royal Seal with him. And becauſe the City of Los Reyes was a place of great importance to him, he thought fit to confide it in the hands of ſome faithfull perſon, whom he could truſt, and accordingly made choice of one Lorenço de Aldana, to whom he delegated the Government of the City, being a prudent, wiſe and diſcreet Gentleman, and one who was very rich, having a great Eſtate and intereſt in Arequepa, with whom he left eight hundred men for guard and ſafety of the City; and Piçarro went attended with all the Inhabitants of the City, and Gentlemen who had any command over the Indians, and took ſhipping in the month of March 1545, and ſailed to Port Santa, which is about fifteen leagues from Truxillo, where he landed and remained ſome days untill his other Forces could come up, becauſe it was a time of the year when the paſturage was green and well grown; but leſt he ſhould oppreſs and burthen the Spaniards by his long abode there, he removed his Camp to the Province of Collique, where he remained for ſome time, untill his Forces could come up to him; and then making a general Muſter of his Men, it appeared on the Muſter-rolls that his numbers amounted unto more than ſix hundred men, Horſe and Foot: and though the Vice-king was equal in number, yet Piçarro had much the advantage both in his Arms and preparations for War, and in his Men, who were for the moſt part veterane Souldiers, trained up to War, had been in many Battels, and ſeen much of Action; and beſides, they knew the Countrey and the difficult paſſages of it, and were accuſtomed to the dangers and labours of War, and had been practiſed therein ever ſince the Spaniards entred firſt upon the conqueſt of that Empire; and on the contrary, the Souldiers of the Vice-king were all new-raiſed men, lately come out of Spain, not trained to the War, poor, ill-habited and armed, and their powder bad, beſides other wants which were amongſt them.

CHAP. XXV.

The great preparations and proviſions made by Gonçalo Piçarro to paſs a Deſart. He faces the Vice-king's Forces, who retreated to Quitu. The good and prudent Conduct of Lorenço de Aldana.

Gonçalo Piçarro, being in the Province of Colliqne and in the parts thereabouts, made all the proviſions he could for the ſubſiſtence of his Army; for he was to travel over a hot, dry, ſandy Deſart of twenty leagues over, where was neither Water nor any other refreſhment. And becauſe Water was the moſt neceſſary of any thing in that hot and dry paſſage, he ſummoned in all the Indians of thoſe parts round, to bring all their Pails, Buckets and Jarrs for Water, and commanded that the Indians who were appointed for the Carriages of the Army, ſhould leave all the Souldiers Clothes and other Baggage behind, to carry Water and Proviſions which were neceſſary for the ſupport of Man and Beaſt. In this manner the Indians were laden without any other incumbrance than that of Water; and twenty five Horſemen were ſent before by the common Road, who were to give out, in caſe they met with the Scouts of the Vice-king's Army, that Gonçalo Piçarro was coming in perſon through the Deſart that way, but that the reſt of his Army had taken the other Road. In this manner they travelled, every Horſeman carrying the proviſion of his own Horſe behind him. The Vice-king, who had his Spies upon both the Roads, received advice of the approach of the Enemy ſome time before they came; upon which an alarm was given, and it was ſaid that they would go out and give them Battel: but ſo ſoon as his Forces were brought together, they marched out of the City to the ſide of a Hill called Caſſa, from whence they haſtned away with all the ſpeed they were able; of which Gonçalo Piçarro receiving intelligence about four hours after, he made no ſtay at St. Michael's, not ſo much as to enter the Town or recruit his Proviſions, but without ſtop or delay purſued after the Enemy, and that night travelled eight leagues, where overtaking them he took many Priſoners, ſeiſed all the Baggage of the Camp, hanged ſeveral whom they thought fit; and paſſing over rocky and almoſt unacceſſible ways without refreſhments, they took Priſoners every day, who for want of ſtrength lagged behind.

Then Letters were wrote and ſent by Indians to ſeveral perſons of Quality in the Vice-king's Camp, promiſing Pardon and great Rewards to any perſon who ſhould kill him; the which ſerved to create jealouſies and ſuſpicions amongſt thoſe who were joyned with the Vice-king, every one being afraid of each other; which ſuſpicions proved of fatal conſequence, and (as we have mentioned before) were the cauſe of many a man's death; for the Libels which were caſt abroad, which none would own or juſtifie, ſerved howſoever to create jealouſies in the mind of the Vice-king, and made him afraid of his own People, not knowing whom to truſt of thoſe who were about him. And though it is certain, that neither Gonçalo Piçarro, as all Authours agree, did ever give order to kill the Vice-king, or that the Vice-king did plot in the like nature againſt Piçarro; yet in all Civil Wars, jealouſies and fears are natural to the minds of men. And thus Gonçalo Piçarro having purſued the Vice-king through Mountains, Deſarts and uninhabited places without proviſions or refreſhments (for we may believe, that the Vice-king carried all away with him) he came at length to a Province called Ayahuaca, where he ſtay'd to refreſh his men, who were much tired and haraſſed with their hard marches in want of all things neceſſary, ſo that here they gave over over the purſuit of the Enemy, who were ſo far advanced before them, that it was impoſſible to overtake them. And having refreſhed his men in Ayahuaca as well as he could, he marched away in good order by the ſame way that the Vice-king had paſſed; where in the way they picked up ſome of the Vice-king's people, who were tired, and not able, by weakneſs to follow his Camp, and others, who out of ſome diſcontent had deſerted his Party: but as to the Vice-king, with ſuch as were with him, he purſued his march towards the City of Quitu, which is ſituated in a Countrey plentifull of all proviſions for refreſhment of his men, who were much tired and weakned for want of neceſſary Food. After ſome little repoſe and refreſhment taken, Piçarro continued his purſuit, though by his long ſtay he was far caſt behind: howſoever as he paſſed he took ſeveral of the Vice-king's men, who lagged in the rere, which he refuſed to entertain in his ſervice, either becauſe he was ſuſpicious of them, or becauſe he had more men than proviſions, and needed no additional forces againſt the weakneſs of his Enemy: but ſuch as he took of them he ſent away either to Truxillo, Los Reyes or any other part, according to every man's choice; but men of note and quality he hanged up. The people who were thus permitted to return unto their homes, reported all things where they paſſed in favour of the Vice-king, and in diſparagement of Piçarro, whom they repreſented as cruel and tyrannical; which moſt perſons believed, becauſe they eſteemed the cauſe of the Vice-king to be juſt and loyal: And whereas the people who reſide in that Province are more deſirous of news and changes than in other places, becauſe they are Souldiers, which are idle, and give themſelves to no buſineſs or employment, and therefore entertain diſcourſes of State Affairs with much variety and pleaſure in their talk: And on the contrary, Citizens and men of buſineſs are averſe from the War, becauſe they are haraſſed therewith, and ſubjected to the inſolence of Souldiers, and though they intermeddle not in Affairs, yet they are liable upon every little occaſion to be queſtioned by him who Governs, and be put to death, that their Eſtates being confiſcated he may gratifie his Followers and Faction with them; and therefore having theſe fears, every one talked and diſcourſed of news. Theſe rumours were ſo common and loud that they came to the ears of Piçarro and his Rulers in their reſpective Juriſdictions; to ſuppreſs which reports in all places, and more eſpecially at Los Reyes, where the greateſt confluence of people was, many were hanged by Warrant from an ordinary Juſtice, called Pedro Martin de Cicilia, who was very zealous in the cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro and for the ſucceſs of his Affairs. For as to Lorenço de Aldana, who was his chief Deputy there, he was cautious and wary how he intermeddled in matters, for which he might be called into queſtion in caſe the tide of Affairs ſhould turn; but behaved himſelf with that moderation as prevented the effuſion of bloud, and confiſcation of Eſtates; and for the whole time of his Government he kept things in ſuch order, that, though he acted by Commiſſion under Piçarro, yet, he never did any thing partial or againſt Law in his favour, but rather protected thoſe who were inclined to the Vice-king's Party; who being ſenſible of his favour, flocked from other Provinces to take refuge under him; of which the Zealots for Piçarro taking particular notice, eſpecially the High Conſtable of the City called Chriſtopher de Burgos teſtified great diſpleaſure thereupon; for which Lorenço de Aldana ſeverely reproved him, and gave him very hard words publickly before the people, and on farther provocation clapt him into Priſon. Of all which, though Gonçalo Piçarro received certain intelligence, yet, he diſſembled the matter, judging that, being far diſtant, it would not be convenient to revoke his Commiſſion, becauſe he was ſtrong in Souldiers, which were with him, and had gained the affections and good will of the people in that City. Thus far are the words of Auguſtine Carate.

CHAP. XXVI.

Gonçalo Piçarro ſtill continuing to purſue the Vice-king, both Armies ſuſtain great famine and hardſhip in their march. The violent death of the Vice-king's Major General and Captains.

Gonçalo Piçarro ſtill continuing to purſue the Vice-king, reſolved totally to defeat his whole Force; and accordingly, for better expedition, detached about fifty ſelect Horſemen under the command of Franciſco de Carvajal, to fall in upon the rere of the Enemy, whilſt himſelf followed the main body of the Army. On the other ſide, he ſent Orders to Hernando Bachicao, who was then on the Coaſt, to leave his Ships at Tumpiz under a good Guard, and to march with what Forces he had, to join with his at Quitu. And having given theſe Orders he continued the purſuit, giving courage and ſpirit to Carvajal; who knew that he ſhould be well ſeconded in a very ſhort time. In the mean time the Vice-king encouraged his people, and having marched eight Leagues in one day, they diſpoſed themſelves to reſt, ſuppoſing that they were got far out of the reach of their Enemies; but Franciſco de Carvajal who ſlept not, fell into their quarters about four hours in the night; and gave them the firſt allarum with his own Trumpet.

The Vice-king immediately aroſe, and rallying his people together as well as he could, drew them into a poſture of defence, and ſo marched away: Carvajal following cloſe upon their heels, took ſome of the Foot, who lagged in the rere; but ſo ſoon as it was day, that they could take a view of each other, the Vice-king perceiving the ſmall number, drew out his men to give them battel, and divided his Body, conſiſting of a hundred and fifty men, into two diviſions or ſquadrons: but Carvajal, not being willing to engage on ſuch diſadvantages, ſounded a Retreat: upon which the Vice-king drew off his men, and proceeded on his march; but, alas! with little comfort, for his men were periſhing with travail and famine, and their Horſes ſo faint for want of graſs and provender, that they were not fit for a march: wherefore the Vice king, commiſerating the condition of his men, told them, that if any one of them were deſirous to remain behind, he freely gave them their diſcharge, but not a man of them accepted thereof, but ſaid, that they would rather die with him, than deſert him: ſo they marched day and night without ſleep, or repoſe, or ſuſtenance, or any refreſhment. In the mean time intelligence was given to Gonçalo Piçarro of what had paſſed between the Vice-king and Carvajal; of which ſome who were Enemies to Carvajal made uſe, to diſparage his Conduct, ſaying, that it was in his power to have defeated the whole force of the Enemy at that time, having ſurprized them as they were ſleeping and at reſt: and I find that ſome Hiſtorians object this matter againſt him as a point of neglect: but I, who knew the perſon of the man, am of another opinion, and have heard from many well experienced in the War, that ſince the time of Julius Cæſar, there hath not been a greater Souldier than he, the truth is, and ſo all Hiſtorians report, that the Vice-king being a hundred and fifty to fifty, that is, three to one, it was prudence in him not to adventure on ſuch a diſadvantageous undertaking, but rather to make a Bridge of Silver for deſperate men to eſcape over. Moreover ſome ſay he had no Commiſſion to engage, or to hazard his men; but in military matters it is hard to cenſure great Captains, who better underſtand the ſecret of their affairs than Strangers can do. Howſoever the matter was, Gonçalo Piçarro reinforced him with two hundred men more, which he ſent under the command of Licenciado Carvajal, by which auxiliary force they allarum'd and purſued the Vice-king untill he came to the Province, and people called Ayahuaca, ſeizing every day ſome of their Men, Horſes and Baggage, ſo that by the time he came to Ayahuaca, he had ſcarce eighty Men remaining of all his number; howſoever he proceeded forward to Quitu, where he hoped to find Proviſion for his Men. In the like ſtraits alſo was the Army of Piçarro, who who being almoſt famiſhed with hunger, were forced to kill and eat their Horſes for want of ſuſtenance, and indeed were in greater neceſſities than the Vice-king's Souldiers; becauſe Blaſco Nunnez, whereſoever he came, deſtroyed every thing which he thought might be of benefit to the Enemy which followed him. In this purſuit, the principal that were taken, were put to death by Carvajal; namely, Montoya an Inhabitant of Piura, Brizenno of Puerto, Velejo, Raphael Velâ, and one Baltaçar. And farther to re-inforce Carvajal, ſixty Horſe were ſent under the command of Captain John Acoſta, conſiſting of the moſt ſelect and choice Souldiers that were in his Army, by which the Vice-king was ſtraitned to the laſt extremity; which Diego Fernandez, in the fourty firſt Chapter of his Book, expreſſes in theſe words.

Thus did the Vice-king, ſays he, march day and night with the ſmall remainder of his Forces; and finding no other proviſions in many places, than onely a few Herbs and Roots; did often, in deſpair and fury, curſe the Countrey and the day in which he entred into it; and the people who were ſent to him from Spain, that had ſo baſely deſerted and betrayed him: but John de Acoſta, who was lately come, and his Men freſh preſſed him ſo hard, that he came cloſe to him a little before his arrival at his quarters of Calva; where coming ſomething late, and having marched hard, he thought he had time enough to take ſome little repoſe. But John de Acoſta beating up his quarters about break of day, fell upon the Front with ſuch a ſurprize, that he took many of their Men and Baggage, onely the Vice-king had time to make his eſcape with about ſeventy of his beſt Horſe. After which John de Acoſta made a retreat, and returned to the main Body, ſuppoſing that there was little more to be done upon the Enemy. By which means the poor Vice-king tyred and famiſhed came to the Province and his quarters in Calva. And in regard two of his Captains, namely, Jeronimo de la Serna and Gaſpar Gil advanced with their Companies and Colours before him, he fanſied that they went with intention to poſſeſs a certain paſs on the way; which when he was at Piura, he had ſent before, and cauſed to be made of Timber with great labour, upon a thick rock hanging over a river near Jambo Blanco in the Province of Amboca; which being broken down would require ſome time to repair; and having a ſuſpicion that theſe Men went before to poſſeſs this Paſs, and by ſuch a piece of ſervice to reconcile themſelves with Piçarro; he reſolved to prevent them by taking away their lives, and accordingly he put it in execution, cauſing their throats to be cut during the little ſpace of leiſure which the Enemy had given him: ſo that now marching with a little more eaſe and ſecurity than before, he came at length to Tomebamba; where having taken up his quarters, he executed another piece of cruelty on his Major General Rodrigo de Ocampo; for though untill that time he had eſteemed him to be his intimate and faſt friend; yet the like melancholy fancy of ſuſpicion and jealouſie entering into his head, as did of the other two Captains, he incurred the ſame deſtiny as they did, though they had followed and attended him in all his misfortunes.

The death of theſe perſons cauſed various Diſcourſes and Judgements in Peru, ſome condemning, and others excuſing the Vice-king therein. From Tomebamba Blaſco Nunnez proceeded till he came to Quitu, without interruption, and without that want and ſcarcity under which he formerly laboured. And having in his way to Quitu received informations againſt Franciſco de Olmos, that he and others who came from Puerto Viejo had been the Authours of falſe reports, to the diſſervice of his Majeſty; he no ſooner came to the City, but he examined the truth of thoſe informations which were brought againſt thoſe who came from Puerto Viejo; the which being proved, he conſulted the matter with Licenciado Alvarez, and then immediately executed Juſtice upon them, cutting off the heads of ſome, and hanging others, under the Notion of Traytors to the King; amongſt thoſe who ſuffered were Alvaro de Carvajal, Captain Hojeda and Gomez Eſtacio: but upon farther proof of the innocence of Franciſco de Olmos, he ſpared his life. Thus far is related by Diego Fernandez Palentino: but Lopez de Gomarra, in chap. 168. writing of the death of thoſe Captains, gives us this account, which is extracted verbatim out of his Book in theſe words.

Piçarro ſent John de Acoſta with ſixty light Horſemen in purſuit of Blaſco Nunnez, to engage him, or force him to a haſty retreat, accordingly he marched to Tomebamba with fear and trouble, and in want of all things: and having a ſuſpicion, that Jeronimo de la Serna and Gaſpar Gil, who were two Captains of his, kept a private private correſpondence with Piçarro, he cauſed them to be run through with a Lance: though it is ſaid for certain, that they were not guilty, at leaſt Piçarro never received Letters from them: and about the ſame time alſo, and upon the like ſuſpicion he cauſed Rodrigo de Ocampo to be ſtabbed with a Dagger; though he was innocent of that Treaſon of which he was ſuſpected; and in reality deſerved highly from him, having adhered faithfully to him in all his Troubles: And being come to Quitu, he gave Orders to Licenciado Alvarez to hang up Gomez Eſtacio and Alvaro de Carvajal, who were Citizens of Guayaquil, pretending that they had a Conſpiracy to take away his life, &c. Thus far Gomara.

This great effuſion of Bloud and Slaughter gave much cauſe of offence to the people of Peru, who every where ſpoke againſt the Vice-king and his Cauſe; ſaying, that he was not a man to be dealt with, who thus upon every light occaſion, or the leaſt ſuſpicion could put men to death; and therefore many fell off from his party, and denyed him the aſſiſtence they otherwiſe deſigned him, for fear of incurring the like fate with others.

But now, leaving the Vice-king in Quitu, and Gonçalo Piçarro in purſuit of him, we ſhall relate the ſucceſſes of thoſe Affairs which paſſed in the Kingdom of Quitu, with what happened in the Province of the Charcas, which are Countreys above ſeven hundred Leagues diſtant each from the other, and are the utmoſt confines of Peru: which is wonderfull to conſider that theſe quarrels ſhould extend ſo far, as to influence Affairs at ſo far a diſtance.

CHAP. XXVII.

The death of Franciſco de Almendras. The Inſurrection of Diego Centeno. The Oppoſition which Alonſo de Toro made againſt it: and the defeat he gave him.

WE have already mentioned, how that many of the Inhabitants of the City of Plate, whom the Vice-king had ſummoned to come in to his aſſiſtence, were actually on their way to him, but hearing of his Impriſonment, they returned to their own homes. We have alſo ſaid, That Gonçalo Piçarro had ſent Franciſco de Almendras with Commiſſion to be his Deputy; knowing him to be a perſon truely zealous and affectionate to his Cauſe; and indeed he ſhewed himſelf really ſo to be; for having information, that a principal Gentleman of that place called Don Gomez de Luna, ſhould ſay in his houſe, that it was impoſſible, but that one day the Emperour would reign in Peru, he preſently took him, and clapt him up in the common priſon, with a ſtrong Guard upon him: but the Corporation of the City made ſeveral Addreſſes in his behalf which were rejected by Franciſco de Almendras; with ſome kind of ill language, which a certain perſon taking notice of, boldly replyed, that if he would not releaſe him, they would: at which Almendras though highly offended, concealed his diſpleaſure for a while; and at midnight, went in perſon to the priſon, and there ſtrangled Don Gomez, and drawing his body to the Market-place, cut off his Head, and there left the Corpſe: The Inhabitants were ſo greatly offended hereat, as Carate in the 5th Chap. of his 20th Book relates, that the ſenſe thereof was general, and eſteemed to be a common concernment; and particularly one called Diego Centeno; who was a Native of the City. Rodrigo took it much to heart, having had a particular friendſhip for Gomez. And though this Centeno followed the party of Piçarro when he made his firſt Inſurrection, and followed him from Cozco to Los Reyes, having great intereſt in the Army, and a Plenipotentiary for the Province of the Charcas: yet afterwards, diſcovering the evil deſigns and intentions of Piçarro, he obtained leave from him to return to his own eſtate, and his Command over Indians, where he quietly reſided untill ſuch time as this unhappy death of Gomez fell out, which firſt moved him to uſe the beſt means he was able to free the Lives and Eſtates of that people from the oppreſſion and tyranny of Franciſco de Almendras: in order whereunto he communicated his deſign to the principal Inhabitants of that Countrey, namely, Lope

de Mendoça, Alonſo Perez de Eſquivel, Alonſo de Camargo, Hernan Nunnez de Sagura, Lope de Mendiera, John Ortiz de Carate his Brother, with other perſons in whom he repoſed a confidence; who being aſſembled together, they agreed that the onely way was to kill Franciſco de Almendras, which accordingly they put in execution one Sunday morning at his own houſe, ſtabbing him in divers places juſt as he was going forth to hear Maſs; and being not quite dead, they drew him out into the Market-place, and there cut off his Head. Nor was there much fear that any great tumult would follow hereupon amongſt the people, becauſe Almendras was generally hated and ill ſpoken of in all parts. In his place Diego Centeno was named Captain General, who alſo gave Commiſſions to ſeveral other Captains both of Horſe and Foot, and with great diligence raiſed Men, and provided Arms and other things neceſſary for War; and to hinder all intelligence from coming to the Enemy, he ſet Watches and Guards upon the ways. And moreover he ſent Lope de Mendoça to Arequepa, to ſeize, if poſſible, upon Pedro de Fuentes, who remained there with Character of Lieutenant Governour to Gonçalo Piçarro: but this matter was not carried ſo covertly, but de Fuentes received timely Advices thereof, by means of the Indians who were in the Charcas, upon which he abandoned the City, and Lope de Mendoça entred therein and poſſeſſed himſelf of the People, Arms, Horſes, with what Money he could find; and ſo he returned to joyn with Diego Centeno, who was then at the Villa de Plata, and there they made up a Body of two hundred and fifty Men well armed and appointed in all reſpects. And being now aſſembled together, Diego Centeno made them a long Diſcourſe of all matters which had paſſed from the beginning of the Troubles untill that time; he condemned the proceedings of Gonçalo Piçarro, putting them in mind of the many Slaughters he was guilty, and of the Bloud he ſpilt of thoſe who pretended to doe ſervice to the King: and now by menaces and force of Arms he had cauſed himſelf to be ſtyled Governour of that Empire, and that he had poſſeſſed himſelf not onely of his Majeſty's revenue, but of the Eſtates of particular Men, from whom he had taken away their Indian plantations, and appropriated them to himſelf; and that he had encouraged men to ſpeak things in derogation of his Majeſty's Authority; to which he added many other things, which he objected againſt Piçarro: and in the concluſion he put them in mind of the duty which good Subjects ought to bear towards their Prince, and the danger of denying their allegiance: the which reaſons Diego Centeno urged ſo home that the people unanimouſly agreed thereunto, and frankly offered to follow his Commands in what enterprize ſoever he ſhould employ them.

And to keep this matter the more ſecret, care was taken to intercept all correſpondences and intelligence which might paſs by the way to Cozco, untill ſuch time as he had made his full recruit of Men, Horſe, Powder, and other ammunition for War; and yet notwithſtanding all this care and caution, it was impoſſible to hinder or obſtruct the intelligence which by means of the Indian Meſſengers was diſpatched to Cozco; and a hundred Leagues farther to the Northward toward Los Reyes; though Alonſo de Toro who was an Officer belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro did all that he was able to intercept Advices; and to that end had ſent a hundred Men to poſſeſs the paſs and obſtruct all intelligence, and the paſſage of the Vice-king towards Cozco. And here it was that Alonſo de Toro received the firſt news of the Inſurrection of Diego Centeno and the death of Franciſco de Almendras; together with the number of Men, and Horſe, and Ammunition; and all other matters which untill that time had paſſed; which the Indians in a particular manner related to him. So ſoon as Alonſo de Toro received theſe informations he immediately repaired to Cozco, where having levied Men, he perſuaded the Citizens and Governours of the City to engage themſelves in the Cauſe of Piçarro againſt Diego Centeno; telling them, that with the help and aſſiſtence of thoſe Souldiers, Horſe and Arms, which were then in the City, he intended to go forth and fight him: And moreover to juſtifie the righteouſneſs of his Cauſe, he told them that this Diego Centeno was a mere Impoſtor, who had no right, nor title, nor authority on his ſide; and that being moved onely by his own intereſt and private advantage with colour and pretence of his Majeſty's ſervice, had inveigled many people to follow his Colours; whenas in reality Gonçalo Piçarro was the onely true and lawfull Governour of thoſe Kingdoms; intending to keep them in quietneſs, and peace, and ſafety, untill ſuch time onely as that his Majeſty ſhould declare his ſenſe and pleaſure in theſe matters: and therefore that the Inſurrection made made by Diego Centeno was not to be juſtified, but rather oppoſed by all good men who wiſhed well to the publick peace and ſecurity of the people. And moreover, to juſtifie the Cauſe of Piçarro, he admoniſhed them to call to mind the Merits of Gonçalo Piçarro, and the good Services he had done for all the people and Souldiers of the Empire, by reſcuing them from the execution of thoſe new Laws and Regulations which would have proved their ruine; to perform which he had adventured and expoſed his perſon to the greateſt dangers, for no other reaſon, than for the publick benefit and welfare of the people. For it was manifeſt to all the World, that if the late new Statutes and Regulations had taken place, no Inhabitant could have enjoyed any Eſtate, and ſo have been diſabled from quartering Souldiers, and conſequently they could never have ſubſiſted, ſo that both one and the other had obligations on them to favour the Cauſe and Intereſt of Piçarro: for as to what concerned himſelf, he had never oppoſed his Majeſty's Laws and Commands; but in way of a Supplicant went with his Petition to the Vice-king; but before he could come to him, finding him to be impriſoned and baniſhed by proceſſes from the Court of Judicature, he conceived he might juſtly ſet up his own title to be Governour during that vacancy. And in caſe he did at any time act againſt the Vice-king, it was by order and warrant from the Royal Court of Juſtice; an evidence whereof they might ſee before their eyes, if they were pleaſed to caſt them on Licenciado Cepeda then preſent with Piçarro, and was the moſt ancient Judge of that Court. Nor ought there to be any queſtion, whether the Judges, as the caſe then ſtood, were able to confer this Power upon him or not; and if the matter be doubtfull, men ought to expect his Majeſty's determination therein; and in the mean time acquieſce in the Government of Piçarro, who hath given ſufficient proofs of his great abilities to ſupport the burthen of ſo important a Charge, which he may juſtly challenge upon the ſcore and merit of his brothers and himſelf, who have gained the Empire with great labours and hazards of their lives; and indeed none ſeems more fit and proper for that emploiment than himſelf who is acquainted with the Merits of all the Adventurers with him in the Conqueſt; and accordingly knows in what manner to reward and gratifie every man according to his deſerts; which is impoſſible for others to doe, who are Strangers, and newly come from Spain.

With this and ſuch kind of reaſoning, delivered in his fierce and angry manner of expreſſion, he cauſed himſelf to be obeyed; for none daring to oppoſe or contradict him, they all inclined to join with him againſt Diego Centeno. Thus did Alonſo de Toro raiſe Forces and appoint Captains over them, and to mount his Men he took all the Horſes in the City which belonged to perſons that were aged and infirm; ſo that in a ſhort time he had gathered almoſt three hundred Men indifferently well armed; and with them marched about ſix Leagues from Cozco towards the Southward: where he remained for the ſpace of twenty days for want of Intelligence of the Enemy's motion; at length, being impatient, and fearing that he loſt his time, he marched forwards, and came within twelve leagues of the place, where Diego Centeno was quartered, who having divided his Forces into two parts, made a retreat; howſoever Meſſengers with Propoſitions and Articles of peace paſſed between both Parties with intention if poſſible to bring matters to an accommodation, but it ſoon appeared how great the difference was, and what little hopes of compoſition by the peaceable way of Treaty.

Wherefore Alonſo de Toro proceeded with intent to give battel to the Enemy: but Diego Centeno and his Officers thought it not prudence to adventure ſo conſiderable a ſtake, and a matter of that high moment, wherein his Majeſty's ſervice was concerned to be decided by ſuch a doubtfull event; for if they were worſted, they ſhould be irrecoverably loſt; wherefore making a retreat, and marching away, they laded whole droves of Sheep with proviſions of the Countrey, and taking with them the Curacas, or Lords, of the Countrey, they left all parts behind them deſolate, and without proviſions or inhabitants, for the diſtance of above fourty leagues round. Howſoever Alonſo de Toro purſued after them, as far as to the City of Plate, which is diſtant at leaſt a hundred and eighty leagues from Cozco: but finding the Countries entirely diſpeopled, without ſuſtenance or food, by reaſon that the Curacas had cauſed all their Subjects to attend them on the part of Centeno, and not being able to ſuſtain themſelves longer; they reſolved to return back again to Cozco; in which march Alonſo de Toro was to lead the Van with with fifty Horſe, and Alonſo de Mendoça was to bring up the Rere, and to cover the main Body in caſe they ſhould be attacked by Diego Centeno, and in this order they marched to Cozco, where they all met.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Diego Centeno purſues after Alonſo de Toro: great Jealouſies and Fears ariſe in the City of Los Reyes. Lorenço de Aldana pacifies and ſuppreſſes them. Gonçalo Piçarro ſends his Major General Franciſco de Carvajal into the Charcas; with what happened in his way thither.

THE return of Alonſo de Toro towards Cozco was ſpeedily made known to Diego Centeno by the intelligence which the Indians brought him; at which he much admired; and conceived that this ſudden turn from his late purſuit and diviſion of his Forces into three parts muſt neceſſarily be cauſed by ſome extreme want, defect or inability amongſt his people, in confidence whereof he detached fifty of his beſt and lighteſt Horſe under the command of Captain Lope de Mendoça, to purſue the Enemy, and take up the ſtraglers, and ſuch as remained in the Rere. And accordingly Mendoça had the fortune to overtake about fifty Horſemen of them who were in the ſecond detachment, all which he diſmounted, and took their Horſes and Arms from them; though afterwards he reſtored them again, upon promiſe to take their ſide and join with them; which good ſucceſs was obtained during the time that Alonſo de Mendoça continued in the City of Plate. Some Hiſtorians who favoured the Cauſe of Alonſo de Toro, ſay that he hanged ſeveral of them, though the number is not ſpecified. After which Lope de Mendoça returned again, to ſet upon Alonſo de Mendoça, for as yet he had not quitted the City of Plate; but he having received advice of the late ſucceſs, took another way, and ſo avoided him: in the mean time Diego Centeno coming to the City of Plate; it was agreed to continue there for ſome time, that the people might have an opportunity to come in to them, and make proviſion of Arms and neceſſaries of which they ſtood in need. The unexpected return of Alonſo de Toro to Cozco ſurprized all the City with great amazement; and the rather, becauſe no juſt cauſe or reaſon appeaerd for ſuch a diſorderly retreat; which had given courage to the Enemy, that was low, and a little before weak and affrighted, to become bold and daring, and to make an attack upon them. All theſe ſucceſſes were particularly known and diſcourſed at Los Reyes; and in regard there were people of both parties in that place, and ſuch as favoured the ſide of the Vice-king talked publickly, that they would goe forth and join with Diego Centeno: to all which Lorenço de Aldana ſeeming to give little regard, or to puniſh or ſuppreſs ſuch who gave out theſe Diſcourſes; Gonçalo Piçarro concluded that he was one of that Plot, and a Ringleader of that Faction.

With theſe apprehenſions ſeveral perſons went to Gonçalo Piçarro, and gave him an account how freely people diſcourſed of his Affairs: but when News came of the defeat of the Vice-king, and his ſtraitned and unhappy condition, the hearts of that Party who declared for him began to ſink, and the Faction of Piçarro to riſe and take courage; ſo that the principal Inhabitants of that City thought they might not ſafely make their Complaints to Loreço de Aldana againſt certain ill-affected perſons who daily uttered ſeditious words and reports, to the diſturbance of the City; whom they offered particularly to name, and bring their informations againſt them; to the end that they might be puniſhed by death or baniſhment, as their Crimes deſerved; to which Lorenço de Aldana gave for anſwer, that he was not informed of thoſe matters before, but that now he would ſeverely puniſh them, as the Law did direct.

The Informers, encouraged with this Answer, seised upon fifteen persons, and brought them before the Chief Justice Peter Martin de Cecilia, otherwise called Don Benito, for he was called by both those names, who would have put them on the wrack, and passed sentence of condemnation on the least word of confession, so passionately zealous he was for the Cause of Piçarro, but Lorenço de Aldana, who was a Man of much more moderation, freed them from his hands, and sent them to his own Lodgings, on pretence of safer custody, where having allowed them all things necessary, he afterwards, under pretence of banishment, conveighed them away upon a Ship which he had provided for them; and under the Seal of secrecy gave them assurances of his good intentions, to which they formerly had not been strangers. But the Party of Piçarro was not contented with this easie way of punishment, but rather highly offended thereat; and therefore represented Lorenço de Aldana unto Piçarro, as a person inclined to the contrary Party; but Piçarro seemed not willing to give ear thereunto, either because he would not believe him to be other than his friend; or that being so far distant from him as Quitu, thought it imprudent to manifest his displeasure and resentments against a person so well beloved and generally esteemed by the people. By this time the News of the Insurrection of Diego Centeno, with what had succeeded in the Charcas was come to the knowledge of Gonçalo Piçarro, who conceived it a matter of high importance, and of a more dangerous consequence than the troubles at Los Reyes, and therefore after consultation held with his Officers, he gave an immediate Commission to Francisco Carvajal to go and suppress those commotions; in which resolution the generality of all the Officers concurred, as being the most brave and most experienced Captain of the Army; though in reality, being weary of his uneasie temper they were desirous to be rid of him, that they might have the greater hand in the rule of affairs. Thus Carvajal with a select number onely of twenty Horse in whom he reposed the greatest confidence departed from the Confines of Quitu, and came to St. Michael's, where outwardly he was received with high demonstrations of honour and respect from the People. Howsoever he took six of the Chief Governours, and having severely reproved them for their perfidy and falseness to Gonçalo Piçarro, and for their affection and zeal to the Vice-king; he told them that he resolved once to put all their City to fire, and sword, and not to leave one Man, Woman or Child alive therein: but considering that this was not an act of the generality or of the common people, but onely of those who were their Heads and Rulers; he therefore resolved to punish the fault and crime in them, whom he esteemed to be the principal Instruments; and having ordered them to make their Confession to the Priest, he caused one of them, who was a Clerk, and had sealed the Warrants and Orders which the Vice-king had sent abroad to be executed, but the others, by the earnest Addresses and Solicitations of their Wives and other Relations escaped, and by the Prayers of Friars and Priests who earnestly interceded in their favour, obtained their pardon: howsoever he banished them from the Province, confiscated their Indians, and fined them in four thousand pieces of Eight a piece; thence he marched to Truxillo gathering in his way all the Men and Money he was able: he laid Taxes on the people, and gathered them in haste, and then he passed to Los Reyes, where he formed a Body of above two hundred Men, and took the road to Cozco by way of the desart, and being come to Huamanca, as some Authours say, he brought that place under Tribute, and made them pay the Impositions which he laid upon them.

Whilst these Matters were in agitation, there were designs plotting in Los Reyes to take away the Life of Lorenço de Aldana: for at that time people were so uneasie and unquiet, that upon every small occasion they were ready to fly into a mutiny, and conspire against their Governours, for which the principal Authours were put to death. And this was the third Plot which was contrived in Los Reyes, which ended with the death of three or four of the chief Conspiratours, and of five or six more than in Huamanca, with Francisco de Carvajal, who being accused by those in Los Reyes, were upon their confession put to death. It was in Huamanca also where Carvajal received the News of the retreat of Diego Centeno, and the Attacques which Alonso de Toro had made upon him, and that he was returned victorious to Cozco: upon which intelligence Carvajal thought it not necessary to proceed farther; considering that Diego Centeno was retired: for which cause, and because he was not willing to meet with Alonso de Toro, he resolved to return to Los Reyes, Reyes, and the rather, becauſe theſe two great men were at odds, on occaſion that Gonçalo Piçarro had taken from Alonſo de Toro his Office of Major-General, and conferred it on Franciſco de Carvajal, on pretence that the other was ſickly and infirm which rendred him uncapable of that Charge; but Carvajal was ſcarce come to Los Reyes before the news overtook him that Diego Centeno had paſſed the Mountains in purſuit of Alonſo de Toro, and that he had taken fifty of his men Priſoners, and that they had revolted and taken up Arms on the Enemy's ſide, and that Alonſo de Mendoça was retreated another way: upon this intelligence he reſolved to turn againſt Diego Centeno, as he accordingly did, and took his way by Arequepa to avoid meeting with Alonſo de Toro: notwithſtanding which both Alonſo de Toro and the Government of Cozco receiving advices thereof, wrote a joint Letter to Carvajal, deſiring him to take Cozco in his way, for that it would ſeem a diſparagement to that City, (which was the Head of that Empire) to be neglected, and that his Forces deſigned againſt Diego Centeno ſhould ſeem to iſſue out of Arequepa than from Cozco. Carvajal conſented to their deſire, rather from hopes of increaſing and augmenting his Forces in that City than a deſire of compliance with their requeſt; and ſo haſtning to Cozco, he, and Alonſo de Toro had a meeting with unkind looks and jealouſies each of other, though outwardly and in publick their enmities were not manifeſted: howſoever the day following Carvajal took four of the Citizens of Cozco, and without any intimation thereof to Alonſo de Toro, hanged them up, which ſerved to foment the quarrel and differences which were between them. And now Carvajal having increaſed his numbers to three hundred men, all well armed and appointed, one hundred of which were Horſe, and the reſt Foot, he marched with them to Collao, where Diego Centeno was quartered, and being come within ten leagues thereof, Centeno grounding an opinion on a report, that the Souldiers of Carvajal were diſcontented and would not fight but revolt to his ſide; took an aſſurance one night with a Party of eighty men to beat up the quarters of Carvajal, and accordingly came ſo near that they could hear one another ſpeak: but he ſoon found himſelf deceived, for Carvajal put himſelf in ſo good a poſture to receive him, that every perſon was in order of Battel, nor were the diſcontents amongſt the Souldiery ſo great as were reported; for otherwiſe it had been impoſſible for one ſingle Man to have contained three hundred in due obedience to him.

Howſoever it is moſt certain, as all Authours agree, that Carvajal was ill beloved by the generality, for he was very ill-natured and ſevere towards his Souldiers, paid them ill, and perhaps with nothing but bad words, and worſe performances: but howſoever the ſtory goes, it is ſtrange that he ſhould perform ſuch great actions with men ſo much diſcontented, and who had evil wills and inclinations towards him. It is certain that he was very cruel in his own nature, but not to thoſe of his own Party; but to ſuch as were Traitours, and revolted from his to the contrary Party, like the Weaver's Shuttle from one ſide to the other; for which reaſon they were called Weavers: but we ſhall ſpeak more at large hereafter of Carvajal, who moſt certainly was a very brave Souldier, having been bred up under that great Captain Gonçalo Fernandez de Cordona, Duke of Seſa, and other renowned Commanders of thoſe times: but as to Diego Centeno, he perceiving that matters did not ſucceed according to his expectation, made his retreat in good order, and ſtill defended himſelf with ſome loſs, untill by degrees his Forces being diminiſhed, he was totally defeated.

CHAP. XXIX.

Carvajal continues his purſuit after Diego Centeno. A ſtrange piece of Cruelty committed by him upon a Souldier, and a trick which another plaid upon him.

SO ſoon as it was day Carvajal purſued the Enemy with his Foot drawn up in form of Battel, the Horſe advancing before to fall on them in the Rere: but Diego Centeno made his retreat good, and the night following, and for three or four nights following he continually alarm'd Carvajal, in expectation that ſome parties would fall off from the Enemy and revolt unto him; but finding his hopes deceived in that point, he got his Forces into faſt places, and acted on the defenſive part; and at length began to march away with all ſpeed, twelve, thirteen and ſometimes fifteen leagues a-day: and as ſome Authours report, he ſent away his Baggage before, and what elſe was cumberſome, whilſt he with a ſelect number of men well armed marched in the Rere. Howſoever the Enemy purſued ſo cloſe after them, that notwithſtanding the long marches which Diego Centeno took, they ſcarce loſt ſight of them; for about two dozen of Pikes which marched always in the Front, did continually gall them, untill at length they were utterly deſtroyed: whenſoever Diego Centeno came to any narrow Paſs, he then made a ſtop and faced the Enemy, and maintained it for three or four days, untill the Baggage and whatſoever was cumberſome had advanced twenty leagues before, and then he would follow with all haſte to overtake them, and when he was come up to his Companions, they would all ſay, We wiſh to God that he would give a ſtop to the proceedings of this Tyrant, that we might take a little repoſe for two or three days; that in the mean time we might advance twenty leagues before him: but ſo hot a purſuit did they make after them (as I have heard from ſeveral of Diego Centeno's own people,) that they had ſcarce taken five or ſix hours of repoſe and reſt, before they eſpied a ſtand of Pikes ſtill following with ſuch diligence as if not men but the Devil had driven them; upon appearance of which they inſtantly put themſelves upon the march, whilſt Diego Centeno himſelf faced the Enemy and covered the Rere. It happened one day that Diego Centeno and his Companions maintained a narrow Paſs, which was ſomething rocky, for the ſpace of above half a day together, untill ſuch time as night cauſed both parties to retire: during which time one of that Company, who was mounted on a Mare, whoſe name I have forgotten, alighted from his Beaſt, and with his Gun went to a Rock, on the ſide of which taking a ſtay for the better aſſurance of his ſhot, he fired at the Enemy, and did the execution to kill a Horſe by the ſide of Carvajal; which being done, the poor man returned to take his Mare, truſting to her Leggs, that with her ſwiftneſs he ſhould both eſcape the Enemy and overtake his own Party; but when he came to ſeek his Mare where he had tyed her, ſhe had broke her Bridle and was gone, having been affrighted with the report of the Gun and the noiſe of the Horſes which paſſed by her, ſo that the poor man falling into the hands of Carvajal's Souldiers, they took him and preſented him to their Commander, who being wearied with the purſuit, and angry at the reſiſtence which was made, and more incenſed at the particular action of this Souldier, he reſolved to put him to a lingring death, and in order thereunto he ſtripped him naked, and tied his Arms and Feet and threw him into a hollow Pit to die with cold; for the colds in that Countrey are ſo extreme, that the Indians take care to carry their Pots and Jarrs under covert and within the Walls of their Houſes by night, for otherwiſe they would crack and burſt with the intenſeneſs of the Froſts. To this miſerable torture was this poor Wretch expoſed, crying out all night, lamenting and ſaying, is there no good Chriſtian who hath ſo much mercy and compaſſion for me as to kill me, and rid me out of this miſerable world, which will be ſuch a piece of charity as will be recompenſed by bleſſings from God.

Having paſſed the whole night with theſe ſad lamentations, ſo ſoon as it was day, he was told, that Carvajal intended him that nights lodging for his punith-

ment, and then, extending his mercy to him, he cauſed him to be hanged; which I believe was the greateſt piece of cruelty that he ever committed: after which he proceeded forward in his march. The Party of Diego Centeno, not being able to ſuſtain ſuch perpetual labours and tedious travels, began to faint and fail, as well Horſe as Foot, ſo that ſeveral of them fell into the hands of Carvajal; ſuch as were principal men of note he put to death, without pardon or mercy to any one of them, but as to the meaner ſort, he ſpared them at the interceſſion of his own Souldiers. But here we muſt not omit the relation of a trick or jeſt, which, at this time, and in the midſt of this purſuit, a certain Souldier put upon Carvajal, as many had already done during this War. It happened that many poor Souldiers went to Carvajal and complained, that during all the time that they had ſerved under him, and had marched ſo many leagues on foot without ſhoes or ſtockings in ſervice of their Lord the Governour, he had never taken care to provide them with things neceſſary and convenient for them; upon which Carvajal ſupplied many of them with Horſes, Arms, Clothes, and Money ſo far as he was able. The which gave encouragement to many of the Souldiers to be faithfull, and ſerve him to the end of the Wars; but others of looſer principles made uſe of the Horſes and Arms which he had given them to revolt to the other Party. Amongſt the reſt there was a certain Souldier whom Carvajal had mounted on a Mare, and having an intention to revolt, he always came up in the Rere with his Mare, ſtill making his boaſts and bravadoes, what he would doe, and how forward he would be, if he were well mounted. Carvajal being troubled to hear theſe conſtant vapours and ſayings of the Souldier, changed his Mare, and in place thereof gave him an excellent Mule, and told him, look to it now, Gentleman Souldier, for I have mounted you the beſt of any man in this Troop; here, Sir, ſaid he, take her and complain no more of me, for I ſwear by the Life of our Governour, that unleſs you advance to morrow by break of day twelve leagues before us, I will pay you off according to your deſerts. The Souldier received the Mule, and heard the threats, but to avoid the effects of them, he took another way, and travelled that night before Sun-riſing eleven leagues. About which time meeting with a Souldier of his acquaintance, who went to ſeek for Cavajal, he ſaid to him, pray recommend me to my Colonel, and tell him, that though I have not been able this night to travel twelve leagues, yet I have travelled eleven of them, and hope before noon to reach the full twelve, and four more. The Souldier not knowing that the other was fled, but ſuppoſing he was ſent by him upon ſome Meſſage with haſte and diligence, told Carvajal what the Souldier had ſaid to him; but Carvajal was more aſhamed of this ſecond cheat that was put upon him than angry at the unfaithfulneſs and treachery of the fellow; and in a paſſion ſaid, Theſe Weavers (for ſo he called all thoſe who revolted from his to the King's Party) had need to live in a ſtate of Confeſſion, and always prepared to die, and to pardon me in caſe I make bold to hang as many of them as I can meet with; for I have no need of ſuch Cuſtomers, who come and cheat me of my Horſes and Arms, and when they are well provided and equipped, then to run from me and revolt to the Enemy. And as to the Prieſts and Friars, they are but ſo many Spies, and ſuch as come with a like deſign. It is fit for Friars and religious men to remain in their Churches and Cells, and like good men to pray for the peace of Chriſtians, rather than under the ſanctity of their Habits to cloak treacherous deſigns: Let them look to it, for if they underſtand not the duty of their Profeſſion, let them not think it much, if I ſtrip them of their Habits, and make bold to hang them: of which I have obſerved ſeveral examples in the Wars where I have been a Souldier.

This did Carvajal utter with much paſſion and vehemence, and was as good as his word, as well to Friars as others, according to the report of all Hiſtorians: for ſuch as he took who had revolted from him, he puniſhed with the utmoſt cruelty and torment; but thoſe who were onely Priſoners of War, and had kept their ſide, he uſed well and with ſome kindneſs, endeavouring to bring them over to his own Party. And now we ſhall leave Carvajal in his purſuit of Diego Centeno, and return to Gonçalo Piçarro who was alſo in the purſuit of the Vice-king at the ſame time, and almoſt in the ſame days.

CHAP. XXX.

Gonçalo Piçarro purſues the Vice-king ſo cloſe that at length he drove him out of Peru. Pedro de Hinojoſa ſails to Panama, with a Fleet of Ships belonging to Piçarro.

WE have before mentioned how that the Vice-king marched into Quitu, and that Piçarro purſued him at the heels, though his Souldiers were not leſs weary, nor wanting of proviſions than the others, but rather more, becauſe the Vice-king marching before, carried away all the proviſions of the Countrey whereſoever they came; howſoever ſo eager was Piçarro, and ſo much concerned to put an end to theſe labours, that he continued his purſuit day and night, as Carate reports in the twenty ninth Chapter of his fifth Book in theſe words;

Gonçalo Piçarro purſued the Vice-king from the City of St. Michael's (which was the place from whence he made his retreat,) as far as the City of Quitu, which are an hundred and fifty leagues diſtant from each other; and ſo hotly did he carry on this work, that there was ſcarce a day but they ſaw each other, and the Scouts often diſcourſed together; and to be in greater readineſs, their Horſes remained always ſadled: but if either Party was more vigilant than the other, it was the Vice-king's, for his men ſlept always in their Clothes, holding their Horſes by the Halter, without Tents or Horſe-clothes to cover them; but neceſſity made them ingenious, and taught them a remedy, in that ſandy Countrey where were no Trees to ſhelter them, which was this; So ſoon as they came to the place where they intended to quarter that night, they filled certain Baggs or Sacks, which they carried with them, with Sand, and having made a great hole they threw them in, and covered them with Sand, which they troad and trampled on and made it very firm, ſo that the Horſes could lie thereupon with much eaſe. But beſides all this, both Armies ſuffered much for want of proviſions, and eſpecially Piçarro's men who came in the purſuit, for the Vice-king whereſoever he paſſed raiſed all the Indians of the Countrey, and the Caciques or Governours, and took them with him, that ſo the Enemy coming after, might find all places diſpeopled and unprovided: and ſuch was the great haſte which the Vice-king made that he took with him eight or ten of the beſt Horſe which could be procured in that Countrey, which were led by Indians, and in caſe any of his Horſes happened to be tired on the way he maimed or diſabled him in ſuch manner that the Enemy could make no uſe of him. And now in the way Captain Bachicao returned from the Voyage which we formerly mentioned, and joyned with Gonçalo Piçarro, bringing a recruit of three hundred and fifty Men, twenty Ships and good ſtore of Cannon, and ſailing along the coaſt which is neareſt to Quitu, he landed his Men in a place not far from the Forces of Piçarro; with which additional auxiliaries Piçarro's Army amounted to eight hundred men, of which many were principal perſons of quality and note, as well Inhabitants as Souldiers, who came in with ſuch frankneſs as no ſtory can parallel under the Government of a Tyrant and an Uſurper. In that Province all Proviſions were very plentifull, and therein not long before they had diſcovered ſeveral rich Veins of Gold, out of which the Spaniards whoſe lots fell there, raiſed vaſt ſums, which they refuſed to yield to Piçarro, and alſo denied the fifths to his Majeſty, or to be accountable for the Treaſures of dead perſons. And here it was that Piçarro received intelligence that the Vice-king was advanced forty leagues from Quitu, and was entred into a certain Town called Paſto, within the Government of Benalcaçar: And here he reſolved to purſue him to that place, which he accordingly did without delay or interruption; for Gonçalo Piçarro ſtaid but very little in Quitu, and having overtaken the Enemy, ſeveral skirmiſhes happened between parties on each ſide in that place, which is called the Hot River. And the Vice-king having advice that Piçarro was near at hand, he quitted Paſto in great haſte, and marched up into the Countrey untill he came to the City of Popayan, and Piçarro having ſtill purſued him for twenty eight leagues farther, where finding finding a desart and desolate Countrey, and want of all provisions, he resolved to return again to Quitu; which he accordingly did, after he had pursued the Vice-king for so long a time, and through such a vast tract of Land, as is before mentioned: and we may confidently averr that from the City of Plate (from which he first began his March) to the City of Pasto are seven hundred leagues, so long as may be computed to make a thousand of our ordinary leagues of Castile, &c. Thus far are the words of Carate, to which other Historians add, That the Vice-king having passed the River of Hot Waters, did imagine that his Enemies would have remained satisfied therewith, and desisted from all farther pursuit, considering that they had driven him out of Peru, and from the confines of their Jurisdiction, and that now he should remain in peace and quiet, untill some good opportunity should offer for his better advantage; but he had not long pleased himself with these thoughts, and scarce ended his discourse with his Captains concerning them, before some Parties of Piçarro's Army appeared to them, descending a Hill towards the River, with the same haste and fury that they had formerly practised: at which surprise, the Vice-king lifted up his hands to Heaven and cried aloud, and said, Is it possible, or will it ever be believed in Ages to come, That men pretending to be Spaniards should pursue the Royal Standard of their King (as they have done) for the space of four hundred leagues, as it is from the City of Los Reyes to this place? and then raising his Camp with speed, he proceeded forward that his Enemies might have no time to repose: but Piçarro proceeded no farther, but, as we have said, returned to Quitu, where, as Carate reports, he became so elated with pride by reason of his many prosperous successes, that his insolence became insupportable, and then out of the fulness of his heart, he would vent many bold sayings derogatory to the honour and Majesty of his King: The King, said he, will be obliged whether he will or not to grant me the Government of Peru, for he is sensible of the obligations he hath to me for this Conquest: and though oftentimes he would pretend to great obedience and resignation to his Majesty's pleasure, yet at other times, he would let fall words seditious and rebellious; and at the instigation of his Captains, he published his reasons, setting forth his right and title to that Government. And being now settled in the City of Quitu, he passed his time in Festivals, Sports and Banquets, without minding the actions or proceedings of the Vice-king; onely the discourses amongst themselves were that he would go to Spain by way of Cartagena, others that he would pass up farther towards the Continent to raise Men and Arms, and there expect his Majesty's further Instructions; others were of opinion, that he would remain in the Countrey of Popaya untill he received new Orders; but it was generally believed that he would not stay long there, or attempt any thing in those parts; but be his design what it would, it was concluded necessary to obstruct his passage to the Continent; to which end Hernando Bachicao was remanded back again with his Fleet, of which Pedro de Hinojosa, Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, was made Admiral, with two hundred and fifty men under his command, who departed with all expedition. Moreover Rodrigo de Carvajal was dispatched with his Ship to Panama, with a Pacquet of Letters from Gonçalo Piçarro, desiring the Inhabitants of that City to favour his cause and designs, assuring them, that whatever Spoils and Insolencies Bachicao had committed on them were contrary to his will and pleasure, and against his express command. Rodrigo de Carvajal arrived accordingly within three leagues of Panama, where he received intelligence that two Captains sent from the Vice-king were there, the one called John de Guzman, and the other John de Ylanez, who were raising Forces to carry to the Province of Belalcaçar to recruit the Vice-king's Army therewith, and that they had already listed about an hundred men, and had prepared good quantities of Arms, with five or six pieces of Cannon. And though these men had been for some time in a readiness, they were not sent away; by reason that apprehending some attempts from Gonçalo Piçarro, they thought fit to keep their people in reserve till they saw the danger over. Howsoever Rodrigo de Carvajal adventured to send a Souldier privately into the City with Letters to certain Citizens; who upon receipt thereof communicated them to the Officers of the Town, who seised on the Souldier, and by him understanding the design of Hinojosa, put the City into Arms, and sent two Brigantines to seise the Ship of Carvajal; but he suspecting some ill intention against him by reason of the long absence of his Messenger, set sail from thence, and so the two Brigantines missing him returned back without success.

Pedro de Hinojosa takes Vela Nunnez in his voyage. The great Preparations which were made in Panama. And how those Troubles were appeased.

THE Governour of Panama, called Pedro de Casaos, born at Seville, went in haste to Nombre de Dios, where he raised all the Men he was able; with what Arms he could find both offensive and defensive, which he carried with him to Panama to oppose Pedro de Hinojosa: the like diligence was used by the two Captains of Piçarro, between whom and Pedro de Casaos, though there had formerly risen some Disputes and Contests about place or preference, yet all agreed to chuse Casaos for Commander in chief. Pedro de Hinojosa having dispatched Rodrigo de Carvajal, proceeded on his Voyage to Panama, enquiring along the Coast concerning the Vice-king: and in the River and Port of St. John he put some Men ashoar, to receive what Intelligence and News was there stirring, who took ten Spaniards, and brought them on board; by one of whom they were given to understand, that the Vice-king by reason of the long stay of two of his Captains, John de Guzman and John de Ylanez in Panama, had sent also his Brother Vela Nunnez thither to hasten the Recruits, and to increase the numbers, he sent great sums of Money out of the King's Treasury, and delivered to him also the bastard Son of Gonçalo Piçarro; and that Vela Nunnez had sent a Souldier before to discover what danger there was on the Coast, whilst he remained a day's journey behind, upon which Intelligence, Hinojosa sent two Captains with different Parties by several ways; both which had good success; the first had the fortune to take Vela Nunnez; and the other Rodrigo Mexia, who was born in the City of Castin, and with whom was Gonçalo Piçarro's Son; and both of them got great booty and riches; all which came very acceptable to Hinojosa, who was much pleased with the taking of Vela Nunnez, who might oppose and prevent his design in Panama: and with the rescue of the Son of Gonçalo Piçarro, whose freedom would be joyfull to his Father. And encouraged with this happy success they sailed toward Panama, and being near the Place, Rodrigo de Carvajal came forth to meet them, and gave them Intelligence of all Matters at Panama, and how the City was prepared to oppose them. Hinojosa was rather pleased than discouraged with this News; and putting himself into a posture of War, sailed forward untill on a day in the month of October, which was in the year 1545. he came within sight of the City of Panama with a Fleet of eleven sail of Ships and a hundred and fifty Men aboard: upon this appearance the City was in great consternation; all Souldiers repaired to their Colours, and Pedro de Casaos who was chief Officer, had above five hundred Men under his command; but the most of them were Merchants, and the Officers such unexperienced Men in the War, that few of them knew how to fire a Musquet, and all of them unwilling to engage in fight, especially against Men coming from Peru, with whom having formerly been accostomed to deal in Traffick and Merchandize, it seemed strange to contend with them at any other Weapon. And moreover they considered, that a great part of their Estates, and effects were in Peru, which would all be confiscated by Gonçalo Piçarro, in case they should appear in Arms, against his Forces. Howsoever they formed and joined in several Bodies commanded by their respective Officers, the chief of which were first Pedro de Casaos, General; then Arias de Azebedo, who came afterwards over, and lived at Cordova, where at this time some of his Grandchildren inhabit: Other Captains and Officers were John Fernandez de Reboledo, Andrew de Arayza, with the Vice King's two Captains, John de Guzman and John de Ylanez, with several other Noble Persons then present, who resolved to defend the City for the service of his Majesty; and others being affrighted with the late Outrages and Insults of Bachicao were inclined to preserve themselves from the like Tyrannies, which they feared from Hinojosa: but he, considering what sort of people he had to deal with, landed two hundred Men, all old and vete-

rane Souldiers well appointed and armed, and fifty were left aboard, for defence of their Ships. And so he marched along the Coast, being flanked with his Cannon, carrying aboard the Boats belonging to the Ships, much to the annoyance of the Enemy, in case they should make an assault upon them. He gave farther order aboard Ship, that so soon as they should come to an Engagement, that they should presently hang up Vela Nunnez and the other Prisoners which they had taken. Pedro de Casaos seeing the resolution of Pedro de Hinojosa, came out to meet him, with intention either to overcome or dye: and both Parties being come within Musquet shot each of other; all the Clergy-men and Friars came out of the City carrying a Wood of Crosses before them, which served for Banners and Colours, and being all clad in mourning with sadness in their countenances, cryed out with loud voices to Heaven and to the People for Peace and Concord amongst them; saying, Is it not a great shame and pity, that you who are Christians, and are come to preach the Gospel to Infidels, should imbrue your hands in the bloud of each other, to the common ruine and calamity of all. These words being uttered with great out-cries and exclamations, put both sides to a stand, and to look each on the other; untill the religious Troops interposed between both Parties, and began to treat of a Truce, and to create a right understanding. Accordingly Hinojosa sent in his behalf Don Balthasar de Castilia, Son of Count de Gomera, and the People of Panama employed Don Pedro de Cabrera for their Agent, both Natives of Seville. It was pleaded in behalf of Hinojosa, that no reason could be given, why they should oppose his landing, or free admittance into the City: for that his message and business thither was to give satisfaction to the Inhabitants for the Tyrannies and Outrages which Bachicao had committed on them, and to buy Cloths and Provisions of them for their Money, and supply themselves with other necessaries for their Voyage. That they had received strict Commands and Orders from Gonçalo Piçarro, not to give them the least cause of offence, nor to fight, unless they were compelled thereunto: And that so soon as they had made their provisions, and re-fitted their Ships, they would speedily depart in quest of the Vice-king, and cause him to embark for Spain, according to the Sentence which the Judges had given concerning him: and thereby free the Countries from those fears and molestations which he had caused by rowling up and down in all quarters. And in regard he was not in Panama, they had no business which could detein them long there, and therefore they entreated them not to force them to an engagement with them; which according to the Command of Piçarro they would avoid by all means possible; but in case they were forced to fight, they would then doe their best not to be overcome.

On the other side it was alledged in behalf of the Governour Pedro de Casaos; that his entry into their Countrey in that hostile manner could not be justified, though it were given for granted that Gonçalo Piçarro had a right to the Government. That Bachicao had given the same promises, and made as fair pretences as he did, and yet so soon as he had gotten possession, he then committed all those spoils and murthers for which they pretend now to give satisfaction. The Commissioners on both sides hearing these Allegations, and being desirous to make an accommodation, did agree that Hinojosa should be received ashoar, and have free admittance and entertainment in the City for the space of thirty days, with a guard of fifty Men for security of his person; that his Fleet, with the rest of his Souldiers should in the mean time sail to the Isles of Pearls, and take with them Ship-carpenters, and cut such Timber as should be usefull for repair of their Vessels; and that at the end of thirty days they should return to Peru. These Articles being agreed unto by both Parties, they were confirmed by Oath, and Hostages given.

Pedro de Hinojosa accordingly came to the City with his fifty Men; where he took a house, and gave publick entertainment to all comers and goers; and his People sported and treated friendly and familiarly with all the Inhabitants. Augustine de Carate, in the thirty second Chapter of his fifth Book, saith; for what we have farther to add in this matter is upon his Authority; That three days had scarce passed before all those Souldiers who had been raised by the Captains, John Guzman and John de Yllanez, revolted for the most part to Hinojosa; according to whose example the idle and vagrant persons of the City, who were not Merchants, and such as had no employment, listed themselves Souldiers with Hinojosa, intending for Peru: so that the Captains of the Vice-king finding themselves for-ſaken by their men, privately embarked with fourteen or fifteen men, and ſailed away. In the mean time Hinojoſa paſſed very peaceably, without intermedling in the Government or matters of Juſtice, or ſuffering his People to commit the leaſt offence, or give occaſion of complaint to the People: with theſe men he ſent Don Pedro de Cabrera, and Hernando Mexia de Guzman his Son-in-law to Nombre de Dios, with Orders to keep that Port, and intercept all Advices which ſhould come as well from Spain as from other parts.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the Actions of Melchior Verdugo in Truxillo, Nicaragua and in Nombre de Dios, and how he was forced to leave that City.

ABout the ſame time there happened an odd Accident in the City of Truxillo, which gave great offence, and raiſed the enmity and hatred of the People againſt the perſon who occaſioned the ſame, whoſe name was Melchior Verdugo, to whom the Province of Caſſamarca was appointed by lot, a place famous for the impriſonment of the King Atahualpa and other remarkable Succeſſes which have been mentioned before.

This perſon having been born in the City of Avila, and Countrey-man to the Vice-king, was deſirous to ſignalize himſelf in doing ſomething remarkable for his ſervice; the Vice-king, before his impriſonment knowing of his Intenſions, gave him a large Commiſſion to doe many things of high importance, and particularly to deſtroy or diſpeople the City of Los Reyes, for which reaſon Melchior Verdugo, and his adherents fell under the hatred and diſpleaſure of Gonçalo Piçarro, and of ſuch as were of his Party. Verdugo, being informed hereof, reſolved to eſcape out of the Kingdom, fearing to fall into the hands of Piçarro. Howſoever, being deſirous to perform ſome Act extraordinary, he engaged ſome Souldiers to him, bought Arms ſecretly, and made Muſquet-ſhot, Mannacles and Chains in his own houſe, and ſo bold he was in his matters, that his Neighbours and Companions were greatly offended thereat: but fortune favoured his deſign, for at that time, a Ship arriving in the Port of Truxillo from Los Reyes, he ſent for the Maſter and the Mate of the Veſſel, pretending that he had a parcel of Mayz and other Goods to ſhip upon him for Panama, which he deſired them to come and ſee; ſo ſoon as the Maſter and the Mate were within his houſe, he put them into a low cellar or dungeon, which he had made: then he pretended to be lame of the Gout; and ſitting in that manner at his Window, he eſpyed one of the Governours with his Clerk paſſing by; and calling to them, he deſired them to come, to draw ſome authentick Writings, which he had occaſion for; and deſired their excuſe for not coming to them by reaſon of the Indiſpoſition which was upon him: when they were come in, he fairly led them to the place where the Maſter and Pilot were lodged, and there he took away their white Staves, and clapt them in Chains, ſetting a guard of ſix Muſquetiers upon them. And returning again to his Window, he eſpied another Citizen paſſing by, to whom he called in the ſame manner as before, pretending ſome buſineſs with him; and him alſo he put into his priſon, and in this manner he decoyed in at leaſt twenty perſons of the principal Citizens, which were all that remained at home, the others being gone in Service of Piçarro. Then he ſallied out into the Market-place with twenty Souldiers whom he judged to be faithfull to him; he ſummoned all people in the King's-name to come in, and ſeized on thoſe who did not readily obey, and then in hearing of all his priſoners, he told them plainly, that his buſineſs was to carry men and arms to the Vice-king; for which ſervice he had an occaſion for money, which they muſt ſpeedily pay him, in caſe they expected their liberty; and that every one ſhould pay his proportion according to his ability; and if not, he was reſolved to carry them away with him to the Vice-king.

The

The priſoners paid down their ready money, as was agreed; and taking what was in the King's Treaſury with his own Eſtate; for he was a very rich-man, he amaſſed great quantities of Gold and Silver, all which he carried with him, and ſo embarked for Panama; and that his paſſage might not be interrupted, he brought all his priſoners in their chains to the Sea-ſide, and freed them as he was going off. In his voyage he met with a Ship laden with goods, and ſpoils, which Bachicao had robbed at Panama, the which he took, and divided to himſelf and amongſt his Souldiers, and hearing that Gonçalo Piçarro had a Fleet of Ships at that place, he feared to go thither, and ſo ſailed to Nicaragua. Pedro de Hinojoſa having intelligence of his going, ſent two Ships in chaſe of him, under the command of Captain John Alonſo Palomino with a hundred and twenty Muſquetiers: at his arrival there he found that Verdugo was landed; howſoever he took his Ship, but durſt not adventure aſhoar; becauſe the Inhabitants of Granada and Leon denyed him admittance; whereupon Palomino returned to Panama with the Ships which he had taken on the coaſt of Nicaragua, of which he reſerved ſuch as were ſerviceable, and burnt the reſt, and being arrived at Panama, he gave to Hinojoſa an account of all that had paſſed. Thus was Melchior Verdugo put out of all poſſibility of doing any farther feats againſt Piçarro in the Sea of Zur, for he had loſt his Ship, and could not buy another, for Bachicao, and his men, had taken them all. Wherefore conſidering with himſelf what to doe, he imagined, that in caſe he went by way of the North Sea to Nombre de Dios, he might be able to compaſs ſome exploit in that City; for he conceived that Pedro de Hinojoſa had few people in that City, and thoſe all ſecure, and in no apprehenſion of ſurprize by an enemy: with this fancy he built four Frigates, and ſhipped a hundred ſtout Souldiers upon them in the Lake of Nicaragua, and paſſed through that chanel which runnes into the North Sea. In the River which is called Chagre, it was his fortune to take a Boat with certain Negroes who ſpake good Spaniſh, and by them he was informed of all matters that had paſſed in Nombre de Dios, both as to the Souldiers and Officers which were quartered there. And taking thoſe Negroes for their Guides, they came about midnight to the City, where being landed, they immediately ſet upon the Houſe where Don Pedro de Cabre and Hernan Mexia, with ſome Souldiers were lodged, who being allarum'd with the noiſe of the people, put themſelves into a poſture to defend themſelves. Whereupon Verdugo's men ſet fire to the Houſe, ſo that the Defendants perceiving the flame about their Ears, were forced to goe forth and combat with their Enemies by the light thereof: but they being Robbers, and more deſirous of plunder and booty than of bloud, took their heels and fled, and by help of a dark night ſecured themſelves within the high Mountains which are near to the City: of all which particulars Advices being carried to Pedro de Hinojoſa then reſiding at Panama, he ſhewed high reſentments, and complained thereof to Doctour Ribera, who was Governour of Nombre de Dios, at that time reſiding at Panama, before whom he accuſed Verdugo for having entred into his Government and Juriſdiction without Title or Commiſſion from his Superiour; but had by authority onely from himſelf preſumed to impriſon ſeveral Juſtices of the Peace, and forced them and others to pay for their ranſomes; that he had committed many Piracies in the South and North Seas, and at length in a hoſtile manner had entred into Nombre de Dios: all which being highly aggravated before Doctour Ribera, Pedro de Hinojoſa offered him aſſiſtence both in perſon and with his forces; the which Doctour Ribera accepting, adminiſtred an Oath of fidelity to Pedro Hinojoſa and his Captains to obey him as their Captain General during the time of this action, and not to doe any thing contrary to his Command; which being agreed, they forthwith marched from Panama to Nombre de Dios. Melchior Verdugo having notice hereof, drew out his men into the field, with ſuch others of the City as had joined with him. Hinojoſa immediately attacked them, and at the firſt charge ſeveral fell both on one ſide and the other. But when the Inhabitants of Nombre de Dios ſaw their own Governour at the head of the contrary party, they all retired to the Mountain near the City. Verdugo's men would have given a ſtop to the flight of the Inhabitants; but their diſorder being ſuch that they could not withſtand the ſhock of their Enemies, they betook themſelves to their Frigates, with which they ſurprized a Ship in Port; and arming her with their Cannon, they made many ſhot to the Town, but with little or no damage, by reaſon that the Veſſel road at a diſtance for want of Water near the ſhoar. Verdugo finding himſelf thus diſappointed, and in no condition to deal with the Enemy, ſeveral of his men being killed and left aſhoar, he ſailed to Cartagena with his Ship and Frigats, attending an opportunity to incommode the Enemy: but Doctour Ribera and Pedro de Hinojoſa appeaſed the people the beſt they could; and leaving ſome force and Captains for ſecurity and defence of the City, they returned to Panama.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Blaſco Nunnez Vela recruits himſelf in Popayan. Gonçalo Piçarro pretends to goe for Quitu, hoping by that means to cauſe his removal from thence. The Vice-king goes in queſt of Pedro Puelles.

WE before mentioned that the Vice-king was in Popayan, where, to keep himſelf in action, he engroſſed all the Iron of that Province; to work which he compelled the Smiths to come in and ſet up Forges, and in a ſhort time made above two hundred Fire-arms, with Croſlets and Armour proportionable to them, and then he wrote a Letter to Sebaſtian, Governour of Belalcaçar, and to a certain Captain of his called John Cabreras, who was then by order of the ſaid Governour emploied in a new Conqueſt of the Indians, wherein he gave them a particular intelligence of all matters which had happened to him ſince the time of his firſt entrance into Peru, in which was compriſed the Hiſtory of the Inſurrection of Gonçalo Piçarro, who had forced him to abandon the Countrey; and that now he reſolved to return again upon him; to which end, that he might have a competent Army, he deſired them to come and join with him, in which they would doe moſt ſignal ſervice to his Majeſty: and that having overcome and killed that Tyrant, they might largely ſhare in the poſſeſſions of Peru, which would be much better than all the Conqueſts they were now emploied in. Beſides which promiſes, the better to encourage them, he told them that Diego Centeno was actually on the Confines of Peru in his Majeſty's ſervice; that every day his forces encreaſed; ſo that now, in caſe the Tyrant were but attacked on the other ſide, it would be impoſſible for him to hold out. He alſo ſent them Warrants to take out of his Majeſty's Exchequer in ſeveral Towns and Villages near them the ſum of thirty thouſand Peſos of Gold, for payment of the Souldiers. The Captains having received theſe Orders, obeyed them with all readineſs; and with a hundred Souldiers well armed, came, and kiſſed the Vice-king's hand; the which encouraged him to ſend the like Orders to the new Kingdom of Granada, Cartagena and other parts, demanding ſuccour and aſſiſtence from them; ſo that in a ſhort time he had got a Body of four hundred men, all reaſonable well armed; but this ſucceſs was again tempered with the ill News of the loſs of his Brother and of his two Captains, John de Guzman and John de Ylanez; at which he was much troubled, becauſe he had great expectations from them. On the other ſide, Gonçalo Piçarro had nothing to trouble him, but onely the thoughts of the Vice-king, for he could not think himſelf ſecure, whilſt he lived, and was at the head of an Army: And becauſe he could not come at the Vice-king, or march into the Countrey where he was for want of Proviſions, which were very ſcarce in thoſe parts; he gave out, that he would march into the Charcas to ſuppreſs the Inſurrection of Diego Centeno; and to leave Captain Pedro de Puelles with three hundred men to guard that frontier againſt the Vice-King, in caſe he ſhould make an attempt thereupon. And to put a better colour on this feigned deſign, and make it more publick, he named his Captains and Souldiers who were to goe with him, and thoſe who were to remain behind; and made proviſions for maintenance of one and the other. Accordingly he marched out of Quitu, and took care that information hereof ſhould be diſpatched to the Vice-king; to perform which, an ill-man, whom the Vice-king had ſent for his Spy into thoſe parts, was very inſtrumental: for this Rogue had, in hopes of ſome great reward from Piçarro, diſcovered vered the design he was upon, and betrayed to him the Cypher which the Vice-king had given him, by the help of which Gonçalo Piçarro caused him to write all that had passed, and caused the Letter to be delivered to an Indian wholly ignorant of this treachery. On the other side, he caused Pedro de Puelles to write to several of his Friends then in Popayan, that he was quartered in Quitu with three hundred men; so that if they thought fit to come thither and divertise themselves with him for some time, they should find safety and a hearty welcome, in regard that the Countrey was quiet by the absence and retirement of Gonçalo Picarro from thence: and he delivered these Letters to certain Indians who were then present at the departure of Gonçalo Piçarro, that they might thereby confirm the contents of the intelligence which was sent; and farther, he ordered Pedro de Puelles to seem as if he sent these Indians in a secret manner, but yet so as a discovery might be made, and that the Out-guards of the Vice-king might intercept the Letters and carry them to him: the Plot being thus laid, Gonçalo Piçarro (as hath been said) departed from Quitu, and having marched three or four days, he feigned himself sick in excuse of his delay. The Vice-king having received the Letters from his treacherous Spy, and likewise seen the counterfeited intelligence from Pedro de Puelles, to both which he gave undoubted belief; he imagined that with four hundred men, he might easily deal with Pedro de Puelles, and after such a Victory he might pursue Gonçalo Piçarro and overthrow him: And on this confidence and belief building his design (for he could receive no other intelligence, the Roads being obstructed) he resolved to march to Quitu: but on the contrary, Gonçalo Piçarro was better informed, by way of the Indians of Cannaris, of all the proceedings of the Vice-king, and of every days march which he made; and when he understood that he was come within twelve days march of Quitu, he then returned with all speed to the City to joyn with Pedro de Puelles, from whence both the Camps proceeded with great joy, thinking that now they had entrapped the Vice-king and should be able to engage him in a Battel; and though they heard that he was eight hundred men strong, yet Piçarro confided in the valour and experience of his Veterane Souldiers, and contemned the rawness and unskilfulness of the adverse party: For when he came to muster and survey his men, he found that he had two hundred Fire-locks, three hundred and fifty Pike-men, and an hundred and fifty Horsemen, all dexterous and able Souldiers, well provided and armed, with quantity of powder of the best and finest sort. The Captains of the Fire-locks were John de Acosta and John Velez de Guevara, the Captain of the Pike-men was Hernando de Bachicao, and the Captains of Horse were Pedro de Puelles and Gomez de Alvarado, and the Standard was carried by Francis de Ampuero, and supported by seventy Horse. Benito Suarez de Carvajal, Brother of the Agitant Yllen Suarez, took the side of Piçarro, and was there present with thirty men under his command, all of his own Kindred and Relations; In this posture was the Army of Piçarro when news came that the Enemy was come within two leagues of the Camp; whereupon they marched and took possession of a Pass on the River where the Vice-king was to go over, for there was no other way; and being there Piçarro posted and fortified himself very advantageously; which happened, as Augustine Carate reports, on Saturday the fifteenth day of January, 1546.

The Vice-king charged Pedro de Puelles with great courage, in hopes speedily to rout him, and afterwards to deal in like manner with Piçarro; for he always entertained an opinion of the loyalty of the people, that they onely expected an opportunity to revolt and return to obedience and service of his Majesty. In confidence whereof he approached so near to the Forces of Pedro de Puelles, that the Van-guards could speak and call each other Traitours and Rebels, for both Parties pretended loyalty and duty to his Majesty, and yet all this time, the Vice-king was not informed that Gonçalo Piçarro was so near, but believed all the time that he had to deal with none but Pedro de Puelles.

The night following, about the glimpse of the Evening, Carate reports in the thirty fifth Chapter of his fifth Book, That the Vice-king holding a Council of War with his Commanders, it was there agreed, as most advantageous and of less danger to get possession of the Town than to adventure a Battel in the open Field; and accordingly before mid-night quietly and without noise they marched away, leaving their Camp and Tents with the Indians who carried them; and taking the way on the left hand, they marched over a great Desart: and Fernando

Paientino

Palentino ſays, that it rained all night, that they paſſed many rocky places and great Rivers, ſo that many times their Horſes were forced to take a rounding way by the ſide of ſteep Mountains, and coming to the bottom they plunged into Rivers, in which manner having marched all the night, they loſt ſeveral Men and Horſes, who were ſo diſabled and left behind that they could not come time enough to the Battel, and ſo ſoon as it was day they found themſelves within a league of Quitu. Thus far are the words of Palentino.

The reaſon which moved the Vice-king to take this troubleſome march, was in deſign to charge the Enemy in the Rere; but, as Carate ſaith, he did not believe that either the way was ſo bad nor ſo long; for when he moved his Camp, he was not then above three leagues from Quitu, and yet with the compaſs they took it proved at leaſt eight leagues: this errour was fatal to the Vice-king; for whereas he ſhould rather have kept his Men and Horſe freſh and fit for engagement, they were inſtead thereof ſo haraſſed and tired with their long march of eight leagues over Deſarts and unpaſſable places, that they had need of long reſt and repoſe to recover them; but where a misfortune and deſtiny is intended, the Counſels which are deſigned for good are converted to ruine and deſtruction.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The Battel of Quitu, wherein the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez was defeated and ſlain.

THE Vice-king entring into the City of Quitu found no reſiſtance, and there it was told him by a certain Woman that Piçarro was marching againſt him, at which he wondred much, but was ſoon made to underſtand the fraud and ſtrategeme by which he was decoyed into that ſnare. On the other ſide Gonçalo Piçarro knew nothing of the march of the Vice-king to Quitu, but believed all the time that he had remained in his Camp; but when in the morning the Scouts came near the Tents, and hearing little or no noiſe, they adventured in, and underſtood from the Indians of all matters which had paſſed, and accordingly gave information thereof to Gonçalo Piçarro, who was not wanting to ſend the news to his Captains, who immediately raiſed their Camp, and marched in an orderly poſture to Quitu, with intention to give Battel to the Vice-king, in what place ſoever they ſhould meet him. The Vice-king was not ignorant of all theſe matters, and conſidering the great advantage which his Enemies had over him, and that there was no ſecurity but in his Arms, he reſolved to hazard all upon the fortune of a Battel, hoping that ſuch as were true Servants and faithfull Subjects to his Majeſty would revolt over to his ſide; and ſo animating his people with theſe expectations, he marched with his Forces out of the City, and both ſides were ſo full of courage as if they had been ſecure of Victory; and though Gonçalo Piçarro had the greater advantage in his numbers, yet the Vice-king was equal to him in the Valour and Conduct of his Captains, all men of great ſpirit and renown: thoſe who commanded the Infantry were Sancho Sanchez d'Avila, his Couſin John Cabrera, and Francis Sanchez; his Captains of Horſe were Admiral Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar Cepeda, and Pedro de Baſſan, and ſo both Armies marched to meet each other: At the firſt a skirmiſh was begun by two parties of Musketiers detached from each Army; in which the people of Piçarro had the advantage by the ſtrength and goodneſs of their Powder, and by the uſe of their Fire-arms, being the better Marks-men: by this time both Armies were come ſo near to each other, that the detached Parties were forced to retreat to their reſpective Colours; to make which good on Piçarro's ſide, John de Acoſta with another able Souldier called Paez de Sottomayor came in to bring their Party off. Then Gonçalo Piçarro commanded Licenciado Carvajal to charge the right Wing of the Enemy, and he himſelf deſigned to lead and bring up the Horſe in the Front; but his Captains diſſuaded him from it, and rather deſired him to place himſelf within a Squadron of Foot, where, with ſeven or eight other Commanders, he might better overſee and govern the battel. The Vice-king's Troops of Horſe conſiſting of about a hundred and fourty men, obſerving that the Troops of Carvajal were coming up to charge them, they put themſelves on a Trot to meet them, but ſo without rank or order, that they ſeemed (as Carate ſays of them) to be half routed before they came to engage; and a file of Muſquetiers ſo galled them in the flank, that though Carvajal's party was leſs in number, yet the Vice-king's Horſe were ſo haraſſed and tyred, and the Enemy on the contrary freſh and in courage, that Carvajal had great advantage over them. Howſoever engaging firſt with their Lances, many fell on both ſides, and at length, fighting nearer with their Swords and Daggers, Pole-axes and Hooks, the battel grew hot and bloudy: but then Picarro's Standard ſupported with about a hundred men coming in quite turned the ſcale of the battel, and the Enemy routed and totally defeated. On the other ſide, the fight between the Foot, was very ſore and bloudy, with ſuch noiſe, and outcryes, that the numbers ſeemed much greater than they were: In the firſt charge Captain John Cabrera was ſlain, and ſoon after Captain Sancho Sanchez d'Avila; but before he fell, he did great execution with his Sword, having cut down whole files and ranks of the Enemy; but being overwhelmed with numbers and advantages of Arms, they were forced to yield to the greater power of the Enemy, which ranging victoriouſly on all ſides, the chief Commanders were killed, with moſt of the Souldiery. The Vice-king fought very ſtoutly with his Horſe, and in the firſt Charge had the fortune to diſmount Alonſo de Montalto, beſides other exploits which he performed with great reſolution and courage: he was diſguiſed in his habit, for over his Arms he wore an Indian Coat, which was the cauſe of his death: for when he ſaw his Forces totally defeated, he would then have fled, but his eſcape was prevented by an Inhabitant of Arequepa called Hernando de Torres, who engaged with him; and not knowing who he was, gave him ſuch a blow with a Battle-ax on the head, with both his hands, that he knocked him to the ground. And here Carate, in the thirty fifth Chapter of his fifth Book, gives relation of this paſſage in theſe words; The Vice-king and his Horſe was ſo tired with the laſt night's march, having neither reſted, nor ſlept, nor eaten, that to overthrow him and his horſe was not very difficult: howſoever the battel was obſtinately diſputed between the Foot; but ſeeing the Vice-king fall, their courages failed, and ſubmitted to the Conquerour, moſt of them being ſlain upon the place. Thus far Carate.

If Hernando de Torres had known the perſon of the Vice-king, which he might have done, had he diſcovered who he was by the mark of his Order of St. Jago, he would certainly have ſpared his life, and taken him priſoner: but ſuppoſing him to be a common man, clothed in an Indian habit, he killed him without diſtinction. The Vice-king might rather have been blamed for wearing a diſguiſe, but his intention was not to be ſpared, but to fall amongſt the reſt, in caſe he were overcome, and not to outlive his honour and power. So ſoon as Carvajal ſaw that the field was their own, and that they were ſecure of victory, he with great diligence ſought out for the Vice-king, that he might wreak his revenge upon him for the death of his Brother; and found that Pedro de Puelles was giving him another mortal wound, though with his fall, and a ſhot through his body, he was then expiring his laſt breath: a common Souldier was the firſt who diſcovered the body of the Vice-king to Pedro de Puelles, otherwiſe it had remained unknown under the diſguiſe. Licenciado Carvajal had a mind to have alighted from his Horſe, to have given him the laſt fatal ſtroak; but Pedro de Puelles told him, that it was too mean an action for him to lay his hands on a dying man: howſoever he commanded his Negro to cut off his head, as he did, and carried it with him to Quitu, where it was fixed on the head of a Lance, untill it was made known to Gonçalo Piçarro, who in anger cauſed it to be taken away and buried together with the body. A certain Authour gives a relation hereof in this manner; The head of the Vice-king was carried to Quitu, and there for ſome time expoſed on the common gallows; but this giving offence to ſome people, it was taken down and joined with the body, and enterred together with it.

And here it is remarkable with what niceneſs this Authour touches this point; for not to ſay that Piçarro gave order to have the Head removed from the gallows, he ſays, that ſome taking offence thereat, cauſed the Head to be removed, ſo that he ſeems tacitly to accuſe Gonçalo Piçarro, as if by his order the Head

Head was expoſed, or at leaſt that he conſented thereunto: but the truth is, he was troubled at the action, and that ſo ſoon as he was informed thereof he gave immediate order to have it removed; the which is confirmed by the teſtimony of Gomara: but flattery and partiality to a ſide is always prevalent with Writers, who by adding or diminiſhing can make a ſtory turn which way ſoever they pleaſe. Gomara, ſpeaking of the death of the Vice-king, ſaith; That when Hernando de Torres had with a blow ſtunned Blaſco Nunnez and knocked him from his Horſe, and (as many believe) unknown to him, by reaſon that he was under the diſguiſe of an Indian habit, Herrera the Confeſſour to Piçarro, came to confeſs him; and firſt asked, who he was, to which Blaſco Nunnez replied, that that queſtion was not material; for he was to doe his Office, which he deſired him without farther queries to perform; for he was afraid of ſome torments and cruelties would be committed on his perſon. Thus far Gomara. Then came the Executioners and cuff off his head and expoſed it on the gallows; and ſome rude and inſolent Souldiers drew out ſome hairs from his beard; and in diſdain and triumph ſaid, Your cruel and paſſionate temper hath brought you to this: a certain Captain of my acquaintance carried ſome hairs of his beard about him for ſeveral days, untill they were taken from him by order. Thus did this unfortunate Gentleman end his days, for inſiſting too earneſtly on thoſe methods, which were neither agreeable to the conſtitution of the Kingdom, nor yet to the ſervice of the King, whence that effuſion of bloud enſued and thoſe many commotions as have been related in the preceding Hiſtory: and which proved fatal as well to Indians as to Spaniards, as will alſo farther appear in the ſequel of that Relation which ſtill remains. And though his obſtinacy in this point is much blamed by many, yet certainly he is in part to be excuſed on account of thoſe preciſe and ſevere commands he brought from Court, and which he was by the ſupreme power enjoined to execute; as will be proved by the teſtimony of thoſe Authours whom we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to name; and as he himſelf did often ſay, as before mentioned.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Funeral of the Vice-king. The Actions of Gonçalo Piçarro after the Battel. The Pardon he gave to Vela Nunnez, and of the good Laws he enacted for the better Government of that Kingdom.

Gonçalo Piçarro ſeeing that he had gained a clear Victory, cauſed the Trumpets to ſound a retreat: for he perceived that his people were greatly diſperſed in the purſuit, whereby much bloud was unneceſſarily ſpilt: on the ſide of the Vice-king two hundred men were ſlain, and not above ſeven of the Souldiers of Piçarro, as Carate reports: becauſe the people of the Vice-king were ſo tired and weary with their long march the night before, that they ſeemed rather to ſuffer themſelves to be killed than to fight; and herein they ſhewed their great zeal to his Majeſty, and their readineſs to die in his ſervice. The bodies of the ſlain were buried promiſcuouſly together in the field where they died, ſix or ſeven Corpſe being laid together in the Grave: but the bodies of the Vice-king, of Sancho Sanchez d'Avila, of Licenciado Gallego, and of Captain Cepeda, a Native of Plaſencia, were brought to the City, and there ſolemnly interred; and Gonçalo Piçarro, and the other chief Commanders attended the Corpſe, cloathed in mourning, and carrying ſadneſs in their countenances. The perſons wounded were Don Alonſo de Monte Mayor, Sebaſtian Governour of Belalcaçar, Hernandez Giron: but of Cacetes, Carate makes no mention, though Diego Fernandez ſpeaks of him in theſe words;

Gonçalo

Gonçalo Piçarro had an intention to have put Captain Hernandez Giron to death, and accordingly gave order for his execution (which would have ſpared him much trouble, and prevented the many Commotions which he cauſed afterwards in Peru) but by the interceſſion of friends, and becauſe he fought with much bravery, and was the Kinſman of Lorenço Aldana, Piçarro was perſuaded to grant him his life, &c. Thus far Fernandez, &c. Alvarez the Judge, whom the Vice-king did always carry along with him, received many wounds, of which he died in a few days afterwards. Some malitiouſly report, that by default of the Chirurgeons, whom Piçarro had directed ſo to doe, he was ſuffered to periſh: but this report hath gained no credit, being, as believed, malitiouſly charged by the contrary faction, who in ſuch occaſions do always caſt aſperſions on their Adverſaries. Piçarro did not onely pardon Sebaſtian de Belalcaçar, but ſent him away to his Government with the Souldiers he brought to fight againſt him, firſt taking Oath of fidelity to concern himſelf for ever afterwards in his ſervice. But as to Don Alonſo de Monte-mayor, Rodrigo Nunnez de Bonilla Treaſurer of Quitu, with other Perſons of quality, he baniſhed them into Chili; though meeting with a Ship in their way, they took her, and ſailed into new Spain. All the priſoners that were taken he aſſembled together, and having conſidered their ſeveral circumſtances, he hanged Pedro Belis and Pedro Anton, by reaſon that they had in a Boat made their eſcape from the City of Los Reyes. Then, as to the others, he laid their Crimes before them, that without any reaſon or cauſe they had taken up Arms againſt him, or rather againſt their own intereſt; for that he was no otherwiſe concerned than for their good, and for the maintenance of their liberties and priviledges; howſoever he frankly pardoned them all, in conſideration that many of them were deceived by falſe allurements, and others forced to take Arms; howſoever he promiſed ſuch as would return to their duty, not onely pardon, but to receive them into his Camp, and into ſuch places and offices as they exerciſed under the contrary party, and that he would eſteem and treat them with the ſame terms and conditions as he did his own Souldiers; giving expreſs orders, that no man ſhould revile them, or provoke them either by words or actions. He alſo diſpatched Meſſengers with News of the Victory into all parts and places of the Kingdom, whereby his Friends might be encouraged and his Enemies diſmayed, Pedro de Alarcon was diſpatched with his Ship to Panama, to carry the News of this Victory to Pedro de Hinojoſa; and ordered at his return to bring Vela Nunnez and the other priſoners. As to other matters great conſideration was had touching the methods, how things were to be carried on for the future: and it was agreed, that the Fleet ſhould be ſent along the Coaſt of New Spain and Nicaragua, to take and burn all the Ships they ſhould meet in thoſe Seas, whereby all deſigns might be prevented, which might probably produce farther miſchiefs: after which the Fleet was to repair to Los Reyes; that in caſe his Majeſty ſhould ſend any Diſpatches by that way; there being no conveyance for them nor means to diſpeed them to Peru; it might occaſion great delays and diſappointments, which gave great advantage towards the ſettlement of affairs, as will hereafter appear. Gonçalo Piçarro confiding much in the faithfulneſs of Pedro de Hinojoſa, and in thoſe who were with him; for that being perſons truly noble both by birth and virtue, and raiſed by him from poverty and a mean degree to riches and honour, he conceived an opinion that by all the obligations of gratitude they would adhere with all ſincerity to his intereſt; and therefore rejected the Council given him by his Friends; eſteeming ſuch cautions too mean for his great ſoul and ſpirit, who was uſed to ſurmount all difficulties with open force and a high hand. Captain Alarcon made his voyage according to his Inſtructions, and returned with Piçarro's Son, and Vela Nunnez, and three other priſoners; two of which he hanged for having uttered ſome opprobrious words againſt him, he deſigned alſo to have hanged the third, but that his Son interceded for him, alledging that he had many obligations to him on the ſcore of the civilities and good offices he had done him during the time of his impriſonment. Vela Nunnez was ſent to Quitu, where Piçarro granted him his pardon, on condition that he ſhould live quietly, and without cauſing any Commotions or Plots againſt him, for that in caſe any contrivances of that nature were diſcovered, he was to expect no pardon, of which he fairly admoniſhed him: and, for better ſecurity, he took him with him to the City of Los Reyes, and treated him with much frankneſs all the way, and perhaps with more freedom than in prudence he ought to have ſhown to a declared Enemy: but Piçarro believed of him, as he did of others, that he was a perſon noble and ſincere. Licenciado Cepeda the Judge, of whom we have been too ſilent, accompanied Piçarro in all this expedition, and was preſent at the Battel, and fought more like a Souldier than a Lawyer. Whilſt theſe matters were in agitation, Piçarro held his Court at Quitu, from whence he diſpatched all Orders and Decrees which he had made for the quiet and peaceable Government of the Empire; for having deſolved the Court of Judicature, he acted ſingly, and by his own authority: Judge Cepeda was with him, Licenciado Alvarez was dead, Doctour Texada was gone into Spain, in quality of Ambaſſadour, Carate was the onely Judge remaining at Los Reyes, but he was infirm, and ſickly, and unable to act any thing in the matters of Juſtice: wherefore Gonçalo Piçarro, being the ſole Adminiſtratour of the Laws, took upon him to acquit himſelf in the diſpenſation of Juſtice, for the quiet and peace of the Land, to the benefit of Indians and Spaniards, and propagation of the Chriſtian Faith. As Franciſco Lopez de Gomara affirms in the 133th Chapter of his Hiſtory, the Title of which is this:

> Of the good Government of Gonçalo Piçarro during the abſence of Franciſco de Carvajal; and how afterwards, at the Inſtigation of ſeveral perſons, he would take upon him the Title of King.

All the time that Carvajal was abſent from him Piçarro put no Spaniard to death without the conſent and concurrence of his Council, nor then neither without due Proceſs of Law and Confeſſion of the Party. He enacted, that no man ſhould oppreſs an Indian; which was one of the new Ordinances, nor take his goods from him without money, upon pein of death. He ordered and appointed that Prieſts and Scholars ſhould be entertained in all inhabited places for to preach and inſtruct the Indians, at the charge of men who had Eſtates in the reſpective Diſtricts, and ordered the payment thereof upon penalty of forfeiture of their Eſtates. He was very carefull and induſtrious to gather in the King's fifths, according (as he ſaid) to the example of his Brother Franciſco Piçarro. He ordained, that Tithes ſhould be or one out of Ten: and that now, ſince Blaſco Nunnez was ſubdued and ſlain in the War, he commanded, that every one ſhould induſtrioufly apply himſelf to the ſervice of the King, that ſo his Majeſty might gratiouſly be pleaſed to repeal the late Statutes, confirm to them their Eſtates, and grant them pardon for what was paſt. Thus all people praiſed his prudence, and remained contented and ſatisfied under his Government; ſo that Gaſca himſelf, after he had made experience, and ſeen the good and wholſome Laws which he eſtabliſhed, gave this character of him, that, for a Tyrant, he governed very well. The which happy Government, (as we have ſaid before) continued untill ſuch time as that the Fleet was reſigned to the command of Gaſca. Thus far Gomara.

And as to what he farther adds in that Chapter, we ſhall leave untill a more proper place; and in the mean time treat of ſeveral remarkable paſſages and famous exploits which paſſed; and leaving Gonçalo Piçarro in Quitu, we ſhall make a tranſition of about ſeven hundred Leagues, to find out Franciſco de Carvajal and Diego Centeno, whom we left diſputing their Matters, and doing all the hurt and damage they could to each other, as will farther appear in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of a brave Strategeme of War which Diego Centeno performed againſt Franciſco Carvajal. Several other Succeſſes and Paſſages are related, untill the end of that purſute.

WE have formerly mentioned in what manner Franciſco de Carvajal purſued Diego Centeno, without loſing one moment of time; and keeping him in continual Allarums, he ever marched with a Squadron of Foot, in a poſture to fight; and following them juſt at the heels, he daily fell in with their Baggage, or ſome other part of Centeno's Forces. In this hot purſute, it happened one day, that they were to paſs a deep hole or valley between two hills (as is uſual in that Countrey) the deſcent whereunto was about a League to the bottom, where was a ſmall ſtream of Water, and the riſing again about the ſame diſtance; and yet from the top of one Hill to the other, it was not farther than a Muſquet-ſhot; Franciſco de Carvajal being well acquainted with this place, was confident that he ſhould here take his Enemy in a Trap; believing that whilſt Centeno was deſcending to the bottom, he ſhould be able to gain the Top of the Hill, and poſſeſs himſelf of that advantageous place; from whence he might much annoy him and his men; for they aſcending the Hill, and he remaining on the top with ſteddy footing and reſts for their Arms, they could ſcare miſs doing ſome execution with every ſhot. And as Carvajal and his Souldiers contrived this deſign, and were confident of the ſucceſs of it; ſo Centeno was no leſs carefull to prevent the miſchief and ſecure his men in the paſſage, being well advertiſed of the danger they were to paſs: in order whereunto, about a League before he came to the bottom, where the ſtream of Water ran, he aſſembled his chief Commanders, and told them that they were now to paſs a moſt dangerous place; for whilſt we are mounting the Hill on the other ſide, the Enemy will poſſeſs themſelves of the eminency on this part, from whence they may with much advantage fire upon us, ſo as ſcarce a ſhot can miſs of doing execution. To prevent which, I would propoſe, as the onely means of ſecurity to us, that ſix of you, who are the beſt mounted, ſhould ſecretly retire behind this Mountain, on the right-hand; and that when Carvajal and his Van-guard are paſt, that then you ſally forth and fall upon the Rere; killing all the Negroes, Indians, Spaniards, Horſes, Mules, and what elſe is in your way, making what noiſe and out-cry that is poſſible, ſo that Carvajal, being allarum'd therewith, a Diverſion may be made, and Carvajal may be forced to return back to ſuccour his own People, and in the mean time we may make our eſcape over this dangerous paſſage. To perform this exploit he nominated ſix perſons, to avoid all contention amongſt them, for every one out of gallantry, was forward and ready to offer himſelf; there being fifteen or ſixteen whom he had called to this conference. Accordingly Diego Centeno marched forward, charging his people to make all the haſte they were able, whilſt he brought up the Rere. The ſix Cavaliers alſo turned off to the ſide of the Mountain, where they remained concealed, untill Carvajal with the Van, (which conſiſted of his beſt and ſelect Souldiers) was paſt, and then they ſallied forth, and with great fury fell in upon the Rere; killing with their Lances all the Indians, Negro's, Spaniards, Horſes, Mules, and whatſoever ſtood in their way; ſo that an out-cry was made for help and ſuccour. Carvajal though he heard the noiſe, yet he ſtill kept on his march, judging that the allarum was falſe; and that if it ſhould prove ſo, upon his return he ſhould loſe the opportunity of a Victory, which he believed to be now ſecure and in his own power; in the mean time the ſix Cavaliers carried all before them; and amongſt the reſt overthrew a Mule which carried ſome quintals of powder, to which they gave fire, and blew it up, which made ſuch a terrible noiſe that the Woods and Mountains reſounded with the Echo; and that was ſufficient to convince Carvajal, that the allarum was not falſe; and thereupon he gave order to his Souldiers to face about and ſuccour the Rere: and then the ſix Cavaliers gave over the Charge, and fled, taking their way by guidance of ſome Indians over croſs and by-paths, and taking a large compaſs came at laſt after ſix or ſeven days travel to join with their other Companions. Franciſco de Carvajal having in this manner relieved his Rere, was forced to continue all that day and the night following in the ſame place, and give over the purſuit of the Enemy; for the ſix Horſemen upon their firſt Charge having found no oppoſition, killed and lanced all that ſtood in their way; by which means a ſtop being put to the proceedings of Carvajal; Centeno found an opportunity to eſcape that dangerous Paſs, which he greatly feared would be deſtructive to him. Carvajal was ſo angry and diſturbed at this affront, and ſo aſhamed to ſee himſelf diſappointed of his expectation by the Strategeme of Officers much inferiour to him in the Art of War, that he uttered not one word all that day, unleſs it were to repair the loſſes and damage he had ſuſtained; nor would he eat any thing at ſupper that night, ſaying, that the affront he had received would ſerve him for many meals to come: but after ſome hours in the night that his choler began to abate, he opened his mind to his Officers in this manner, Sirs, ſaid he, In all the courſe of my military employment in Italy, which continued for the ſpace of fourty years, I have ſeen many Retreats made by the King of France and another great Captain, by Antonio de Leyna, by Count Pedro Navarro, by Mark Antonio Colona, by Fabricio Colona, and by many other famous Captains of my time, as well Spaniards as Italians; but in all my life I never ſaw ſuch a Retreat made by this young Captain. Which were the very words of Carvajal, without adding thereunto or diminiſhing therefrom; and were repeated to me by one who heard them. The day following he purſued the Enemy with more vigour and courage than before, ſo that in a ſhort time overtaking him, he every day fell in with him, and ſeized ſome part of his Men, Horſe or Baggage, ſo that after a purſuit of two hundred Leagues, ſometimes out of the common road, and ſometimes in, he reduced Centeno to that low condition, that he had not above eighty men remaining of all his numbers, and thoſe alſo haraſſed and tyred with long Marches, and diſcouraged by reaſon that they knew not when, nor where to find a place of refuge or repoſe: wherefore it was agreed to march along the Coaſt to Arequepa, and there if poſſible to embark and find a ſecurity on the Seas for thoſe who had no ſhelter on the Land: in order hereunto a Captain was ſent before, called Ribadeneyra, to hire a Veſſel for money or by ſurprize, and bring her to Arequepa, that thereon they might embark their Men and Baggage, and ſo eſcape the danger which purſued them: by good fortune Ribadeneyra met a Veſſel bound for Chili, which he and his companions with help of a Float ſilently ſurprized in the night without much difficulty; and being well provided with Sea-men and all other neceſſaries, brought her about to Arequepa, there to take in Diego Centeno and his Souldiers, as it was before agreed: but it happened that Carvajal preſſed ſo hard upon Centeno, that he came to the Port ſooner than the Veſſel arrived there; and now finding an Enemy juſt at his heels, and no farther place of Retreat; he reſolved to disband all his people, telling them that in regard Ribadeneyra did not appear, nor that any Veſſel did preſent in that Port, whereon to make their eſcape, he adviſed every man to ſhift for himſelf, and to eſcape away by three or four or five or ſix in a company; and being ſo diſperſed, it would be impoſſible ſo to purſue them, but that moſt would eſcape their hands. As to Centeno himſelf, he abandoned all his companions, and with one ſingle perſon, called Lewis de Ribera, and one ſervant, he betook himſelf to the Rocks and high Mountains, and remained in a Cave for the ſpace of almoſt eight months, untill the Preſident Gaſca arrived in Peru; during all which time he was maintained by a Curaca who lived in the Plantation of Michael Cornejo, into whoſe Countrey it was his fortune to come; where we ſhall leave him untill that time comes to paſs. Onely we muſt not omit to declare, That from the time that Centeno did firſt ſet up a Standard for his Majeſty, Gonçalo Silveſtre, a Native of Ferrera de Alcantara, of whom we have made mention in our Hiſtory of Florida, was always preſent with him, and was an Actor in his exploits, and a Sufferer in his perils. Carvajal, coming to Arequepa in purſuit of Centeno, had there loſt the track of his Enemies, and ſo gave over the chaſe, upon intelligence given, that they were all diſperſed, and that every man ſhifted for himſelf; the next morning, by break of day Ribadeneyra appeared with his Veſſel in the Port, of which Carvajal being informed by one of thoſe perſons whom he had taken, endeavoured to ſeize both him and his Ship: but Ribadeneyra was ſo cautious that, that desiring to speak with some one or other whom he knew, and seeing none come out or answer him, he set Sail and left the Port. Carvajal was further advised, that Lope de Mendoça with seven or eight others were fled up into the Countrey, after whom he sent a Captain with twenty Musketiers, who pursued them almost an hundred leagues, untill they drove them within the Government and Countrey which was conquered by Captain Rojas; from whence they returned again to render an account to Carvajal of all that had happened. And after this defeat of Diego Centeno, and that none of his men appeared, he then marched to the City of Plate, to collect such Moneys as belonged to Gonçalo Piçarro, and to those who had denied a contribution. But to return to Lope de Mendoça, he escaped into the Government of Diego de Rojas, who was one of those Captains to whom Vaca de Castro, late Governour of Peru, had given a Commission to make new Conquests, after he had composed and pacified the many disturbances and commotions in Peru by the death of Don Diego de Almagro, Junior. And now in the following Chapter we shall shew what ensued hereupon.

CHAP. XXXVII.

The successes of Lope de Mendoça. Of the manner how the Indians infuse poison into their Arrows; and how Lope de Mendoça returned to Peru.

THE design of Lope de Mendoça and his Companions was onely to conceal themselves within those high and rugged Mountains (which are situated towards the Eastern part of Peru) untill such time as the loud voice of the King should call them from thence; and little imagining to meet Spaniards in that Countrey, they unexpectedly fell into the company of Graviel Bermudez, who was one of those who followed Diego de Rojas, who with his fellow Souldiers had performed great exploits against the Indians in that Conquest, and having sustained hunger, tedious marches and many other hardships, had proceeded in their discovery as far as to the River of Plate, and to the Fortress which Sebastian Gaboto had built in that Countrey: but Diego de Rojas, who was their chief Commander, being dead, dissensions arising amongst them who should be the person to govern that little but victorious Army, the discord was so highly carried on by the ambition of Pretenders, that they killed each other, and divided themselves into divers Parties, as if they had no Enemy, and could not better employ their Arms than against themselves.

The death of Diego de Rojas was caused by a poisoned Arrow, which the Indians empoison with a sort of Herb which begins to operate within three days after the wound is given, and performs its effect in seven days afterwards; in which time the Patient raves, eats and gnaws his own flesh, and beats his brains against the Wall and so dies. The Spaniards were desirous to know a Remedy or Antidote against this Poison, and perswaded the Indians both by promises and threats to give them the Receipt of it, but could not prevail, untill such time as they wounded one of those whom they had taken in the Thigh with this sort of poisoned Arrow, and then giving him liberty to go abroad and seek his remedy, they observed that he gathered two sorts of Herbs, the which he stamped and pounded severally, and then drank the juice of one of them, and the other he injected into his Wound; but first he opened the Wound with a Knife, and drew out the Barbs of the Arrow, which are very fine and thin, and are left within the flesh after the Shaft is taken out; for unless the wound be first cleared thereof, the Herb can have no effect; and in this manner the Indian cured himself. The Spaniards having made this discovery cured themselves by application of the same Antidote, though some of them died, who had not the art to clear the Wound of the Barb which remained therein. In the Islands of Barlovento, and in all the Countrey of Brasil, in Santa Marta, and in the New Kingdom, and in other Countries, tries, where a cruel ſort of Indians inhabited, they uſed another ſort of poiſon, and of a different nature to what we have before mentioned; for they would take the Leg of an Indian, whom they had killed, and hang it up in the Air againſt the Sun, and fill it with many Barbs of poiſoned Arrows, which were taken out of the fleſh of an Indian, which after ſome days they took out, and without cleanſing of them they dried them in the Air where the Sun did not come, and then they headed their Arrows with them; and that became the moſt malevolent poiſon, and the moſt hard to be cured in the world; I have ſeen the experiment thereof, and as an eye-witneſs will relate the effect in its due place. After the Spaniards came into that Countrey, and waged War upon the Indians, they then changed the nature of their poiſon: for whereas before they compounded their poiſon with the fleſh of Indians, they then made it with the fleſh of Spaniards, whom they killed or took; but more particularly they deſired the fleſh of ſome red-headed Spaniard, whoſe hairs were of a deep Saffron colour; for they were of opinion that there was more heat in that fleſh, and conſequently more virulency in the poiſon which it produced: but perhaps they may have heard it often ſaid amongſt the Spaniards themſelves, that red-headed men are fit to make a compoſition of poiſon.

But to return to thoſe who had made their entrance into this Countrey, they obſerved ſuch animoſities and quarrels which they maintained one againſt another, that it was impoſſible to reconcile them; ſo that many of them reſolved to leave that Countrey and go into Peru; for that whilſt they were ſo divided there was no hopes to ſubdue thoſe Indians, who were a rugged and a martial ſort of people. But of the nature of this poiſon, and of what elſe happened in this adventure, and the great diſcords and differences amongſt the Spaniards, Diego Fernandez Palentino recounts a long ſtory, with many ſtrange and various accidents, which for brevity ſake we omit, and refer the Reader to his relation. But beſides theſe differences amongſt themſelves, the Spaniards were inclined to travel into Peru upon the news which an Indian brought of commotions there; without any other particulars, than onely that the Spaniards waged Civil Wars amongſt themſelves.

Upon this news Graviel Bermudez was diſpatched to the confines of Peru to inform himſelf of the ſtate of matters, and to certifie to them the truth of things; after which they would reſolve to take that ſide to which they were moſt inclined, Graviel travelling on the way with this deſign happily met with Lope de Mendoça, who gave him a relation at large of all that had paſſed in Peru, ſince the time that Diego de Rojas departed thence; and joyning his men with the party of Graviel Bermudez, they by mutual conſent diſpatched Meſſengers to Nicholas de Eredia, who was chief of another Band of Men; and he immediately came to them with his Aſſociates. Lope de Mendoça reconciled them and made them Friends, and all by common conſent made him their Captain-General, promiſing to obey and follow him. They were in all about an hundred and fifty men in number, almoſt all Horſe; men of great bravery and inured to Sufferings, having for the ſpace of three years together undergone incredible hardſhips both by Famine and long Travels; during which time they made a diſcovery of ſix hundred leagues of Land, ſcarce enjoying one day of repoſe; the relation of which is not to be expreſſed by the Pen of Writers. With this ſtout and brave Cavalry Lope de Mendoça deſcended from the Mountains, either with intent to give a ſtop to the proceedings of Franciſco de Carvajal, or to join with ſome other Party which owned and declared for obedience and loyalty to the King. Accordingly he marched as far as the Province and People called Pucuna, where he reſted one day for the refreſhment of his Men and Horſes, being much haraſſed with long marches and want of Proviſions. Franciſco de Carvajal who omitted no point that concerned a good Commander, received intelligence how that Lope de Mendoça, with his Souldiers of the Invaſion, (for they gave the name of Invaders to that Party) were deſcended from the Mountains, and that they were not well at unity and in friendſhip one with the other, and therefore not to loſe that advantage he reſolved to engage them before they were better reconciled. Lope de Mendoça, having news of his coming, fortified himſelf within Trenches, but when he heard that Carvajal approached nearer he then changed his mind, fearing a Siege; for which having made no proviſion, he concluded that he could not long hold out before he ſhould be forced to a ſurrender: beſides he conſidered, that his force conſiſting for the moſt part of Horſe, they would fight with more advantage in the open Field than within within Trenches; As to the opinion that Carvajal conceived of his People, that they were discontented and would leave their Colours with the first occasion that presented; it was believed that he would be as much mistaken in his imagination concerning Lope de Mendoça as he had oft-times been of Diego Centeno: for on the contrary Mendoça boldly sallied forth to meet Carvajal, who also marched against him with his Squadrons drawn forth in form of Battel; and so soon as he perceived that Lope de Mendoça had abandoned the Fortification, he then made, as if he intended directly to give him Battel, but his design was onely to entice them out of the Fort, which when he had done, and saw them in open Field, he made light of all the rest; and seeing their confidence and boldness, he drew near to them, as they also did to him; but when they were within Musket shot, Carvajal drew off in good order and entred into the Village, which Mendoça was not able to hinder; for the Enemy was double their number, and their Musketiers expert, and well exercised: so that now their quarters were changed, for Carvajal was entred into the Fortification, and Lope de Mendoça remained in the open Field. Carvajal's Souldiers had now time to plunder the Village where the Enemy had left their Riches; and where, besides their Clothes and Garments, they took fifty thousand pieces of Eight in Bars of Silver, which Lope de Mendoça, when first he descended from the Mountains, had caused to be brought from several parts, where he and Diego Centeno had hid them, when they fled from Francisco de Carvajal: with this money he intended to have paid the Souldiers, but they were so generous that very few or none would accept thereof; that so for the future, when they should come to receive the reward of their services and sufferings for their loyalty to the King, they might then have to alledge, that they had received no pay nor subsistence from his Majesty, but had served him at their own charge, cost and hazard; as they accordingly made known afterwards in their petitions. And this became a common custome among the Souldiers, not onely of those (who were called of the Invasion) but of other noble and brave Souldiers of Peru, who scorned to receive any pay, and were angry when it was offered, standing much upon the honour of serving without present interest, but onely in hopes and expectation of a future reward: but if the necessities of any particular person were so great as to enforce him to receive subsistence money, he would not accept it by way of pay, but as money lent, giving his obligation to repay it again to his Majesty's Exchequer, when they were enabled so to doe; which engagement they performed with much punctuality, standing greatly on the honour of a Souldier's promise.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

The Adventures of Francisco de Carvajal, he overcomes and kills Lope de Mendoça, and enters into the Charcas.

WHilst the Souldiers of Carvajal were dispersed and plundering the Village, it seems as if Lope de Mendoça had lost an opportunity and the right time of falling upon his Enemies; but Mendoça apprehended that Carvajal was so vigilant as to leave him no such advantage; which indeed so appeared accordingly, for no sooner did Carvajal observe his men to be dispersed, but he immediately sounded an alarm, with which his men immediately repaired to their Colours, and remained all night drawn up in posture of Battel. And now to deceive the Enemy, he feigned a Letter from one of his Souldiers, which he delivered to be carried by an Indian, who spake very good Spanish, instructing him what to say to gain a belief: in that Letter he was advised to fall in upon Carvajal that night, and to charge him in two several places, and that he would then find many that would revolt over to his side, for most were discontented; the which divers would have done the day before, but that they feared the shot in their passage over unto him.

Thus

Thus did Carvajal avail himſelf of the opinion which Mendoça falſly conceived of the diſcontent of his men, and of their uſage which inclined them to revolt when an opportunity ſhould offer. So ſoon as Mendoça had read the Letter, he gave full credence to it, though it had no hand or firm thereunto, becauſe it agreed with the opinion he conceived of the inclinations of Carvajal's men; and with theſe expectations having drawn out his men, he attached the Enemy in two places according to the advices which were given him; but he was beaten off in both, becauſe they were provided to receive him; and finding that no man joyned or came over to his ſide, with much diſcouragement he drew off, having loſt ſeven or eight of his men killed, and as many wounded. And having underſtood from the Indians that about ſix or ſeven leagues from that place Franciſco de Carvajal had lodged all the Riches belonging to himſelf and to his Souldiers, he reſolved to play him the ſame game, and to pay him in the ſame coin; accordingly matters ſucceeded, for marching thither he ſeiſed on all the Spoils which Carvajal had made, with which he rewarded his men to their great ſatisfaction; for beſides clothing of all ſorts, they ſeiſed quantities of Gold, Arms and Powder.

The three Hiſtorians report that Carvajal was wounded that night by a Musket-ſhot in his Thigh; howſoever he would not own it, for, being privately dreſſed, he went abroad and gave ſuch Orders as were neceſſary; but if that were, it was but a ſlight wound, conſidering that he went the Rounds, and was on the Guard and Watch all that night, and the next day purſuing them to their Quarters, beat them up, and fell upon them in the night; and they being weary, and tired, and aſleep, were totally routed and defeated; many of them were taken, but ſuch of them as eſcaped by the darkneſs of the night, (amongſt which Lope de Mendoça was one) were diſperſed into divers parts. So ſoon as it was day, Carvajal perceived that Mendoça was gone, but howſoever he followed him upon the track; and then it was that he firſt underſtood in what manner he and his Companions had been plundred of their Riches and Spoils by Mendoça. Upon which news, turning to his Souldiers, Lope de Mendoça, ſaid he, hath been ill-adviſed to carry with him the inſtrument of his death; whereby he would give them to underſtand that he would purſue them to the laſt extremity, and untill ſuch time as they had retrieved their eſtates. And according to this ſaying, he hotly purſued Lope de Mendoça, who having travelled about eight or nine leagues, imagined that Carvajal had ſo much to doe that it was impoſſible for him to make purſuit after him either that day, or the day following; and in confidence hereof, he paſſed a River, and laid himſelf down to repoſe, and refreſh himſelf after the watchings of ſeveral nights: but whilſt ſome were ſleeping, and others eating, Carvajal unexpectedly appeared deſcending from the top of a Mountain directly to the River; upon which an alarm being given, every one ſhifted for himſelf, and though Carvajal had no more than ſixty Horſe with him, of the choiceſt of his Troops, which he ſuppoſed ſufficient to purſue a flying Enemy, yet they believed him to come with all his Force. In this place Carvajal took many Priſoners, and amongſt them two or three Files of Souldiers who were playing for the pieces of Gold which they had robbed: upon which occaſion Carvajal uttered ſome very remarkable Sayings, which Diego Hernandez mentions. And at this place taking one days reſt for his neceſſary refreſhment, Lope de Mendoça, with five or ſix of his Comrades, had the opportunity of flight, and to diſperſe themſelves into divers places, not knowing where to go, or where to take refuge and onely to fly from the face of the Enemy.

Carvajal having recovered the greateſt part of what he had loſt, though not all, followed the purſuit of his game, and it was his fortune to take the track which was made by Mendoça, not that he had any certainty thereof, but onely ſeeing the way to be larger and wider than the others, he followed that track ſo cloſely that though the Enemy was gone five or ſix hours before them, yet after the ſecond night, by break of day, he arrived at the very place where Mendoça was lodged, in a little Indian Village, having in leſs than thirty hours, from the time when he was laſt diſturbed in his Quarters, marched twenty two leagues; and indeed had he not been forced thereunto for want of ſleep and repoſe, he had yet proceeded farther; but he and his people were ſo overcome with long journies, and faint for want of food and ſuſtenance that they laid themſelves to ſleep like ſo many loggs of wood, and without ſenſe like inanimate Creatures. In the mean time came Carvajal to the Village with eight men onely, leaving the reſt behind, that he might give an alarm that night to Lope Mendoça in what place ſoever he found him, being reſolved ſo to hunt and purſue him, that having no time given him either for ſleep or refreſhment, he ſhould periſh in the chaſe. The Indians gave notice of the Houſe where Mendoça and his Comrades were lodged, to which he went with greater aſſurance and ſeiſed on both the doors of the room, which was a great Hall belonging to the Cacique or Lord of that Village; and then to make them believe that all his Captains and Forces were with him, he would call out to them by their names, ſaying, You, ſuch a one, go thither, and ſuch a one keep this door, and you this; and then he called to another by his name to ſet fire to the Hall: with this noiſe Carvajal, calling out in this manner, had charmed all within the Houſe to a kind of aſtoniſhment, ſo that he entred into it with three perſons onely, and diſarmed, and bound them all, excepting Lope de Mendoça, to whom, in conſideration of his Office and Title of Captain-General, they ſhewed a greater reſpect; and then they brought them out of the Houſe, that they might ſee the ſmall number to which they were become Priſoners. In this manner Lope de Mendoça was taken; the which Hiſtorians relate in general without the circumſtances of the ſeveral ſtrategems uſed by Carvajal. Lope de Mendoça was immediately ſtrangled and his Head cut off, as alſo Nicholas de Eredia and three others; but the reſt were all pardoned, as were all others (of the Invaſion as they called them) to whom he reſtored their Horſes and Arms and whatſoever was taken from them; and gave Money and Horſes to ſuch as wanted them, endeavouring by all fair means to gain them to his Party. In like manner he pardoned Lewis Pardomo and Alonço Camargo, who had joyned with Mendoça after they left Diego Centeno: the which Pardon was granted in conſideration of a diſcovery they made of fifty thouſand pieces of Eight in Silver, which were buried by him in a certain place. After this Victory, no other action remaining to be performed, he marched into the Charcas with intention to recide ſome days in the City of Plate, and to amaſs what Silver he could from the Mines of Potoſi, which were diſcovered that year. And then he confiſcated all the Indians, and Plantations of thoſe who were dead, and of thoſe who ſtood out and were fled, unto the uſe of Gonçalo Piçarro, in recompenſe for the great charge and expence he had been at for maintenance of the War. When he was come near to the City of Plate, all the Inhabitants thereof came forth to meet him, in hopes with that complement to appeaſe and ſoften his angry and fierce humour: amongſt the reſt came Alonſo Ramirez with his white Rod in his hand, having been made chief Governour of that Town by Diego Centeno. Carvajal at ſight hereof grew angry, and ſaid to him, Mr. Ramirez, Take off the Croſs from the top of that white Staff, and then ſharpen it at the point, and dart it at a Dog, and I proteſt that if you do not hit him in the right eye I will hang you for it; meaning thereby to declare his folly and indiſcretion in coming to meet him with that ſignal of Authority in his hand, which he had received from a Party which ſtood in defiance of him, and whoſe Power he would not own. Hereupon Ramirez threw away his Staff, not reflecting in due time on the indiſcretion and imprudence of this Act.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Carvajal ſends the Head of Lope de Mendoça to Arequepa, and what was the ſaying of a Woman thereupon. Of a Mutiny which was made againſt Carvajal, and how the Authours thereof were puniſhed.

THE next day after Carvajal entred into the City of Plate, he ſent the Head of Lope de Mendoça to the City of Arequepa by Dionyſio de Bobadilla, who was afterwards made Serjeant-Major to Gonçalo Piçarro, and with whom I was acquainted; and his inſtructions were to ſet it up upon the common Gallows of that City, that the Inhabitants might take notice and example thereby; for in that Town Diego Centeno had first set up his Standard. Bobadilla was the Messenger hereof, and upon this occasion it may be pertinent to our purpose not to omit a particular passage which happened hereupon, that a matter so remarkable may not be forgotten. There lived in Arequepa a vertuous and charitable Woman, called Joanna of Leyton, who had been a Servant to the Lady Catalina Leyton, a Woman of as noble a Family as any is of that name in the Kingdom of Portugal, and was the Wife of Francisco de Carvajal, though some, to render her odious, will have her to have been his Whore; but certainly she was his Wife, and greatly esteemed by her Husband, and all the Nobility of Peru, and indeed her Person, and Vertues and noble Birth did deserve no less.

This Lady bred up and maintained this Joanna Leyton for so long a time, that at length she took that name, and called her self Leyton; and then afterwards married her to a person of honour called Francisco Voso, and she was a Person of so great honour that Francisco Carvajal loved her as his own Daughter. During these troubles and revolutions caused by Gonçalo Piçarro she always favoured the King's side, and often interceded for some of them with her Master Carvajal; others she assisted with her Money, and some she concealed in her House, and particularly she hid three at that time when Gonçalo Piçarro first entred into Rimac with that slaughter and imprisonment of people which we have before related. Francisco de Carvajal, whose knowledge nothing escaped, took her aside, and asked her where those three men were which she had hidden; she denied to know of any, but he confidently charging her with it, and naming one of them, whom he suspected, she was so confounded, that she could not longer persist in the denial; and therefore, taking a manly courage, it is true, said she, they are in such a Chamber, and I will bring them to you with a Knife, that you may cut their Throats and drink their Bloud, and eat their Flesh, that so you may be glutted and satiated with humane Bloud after which you are so thirsty: and so being just going away, Carvajal called her, and said, let them alone, let them alone, and let me alone also, and the Devil take thee: and thus Joanna Leyton gained her point and victory over him. This relation I received from one of the greatest enemies that Carvajal had, but a person of great probity, called Gonçalo Silvestre, of whom we have formerly made mention.

Some short time after this Joanna de Leyton went to live at Arequepa, where Dionysio de Bobadilla brought the Heads of Lope de Mendoça, Nicholas de Eredia, and of three or four others; and before he went to pay his respects to Pedro de Fuentes, who was Governour of that City under Gonçalo Piçarro, he made a visit to this Joanna Leyton, believing that she would gladly hear of the health of her Master Francisco de Carvajal. The Lady received him with a good welcome, and having first passed the usual complements at meeting, and made enquiry after the welfare of her Lord, she earnestly entreated Bobadilla to deliver the Head of Lope de Mendoça into her hands, that she might have the satisfaction to bury it in such manner as became a person of his merit and loyalty to his King; but Bobadilla excused himself, saying, that he durst not doe it, for that she well knew the severe humour of Carvajal his Lord, who would for such an offence hang him and quarter him; but she still continued her importunity, and desired him for God's sake to let her have it, and that she would give him two hundred pieces of Eight, wherewith he might oblige and help one of his indigent Souldiers, for what good, said she, can it doe you, since the Head is dismembred from the Body, to drag it through the Streets, and fix it on the Gallows? But Bobadilla still desired her excuse three or four times with the same words, and she continued to press him with the greatest earnestness in the world; but at length, seeing that she could not prevail with all her intreaties and promises, she grew angry, and then said, Well, set it up then in the name of God, but know that you had better have let it alone; and that the two hundred pieces of Eight which I offered for it, I will employ in Masses to be said for his Soul; and I tell thee farther, that he, whosoever he is, that is not contented to have that Head honourably buried, will not live long, and I hope shortly to see thy Head in the place of it.

This discourse passing thus, Bobadilla (as the Historians say) was ready to die with laughter, admiring much at the Dialogue he had with Joanna Leyton, and from her went directly to present the Heads to Pedro de Fuentes. And commanding the Indians to unfold the Clothes wherein they were enwrapped, they did it so awkerdly, and were so puzzled at it, that he was forced to come himself and lay them open: some of the Spaniards standing by, said that the Heads stank, but Bobadilla made made anſwer, No, Gentlemen, ſaid he; the Heads of our Enemies cut off with our own hands do never ſtink, but rather ſmell ſweet, by which he ſhewed himſelf a true Scholar and Servant to Carvajal, for all his Diſciples were of the ſame ſtamp.

Franciſco de Carvajal having thus defeated Captain Diego Centeno, and killed Lope de Mendoça, Nicholas de Eredia, and others; and having refreſhed his Souldiers and gratified thoſe who revolted to him at the River of Plate, with Horſes, Arms and Money; the better to oblige them to him, he kept his head-quarters at the City of Plate, making what Money he was able to ſend to Piçarro.

About this time the Souldiers (of the Invaſion) who were many of them noble by birth, being aſhamed to have been ſo eaſily overcome, and angry at the death of Nicholas de Eredia their chief Commander, and other their Companions, entered into a Conſpiracy to revenge the ſame with the bloud of Carvajal: and that truly in pure revenge, and not out of covetouſneſs, as ſome report; but that is not probable, becauſe not long before they were ſo generous as to refuſe money which was offered them for their Pay. The principal Conſpiratours were Lewis Pardomo, Alonſo Camargo, and others who had formerly been pardoned by Carvajal, as we have mentioned before; and with theſe thirty others were engaged in the Plot whoſe names are not known, and agreed to kill him on ſuch a day, and all of them took an Oath of Secrecy, laying their hands on a Crucifix. But Carvajal, who was a ſuſpicious man, and careſull of his own perſon, and had many friends who were very true to him came to a diſcovery of the whole Conſpiracy, to prevent which, he ſeized upon the principal Actours therein, and with great fury and madneſs uttered in a raving manner theſe words, as Diego Fernandez reports; Senior Balmaſeda, and other Cavaliers of the Invaſion have conſpired to kill me, notwithſtanding my kind treatment of them, and the reſpect I ſhewed them above the true and loyal Servants of my Governour and Lord Piçarro, &c.

And thus having put ſix or ſeven of the principal Plotters to death, he pardoned all the reſt; but to ſecure himſelf from them, knowing them to be deſperate men; he ſent them in the nature of baniſhment to Gonçalo Piçarro by different ways, to whom he had lately wrote a relation of all paſſages, and how his Enemies were totally routed and defeated; and about the ſame time Franciſco de Carvajal received in exchange of his relation an account of the Battel at Quitu, wherein the Vice-king was ſlain, with what elſe he had done after this ſucceſs; and how he intended to goe to the City of Los Reyes, where he deſired to meet Carvajal, that they might there conſult, and agree upon ſuch meaſures and methods as were to be taken for the future.

CHAP. XL.

The ſubſtance of Franciſco de Carvajal's Letter to Gonçalo Piçarro, and of his Diſcourſe by word of mouth, perſuading him to proclaim himſelf King of Peru. And how others encouraged him thereunto.

THIS fortunate News put Carvajal into a thouſand thoughts concerning the ſtate of Piçarro's affairs, contriving how it might be poſſible for him to perpetuate his power and rule; not meaning under the Emperour, but by virtue of his own abſolute and independent authority, having with aſſiſtence of his own Brother and his own Arms, won and gained that Empire. Diego Fernandez in the fourty ninth Chapter of his Book recites the whole Letter, wherein he adviſes him to take on himſelf the Title of King: And when afterwards he and Piçarro met at Rimac, he then made this Diſcourſe to him, which we think fit to anticipate and repeat out of its due place.

Sir, said he, A Vice-king hath been killed in battel, and his Head cut off by us, and publickly placed on the common Gibbet. After we have waged War againſt the Royal Standard of his Majeſty, and have been the cauſe of the effuſion of ſo much bloud, and committed ſo many ſpoils, and robberies, and outrages upon the people; what place can we expect for mercy and pardon from the King? Nay, if we ſhould come off upon Articles of agreement, and that you could juſtifie your ſelf, and ſhew as clear an innocence as the child which ſucks at the breaſt; yet, what ſecurity can there be to rely on the moſt ſolemn vows and promiſes that can be made you? Wherefore, I conclude, that you have no ſafety but by taking upon you the authority of a King, by which you will better ſecure your government than by expectations to receive it from another hand. Plant the Crown upon your own head, and divide the Lands amongſt your own friends and creatures: that which the King hath granted for two lives onely, do you give them the fee-ſimple and inheritance of, with Titles of Dukes, Marqueſſes, and Earls, as is uſual in all the Kingdoms of the World, who will be thereby engaged to defend you, whilſt they fight in defence of their own Eſtates and Fortunes. You may alſo create new Orders of Knighthood, calling them with the ſame names as are uſed in Spain, or by the denomination of other Saints to whom you are more particularly devoted, and you may frame other Badges as are moſt agreeable to your fancy; and ſuch as you ſhall make Knights of the Habit, you may aſſign them Rents and Penſions to live upon and enjoy for a term of life, as is common every where to the Military Orders. In this manner you will engage all the Gentry and Nobility of the Spaniards, who reſide in this Empire, to your Party, and draw thoſe in who are averſe. And to bring the Indians in likewiſe to your ſervice and devotion, and to dye for you, as they do for their own natural Prince. I would perſuade you to marry that Princeſs which is neareſt of bloud to the Royal Family: in order whereunto, I would have you ſend Ambaſſadours to the Mountains, where the Inca, who is Heir to this Empire, doth now reſide; deſiring him to quit his ſolitary habitation, that ſo you may reſtore him to the Majeſty and Grandure of his Empire; and that he would with his own hand give his Siſter or Daughter in marriage to you. It is not to be doubted but that he will be infinitely proud and overjoyed with this Alliance: and ſuch will be the univerſal ſatisfaction and contentment of his Subjects in reſtoring their Inca to his power and dominion, that they will chearfully obey what ſervil Offices ſoever their Inca ſhall command them for your ſervice; as the carriage of your proviſions, depopulating Towns where your Enemies are to paſs, making ways and roads where you ſhall direct. And, in fine, you will hereby engage all the Indians to be of your ſide: for it would be a great inconvenience to an Enemy to want people to carry their baggage, without which they can ſcarce paſs in the Countrey. And as to the Inca, he will content himſelf with the bare name and title of a King; and you many ſuffer his Subjects to obey him in the times of peace, as they did his Anceſtours in former ages. And as to your ſelf, You and your Miniſters and Captains may rule and govern the Spaniards, and require the Inca, when occaſion ſerves, to command his Indians to perform ſuch and ſuch ſervices as you ſhall appoint; and by theſe means you will ſecure them to be faithfull to you, and engage them to be true, and not falſe, and Spyes, as they have been to both ſides.

Moreover, you will by this friendſhip of the Inca amaſs all the Gold and Silver that the Indians dig throughout the Empire, and ſeeing they eſteem not of it as riches or treaſure, they will, in reward of the reſtauration of their Prince and on the ſcore of your alliance with them, be eaſily induced to diſcover to you all the treaſure which hath been hidden by their Anceſtours: which will amount to that vaſt riches, that (as the ſaying is) you may therewith purchaſe the whole World, in caſe you are ambitious to be the ſole Monarch of it. And let not that be any ſcruple to you, that you hereby uſurp on the dominion of the King of Spain; for when you are a King (as the ſaying is) you can doe no wrong. This Countrey did once belong to the Inca's, who were the natural Princes thereof, ſo that it properly belongs to them; and if any right may be claimed on the ſcore of Conqueſt, it belongs not to the King of Caſtile, but to you and your Brothers, who gained it at your own expence, and with hardſhips and hazards of your Lives.

And now therefore to reſtore again the Government to the Inca, the natural Lord thereof, it is a piece of generoſity founded on the Law of Nature; and thereby alſo you will doe right to your ſelf, for it is not reaſon that you who are the Conquerour of an Empire ſhould be a Slave and Subject in it; or that he, who by the valour of his Arme hath made himſelf a King, ſhould out of a meanneſs and puſillanimity of ſpirit render himſelf a Vaſſal or a Subject in it. The ſucceſs of all theſe Actions conſiſts in making good the firſt ſteps and gradations to it; And therefore I beſeech you ſeriouſly to conſider of what I have propoſed, which, if well purſued, will certainly tend to your eſtabliſhment in this Empire, and make

make all people in this and in the ages to come acknowledge you and yours for their lawfull Sovereign.

And, to conclude all, be the event what it will, let me adviſe you to take the Crown and Title of King; it is but what you have gained by your Arms and Valour; and no leſs Title than that can become you: and therefore I cannot but repeat it again and again to you, Dye a King, and not a Subject; He that is contented in an ill condition, deſerves a worſe.

I have in this Diſcourſe of Carvajal's omitted ſeveral particulars which will ſound ill in the ears of Loyal perſons, and gratifie the honour of ill-affected perſons. Theſe Diſcourſes were not unpleaſing to Gonçalo Piçarro, who heard them willingly, and took it ſo kindly from him, that he would ſo far concern himſelf for his eſtabliſhment in grandure, that he afterwards called him Father; the ſame Advices were in like manner confirmed by Pedro de Puelles, Licenciado Cepeda, and Hernando Bachicao, with the concurrence of his intimate Friends, who as Gomara ſaith in Chap. 173. were very many; and gives an account of that paſſage in theſe words.

Franciſco de Carvajal and Pedro de Puelles wrote a Letter to Piçarro to give himſelf the Title of King; and by that means to excuſe the ſending of Ambaſſadours to the Emperour; and in lieu thereof to provide good Horſes, Armour, Shot, and Arms, which were the beſt Advocates for juſtification of his Cauſe; and that he ſhould apply thoſe fifths, and rents and duties which Cobos, without deſerving any part thereof had carried away, unto his own uſe: ſome were of opinion not to yield the Countrey unto the King, but upon terms that he ſhould grant likewiſe unto them the inheritance of their Lands; others ſaid that they would make a King, as they thought fit, as had been practiſed in Spain, when Pelayo and Garci Ximenez were ſet up. Others ſaid, that unleſs the Government of Peru were given to Piçarro, and his Brother Hernando Piçarro ſet at liberty, they would call in the very Turks to their aſſiſtence: And all of them concurred in that general opinion, that the Countrey was their own, and that they might make a Diviſion thereof amongſt themſelves, in regard they had won it by conqueſt and at the expence of their own bloud. Thus far Gomara, which Fernandez Palentino confirms in the thirteenth Chapter of his ſecond Book, in theſe words which I have extracted from thence.

Theſe Actions being ended, they marched to the City of Los Reyes, diſcourſing on the way of the methods which were now to be purſued. Some were of opinion that the King would overlook all things that were paſt, and confirm Gonçalo Piçarro in the Government: others, more impudently ſaid, that it was no matter whether the King did approve of things or not, for that his Commands would find little effect or compliance in thoſe parts. Licenciado Cepeda, who was deſirous to flatter and pleaſe Piçarro in all things, approved of the ſaying of Hernando Bachicao and others, that all the Kingdom and Dominion of Peru did by right and by juſt claim belong unto him: to prove which he produced many examples, whereby it appeared that many Kingdoms, Provinces and Countreys which at firſt were gained by force of Arms, were afterward conſerved, and after a long tract of time were eſteemed the hereditary Poſſeſſions, and devolved to poſterity by an undeniable Title: witneſs the Kingdom of Navarre; and the reaſon, form and manner how theſe Kings were anointed, which he compared with the circumſtances of Piçarro; and then he concluded, that never was any King upon the face of the Earth, who at the beginning had ever a more fair and clear Title to a Kingdom, than Gonçalo Piçarro had unto his: all which Piçarro heard with great attention and delight; for beſides that humane nature is naturally ambitious of power and government; his affections were alſo for want of due conſideration let looſe to the immoderate deſires thereof; for he was a man naturally of a dull capacity, and knew not how to write or read; and therefore made not thoſe reflexions on the conſequences of things as thinking-men uſually do. And in regard that Cepeda was a learned and a well read man, and eſteemed for his judgment and knowledge, every one approved his ſayings, and none did contradict or queſtion any thing that was ſaid by him, for this matter was the whole ſubject of their diſcourſe at all times when they were in converſation together. Thus far Palentino.

We have formerly mentioned what is reported by Gomara concerning the duties which Cobos took without deſerving or doing any thing for them: the truth of which which matter ſtands thus: His Imperial Majeſty was pleaſed to grant unto his Secretary Franciſco de Cobos one and a half per Centum upon all the Gold and Silver which was brought to the Mint and Treaſury of his Majeſty, where the Fifths were deducted for the uſe and benefit of the King: but then Cobos was to be at the whole charge to find Coals for melting, and to provide Say-maſters to refine and aſſay the Gold and Silver, to pay the Minters; and in fine, to defray all charges and expences thereof whatſoever; which were ſo great, that the Secretary would rather have been a Loſer than a Gainer thereby: but in regard that every one who went to pay his Fifths might the better make up his accounts, and know how much he was to pay and how much remained to him; the manner was to bring the Gold and Silver ready melted, refined and aſſayed by the King's Aſſay-maſter, at the proper coſt and expence of the perſon to whom it belonged: by which means Cobos did not perform his obligation which he had given; and for that reaſon Gomara ſaith that he took duties which he had not deſerved.

CHAP. XLI.

Gonçalo Piçarro declares his duty and allegiance to the King, he departs from Quitu, and goes to Truxillo and Los Reyes; and the great joy was made at his coming.

BUT notwithſtanding all this diſcourſe and perſuaſion, Gonçalo Piçarro from a principle of Loyalty to his Sovereign, could not reſolve to take upon himſelf the Title of King; and more eſpecially becauſe he could not but believe that his Majeſty would confirm him in the Government of Peru, in conſideration that he and his Brothers had done great Services, having by the Conqueſt of that Kingdom annexed it to the Imperial Crown, and by virtue of the Commiſſion given to his Brother the Marquis he was to hold that Government during his life; with liberty to name a Succeſſour after his death; and that his Brother had accordingly nominated him. Then as to his proceedings and ſucceſſes againſt the Vice-king; he ſuppoſed that his vigorous and unreaſonable proceedings in execution of the new Laws might eaſily juſtifie his Actions. For that the Vice-king refuſed to hear the Addreſſes and Petitions which were made to him by the whole Kingdom, and for that reaſon he was choſen and elected by the unanimous conſent of all the People to repreſent their complaints and aggrievances, which he had rejected and abſolutely refuſed to receive. Then, as to the impriſonment of the Vice-king, and deſigning to embark and ſend him away for Spain; it was not done by him, but by the Judges upon theſe conſiderations which he meditated within himſelf; Piçarro flattered himſelf with high expectations that he ſhould not onely obtain pardon from the King, but a new confirmation and ſettlement of the Kingdom of Peru upon him: thus men of Arms and great Souldiers take falſe meaſures of their merits and the rewards which they expect for them. But in regard Gonçalo Piçarro did not accept of the offer, which his friends made him; his refuſal was interpreted as the effect of a weak underſtanding, and not proceeding from a principle of loyalty towards his Prince; and perhaps upon this ground it was, That all Hiſtorians in the character they give of him, repreſent him as a perſon of a weak underſtanding; though in reality thoſe who have been familiarly acquainted with him have reported him to have been endued with a ſufficient Talent of knowledge, to have been of a good nature, ſincere and open, firm to his promiſes, without fraud and tricks; but of a true, honeſt and noble ſpirit, repoſing too much confidence in his friends, who afterwards betrayed and deſtroyed him, as all Hiſtorians relate. Nor can we much blame the Writers for giving a character of Piçarro ſo different to truth; becauſe they compiled their Hiſtories out of thoſe notes and particulars which were given them by perſons who were directed to temporize and comply with the humour of thoſe times; as Palentino complains complains in his dedicatory Epiſtle in theſe words: Being reſolved to proceed, ſays he, my pen ſtarted with fear, and a ſtop was given to the courſe of my Hiſtory, upon conſideration of ſome inconveniences which might happen unto me thereby. And remaining in this ſuſpenſe, I came to the Court of your Majeſty where I preſented before your Royal Council of the Indies the firſt part of the Hiſtory which I had finiſhed. And in regard they conceived a good opinion of the truth of what I had delivered therein; they were pleaſed to judge it not onely beneficial and uſefull, but likewiſe neceſſary for me to compleat the Hiſtory which I had begun: and being ſo commanded to doe with promiſes of a reward for my labour; I took new ſpirit and courage again, and baniſhed all that fear and apprehenſions which formerly gave a ſtop to the courſe of my Pen, &c. And in this manner I little regarded the teſtimony of Enemies, or what men ſaid, who reported matters with a prejudice, knowing it to be the cuſtom of mankind to ſay things by halves where they have no kindneſs for the Party. And now Gonçalo Piçarro reſolved to leave Quitu, and goe to the City of Los Reyes, and to make his reſidence there, becauſe it was in the middle of the Empire, and the moſt advantageous ſituation to ſeat himſelf for ſuppreſſion of diſturbances and ſtirrs which might ariſe in any parts of Peru, as alſo to adminiſter juſtice in the times of peace. In Quitu he conſtituted Pedro de Puelles to be his Captain General and Deputy with three hundred Souldiers; for he repoſed great truſt in him upon the experience he had of his faithfulneſs to him, and ſuccour which he gave him at a time when he looked on himſelf as ruined and ſinking: and being come to the City of St. Michael, he received intelligence that a great number of Indian Souldiers were gathered in a Body upon the frontiers of that Countrey; to diſperſe which, he ſent Captain Mercadillo with about a hundred and thirty men who therewith afterwards peopled that City which is now called Laxa. Then he ſent Captain Porcel with a Party of ſixty men to the ancient Conqueſt which had been made in the Province of Pacamura; likewiſe Licenciado Carvajal was ordered to goe by Sea and embark with thoſe Souldiers which John Alonſo Palamino had brought from Nicaragua; and that he ſhould order matters in every Port according to the Inſtructions which were given him. Licenciado Carvajal performed every thing as he was commanded, ſailing along the Coaſt as far as Truxillo, whilſt Gonçalo Piçarro marched all the way by Land; and at length they met all together at that Place, where orders were given to goe to Los Reyes; Piçarro was accompanied thither with two hundred choice Souldiers, amongſt which were Licenciado Carvajal, John de Acoſta, John de la Torro, Licenciado Cepeda, Fernando Bachicao, Diego Gaillen, with other Perſons of Quality.

Upon his entry into the City men were of different opinions concerning the manner of it. Thoſe who would have him take the Title of King, and to be ſpeedily crowned, propoſed that he ſhould enter under a Canopy of State. Others, who were of a more moderate temper, would have the Gate and the new Street enlarged and made more wide by laying open one of the Barriers of the City, to make his Entrance the more ſignal, according to the example of the Roman Emperours, when they entred Rome in triumph: both ſides earneſtly contended about this matter, but Piçarro would yield to neither of them, but onely referred himſelf to what Licenciado Carvajal ſhould judge convenient and fit to be done. And he accordingly directed, that he ſhould make his Entry on Horſe-back, and his Captains all on Foot before him, with their Horſes led on the right-hand of them, after which the Foot were to march in rank and file. The Horſemen diſmounted and marched on foot, being intermixed with the Infantry; it not ſeeming decent that they ſhould ride whilſt their Captains were on foot. Gonçalo Piçarro was mounted on a very fine Horſe, and came up in the Rere, ſupported on each ſide with four Biſhops; on the right-hand by the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes and the Biſhop of Quitu; and on the left by the Biſhop of Cozco and the Biſhop of Bogota, the latter of which came to Peru to be conſecrated by the hands of thoſe other three Prelates. Then came another band of Souldiers for a Rereguard, all marching without Guns, or Pikes, or other Arms, than onely their Swords and Daggers in token of peace. After all came Lorenço de Aldana who was conſtituted chief Governour of that City by Piçarro, together with the Aldermen of the Corporation and other Inhabitants, who came out to welcome Piçarro; and all the people, as he paſſed, ſaluted him with loud acclamations and a thouſand bleſſings, for having concerned himſelf for their welfare, and reſtored their Eſtates to them with infinite labours and hardſhips, and the hazard of his life; in conſideration of which they offered their lives and fortunes to remain at his devotion. And being now entred within the City, he went directly to the Cathedral Church there to adore the moſt Holy Sacrament; the Streets all along as he paſſed reſounded with vocal Muſick, Singing, Minſtrels and Trumpets, which were excellently good in that City; and the Bells of the Churches and Monaſteries ſpake his welcome, and added to the Solemnity of that day. Piçarro having performed his devotions to our Lord, went to his Houſe, which formerly belonged to his Brother the Marquis, where, as the Hiſtorians ſay, he lived in greater ſplendour and ſtate than ever he had done before. Some ſay that he entertained eighty Halberdiers for his Guard, and that no man was permitted to ſit down in his preſence; ſome ſay he gave his hand to be kiſſed: but many ſtories of this nature are framed out of envy and malice of enemies, who, as we have ſaid, raiſe theſe reports: though to my certain knowledge, and I ſpeak the ſame on the truth of a Chriſtian, that there was not one Halberdier in all his Guard, nor have I ever heard that he entertained any. And, as I have formerly mentioned, when his Brother the Marquis returned into this Countrey, with a Commiſſion from his Majeſty, and with the privilege to entertain twenty four Halberdiers for the guard of his Perſon, he could by no means perſuade any to accept of the Office, it being eſteemed too low and inferiour to the quality of a Spaniard; onely I knew two men who vouchſafed to humble themſelves to that mean degree. And therefore I know not how afterwards it could come to paſs in times of greater pride and height, that eighty Spaniards ſhould be found to ſtoop or condeſcend ſo low as to bear Halberds on their ſhoulders, eſpecially ſince it hath been obſerved, that they were too proud to own the taking money on the notion of pay; and therefore I am of opinion, that the Authours who wrote of this matter did miſtake the name of Halberdiers for Harquebuſiers. Beſides, I note it for a miſtake of the like nature in thoſe who report, that Piçarro made uſe of poiſon to remove thoſe out of the world who ſtood in his way, for never any ſuch thing was acted, nor yet imagined to be done, for if it had been I ſhould certainly have heard thereof, ſooner or later, as well as they; and indeed, had he been guilty of ſuch vanities and crimes as theſe, he would have been deteſted and abhorred by all the world, whereas on the contrary (as all Authours agree) he was well beloved and generally eſteemed. And ſo much I declare upon my faith and truth, as an eye-witneſs of moſt of theſe paſſages; and I ſpeak in ſincerity without favour or affection to any, having no engagements to either Party.

CHAP. XLII.

The Authour declares in what manner Gonçalo Piçarro behaved himſelf towards his own People. The death of Vela Nunnez. The arrival of Franciſco de Carvajal at Los Reyes, and the manner how he was received.

WHEN Gonçalo Piçarro was at the City of Cozco, I had ſome knowledge of him by ſight; for ſoon after the Battel of Huarina he came and reſided there untill the Battel of Sacſahuana, which was about ſix months, during which time I was frequently in his Houſe, and obſerved his behaviour both within doors and abroad. All people paid him the honour and reſpect which was due to their Superiour, attending and following him whereſoever he went, either on foot or on Horſeback; and he demeaned himſelf with that courteſie and affability towards all, and ſo like a fellow-ſouldier, that no man could find cauſe of complaint: I never ſaw him give his hand to any man to be kiſſed, though deſired in way of complement. He freely took off his Hat to every man, and to perſons of Quality he gave them the Titles which were due to them: he conſtantly, as we have ſaid, called Franciſco de Carvajal by the name of Father, as I once overheard heard him say; for when I was a Boy, or a young Lad, he would always have me with him, and upon a certain time Carvajal came to speak to him, and though there was none in the Room present with them besides my self, yet Carvajal not being willing that I should hear any thing which was between them whispered him in the ear; what it was I could not hear, but Piçarro answered in a few words, which were, Look you Father.

I have seen him sometimes at Dinner, for he always ate in publick; his Table was very long, and held at least an hundred people: at the upper end of which he sate himself, and on each hand there was a void space left which might contain two persons; at which distance all Souldiers sate down as they pleased; onely the Captains and Citizens did not dine with him, unless it were in their own Houses. I dined with him twice at his own Table, by his command and invitation; one of which was on Candlemas-day, and then his Son Don Fernando, and Don Francisco his Nephew, who was Son to his Brother the Marquis, and I ate standing at the void place of his Table, and he carved for us all, and gave from his own Plate; all which I saw, being then about the age of nine years, which I compleated on the twelfth day of April following, and do certifie the truth thereof, having been an eye-witness of what I have before mentioned; so that Historians may yield more credit to me herein than to those who speak out of prejudice, and with rancour and malice to his person. In like manner they accuse him, and say that he took away all the Fifths and Revenue belonging to the King, with the Tributes which were paid by the Indians, and the Estates of those who took up Arms against him, which together amounted to above two third parts of all the Income of Peru; and yet for all this they say that his Souldiers were unpaid, at which they remained much unsatisfied; but we may easily refute this errour and this mistake of Writers, when it is considered, that for certain he left no hidden Treasures at the time of his death. They also accuse him of Adultery and Incontinence, with many aggravating circumstances, which are most notorious in the lives of Governours and men in eminent places.

But to return to our History: We must know, that during the time that Gonçalo Piçarro resided at Los Reyes; it happened that Vela Nunnez, Brother to the late Vice-king, came to an unfortunate end by means of Captain John de la Torre, who some years before had married an Indian Woman, who was Daughter to the Curaca of the Province of Puerto Viejo: The Indians, pleasing themselves with the honourable alliance of a Spaniard, whom they esteeming and preferring before their Riches, discovered unto him a Treasure of an hundred and fifty thousand Ducats in Gold and Emeralds, which were hidden within the Tombs of their Ancestours. John de la Torre, having thus made his fortune, had a mind to leave Gonçalo Piçarro, and return into Spain, and there to enjoy his Riches: but then considering with himself that his Rebellion and Actions against the King were too well known (for he was one of those who tore out the Hairs of the Vice-king's Beard and put them into a Medall) he feared he should be called in question, and not live securely and in peace at home: wherefore to take off this blemish from him, and doe some remarkable service, he persuaded Vela Nunnez to make his escape with him, on one of the Ships then in Port, promising to assist him therein, in case he would engage his Relations to favour and protect him, for the good services he had done in delivering him out of the hands of that Tyrant. Vela Nunnez hearkned to the propolals he had made him, but then stories and rumours flying about that the King had confirmed Gonçalo Piçarro in the Government, Vela Nunnez presently changed his mind, and began to contrive in what manner he might fix himself in the good opinion of Gonçalo Piçarro. John de la Torre observing this alteration, and fearing lest he or some others of his Confidents should make a discovery to Piçarro of the Compact or Plot that was between them, thought it to be his best course to be before-hand with them in the discovery; and so went to Piçarro and informed him of the design of Vela Nunnez to make his escape, for which they cut off his Head, and hanged and quartered another concerned in the same Plot: howsoever, it was the common talk that this piece of cruelty was acted at the persuasion onely of Licençiado Carvajal; for Piçarro had a kindness for Vela Nunnez, whom he loved for his good nature and sweet disposition, and never inclined to put him to death. And this was the fate of this poor Gentleman, by the false accusation of a treacherous fellow, who was a Villain of the highest nature. Francisco de Carvajal, having some days before received intelligence of Piçarro's march to Los Reyes, and his orders to meet him there, he came to the Charcas with intention to joyn his Forces with him at the City it ſelf: Piçarro upon the news of his approach went a great way to meet him, and cauſed a triumphal reception to be made for him, as due to a Captain of his merit, who had defeated ſo many Enemies and gained ſo many Victories. Carvajal left Alonſo de Mendoça for Governour of the City of Plate under Gonçalo Piçarro, and brought with him about a million of pieces of Eight, which he had digged from the Mines of Potocſi, and from the Indians who are free and not under ſubjection of any Lord, ſo that Piçarro was now furniſhed with plenty of money; and then Carvajal took his opportunity to preſs him farther upon the Subject of making himſelf King, repeating the ſame arguments, which he had uſed in his Letter. And here let us leave them, their Officers, and their Friends, and particularly the inhabitants of the ſeveral Cities of that Empire, employed in keeping all things peaceable, and in quiet condition to the ſecurity and protection as well of Indians as Spaniards, and to the increaſe and propagation of the Holy Catholick Faith by catechiſing and preaching to the Natives; and to the advantage of Trade and of every private man's concernment, which was ſo diminiſhed and impoveriſhed by the late Wars and Revolutions, that no man durſt pretend to an Eſtate, for fear that it ſhould be taken away, either by the violent force of Tyrants, who bare-faced plundred and pillaged all they could ſeiſe and lay their hands on; or elſe by thoſe who pretended to borrow it for the ſervice of his Majeſty. And now (as the Proverb is) That it is good fiſhing upon turn of the Tide, let us paſs over into Spain, and let us ſee what his Imperial Majeſty is there deſigning for reducing to obedience the Rebels in Peru, and to ſet at liberty the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez.

BOOK V.

CHAP. I.

Licençiado Pedro de la Gasca is choſen by the Emperour Charles the Fifth to reduce Peru.

WHilſt matters were tranſacted in Peru in the manner before related, Diego Albarez Cueto and Franciſco Maldonado arrived in Spain in Quality of Ambaſſadours, the firſt of which was ſent from the Vice king, and the latter from Gonçalo Piçarro, and both went to Valladolid, where the Court then reſided, under the Government of the Prince Don Philip, who ruled that Kingdom in the abſence of the Emperour his Father; who, like a Catholick Prince, was at that time actually employed in the Wars in Germany againſt the Lutherans, labouring to reduce them to the obedience of the Holy Mother the Church of Rome. Theſe Ambaſſadours did ſeverally inform the Prince's Highneſs and the Royal Council of the Indies, in the beſt manner they were able, of all the tranſactions and ſucceſſes which had happened in Peru, untill the time of their departure from thence; for then the Vice-king was ſtill living. The ill news of theſe great revolutions and troubles of that Kingdom cauſed many thoughts in the mind of the Prince; for remedy of which his Highneſs ſummoned a Council of the moſt wiſe and grave perſons, and of moſt experience, then reſiding at the Court, which were the Cardinal Don John Tavera Archbiſhop of Toledo, Cardinal Don Fray Garcia de Loayſa Archbiſhop of Seville, Don Franciſco de Baldes Preſident of the Royal Council and Biſhop of Ciguença, the Duke of Alva, the Count of Oſorno, Franciſco de Los Cobos Lord Lieutenant of Leon, Don John Cunniga Lord Lieutenant of Caſtile, Ramirez Biſhop of Cuenca and Preſident of the King's Bench in Valladolid; all the Judges of the Royal Council of the Indies, beſides ſeveral other perſons of great Quality; all which, as well as the Court in general, did admire that thoſe Laws and Ordinances which were made and deſigned for the univerſal good, as well of the Indians as of the Spaniards of Peru, ſhould have ſuch a different effect, and prove the cauſe of the deſtruction both of one and of the other, and ſo to endanger the Kingdom as even to put it in hazard of being alienated from the Crown of the Emperour. To prevent which, many conſultations were held, and great debates did ariſe thereupon; ſome were of opinion, that it was to be done onely by force of Arms, and that immediately Souldiers were to be ſent thither under the command of ſeveral experienced Captains; but this opinion was oppoſed by the difficulty of ſuch an enterpriſe; for that the charge of ſhipping Souldiers, Arms, Ammunition, Horſes and Proviſion would be very great, the Voyage was long, the Navigation difficult and ſubject to a thouſand hazards, being to paſs two Seas. Other Counſels there were of the more moderate and grave ſort of men, who were of opinion, that, ſince all thoſe diſturbances were cauſed by the rigour of the new Laws, and the ſevere and indiſcreet manner of putting them in execution by the Vice-king, the remedy thereof ought to be by contrary applications; which was, that the new Laws ſhould be abſolutely abrogated and declared invalid, and that to declare and publiſh them for ſuch, a perſon ſhould be ſent of a mild, gentle and affable temper, and one of experience of the world, of prudence, and capable of Government in the times of Peace, and yet a Souldier knowing how to manage a War if occaſion ſhould require. The Perſon elected for this employment was Licençiado Pedro de la Gaſca, a Presbyter of the Church, and a Member of the General Council of the Inquiſition, and one in whom all the fore-mentioned qualities did concurr; and being thus elected, he was offered to his Majeſty for his approbation: upon receipt of theſe Letters of recommendation, Orders were given in ſuch manner as Gomara writes in the 175th Chapter of his Book, which I have thought fit to repeat word for word, becauſe he ſeems to be more plain and clear herein than any other Authour whatſoever.

When the Emperour, ſaith he, had received the news of the great diſturbances in Peru, and of the impriſonment of Blaſco Nunnez, he highly reſented the inſolence of the Judges, who durſt attempt ſo daring a piece of injuſtice againſt their allegiance, and alſo condemned the proceedings of Gonçalo Piçarro, as not tending to his ſervice. Howſoever, when it was conſidered that Appeal was made to him in reference to the new Laws, that the Letters of Inſtruction which were given herein and ſent by Franciſco Maldonado were miſcarried, and that Texada died at Sea; the fault was caſt upon the Vice-king, who with too much rigour executed the new Laws, without admitting of any Petitions, or hearkening to the Reaſons which were offered to the contrary: but then he ſeemed again to be excuſed by the poſitive commands in his Inſtructions not to admit of any appeal or delay, for that thoſe methods were looked upon as certainly conducing to the ſervice of God, to the welfare and conſervation of the Indians, to the diſcharge of a good Conſcience, and to the increaſe of the King's Revenue: when theſe things, as we ſaid, were conſidered, the anger of the Emperour much abated, but his trouble increaſed by this unſeaſonable news, which came to him at a time when he was engaged in a War in Germany, and in thoſe diſturbances which were cauſed by the Lutherians. Howſoever, conſidering how much it concerned him to relieve his Subjects in Peru, and provide remedies wherewith to pacifie the commotions raiſed in thoſe Kingdoms, which yielded him a vaſt Income and Revenue; he concurred in the opinion of his Council, which was to ſend a perſon of a gentle and peaceable diſpoſition, and of experience and practice in affairs, and different to the humour of Blaſco Nunnez, who was violent, open in his Counſels, and neither underſtanding Men nor Buſineſs: and laſtly, conſidering that ſince a Lion could not prevail, the gentle ſpirit of a Lamb might be much more mollifying and winning of the people: ſuch a perſon as this was Licenciado Pedro Gaſca eſteemed to be, a man of a much better underſtanding than the other, and one who had gained a reputation in management of the Commotions and Treaties with the Moors in Valentia: And accordingly a Commiſſion was given him, with Letters and Orders in Blank, to inſert what Names he ſhould think fit; and all the late Ordinances and new Laws were cancelled and repealed; and Letters were wrote to Gonçalo Piçarro all dated at Vienna in Germany in the year 1546.

Thus Gaſca was diſpatched away, and though he departed with a ſmall number of Perſons, and a mean Retinue, and with the Title onely of Preſident, yet he was high in eſteem, and great hopes were conceived of the ſucceſs of his negotiations. The ſhipping which attended him was meanly provided with Mariners, and onely what was neceſſary, that he might put the Emperour to as little charge as was poſſible, and ſhew plainneſs to the people of Peru without affectation of ſtate in all his proceedings; the Judges he carried with him were Andreo de Cianca and Renteria, being perſons in whom he greatly confided. When he arrived at Nombre de Dios, he communicated his buſineſs to no man, but treated with every man in ſuch manner as agreed with the Character which was given of him, ſaying, that he was to go to Piçarro, and that in caſe he would not receive him he would return again to the Emperour; for that his profeſſion was not to be a Souldier, nor was he acquainted with the Art of War, his buſineſs being onely to recall the late Ordinances, and to preſide in the Council. And whereas Melchior Vedugo ſent to let him know, that he was coming to ſerve him with ſome other Companions,

nions, he desired him to forbear a while, and to attend his farther Orders. And leaving his directions here he went to Panama, where he constituted Garçia de Paredes Governour, and appointed him a Garrison of those Souldiers which Hernando Mexia, and Don Pedro de Cabrera, who were Captains belonging to Piçarro had brought to him, to defend that Town from the French, who committed Piracies along that Coast; and their coming thither was expected also, but their Voyage was shortned by the Governour of Santa Maura who killed them all at a Banquet to which he had given them an invitation. Thus far Gomara.

CHAP. II.

Of the substance of the Commission which Licenciado Gasca brought. His arrival at Santa Marta and Nombre de Dios, the manner of his reception there, and of the various Successes and Treaties which passed there.

NOW that we may add to what was omitted by this Authour relating to the Commission which Licenciado Gasca carried with him, and in which he comes short, for though in general he says, that the Emperour granted him a power as large as he could desire, yet not mentioning the particulars thereof, we are to add, that he gave him an unlimited and an absolute power in all things in such full and ample manner as his Majesty could grant; commanding all people upon his Summons to come in to his assistance with Men, and Horse, and Arms, and Money; with Shipping, Provision, and whatever else he should require for his Majesty's Service. He also carried with him a general Act of Pardon for all Crimes whatsoever, and that no action should be brought against any person by reason thereof; and that every man's Estate and Free-hold should be conserved to him. And that he should cause the Vice-king to be embarked and transported into Spain, in case he believed it conducing to the service of his Majesty and the quietness of the Kingdom. He had also a Licence and Authority to make use of the Royal Revenue, so far as he judged it necessary for reducing the Rebels, for quieting the minds of the People, and for due administration of Justice by the Government. He had also Power and Authority to dispose of such Lands and Estates which belonged to Indians, which were not already granted or given away; and also of all Offices and Governments through the whole Empire, as well those which were already gained and conquered as those which should be acquired and discovered hereafter. And to himself there was no fixed or settled Sum appointed for his Salary or Entertainment; but a liberty and privilege to spend so much as he judged convenient for his Majesty's Service, of which the Auditor-General was to take an account, and send the same to the Officers of his Majesty's Treasury. All which particulars were set down, and required by Licenciado Gasca, who, like a wise man, provided as well for the future as for the present, and also that malitious men might not say, that Interest and a great Salary was the motive to incite him to laborious and difficult undertakings, which at every step offered themselves, but a true zeal onely to his Majesty's Service was his highest inducement; to which he sacrificed all his peace and quietness, and prefetred it even before his own life. And Gomara farther describing this Licenciado Gasca, saith, that as he was of much more solid understanding and better temper than the Vice-king, so also he was of little stature, and of a strange shape, for from the girdle downwards he was as long as any tall man whatsoever, and then from the girdle upwards to his Shoulders he was not one third so high, and without any proportion to his other parts: when he was on Horse-back he seemed much less than he was, for he was all Thighs and Leggs; and his Countenance was very ill-favoured and unpleasant: but what nature had denied to him in his Body, was largely recompensed to him in the endowments of his Mind; for he had not onely all those which this Authour declares of him, but many more, considering that he regained his Empire again to his Majesty, which was almost totally ruined, and revolted from its allegiance. I my self knew him, and particularly one evening I was with him when he stood in the Court-yard of my Father's house, leading to the open place from whence he saw the Feasts of Bulls and Sports on Horse-back with their Darts; but he lodged then in the houses of Thomas Vasquez, now in the possession of his Son Pedro Vasquez; where also Gonçalo Piçarro lodged when he was in that Town; and situate on the outside of the Street which is in the middle between our house and the Convent of our Lady of the Mercedes: and though those Houses have at one corner Windows which look out into the Market-place, from whence Licenciado Gasca might have seen all those Sports, howsoever he chose rather to see them from my Father's Court-yard, which more immediately fronts with the Market-place.

And now we shall proceed to declare his Actions which were not performed by the Sword or Lance, but by the force of his reason and council, which carried him on with such success as obtained all the points he desired both in Peace and War, and at length conducted him out of the Countrey without any Complaints or Accusations against him of violence or oppression. His weapons were, Patience to bear and undergo all the labours and difficulties which presented, and mildly to suffer the insolences and affronts of the Souldiery; he also had a great stock of subtlety, and craft, and good management to penetrate into the Plots and Designs of his Enemies, and to circumvent and disappoint them; from all which we have arguments sufficient to prove the difficulty of his undertaking, especially if we consider the condition of this Empire, when this worthy person undertook to settle and reduce it to obedience. And here we shall omit to give an account of the particulars of the Voyage which the President made to Nombre de Dios (to whom hereafter we shall give that Title) referring the Reader to Diego Fernandez for that relation, and so shall proceed to what succeeded after his arrival there. The President received the first News of the death of the Vice-king in Santa Marta, from Licenciado Almandarez, who was then Governour of that Province and of that new Kingdom; from whence both Gasca and those with him apprehended great difficulties in their design; judging it almost impossible to reduce a People without Arms who had proceeded so far in their Rebellion, as to kill the Vice-king in a pitched Battel. But the President, not to discourage his People, concealed the opinion and apprehension he conceived thereof; and to prevent farther disturbances which might arise, he publickly declared, that he had sufficient power and authority to pardon all the Crimes of what nature soever which were already committed, so that no man ought to doubt of pardon or of a general Act of Oblivion. Moreover he considered, that by the death of the Vice-king, that general hatred was removed from the People, which they conceived against his perverse and untractable humour, and that thereby they might more easily be reduced to the service of his Majesty: Besides which another difficulty was obviated in case it should be thought necessary for quieting the People, to send the Vice-king out of that Countrey; who might object the injustice of such proceedings against a person, who for no other reason than the Service of his Majesty against Rebels and Tyrants, was banished the Countrey, and deprived of his Authority. The President Gasca comforting himself with such Considerations as these sailed to Nombre de Dios, where he was received by the Souldiers of Hernan Mexia and by the Inhabitants all well armed; but they shewed him very little respect and less affection, speaking contemptibly of his person with affronting words; of all which (as Diego Fernandez saith) he took no notice, but spake kindly and chearfully to all sorts of People. But the Clergy of the City, like true Servants of God, went in procession with the Cross to meet and receive the President; whom they conducted to the Church to sing the Te Deum Laudamus, with which kindness the President was much pleased, and thanked God, that some People were remaining, who were acquainted with their duty and good manners, and in some kind made amends for the disrespects of others: but that which added most to his satisfaction was, that the night following, Hernan Mexia who was one of the Captains of Gonçalo Piçarro, and much obliged to him for several favours, came privately to speak with him, offering himself to the service of his Majesty, and to use his utmost endeavours to engage other Captains and Souldiers to return unto their Loyalty and duty towards their Prince: Moreover he gave him a large Narrative of the State of the Countrey and of the Fleet which was at Panama, and of the Condition of the Captains and Souldiers which were embarked thereupon, and how that Pedro de Hinojoſa was Admiral thereof: for all which Advices and Promiſes the Preſident returned him thanks, and promiſed him in the name of his Majeſty a ſuitable reward, deſiring his ſecrecy in the whole matter: And thus Peace and Friendſhip being agreed between them, they privately diſcourſed every night together, and Hernan Mexia gave him an account of all matters, which they wrote to him from Panama. Thus did the Preſident gain every day upon the good wills and affections of the People and Souldiery, ſo that many of them went to dine and converſe with him; and in all his diſcourſes, he told them plainly that he came thither to no other end and intention, than onely to reduce them to their obedience and loyalty due to his Majeſty by terms of peace and friendſhip, and with promiſes of reward: That the King had given him full power and authority to promiſe them a general Pardon for all crimes and faults which were already paſt; and that if People would not be contented herewith on fair terms, he for his part was ready, without farther force, to return ſpeedily into Spain. This was his common diſcourſe and declaration at all times, when he was in publick, with intention that the report hereof might be ſpread in all parts of the Empire: ſome few days after the arrival of the Preſident at Nombre de Dios; Melchior de Verdugo, of whom we have formerly made mention appeared before the City of Panama, with intention to enter with his two Ships into the Port: But the Citizens were in great combuſtion hereupon, by reaſon that they feared and hated the perſon of Verdugo, and believed that he was commanded thither by the order of the Preſident: but to clear himſelf of this ſuſpicion, he wrote a Letter himſelf to Verdugo, and ſent it by the hand of an intimate friend of his, who was a Church-man, ordering Verdugo, upon no terms whatſoever to come to Nombre de Dios, but to go to any other place, which ſhould be more convenient, and that he ſhould reſtore the Ships and Goods which he had taken to the true Proprietors.

This was the Contents of what was wrote in the Letter; but then privately and by word of mouth; he gave him orders to return to Nicaragua, and there to expect ſuch farther directions which ſhould be ſent him, the which would tend greatly to his Majeſty's Service. But Melchior Verdugo, inſtead of returning to Nicaragua, ſailed into Spain, much doubting his ſecurity in that Countrey, for that he had rendred himſelf ſo odious to the People, that he thought himſelf in no place ſecure or ſafe. And being in Spain, his Imperial Majeſty honoured him with the habit of Santiago. I ſaw him once in the Anti-chamber of the moſt Catholick King Philip the Second, in the year 1563. But ſoon after Informations came againſt him of all the Pyracies he had committed in Peru, and the other Violences and Miſchiefs he had done in Nicaragua and Nombre de Dios; which were ſuch great and crying ſins, that he was in danger of being deprived of the honour of his habit, with which he became ſo ſad and dejected, that his countenance changed and ſhewed the inward ſorrow of his mind: but afterwards, at the Interceſſion of Friends he obtained his Majeſty's Pardon, and returned into Peru.

CHAP. III.

The Preſident ſends Hernan Mexia to Panama to quiet the Diſturbances which were made by Pedro Hinojoſa, and diſpatches an Ambaſſadour to Gonçalo Piçarro; who having Intelligence of the coming of the Preſident, ſends Meſſengers to the Emperour.

THE Preſident made preparations to return again to Panama, where he hoped by means of his good conduct to reduce Pedro de Hinojoſa, with the other Captains which were there quartered, to due allegiance unto their Emperour: for according to the relation which Hernando Mexia de Guzman had given him him, their inclinations were very well disposed thereunto; and accordingly he conceived great hopes of success. In order to which he went with all speed possible to Panama, taking the Mareschall Alvarado into his company, and to his assistance (as Diego Fernandez Palentino in the thirty eighth Chapter of his Book affirms) for whom he had obtained a Licence from the Council of the Indies, that he might be spared for some time from the Register's Office to attend unto the affairs of Peru, and be an Assistent and a Companion to him. This Gentleman having been in the Battel of Chupas against Don Diego de Almagro Junior, returned afterwards into Spain; and by reason that he was well versed in the transaction of affairs between the Piçarrists and Almagrians, he was entertained in the service of the Council of the Indies. But let us leave both him and the President in their journey; to relate what Pedro de Hinojosa acted in the mean time at Panama, upon the News, that Hernan Mexia had received the President with signs and demonstrations of peace and friendship, rather than of enmity and opposition: and he was the more dissatisfied, because he was ignorant of the Commission and Contents of the Instructions which the President brought; And because he had concluded and agreed without any communication or correspondence with him: wherefore Hinojosa wrote so very angrily to him upon that matter, that several friends of Hernan de Mexia advised him not to go to Panama: Howsoever (as Augustine Carate saith) after some conference had with the President thereupon it was concluded, that Hernan Mexia should speedily depart for Panama, and laying aside all fears and jealousies should boldly communicate the whole matter to Hinojosa; which Mexia accordingly performed in confidence of the friendship which was between them, and the knowledge he had of his humour and disposition. After some conference together Mexia so well acquitted himself and gave such reasons for receiving the President; shewing that, let the business go how it would, his actions hitherto could bring no prejudice to their cause; that Hinojosa appeared well satisfied: thereupon Hernan Mexia returned to Nombre de Dios, and the President went to Panama, where he personally treated with Hinojosa and with all his Captains, declaring to them the cause and reasons of his coming; And managed matters with such secrecy and prudence, that none knew what he had communicated to the other; which so secured their affections and good will towards him, that he adventured publickly to declare his design, and to assure them that his negotiations tended to the publick welfare: and at the same time took care to provide for the necessities and conveniences of the Souldiery; the which he acted with such sweetness of behaviour and respect towards all, as feeds the vanity of that Souldiery, and prevails most in that Countrey. Thus far Augustine de Carate in his seventh Chapter.

So soon as Pedro de Hinojosa had notice of the coming of the President to Nombre de Dios, he gave immediate intelligence thereof to Gonçalo Piçarro, as did all his Captains, giving him assurance, that they would never suffer him to pass into Peru. But notwithstanding all their resolutions, after some conferences which they held with the President at Panama, they changed their minds, and then wrote in a different manner: for the President had so dealt with every single person in private, as had much engaged them and inclined their good-wills and affections to him. Whereupon they consented, and gave permission that he might send one of those persons whom he brought from Castile with Letters from Gonçalo Piçarro to advise him of his arrival in those parts; the Gentleman whom the President resolved to send was called Pedro Hernandez Paniagua, who was an Inhabitant and Governour of the City of Plasencia, a person well qualified for such a negotiation; for, besides that he was a Gentleman of good extraction, he had left his Wife and Children a competent Estate in Spain, for which he not onely merited esteem and respect of Piçarro, but also for his Countreys sake, and for the sake of his kindred and relations, who were engaged in his faction. Thus did Paniagua set sail for Peru, upon a frigate appointed for him; all the Letters he carried with him were one from the King to Gonçalo Piçarro, and another to him from the President, besides some other private Letters to persons of quality, as namely, to the Bishop of Lugo, and another to Licenciado Benito de Carvajal, to whom the President wrote amicably, and as became a kinsman, directing him in what manner to act for the service of his Majesty. And here we will leave Paniagua in his voyage, and relate what Gonçalo Piçarro was acting in the mean time.

Whilst

Whilſt Piçarro was arrived at the top of all his hopes and expected a confirmation in his Government, and to be made perpetual Dictatour in that Empire, he received Letters from Pedro de Hinojoſa his General, which gave him advice of the arrival of the Preſident in thoſe parts. Piçarro and all his Captains were greatly ſurprized and troubled at this unexpected News, and thereupon with ſome of the Citizens entred into conſultation how and in what manner they were to behave themſelves in this buſineſs; the Debates were many and long, and the opinions different to each other; but at length they were reduced to two: ſome were of opinion that either publickly or ſecretly the Preſident was to be killed. Others were of opinion that they ſhould invite him to Peru, where having diſcovered all his Papers, Inſtructions and Commiſſion, that then they ſhould endeavour to perſuade or force him to concur with them, and grant whatſoever they deſired: and in caſe they could not prevail, it was but to put him off then with delays, pretending that they had not power to conclude alone, without the conſent and concurrence of all the other Cities of that Kingdom, with that of Los Reyes: and in regard the Places and Cities were far diſtant each from the other, there would be good cauſe of excuſe and means to deferr the Aſſembly for two years: And in the mean time the Preſident would be deteined a Priſoner in the Iſland of Puna, under a Guard of faithfull Souldiers, who were to be carefull to intercept all Letters which he ſhould write for information of his Majeſty, by default of which they might ſtill continue under the notion of obedient and loyal Subjects. Others were of opinion, that the beſt and moſt expedite way was, to cauſe him to return again into Spain, and to perſuade him thereunto with money and proviſions for his voyage; by which it would appear, that they had treated him like a good Servant and Officer of his Majeſty. Theſe Debates continued with great difference and heat for many days: but at length it was by common conſent agreed, That Meſſengers ſhould be ſent from them to his Majeſty to negotiate the Grant of ſuch Particulars as were moſt conducing to the welfare of that Empire: That they ſhould give an account of all things which had been lately tranſacted; and eſpecially to inſiſt in juſtification of their cauſe, that they were compelled to the engagement of Quitu, where the Vice-king was ſlain: and in all their Diſcourſes they were to charge the Vice-king as the Aggreſſour, who had perſued them through all places, and at length forced them to kill him in their own defence: And in fine, the Prayer of their Petition was, That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to confer the Government of that Empire on Gonçalo Piçarro, who by his own bravery and merit of his Relations had gained that Empire to the Crown; and that farther, he pretended a Title thereunto on the Commiſſion his Majeſty had given to his Brother to nominate a Succeſſour thereunto after his death: and in the mean time they deſired, that the Preſident might be ordered to reſide in Panama, and not to proceed farther into Peru untill his Majeſty ſhould give new directions. This matter being agreed upon, Ambaſſadours were choſen who were to negotiate thoſe great Points in Spain; and to give the better countenance thereunto, Don Tray Geronimo de Loayſa, Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes, who was a great Prelate, Father and Paſtour of that City, was entreated to accept of that Charge, who being a Perſon of great eſteem and intereſt in Spain, it was preſumed that he would be heard with the more favour; the like alſo was deſired of the Biſhop of Santa Marta, and Friar Thomas de St. Martin, who was Provincial of the Order of St. Dominick; and Lorenço de Aldana and Gomez de Solis were pitched upon to join with them in the Commiſſion. Money was ordered for their Voyage ſufficient to defray all their charges; and particularly it was ordered, that Gomez de Solis, who was chief Gentleman-uſher to Gonçalo Piçarro, ſhould have thirty thouſand pieces of Eight paid to him apart, out of the which he was to give unto Pedro de Hinojoſa ſo much as he judged neceſſary: but as to Lorenço de Aldana, he ſuppoſed that he had ſo many endearments towards him on account of his Countrey and mutual friendſhip which was between them, that he did not doubt but that he would prove a faithfull correſpondent, and with all fidelity adviſe him of the accidents and ſucceſſes of his Voyage, but more particularly to acquaint him from Panama of the import and contents of the Commiſſion, and Inſtructions which the Preſident had brought with him: Accordingly theſe perſons embarked in the month of October, 1546. with Title of Ambaſſadours from the Empire of Peru, unto his Majeſty; in whoſe Voyage nothing occurred worthy the Relation.

CHAP. IV.

The Ambaſſadours arrive at Panama, and both they and the People of that City revolt from Gonçalo Piçarro, and deliver up their Fleet into the power of the Preſident. Paniagua comes to Los Reyes.

SO ſoon as the Ambaſſadours arrived at Panama, Lorenço de Aldana went to take up his Lodgings with Pedro de Hinojoſa: and having firſt burnt the Commiſſion and Inſtructions which he brought from Gonçalo Piçarro, relating to matters which he had to act in Panama and Spain; he made his Addreſſes to the Preſident, giving him in few words to underſtand his intentions: and in a ſhort time becoming better acquainted, Aldana, Hernan Mexia and Pedro de Hinojoſa engaged to employ themſelves in the Service of the Preſident; onely they pretended to make ſome difficulties for the firſt three days, untill they had well digeſted their matter: and then finding themſelves all of an opinion, they began to publiſh their intentions, and on the fourth day they and all the Captains went to the Preſident and profeſſed their allegiance to his Majeſty: and in token thereof delivered up the whole Fleet into his poſſeſſion and command, together with the Arms, Ammunition and Appurtenances thereunto belonging, engaging upon Oath to doe homage to him, and to ſerve and obey him in whatſoever he ſhould command. And in the mean time theſe Reſolutions were kept as a Secret untill it was known how Gonçalo Piçarro received Paniagua and the meſſage which he brought him. The principal motives which incited theſe perſons to revolt from Piçarro to the Service of his Majeſty were, impartially ſpeaking, the ſenſe of true allegiance and duty which they owed to his Majeſty. In the next place, it was ſecretly agreed, that ſo ſoon as theſe Commotions were ſuppreſſed and the Countrey in peace and quietneſs, that the Army ſhould receive their full arrears of Pay: the which was afterwards complied with in a more ample manner than they themſelves had propoſed, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its due place. But nothing more prevailed and facilitated this matter than the Repeal of the late Ordinances and new Laws, and the general Pardon for what was already paſt: for when they ſaw themſelves ſecured in their poſſeſſions and commands over the Indians; and abſolved of the murthers, ſpoils and robberies they had committed in the late Civil Wars; they reſolved to cloſe with this opportunity to ſave themſelves, though thereby they ſacrificed and ſurrendred him to deſtruction who had promoted them to the Titles of Captains and Ambaſſadours of that Empire, rather in expectation of future ſervices from them, than in reward of former merit; for though they were Perſons of Quality, yet none of them had been Conquerours, unleſs Alonſo Palamino. This Secret was concealed for ſome few days, which the Preſident eſteemed, as no loſs of time, conſidering his great ſucceſs in ſo ſhort a time. In fine, at a general Rendezvous the ſeveral Colours were ſurrendred up into the hands of the Preſident, and the Captains publickly declared for the Preſident; who accepted the ſurrender in the name of his Majeſty and reſtored every man to his Office by Commiſſion from the Emperour: as is confirmed by Gomara, Chapter 179. in theſe words:

By the prudent and dexterous negotiations of Gaſca, and by the promiſes of reward which he made to Hinojoſa, for there could be no force or compulſion in the caſe, a voluntary ſurrender was made of the whole Fleet unto the Preſident: and here the firſt ſtep was made to the ruine of Gonçalo Piçarro. Gaſca accepted of the Fleet, and confirmed Hinojoſa in his Office of Admiral, and all the Captains in the commands of their reſpective Ships, thereby converting Traitors to a condition of loyal and faithfull Subjects. The Preſident having gained the Fleet, began to conceive great hopes of theſe his negotiations; and indeed he had reaſon ſo to believe, for without the Fleet he could never have ſucceeded in his enterpriſe; by Sea it had been impoſſible to have found ſhipping to tranſport him to Peru: and to go by Land, (as it was once deſigned) the journey had been difficult and attended tended with the ſufferings of hunger, cold and other dangers. Thus much Gomara reports of this matter, and in the ſame place touches upon the induſtry and diligence uſed by the Preſident in all his actions, and the mutual Promiſes and Engagements which paſſed between both Parties. This accord being made, and the account of the Arrears of pay being made up and ſtated, Gaſca thought it time publickly to own the command of all, and to chuſe Pedro de Hinojoſa Captain-General of all the Forces both by Sea and Land. Then he commanded and ordered four Ships to be prepared and fitted, under the command of Lorenço de Aldana, John Alonſo Palomino, Hernan Mexia and John Yllanes. Lorenço de Aldana was appointed Admiral of the four Ships, which were to carry three hundred men of the beſt Seamen and Souldiers ſelected out of the Fleet and provided with all things neceſſary for their Voyage.

They were moreover ordered to carry with them many Copies or Tranſcripts of his Majeſty's moſt gratious revocation of the late Ordinances, and of the general Pardon, which was extended and indulged to all perſons without exception, the which were in the beſt manner they could contrive to be diſperſed in all places of the inland Countries. Theſe four Captains being accordingly diſpatched, the Preſident wrote a Letter to Don Antonio de Mendoça, Vice-king at that time of Mexico, informing him of all particulars which had ſucceeded to that time, and deſiring his aſſiſtence with Men and Arms to forward his Majeſty's Service. In like manner Diſpatches were ſent to Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla at Guatimala, and Nicaragua, and to other perſons of St. Domingo and Popoyan, and the like unto other parts, for it was believed that all was little enough to reduce the Rebels to their duty and allegiance: but no force was ſo prevalent as the revocation of the late Ordinances, and the general Pardon, which operated on the minds of men, and contributed more to the ruine of Gonçalo Piçarro, and conſignation of the Empire to Gaſca than all the preparations did which were made for War.

But now, returning to ſpeak of Paniagua, whom we left on his Voyage to Los Reyes, we ſhall paſs by the Journal of what happened in his paſſage, to relate matters more eſſential to this Hiſtory. Paniagua being arrived at Los Reyes, he delivered the Letters which he brought from his Majeſty and from the Preſident to the hands of Piçarro, as alſo his general Letter of Credence, ſignifying that he was ſent by order of the Preſident, and that entire belief was to be yielded to whatſoever he ſhould deliver in the name of his Majeſty and of the Preſident. Gonçalo Piçarro ſeemingly gave him a fair reception, and having heard his Meſſage, he diſmiſt him for the preſent, charging and forewarning him not to meddle or treat with any about the affairs of the Preſident at his peril. He then called for Licenciado Cepeda and Franciſco de Carvajal, and in preſence of thoſe three onely were the King's Letters read, as Auguſtine Carate writes.

The Subſtance of his Majeſty's Letter.

The KING.

BY your Letters (Gonçalo Piçarro) and by other relations, we have been informed of the many troubles and commotions which have happened in the Provinces of Peru, ſince the time that Blaſco Nunnez Vela Our Vice-king arrived there, together with the Judges of our Courts of Juſtice; and which were raiſed by putting thoſe new Laws and Ordinances into execution, though contrived and framed for the better Government of thoſe parts, and for the eaſe and relief of the Natives thereof. And we are well aſſured, that neither you nor any of thoſe who have followed your Party, did act intentionally to doe us a diſ-ſervice, but onely to put a ſtop to the ſeverity which the ſaid Vice-king uſed in the violent and indiſcreet execution thereof, without receiving or admitting any reaſons or petitions to the contrary. Of all which being well informed, and having heard whatſoever Franciſco Maldonado had to communicate to us on your behalf, and from the Inhabitants of thoſe Provinces; we have thought fit to ſend Licenciado de la Gaſca, one of the Counſellours of the Holy and General Inquiſition, with Title and in Quality of our Preſident, to whom

We have given a Commiſſion and ſuch Inſtructions as will undoubtedly put an end to all the troubles and commotions of that Countrey. And farther we have given him a general authority to act and doe whatſoever he ſhall judge may moſt redound to the ſervice and honour of God, to the improvement of thoſe Provinces, to the benefit and welfare of Our Subjects, who are Planters, and of the Natives thereof. Wherefore we do command and require you to be aiding and aſſiſting to our ſaid Preſident in whatſoever he ſhall demand of you in Our Name towards the performance and accompliſhment of thoſe rules and directions which have been given him. And herein relying upon you with much confidence, We ſhall ever be mindfull of the Services which your Brother the Marquis hath done for Us, and which ſhall ever be remembred to the advantage of his Sons and Brothers. Given at Venloe the 16th day of the Month of February, 1546.

I the KING.

By command of his Majeſty,

Franciſco de Erato.

The Letter which the Preſident wrote to Gonçalo Piçarro was to this effect.

Illuſtrious Sir,

SUppoſing that my ſtay would not have been ſo long in this Countrey I deteined the Emperour's Letter by me, intending to deliver it with my own hand; nor did I think fit in the mean time to acquaint you of my arrival, out of reſpect to his Majeſty's Letter, which ought to have come firſt unto your hands before mine. But conſidering that the Affairs of his Majeſty would require my preſence here for ſome time, and hearing that you had convened an Aſſembly of the People to meet you at the City of Lima, to conſider of Affairs which depend on things already paſt; I judged it neceſſary to employ an expreſs Meſſenger with his Majeſty's Letter, and with the ſame occaſion alſo to ſend you mine, the bearer whereof, named Hernandez Paniagua, is a Perſon of Quality, and one conſiderable in your Countrey, and very much your Friend and humble Servant. What I have now to ſay to you farther, is to acquaint you, That in Spain there have been great Conſultations concerning the manner how the commotions and diſturbances, which have been raiſed in Peru ſince the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez (whom God forgive) came into thoſe parts, were to be taken and reſented. And after his Majeſty had well weighed and conſidered the ſeveral Debates and Opinions thereupon, there hath no cauſe appeared hitherto to believe, that the ſame did proceed from any motive of diſobedience or diſ-ſervice to his Majeſty, but merely from a principle of ſelf-preſervation, which induced them to oppoſe that ſeverity which the Vice-king uſed in the execution of the new Laws againſt the privileges and rights of that Countrey: And farther his Majeſty hath conſidered the obſtinacy of the Vice-king, who would admit of no Petition or Appeal, or ſuſpenſion of the new Laws untill ſuch time as his Majeſty was acquainted with the inconveniences thereof; all which appears at large in your Letter to his Majeſty, and which gives a farther relation, that you had taken upon you the Government at the inſtance and deſire of the Court of Juſtice, and which they had delivered unto you by Commiſſion under his Majeſty's Broad Seal; in virtue whereof you promiſe to ſerve his Majeſty, and profeſs, that to have refuſed the Government at that time would have been a diſ-ſervice to his Majeſty, and that you accepted it on no other terms than ſuch as became a good and a loyal Subject, and with intention to reſign it at the command and will of his Majeſty. All which being thus underſtood by his Majeſty, he hath ſent me to quiet the minds of the People by a revocation of thoſe Laws, according to the prayer of your Petition; with power to publiſh a general Pardon for all Faults, Crimes and Miſdemeanours already committed: and laſtly, to take the opinion and direction of the People of this Countrey concerning the methods which are to be uſed for the advancement and promotion of the ſervice of God, and for the common good and welfare of the Inhabitants: And in regard there are many Spaniards in thoſe parts, who are unemployed, and have no poſſeſſions, it is thought fit, fit, that they ſhould be provided out of new diſcoveries, which is the onely way for them to gain honour and riches according to the example of the ancient Conquerours, wherefore I heartily deſire you to conſider theſe matters with the underſtanding of a good Chriſtian, and the worthy mind and intention of a Gentleman, and of a wiſe and prudent Perſon, and with that affection and good will which you have alway ſhewed to the happineſs and welfare of this Countrey, and charity towards the Inhabitants thereof; giving God and our Lady thanks, (to whom you are a zealous Votary) that this great and important Affair, in which you have ſo deeply concerned your ſelf, hath been ſo favourably interpreted by his Majeſty and by the Grandees of Spain; who were pleaſed to acquit your actions of rebellion and diſloyalty, and to ſtyle them with the more ſoft terms of defending his Majeſty's Juſtice, to which his Subjects were denied acceſs, or to be heard by way of Petition. And now in regard your King, who is a Catholick and a juſt Prince, hath reſtored you and every perſon to the enjoyment of his own Eſtate and Poſſeſſions in as full and as ample a manner as they deſired in their Petition; It is but reaſon that you deal as ſincerely and juſtly with your King, by yielding due obedience to him, and compliance with all his commands: the which is a duty incumbent on us, not onely by the Laws of Nature, which oblige every Subject to be loyal to his King, but alſo by the Laws of Scripture and Grace, which injoyn us, on the penalty of eternal damnation, to render unto every man his due, and eſpecially obedience unto Kings. And ſince your Anceſtours have made themſelves illuſtrious by their loyalty and by their ſervices to the Crown, which have gained them the Title of Nobles; it will now be your part to Copy out this leſſon in the largeſt characters, rather than to degenerate from their lineage and caſt a blemiſh on all their atchievements by your demerits and defection from their vertues. The greateſt concernment we have in this world, next to the ſalvation of our Souls, is our honour, which is moſt reſplendent in perſons who move in your high ſphere, in which you are capable to brighten the luſtre of your Anceſtour's glories, or otherwiſe by irregular actions to caſt a blemiſh and an eternal obſcurity upon them. For whoſoever falls from God by infidelity, or from his King by treaſon and diſloyalty, doth not onely diſhonour himſelf but likewiſe caſts a blemiſh and infamy on his whole Family: wherefore let me adviſe you to reflect hereupon with a wiſe and a prudent ſpirit, weighing well the power of your King, whoſe Forces you are very unable to withſtand: but leſt your want of knowledge and experience in his Court, not having viewed his Armies, or fathomed the depth of his Counſels, ſhould betray you to an over-weening opinion of your own ſtrength; be pleaſed to figure unto your ſelf the mighty power and puiſſance of the Great Turk, who marched in Perſon at the head of above three hundred thouſand fighting men, which he brought into the Field againſt him, beſides Pioniers and other attendants on the Camp, notwithſtanding which, when he met his Majeſty near Vienna he durſt not adventure to joyn Battel with him, but rather endeavoured a retreat, facing the Enemy with his Horſe whilſt the Infantry marched away and made their eſcape, &c.

This Letter is writ more at large by divers Authours, which we have thought fit to abbreviate, becauſe it relates the many Victories which the Emperour gained upon the Turk, from whence he frames divers Arguments to prove how unable Gonçalo Piçarro was to contend with ſo formidable a Force, but that rather he ſhould incline his mind to ſubmiſſion and obedience: but what his conſultations and reflexions were on this Letter, we ſhall declare in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of the Conſultations and Opinions concerning the Revocation of the New Laws: and of the General Pardon of all faults and crimes paſt. What private Inſtructions had been given to Paniagua; and Gonçalo Piçarro's Anſwer thereunto.

THESE Letters having at the firſt conſultation been read three or four times in preſence of Gonçalo Piçarro, and of Licenciado Cepeda and Franciſco de Carvajal; Piçarro demanded their opinion thereof: Cepeda deſired Carvajal, becauſe he was the oldeſt man of the company, that he would firſt ſpeak to the matter in queſtion, and though there were ſome little Replies between them, each deſiring the other to begin firſt: yet at length Carvajal gave his opinion as followeth: Theſe are, Sir, in reality great offers; Let us not neglect to accept theſe fair Conditions. What fair Conditions, anſwered Cepeda. What good or benefit can they bring to us? Why, ſaid Carvajal, they are, Sir, both good and cheap; for they propoſe a revocation of the late Ordinances which gave us ſo much cauſe of diſcontent, together with a General Pardon for all that is paſt. And that for other matters a general Aſſembly ſhall be held conſiſting of Members of the ſeveral Cities, by whoſe Votes and Directions, Rules ſhall be given to order all matters tending to the ſervice of God, to the wellfare of the Countrey and benefit of the Inhabitants and Planters thereof; which is as much as we ever deſired or can poſſibly expect: for by annulling or revoking thoſe new Ordinances, we ſecure our Indians; our properties in which was the chief cauſe which moved us to take up Arms, and to adventure our lives in the defence thereof. The General Pardon exempts us from all future Reckonings for what is paſt, and ſtill we conſerve the Government in our own hands; ſince that all the Laws and Rules which are to be made, are to proceed and to be enacted from and by the reſpective Corporations of Cities of which we are principal members. Wherefore upon the whole matter my opinion is, that we ſhould accept of theſe gracious Offers, and in anſwer thereunto return Ambaſſadours to the Preſident, ſignifying our acceptance of the terms propoſed: and to engratiate our ſelves with him, let him be invited to this place, and carried on mens ſhoulders into the City; let his way hither be paved with Plates of Silver and Ingots of Gold, and treated in the moſt magnificent manner imaginable, for having been the Meſſenger of ſo general a good to us: let us find ſome farther way to oblige him to deal with us as Friends, and treat in confidence with us: I do not doubt but ſince he hath begun thus generouſly to open himſelf, but that he hath yet a larger Commiſſion, and a power to confer on you the Government of this Empire: but let the matter go how it will, I am of opinion, that he ſhould be brought to this place; and if afterwards his proceedings do not pleaſe us, it will remain ſtill in our hands to diſpoſe of him as we ſhall think fit.

Cepeda was abſolutely of another opinion, and oppoſed all that Carvajal had declared; ſaying, that theſe fair promiſes were words without ſecurity; which powerfull men could eaſily avoid, as they ſaw occaſion. That if the Preſident were once admitted in, he would ſo draw the hearts of all people to him, as to order and diſpoſe every thing according to his own will and pleaſure: that the perſon who was ſent with theſe Letters, was not one of that plain and ſimple ſort as was pretended; but a man of great ſubtlety and underſtanding, and full of Intrigues and Policies to delude and affect the minds of the People: and in ſum his concluſion was, that they ought not to receive the Preſident amongſt them; for that his admittance would prove the ruine and deſtruction of them all. This was in ſhort the opinion of theſe two Councellours, though the reaſons Pro and Con were more large; and though Piçarro did not declare himſelf at that time either one way or other, yet in his own thoughts he inclined more to the opinion of Ce- of Cepeda, than to the ſenſe of Carvajal; believing that ſo ſoon as he aſſented thereunto, he immediately deveſted him of all the power and authority which he had in that Countrey. Cepeda alſo, blinded with his own ambition and intereſt, ſtiffly adhered to his own opinion, well knowing, that in caſe the Preſident were received, his authority would fail, and that he ſhould loſe his Seal, and perhaps his life, for his crimes were of a deep ſtain; he had once been an Officer and Miniſter of the King's; whoſe Laws and Ordinances he ought to have ſuſtained; and inſtead thereof he had oppoſed the execution of them, and born Arms in that Battel where the Vice-king was ſlain. Howſoever Piçarro not being fully reſolved what courſe to take, ſummoned a general Aſſembly of all the principal Inhabitants of the City, of the Captains, Nobility, and of the moſt knowing perſons in thoſe parts, to deliberate upon the Anſwer which was to be given to the Letters from his Majeſty and the Preſident; which being of common concernment would beſt ſuit with the general authority and conſent of the whole Countrey. The Aſſembly being met, conſiſted of eighty perſons, amongſt whom were many ſtrange and different opinions. Some were delivered with great gravity and prudence, tending to the common good of the Indians and Spaniards, and to the advancement of God's glory and ſervice: others were of a different ſtrain, every one ſpeaking according to his own fancy and talent, and as it is uſual where many are there are different imaginations and fancies according to the Proverb, So many men, ſo many minds: men of the moſt ſolid judgments did concur in opinion with Franciſco de Carvajal, but ambition and the deſire of rule thwarted all to the other ſide. Howſoever Franciſco de Carvajal boldly declared in publick, that the Offers were ſatisfactory, and ought not to be refuſed: to which Cepeda preſently reply'd, that the Major General was afraid, the like was ſaid by other raſh and deſperate men; which Carvajal hearing, cryed out aloud; Gentlemen, I am as affectionate a Servant to my Lord the Governour as any man living, and as much deſire his proſperity, quiet and increaſe of honour; and as ſuch I deliver my opinion ſincerely and really as I believe to be beſt and moſt convenient for him, and from the abundance of my heart and affection I ſpeak it. You may, if you pleaſe, follow other Counſels which lead you into misfortunes; for my part, it cannot much concern me, who have already lived many years in the World, and have as long a neck for a halter as any of your Worſhips. Fernandez Palentino relates ſomething of this opinion of Carvajal in his Hiſtory, but touches it not in this place, but in another ſome time after; perhaps he that gave this information gave it to him late and defective, ſo that he delivered it more fully in another place. Neither Lopez de Gomara nor Auguſtine de Carate make any mention of this particular, which is very ſtrange, becauſe after the War was ended, all people generally applauded the wiſe and politick counſel of Carvajal, which had undoubtedly preſerved Gonçalo Piçarro, had he had Grace and wiſedom enough to have received it.

Theſe Conſultations and Debates were publick; but the Cabals of the other ſide were more private in the Chamber of Paniagua where many People voluntarily reſorted the very night that he arrived there and every night afterwards during the time that he reſided at Los Reyes; all of them proteſting that they were Servants to the King, and obeyed Gonçalo Piçarro againſt their inclinations and will; which they would make appear ſo ſoon as the Preſident arrived in thoſe parts; for then they would revolt from Piçarro to his party; and in the mean time they intreated him to inroll their names in a Liſt, and offer them to the Preſident, aſſuring him of their faithfull ſervice, as opportunity ſhould offer. Theſe were the aſſurances which were ſecretly given to Paniagua by the moſt principal Citizens, and by thoſe who were moſt deeply engaged with Piçarro, and of ſuch who moſt deſperately declared againſt the Preſident, vowing that they would ſtab him or poiſon him, or cauſe the Ship which ſhould carry him to Peru to founder in the Sea, as Hiſtorians write. And this ſecret intelligence was given in the night, partly to prevent the full declaration of his Commiſſion in favour of Gonçalo Piçarro: for we muſt know that juſt as Paniagua was about to take his leave of the Preſident, the laſt and moſt ſecret Inſtruction was given him to be ſure to be very reſerved, and with much art and induſtry to diſcover the inclinations of the People to Gonçalo Piçarro; and that in caſe he found them all of one piece and unanimouſly to adhere unto him; that then he ſhould publickly declare, how that the Preſident brought a Commiſſion with him to confirm Gonçalo Piçarro in the Gothe Government of Peru. And the truth is, it was concluded in Spain by his Majesty's Council just at the departure of the President, that, as the last and ultimate remedy of all, he should have power to confirm Piçarro in the Government: for it was said and concluded, that provided the Countrey were the Emperour's, 'twas no matter, though the Devil governed it.

This secret, (said the President to Paniagua) I entrust to you in as much confidence as it was committed to me, and in all things act as becomes a Gentleman, and as one obliged in duty to serve the King.

After the Countrey was quieted and settled, and the President returned to Spain, Paniagua himself revealed this story, for he remained behind with a good Estate, and a large proportion of Lands and Indians which were given to him. And he confessed, that he was often resolved to have revealed the secret to Piçarro, whilst he remained in a doubtfull condition amidst the various humours and opinions of the Commonalty; and he said, that he often repented that he had not done it.

But to return to our History. Paniagua obtained an answer to his Message; the dispatch unto which was chiefly procured by the interest and favour of Licenciado Carvajal: which was a matter of high importance to him, being in continual fear and danger of his life; for had Piçarro known that he had secretly admitted access to him, and Cabals in the night, he would certainly have been as good as his word in putting him to death, as he threatned him at his first coming to the City. Paniagua, having received his dispatch, departed from Los Reyes in the month of January, 1547. being furnished with money for his Journey, he carried onely a single Letter for the President, of which Augustine Carate takes no notice, but Fernandez Palentino rehearses it in this manner,

Most Honoured and most Reverend Sir,

YOUR Letter dated from Panama of the 26th of September of the year last past, I have received, and return you many thanks, and kiss your hands for the advices you have given me therein, knowing well that they proceed from an affectionate and a sincere heart, agreeable to the quality of your Person, endowed with much learning and conscience. As for my part, I desire you would consider me as a person naturally inclined to the Service of his Majesty, the which you seem to acknowledge without any testimony of my own: And indeed those onely can properly be said to serve his Majesty whose actions and not their words declare their works. Men who serve the King at his charge and cost, may be said to serve him; yet howsoever, they are not to be compared and set in the ballance with them, who, like my Brothers and Relations, and like my self, who have for the space of sixteen years served his Majesty in my Person without any charge or expence to the Crown; to which I have gained and acquired greater and better Countries, and a vaster quantity of Gold and Silver than ever any man hath done which was born; and all this at my own charge, without putting his Majesty to the expence so much as of five Shillings towards all my acquisitions and labours. And now at last there remains nothing either to me or to my Brothers but onely the bare and naked reputation of having served his Majesty, in which we have consumed all that we have gained. When Blasco Nunnez first arrived in this Countrey, there were then living of our stock, the Sons of the Marquis, Hernando Piçarro and my self, amongst which there was scarce the value of a crown remaining either in Gold or Silver, notwithstanding all those immense Sums we had sent to his Majesty; nor had we one Acre of Land amongst us all, notwithstanding that vast tract of Empire we had annexed to the Imperial Crown: and yet notwithstanding all these neglects which have been put upon us, we remain firm and immovable in our Allegiance, to which duty we have no need to be incited from Arguments of his Power, or to be informed of his prowess and puissance of his Arms, unless it be to give us occasion to praise God who hath bestowed such a Prince upon us, who is gratious to his Subjects and so formidable to his Enemies, that as well Christian Princes as Infidels fear and envy his greatness. And though I have not spent so much time in his Majesty's Court as I have done in the Wars for his Service, yet I would have you to know, that I have been as curious to hear and understand the Affairs of his Majesty, especially the successes of the late Wars, as any person whatsoever that is conversant in his Court, who perhaps are not well acquainted with all the occurrences so particularly and truly as I am; for those who come from thence give me informations of what hath past, and some Friends who live upon the place constantly write to me from the Camp, and give me as good intelligence as they are able; for they knowing me to be a man of truth, and delighted with a real and exact account count of all ſucceſſes, do endeavour to gratifie my curioſity and affection to his Majeſty's intereſt by faithfull and true informations, which my zeal to the Crown ſettles and fixes in my memory, &c.

The remainder of this Letter, for brevity ſake, we omit, as impertinent and little to our purpoſe, for it reflects chiefly on the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and caſts the blame of all the miſchiefs paſt on his miſcarriages; and to juſtifie himſelf he ſays, that all the Cities of that Empire choſe him for their Agent-General; in which capacity he was empowered by Commiſſion from the Judges under the great Seal, to drive out and expell Blaſco Nunnez Vela from the limits of that Kingdom; and that he acted nothing all that time but by their Warrant, and by virtue of their commands.

With this Letter Paniagua was diſpatched by Sea, where we ſhall leave him for a while to diſcourſe of other matters which intervened; onely before we conclude this Chapter, we muſt reflect a little on that paſſage of his Letter wherein he ſays, that of that vaſt tract of Empire which he and his Kindred had acquired to the Crown, not one Acre thereof was appropriated to his Family; he means, by inheritance for ever, as the Lords in Spain hold their Lands, which were granted to them by former Kings in reward of the Services they had done in the Wars againſt the Moors, helping to ſubdue and drive them out of the Land: for though Gonçalo Piçarro and Hernando Piçarro were ſeiſed of much Land, with command over Indians, yet they held them onely for their lives, as did alſo the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro whoſe Eſtate was onely for Life, and never deſcended to his Children.

CHAP. VI.

The death of Alonſo de Toro. Diego Centeno and the other Captains come out of their Caves and places of retirement, and appear for the ſervice of his Majeſty. Gonçalo Piçarro ſets all his Ships on fire, and what was the ſaying of Carvajal thereupon.

FErnandez Paniagua having received his diſpatches and departed, Gonçalo Piçarro began to be troubled that he had received no advices or intelligences from Lorenço de Aldana either in relation to his Voyage, or to the Fleet then at Panama, nor of any other matter concerning Pedro de la Gaſca; ſo that he ſuſpected ſomething amiſs, in regard the time did well admit of a return. Wherefore he diſpatched Letters to Captain Pedro de Puelles his Deputy at Quitu, and to Captain Mercadillo Governour of the City of St. Michael, to Captain Porcel in Paccamurus, and to Captain Diego de Mora at Truxillo, adviſing them to be in a readineſs in caſe he ſhould have occaſion to call upon them for their aſſiſtance, which he believed would be very ſpeedy; but when the Meſſengers came to thoſe places, they found all the People already poſſeſſed with the news of a general Pardon, and of the revocation of the late Ordinances (for the Preſident had taken care to diſperſe Copies in all parts) upon publication of which there was a general defection in all places from Gonçalo Piçarro: the like Meſſage was alſo ſent to Captain Antonio de Robles, then in the City of Cozco, to prepare and keep his People in a readineſs to be employed in any future ſervice which might offer: this Meſſage was ſent to Antonio de Robles, becauſe Piçarro was informed, that Diego Gonçales de Vargas (with whom I had acquaintance) had killed Captain Alonſo de Toro, who was Governour under him in that City: the truth is, the matter was ſudden, and neither contrived by him who killed him, nor ſuſpected by the perſon who was ſlain; for Alonſo de Toro was Son-in-law to Diego Gonçales, and lodged in the ſame Houſe together: Alonſo de Toro was of a proud, cholerick diſpoſition, and very loud in his ſpeech; Diego Gonçales being in the Hall, which was next to his Daughter's Apartment, he heard Alonſo de Toro ſcold and quarrel with his Daughter, who was a very good and vertuous Wife, and in his fury coming out into the Hall, he met with his Father-in-law, and fanſying that he came to take part with his Daughter, he preſently bruſled up to the good old man, who was above ſixty five years of age, and with a loud voice gave him baſe and foul language; but Gonçales de Vargas, rather with intention to defend himſelf than with deſign to hurt his Son-in-law, laid hold on an old Dagger which hung by a ſtring at his ſide, and drew it in his own defence, with which Alonſo de Toro being more provoked, came up ſo cloſe to the old Man that he received a wound from the Dagger, which when De Vargas perceived, and conſidered that there was now no other way, he gave him three or four ſtabbs more in the Belly, and then fled, fearing leſt de Toro ſhould by his ſtrength wreſt the Dagger from him, and kill him with it; but he had ſtrength onely to purſue him about fifty paces to the foot of the Stairs, where he fell down and died. This was the fate of poor Alonſo de Toro, which his own fury and cholerick diſpoſition had brought upon him, his Father-in-law being forced thereunto merely to ſave and defend himſelf.

Diego Gonçales was afterwards tried for the fact, and acquitted, and I knew him ſeveral years after; he had a Son named Diego de Vargas, who went to School with me whilſt we learned to reade and write, and were afterwards in our Latin: we were alſo neighbours, and lived next door but one to them when this unfortunate miſchief happened. After the death of Alonſo de Toro the Corporation of the City made choice of Alonſo de Hinojoſa to be Governour and Captain thereof under Gonçalo Piçarro; but he was ſoon ſuperſeded by Antonio de Robles, who received a Commiſſion for the place from Piçarro: by which though Hinojoſa eſteemed himſelf much diſobliged, yet he diſſembled his pleaſure untill a fair opportunity offered to make known his reſentments, as will appear more plainly hereafter.

The Letters and Advices alſo of the arrival of the Preſident were carried to Arequepa, and to the City of Plate, and flew over all Collao, where many of thoſe people were concealed who had been diſperſed by Franciſco de Carvajal when he purſued Diego Centeno. This news cauſed great fermentation in the minds of the People, and particularly an inhabitant of Arequepa called Diego Alvarez, being then near the Sea-coaſt with nine or ten Companions, made himſelf Captain of them, and taking Colours of a Linen Cloth, they went in ſearch of Diego Centeno, who had by this time quitted his Cave, and gotten together about five men, who unanimouſly choſe Centeno for General of the new Enterpriſe. At firſt they conſulted whether it would be moſt advantageous for them to march to the City of Arequepa or to Cozco, where they knew that Antonio de Robles reſided with three hundred men well fitted and appointed; but as yet they knew not what to reſolve upon, for it ſeemed a hazardous matter to attack a body of men with ſo much diſadvantage of numbers; but afterwards, conſidering that they carried with them the ſpecious colour of the King's Authority, and the powerfull name of Loyalty, they reſolved on the queſtion, and to march directly to Cozco. But let us leave them here on their Journey to relate other actions and ſucceſſes which were carried on and paſſed in divers parts, and at the ſame time in thoſe Countries, which were ſo many and various, that I ſeem to be entred into a Labyrinth, from whence I ſhall endeavour to extricate my ſelf in the beſt manner I am able, hoping for the Reader's pardon and acceptance, in caſe I fall ſhort in the relation where ſuch great variety of affairs hath happened.

We have mentioned before, how that Lorenço de Aldana, Hernan Mexia de Guzman, John Alonſo Palomino, and John de Yllanes were, by order of the Preſident, ſent by Sea to Peru; theſe by the way came to Tumpiz, where Bartolmeo de Villalobos was Governour under Gonçalo Piçarro, who obſerving that their four Ships had remained four days before the Port and had not entred, he ſuſpected that they had changed their Copy, and were revolted to the other Party; upon which ſuppoſition, without other grounds, he diſpatched a Meſſenger to Piçarro with this information. The news was firſt carried to Captain Diego de Mora, who was then in Truxillo, above a hundred leagues diſtance from Tumpiz, who was from thence to forward it with all expedition to Gonçalo Piçarro. Diego de Mora, upon receipt of this Advice, diſpeeded the Meſſenger to Los Reyes, but he himſelf remained doubtfull which ſide to take, whether he ſhould adhere to Piçarro, or revolt from him: but but whilſt he was thus conſidering within himſelf, the news came that the new Ordinances were repealed, and a general Pardon granted by his Majeſty for all Treaſons and Crimes which were paſt: wherefore, remaining no longer in ſuſpenſe, he packed up all his Houſhold-ſtuff, took what Gold and Silver he had, and therewith embarked his Wife and Family on a Ship, and with forty of his Souldiers (of which ſome were Inhabitants of Truxillo) he ſailed to Panama: the news of theſe four Ships being come to Los Reyes, though the particulars thereof were confuſed and obſcure, it being not known who or what they were, yet it ſerved to put the People into a great conſternation, and cauſed every one to prepare for a War. At the ſame time news coming of the revolt of Diego de Mora, his place was immediately ſupplied by a Commiſſion given to Licenciado Leon, and he ſent by Sea to Truxillo: but meeting a few days after with Lorenço de Aldana, and his Aſſociates in his way, he turned to their ſide; the like alſo did Diego de Mora, and all of them returned together to the Port of Truxillo, where Diego de Mora landed with his forty men, to recover them of the ſickneſs into which they were fallen at Sea; but he marched farther into the Countrey, as far as Caſſamarca, publiſhing in all places, how that the late Ordinances were repealed, and a general Pardon given for all Treaſons and Crimes already committed: upon this news all people generally came in and offered themſelves for his Majeſty's Service, amongſt which were John de Saavedra, a Native of Sevil, Gomez de Alvarado, John Porcel, to whom Piçarro had lately wrote, adviſing him to prepare matters in a readineſs for War. In ſhort, all the people of thoſe places and Provinces coming in they formed a Body of about three hundred men, under the command of Diego de Mora, and declared for the Emperour: of which Bartolmeo de Villalobos then quartering at Tumbiz receiving intelligence, he gathered what Forces he could and marched into the inland Countries, intending by way of the Deſart to paſs over to Gonçalo Piçarro: but his men gave a ſtop to his Journey, perſuading him to change his way and his intention, and return to Piura, and keep that Town for the Emperour, as he had done before for Gonçalo Piçarro, to which he aſſented, though much againſt his will. The like happened in Puerto Viejo, which Franciſco de Olmos held for Piçarro; who, upon news of the many revolts, and of people turning to the ſervice of the Emperour, went with ſome perſons, in whom he much confided, unto Huayllqui, which was a place governed by Manuel Eſtacio with Commiſſion from Piçarro; and there, without farther ceremony, taking him by the hand, he ſtabbed him to the heart with his Dagger, and immediately ſet up his Majeſty's Standard. And thus, with the news onely of a general Pardon, and revocation of the late Ordinances, without other perſuaſions or forces, the hearts and inclinations of all the Captains, chief Commanders and People were turned and reduced to the ſervice of his Majeſty.

Of all which Gonçalo Piçarro and his Party were not ignorant; for they received intelligence daily how matters ſucceeded, at which they were much troubled, and with great reaſon; for ſeeing how people daily fell from their Party, they feared that many others would follow the ſame example: whereupon they entred into frequent conſultations, but with ſuch confuſion and diſorder that nothing was concluded; onely it was agreed to burn the five Ships then in Port, together with all the Boats and Veſſels which were there. This Counſel was ſaid to be given by Licenciado Cepeda, and Licençiado Benito de Carvajal, men who were better Lawyers than Souldiers, and better skilled in Books than in the Politicks; for they believed that the Ships and Veſſels then in Port would give people opportunity to eſcape and turn to the Enemy, and for want thereof they would be forced, though againſt their wills, to ſide with their Party.

The burning of the Ships was ordered during the abſence of Carvajal, who was gone for a weeks time about twenty leagues from Los Reyes, to direct ſome important affairs then in hand; but when Carvajal returned, and heard of the burning of thoſe Ships, he grievouſly lamented the iſſue of that fatal Counſel, and amongſt other things he ſaid to Gonçalo Piçarro, Sir, You have ordered five Guardian-Angels, appointed for the defence of the Coaſt of Peru and deſtruction of your Enemies, to be conſumed with fire; had you reſerved but one for me, I ſhould therewith have given you ſuch an account of my actions as ſhould have ſurpaſſed all my former ſervices, and have given the world cauſe to envy my great ſucceſſes: for with ſome Musketiers which I would have put aboard, I would have undertaken to engage all the Fleet of the Enemy; for according to the intelligence we have from Panama, all the people they bring from thence, as alſo thoſe who come into them from the Coaſt, are all weak, and ſickly, and ill armed, and their powder is moiſt and wet, and of little ſtrength; for which reaſon one of your Ships is worth four of theirs. But the two Lawyers, who were no Friends to Carvajal, whiſpered to Gonçalo Piçarro that they much ſuſpected Carvajal, and feared, that the trouble and concernment he ſhewed for burning the Ships, was becauſe he thereby loſt his means to eſcape and fly to the Enemy. But hereafter we ſhall ſee the advice of Carvajal verified by experience, and how much the Lawyers were miſtaken in their meaſures.

CHAP. VII.

The Preſident departs from Panama, and goes to Tumpiz, as alſo Lorenço de Aldana to the Valley de Santa, from whence he ſends Spyes againſt Gonçalo Piçarro; who names Captains, pays all his Souldiers, and frames a Proceſs againſt the Preſident.

Pedro de la Gaſca, Preſident for his Majeſty, having diſpatched Lorenço de Aldana and his Companions upon the four Ships which were bound for Peru, he applied himſelf wholly to raiſe Men and Horſe, and to get what Arms and Proviſions the adjacent Countries did afford him, that therewith he might follow and ſecond the Forces which were gone before him. Amongſt thoſe which came to his aſſiſtence, was a very famous Souldier called, Pedro Bernardo de Quitos, born at Anduxar, who ſome years paſt came into the Indies, and had ſerved his Majeſty in the Iſles of Barlovento, Cartagena and the Continent, in quality onely of an Enſign; in which ſtation he ſtill contented himſelf, becauſe no better preferment did offer at that time, in which capacity he acquitted himſelf well during all the Wars with Gonçalo Piçarro; and afterwards ſerved with title of Captain in the Wars of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, and of Franciſco Hernandez Giron, ſo that he well deſerved to have been rewarded with Lands, and an Indian Plantation, which in the City of Cozco was called Cacha, together with a proviſion to maintain Lances for defence of that Kingdom. Several Gentlemen and Noble Souldiers, and the beſt Nobility of that Maritime Coaſt, put themſelves under the command of this worthy Officer for ſervice of his Majeſty to the number of five hundred perſons; which when the Preſident had ſeen, and accounted his Forces in other parts, he believed that he ſhould have no farther need of any relief or recruits from Mexico, as he formerly deſired; of which he gave notice to the Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça, and the other Governours, with informations of whatſoever had hitherto paſt. Having ſent theſe advices, and left neceſſary inſtructions for ſecuring the Government of Panama and Nombre de Dios, he diſpatched a full relation of all that paſſed untill that time unto his Majeſty, and in what manner he had acted for his ſervice, and then ſet Sail for Peru with all his Fleet; and though when he firſt ſet out he met ſome ſtorms and bad weather within the Bays and Gulfs between Lands, yet they gave him no ſtop in proſecution of his Voyage, in which on his way he happily encountred with Fernandez Paniagua, who brought an anſwer from Gonçalo Piçarro. Their joy was very great at meeting, and increaſed, eſpecially when he underſtood the good will and affection which the people then actually with Piçarro expreſſed towards his Majeſty's ſervice, which they promiſed to manifeſt ſo ſoon as occaſion offered: and ſo much was the Preſident tranſported with the news, that he refuſed to reade Piçarro's Letters leſt he ſhould make ſome Propoſitions which he would not gladly hear; and therefore without reading he burnt them, and continued his Voyage with a favourable gale untill he came to Tumpiz, where we will leave him for a while, to ſee what Lorenço de Aldana was doing, who was gone with his four Ships to the City of Los Reyes, and to relate the great trouble Piçarro conceived at the news of this revolt.

Lorenço

Lorenço de Aldana, proceeding on his Voyage, looſed from Truxillo and ſailed along the Coaſt, and, having ſome ſick people aboard, he came for refreſhment to the River called de Santa, where they took in freſh water, from whence he ſent a certain Friar of the Merceds, called Friar Pedro de Ulloa, to carry to Piçarro the news of his arrival in thoſe parts, and with this occaſion to adviſe all perſons whom he knew to be well affected, to eſcape out of the City of Los Reyes upon any Boats or Veſſels they could get, promiſing that, with the Pinnaces and Skiffs belonging to the Ships, he would gather and take them up, and bring them aboard their Ships. So ſoon as Piçarro heard that this Friar was come, he preſently cauſed him to be brought to him without permiſſion to diſcourſe with any perſon either in publick or private: and upon the news of the revolt of his Fleet, he highly inveighed againſt Lorenço de Aldana, accuſing him of falſity, and betraying his Countrey, and of ingratitude for the friendſhip he had ever ſhewed him; blaming himſelf very much for not having followed the counſel and perſuaſions of his Officers, who long ſince would have had him hanged, and puniſhed for his demerit as juſtice required.

But matters could not be carried ſo ſecretly, but that the revolt of the Fleet under command of Lorenço de Aldana unto the Preſident was publiſhed and talked of over all the Town; ſo that Piçarro being forced to own it, he preſently proclaimed a War, and beat up Drums for liſting Souldiers; Captains alſo were named and appointed, and pay advanced to every private Souldier; and ſome Souldiers of note received a thouſand or two thouſand pieces of Eight upon advance according to their quality and deſerts. A general Rendezvous was appointed, to which place Piçarro marched on foot as General of the Infantry, which (as Carate, in the eleventh Chapter of his ſixth Book, ſays) conſiſted of a thouſand men, all as well armed and clothed as any Companies in Italy in the times of peace; for, beſides their armour, every man had good Shoes and Stockins, and a Silk Doublet; and ſome of Cloth of Gold or Silver, or embroideries upon their Cloaks, with Hats turned up with Gold Buckles; and the Stocks of their Guns plated and emboſſed with Gold. The Captains of Horſe were Licenciado Cepeda, and Licenciado de Carvajal, being great confidents and highly in favour. The Captains which commanded the Harquebuſiers were John de Acoſta, John Velez de Guevara and John de la Torre. The Captains of the Pikes were Hernando Bachicao, Martin de Almendras and Martin de Robles: but the Lieutenant-General of all was Franciſco de Carvajal, who kept his former ſtation, and commanded his own Company of Harquebuſiers which had always followed him. The Standard was carried by Antonio Altamirano, and guarded by eighty Horſe. Some Captains in their Colours made a Cypher with the name of Gonçalo Piçarro, that is with the G. and P. with a Crown over it; another Captain brought that Cypher into the form of a Heart; all their Enſigns and Colours were made new of divers colours, and a new faſhion came up by direction of Carvajal (which I have not obſerved in any other Army) for every Souldier to tye a knot of Ribbon of the colour of the Enſign of that Company to which he belonged within the plume of Feathers which he wore in his Hat, and ſuch as had no Feathers wore them in a bunch on their Hats, by which every man was diſtinguiſhed and known unto what Company he belonged; onely Carvajal thought not fit to make new Colours, but told his Souldiers that the old one was their honour, under which having had great ſucceſſes, they might ſtill hope to be fortunate and add new Victories to their ancient Glories. And now Piçarro ſhewed himſelf open-handed to his Souldiers, giving them large pay, and money upon advance; to ſome Captains he gave forty, to ſome fifty or ſixty thouſand pieces of Eight for their Souldiers, according to their numbers, or as they were Horſe or Foot, which conſequently required more expence. He alſo bought all the Horſes, Mares and Mules he could find, to mount his people, for which he paid with ready money: but for ſome (as a certain Authour ſays) he did not pay, the reaſon for which was this: Several Merchants of the City of Los Reyes liſted themſelves for Souldiers, not to ſhew themſelves Cowards or diſaffected, but after ſome days march, growing weary, they procured a diſcharge by ſurrender of their Horſe and Arms, and thoſe who had neither, gave money by way of compenſation: for Gonçalo Piçarro and his Officers thought not fit to conſtrain any man againſt his will, knowing that preſt men never made good Souldiers.

In this manner was the Army fitted and prepared with Weapons of War; and now to ſtrengthen the good Cauſe with Reaſons and Arguments to pleaſe Piçarro,

Licen-

Licenciado Cepeda carried with him a whole Library of Law-books, out of which, with the help of certain Lawyers who lived in thoſe parts, he drew up an Endictment of High Treaſon againſt the Preſident Gaſca, and againſt Pedro de Hinojoſa and all the other Captains, for having betrayed the Fleet into the hands of the Preſident. And to make the buſineſs more formal, Witneſſes were examined, and the treachery and robbery made by the Captains proved upon Oath, and that Gaſca had accepted of the Ships, and appropriated them to his own uſe, which coſt Piçarro about a hundred thouſand pieces of Eight: upon this Proceſs Sentence of Death was paſſed upon them all to be hanged, drawn and quartered. Cepeda was the firſt who ſigned the Sentence, and deſired Gonçalo Piçarro and all his Officers to ſubſcribe it in like manner; but when Cepeda came to Franciſco Carvajal for his hand, telling him that his firm was of great conſequence, Carvajal ſmiled and made a jeſt of the Sentence. I warrant you, ſaid he, ſo ſoon as this Writing is ſigned by this learned Council in the Law, execution will immediately follow thereupon, and the condemned perſons dye upon the ſpot. No, Sir, ſaid Cepeda, but it is good to have them ſentenced by courſe of Law, that when we take them execution may preſently follow without delay or loſs of time. At which anſwer Carvajal laughed aloud; As I am a Souldier, ſaid he, I thought that ſo ſoon as I had ſigned the Sentence, ſome certain blow of Thunder-bolt would have knocked them all dead on a ſudden; but if it be not ſo, for my part I would not give a farthing for all your Sentence nor Subſcriptions; for had I them but here, without ſuch formalities, I would find a way to execute your Sentence with more expedition; to which he added many other pleaſant Sayings to ſhew the impertinence of ſuch a Sentence.

Licençiado Polo (of whom we have formerly made mention) was preſent at this Aſſembly, where he gave ſome reaſons againſt the Sentence: the firſt was, Becauſe Gaſca was a Prieſt, and in Holy Orders, and therefore no Sentence of Death could be paſſed upon him in that nature, under pein of excommunication: another reaſon was, that this Sentence ought not to be precipitated in ſuch manner, becauſe it might probably be hoped, that ſome of thoſe Captains, who for fear of Hinojoſa had betrayed their Ships to Gaſca, might yet repent of this action, and return again to their duty; whereas on the contrary, they will become deſperate if the door be ſhut, and they excluded from Pardon by a Sentence. Upon theſe reaſons a ſtop was given to the Decree, and the Writing ſigned by none but Cepeda.

CHAP. VIII.

Gonçalo Piçarro ſends John de Acoſta againſt Lorenço de Aldana. Spyes are ſent from both ſides. The death of Pedro de Puelles.

WHilſt matters were thus in conſultation, and the Lawyers buſied in drawing up their ridiculous and impertinent Proceſs, Gonçalo Piçarro received Advice, that the four Ships under the command of Lorenço de Aldana, and the other Captains were making their way towards the City of Los Reyes, that they had already been at Truxillo, and were ſailing along the Coaſt: whereupon he detached fifty Horſemen armed with Carbines, under the command of Captain John de Acoſta, to march to the Sea-ſhore, and hinder them from taking Wood, or Water, or landing in any of the Ports. John de Acoſta proceeded as far as Truxillo, but durſt not ſtay above one day there, for fear of Diego de Mora, who was then in Caſſamarca; wherefore he returned again to the Sea-coaſt, and lay in wait expecting to take ſome of Aldana's men in caſe any of them ſhould adventure to come aſhore. Aldana on the other ſide had Spyes abroad who gave him notice of all the motions of John de Acoſta; upon knowledge of which he laid an ambuſh of a hundred Musketiers in a certain Wood through which Acoſta was to paſs: but he receiving intelligence thereof turned another way, and fell upon a party of thoſe which which Aldana had employed to fill water and cut wood, of which he killed three or four, and took as many Priſoners, beſides fourteen or fifteen of them who of their own accord revolted to his party, and gave notice and caution of the Ambuſh. And though the Forces of Aldana were much more in number, yet they durſt not adventure to reſcue the Priſoners, for they were all Foot, and the Enemy Horſe, and their Powder not half ſo good, nor their Guns ſo well fixed, and the Countrey a deep and dead Sand. Acoſta ſent the perſons which were taken to Piçarro, who received them very kindly, and furniſhed them with Arms, Horſes and Money: they acquainted him with the ill condition of the Fleet, how ill they were provided with men and victuals; and moſt of their people being ſick and diſeaſed were put aſhoar, and ſome were dead and thrown into the Sea; thoſe that remained aboard were ſickly and ill provided, and wanted both Arms and Ammunition; that they had received no late News of the Preſident, nor did they know where he was, nor when he would come, nor did they expect him for this whole year. And though this was great good News to him, yet when he conſidered the weakneſs of the four Ships, then he began to be ſenſible of the evil Counſel which ſome of his Confidents had given him, to burn his own five Ships, and how much Franciſco Carvajal was in the right, when he condemned that counſel, and ſaid, one of theſe five Ships was able to fight with all the other four which Aldana commanded. After this Acoſta ſailed to the Port of Huaura, where Palentino ſaith there is excellent good Salt, and in ſuch abundance as is ſufficient to ſupply all Italy, France and Spain.

Gonçalo Piçarro having received intelligence of what Acoſta had performed at Los Reyes, and what Diego de Mora had done at Truxillo, he reſolved to ſend Licenciado Carvajal with three hundred men under his command to hinder Acoſta from landing his men, or taking water or cutting wood, and likewiſe to keep Diego de Mora in ſome awe, and act other matters as occaſion ſhould ſerve. Licenciado Carvajal having accordingly provided all things neceſſary for his march, the Lieutenant General Carvajal gave a ſtop to his proceedings, condemning the Counſell as not good, for he was perſuaded within himſelf that he would revolt with all his men to the other party: that which hath fixed him, ſaid he, ſo long with us was nothing but a deſire to revenge the murther of his brother the Agent: and now ſince that is over, and the late Ordinances repealed, and a general Pardon given for all Crimes paſt, there is no doubt, but he will paſs over to the King's party, with whom all his Kindred and Relations are engaged, and are men of quality, and eminent in their Offices; nor can he forget, how without any fault, the halter was about his neck, and the ſentence ready to be executed. John de Acoſta was of the ſame mind, and earneſtly perſuaded Piçarro not to ſend him; upon which the deſign was altered, and Acoſta was ſent in his place with the three hundred men formerly ordered for Licenciado Carvajal: but when Acoſta was on his march, he obſerved a kind of backwardneſs in ſome of his Souldiers, and an inclination to revolt unto the other party: the which was verified by the flight of twelve Souldiers, men of note and great reputation. And ſome of his friends aſſured him (whether true or falſe it is not certain) that ſeveral others had the ſame intention, and that the chief Leader of them was Lorenço Mexia de Figueroa, the Conde de Gomera's Son-in-law; on which information, without farther proof or teſtimony he put him to death: This Gentleman was married to Donna Leonor de Bobadilla, the Widow of Nunno Jovar, who was Lieutenant General to Governour Hernando de Soto, in that enterprize which was deſigned for the Conqueſt of Florida, as we have at large related in that Hiſtory: he left one Son and a Daughter called Maria Sarmiento, who was married in Cozco to Alonſo de Loayſa an Inhabitant of that City: the very night that they were married, happened the inſurrection of Franciſco Hernandez Giron, as we ſhall relate, God willing, in its due place. The Son was called Gonçalo Mexia de Figueroa, a very hopefull youth, he went with me to the Grammar School, but he died very young, to the grief of all thoſe who were acquainted with him. But let us leave Acoſta upon his march, and the others upon the coaſt, to relate the diſaſter which befell Pedro de Puelles in Quitu: for he, having received advice that the late Ordinances were repealed, and a general Pardon given for all Crimes and Treaſons already paſt, he reſolved to accept the benefit of that gratious Proclamation, and return to his allegiance and duty towards his Majeſty, and thereby renounce Piçarro and his Cauſe, for whom and for which he had zealouſly engaged himſelf in former times.

To

To compaſs the Plot intended, Pedro de Puelles made a ſolemn invitation to all his Souldiers and Captains; and then amidſt the entertainment, he reſolved to propoſe what was fit in order to his Majeſty's ſervice, and for a motive thereunto he deſigned to make known to them that a general Pardon was granted, and the late Ordinances repealed. Pedro de Puelles had in private communicated this his intention to a certain Souldier of note, called Diego de Urbina, who alſo entruſted the ſecret to one Rodrigo de Salaçar, a fellow as crooked in his conditions as in his body: this Rodrigo, eſteeming the matter eaſie and already well prepared to take effect, reſolved, that Pedro de Puelles ſhould not have the honour to himſelf, but that his Majeſty and the Preſident ſhould own the ſignal ſervice of reducing three hundred men to their allegiance ſolely to his management and valour. This purpoſe of his he made known to four of his friends, whoſe ſurnames were Baſtida, Firado, Hermoſilla and Morillo, which were the names by which they were known: giving them to underſtand what the intent of Pedro de Puelles was, and therefore to wreſt ſo ſignal a ſervice out of his hands, and appropriate it to their own merit, he propoſed to kill Pedro de Puelles: to which they all aſſented and agreed, as they accordingly did, and went next morning, being Sonday, all five together to the houſe of Pedro de Puelles, and ſent him up word, that Captain Salazar was come to make him a viſit, and to attend him to Church to hear Maſs. Pedro de Puelles took the viſit kindly from them, and deſired them to walk up into his chamber, for he was not as yet out of bed. It is reported that four of them entred in, and that Rodrigo de Salazar remained at the door, to ſee firſt how matters ſucceeded, though ſome ſay he did goe in; but I have heard the ſtory related often in the manner before mentioned. Theſe four Villains killed Pedro de Puelles with their Swords and Daggers, and then with Rodrigo de Salazar they ran out into the Market-place and declared for the King, to which all the City inclined and concurred with the greateſt cheerfulneſs in the World.

CHAP. IX.

A Challenge is ſent to Salazar to fight a Duell, on occaſion of the Murther of Pedro de Puelles. Diego de Centeno fights with Pedro Maldonado, and enters into Cozco.

Rodrigo de Salazar and his Complices, having performed this Exploit, went with all expedition to join with the Preſident Gaſca, and happily met him in the Valley of Sauſa: where he received them with all the kindneſs imaginable, and praiſed them highly for their Loyalty and Demonſtrations of Allegiance to his Majeſty, which he took notice of, and ſhould be rewarded in its due ſeaſon: but Diego de Urbina, who was a friend to Pedro de Puelles, conſidered that the Diſcovery he had made of his Friend's ſecret was the cauſe of his unhappy fate, and that Rodrigo de Salazar enjoyed all that honour and applauſe which was juſtly due to his dead Friend: wherefore being ſenſibly touched in conſcience for the fact, he publiſhed in all places the truth of the whole matter, and of the loyal intentions of Pedro de Puelles, as before related. He alſo threw all the infamy he could heap up againſt this Salazar: he declared that he was a falſe, treacherous perſon, that he had betrayed the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and revolted to Piçarro, and had followed and ſided with him in all his actions: that he was acquainted and informed of the loyal intentions of Pedro de Puelles; and that to gain the glory thereof to himſelf, he had perpetrated that bloudy Murther: the like he had done by Almagro the younger, whoſe Servant he was, and yet he betrayed and delivered him up. And with ſuch faithleſs practices as theſe, he had ever lived, and to the ſhame of the world was well eſteemed, as the Proverb ſays, Who is proſperous and overcomes, is always commended. Wherefore upon the whole matter Diego de Urbina publickly declared, that he challenged him to a ſingle duel duell in the field; where he would make him confeſs with his own mouth, and acknowledge that all which he had ſaid was true.

Rodrigo de Salazar, who truſted more to his own ſubtilties and craft, than to his Sword, choſe rather to confeſs all which Diego de Urbina required of him to be true, than to enter the Liſts with a perſon ſo much renowned for his valour and experience in Arms, as was Urbina. And therefore after ſuch confeſſion made, he added, that in regard Pedro de Puelles had elapſed the day appointed for ſuch declaration, as before mentioned, he ſuſpected that he had repented of the deſign, and therefore killed him, knowing that delays of that kind are commonly dangerous: upon which confeſſion approved by the Preſident to be ſatisfactory; Diego de Urbina, and his Companions, who were men of note, and engaged with him in the quarrel, accepted of the confeſſion, and put an end to any farther diſpute thereupon: though ſome were of opinion, that the reaſons were of ſome ſmall moment, and not valid enough to put up ſuch a challenge: but as the Proverb ſays, Dead men and abſent have but few friends.

But to return now to Captain Diego Centeno, whom we left on his march to Cozco, with reſolution to engage Captain Antonio de Robles, who with a good force kept that City for Gonçalo Piçarro: and though it might ſeem a very raſh action to attack three hundred men well diſciplined and armed with fourty eight men onely, and thoſe ill provided with Arms and Ammunition, and lately come out from their Caves and Mountains to which they were driven by Franciſco de Carvajal. Howſoever he was encouraged to proceed upon the advice he received how that Alonſo de Hinojoſa being offended with Gonçalo Piçarro for having advanced Antonio de Robles before him in the command of Cozco, had wrote to the principal Inhabitants of that City, to return to their duty and to his Majeſty's ſervice: to which moſt of them aſſenting wrote Letters to Diego Centeno to proſecute his journey towards them with all diligence, promiſing to join with him, and afford him all the aſſiſtence they could at his arrival. So ſoon as Antonio de Robles received News that the Enemy was near at hand, he conſulted with his Captains in what manner they ſhould oppoſe him: and in the mean time he ordered Franciſco de Aguitre, a perſon in whom he much confided, to ſcout abroad, and ride untill he met with Diego Centeno, as he did about ſix Leagues diſtant from the City, where he informed him of the intention of Antonio de Robles to oppoſe his entrance into the City, and in what manner he deſigned to order and draw up his own men: upon which intelligence Diego Centeno and the Commanders then with him, the chief of which were Pedro Ortiz de Carate, Franciſco Negral, Luys de Ribera, Diego Alvarez, Alonſo Perez de Eſquivel, agreed at a Council of War to make their attempt in the night, which would be more terrible to the Town, and give a better advantage to thoſe who were well affected to paſs over to their ſide.

They alſo uſed this ingenious ſtrategem of War; they took off the Bridles from their Mules and Beaſts of burthen, and tied lighted matches upon the pomels of the Sadles, and ordered the Indians who attended them to lead them to ſuch a place, and then whip them in ſuch a manner, as that they might come running into the Town; the way by which they were to enter was by the Street of the Sun, which, as we have mentioned in the deſcription of the City, leads directly to the Market-place: the Indians followed the Orders which were given them, and in the mean time Diego Centeno and his Souldiers entred by another Street to the Weſt ſide, which comes out at a corner of the Market-place. Antonio de Robles being thus alarmed about the beginning of the night, drew up his three hundred men into a body in the Market-place, and faced towards the Street of the Sun, knowing that there was no other way for them to enter the Town but that, unleſs they took a great compaſs to come about. The Indian ſervants did their parts, and made a great noiſe and out-cry with their Horſes and Mules, as if they had with them a multitude of People, and broke in upon the Squadron of Antonio de Robles, before he or his Souldiers knew againſt whom they were engaged; and when they found them to be Horſes and Mules onely without Riders, they were more aſtoniſhed and troubled than before. At the ſame inſtant Diego Centeno and his men appeared at the corner of the Market-place and charged the Enemy on the right-wing, with loud ſhouts and crys, firing thoſe few Muskets which were amongſt them. At that time there was a certain perſon called Pedro Maldonado, who was lodged in the Houſe of Hernando Piçarro, which is now turned into the Jeſu- its College, he was a perſon of a quiet and mild diſpoſition, he was no Souldier, nor pretended to the War, and was then repeating his Office of our Lady, to whom he was entirely devoted; but he being alarm'd with this noiſe, clapt up his Breviary into his boſom, and laying hold of a ruſty Sword and a Halbert, which came next to hand, he ran into the Market-place, and the firſt perſon he met with happened to be Diego Centeno, and not knowing with whom he engaged, without farther ceremony, he took him over the left hand with a good blow, and with the next he thruſt him into the thigh with the point of his Halbert, which did not paſs through, becauſe there was a croſs bar to that weapon in form of a Flower-de-luce; and endeavouring to diſengage his Halbert, and pull it out, that ſo he might give him another thruſt, the barbes were faſtned to his breeches of Velvet, ſo that pulling at them, Centeno fell to the ground: at which time a Page of his, who is grown up to be a man (whoſe name I have forgot) came in to the aſſiſtence of his Maſter, and ſhot Maldonado with a Carbine, with which he fell ſoon; but riſing again to fight with Centeno, more Company came in, and ſeiſed on Maldonado, and diſarmed him, and then purſued their Victory, which was eaſily gained; for by this time moſt of the Enemy's party had declared for the King, and the reſt had conveyed themſelves away. In all which Engagement nothing happened ſo remarkable as the Combat between Pedro Maldonado and Diego Centeno, with both whom, I was acquainted, nor was there one drop of bloud ſhed, but onely that of Centeno.

CHAP. X.

A ſtrange Accident which happened upon this Combat of Pedro Maldonado. The death of Antonio de Robles. Diego Centeno is choſen Commander in chief. Lucas Martin is reduced to his Majeſty's ſervice. An Agreement is made between Alonſo de Mendoça and Diego Centeno.

Pedro Maldonado was one of the fatteſt and moſt corpulent men that ever I have ſeen: and though the ſhot which was given him knocked him to the ground, yet he received no wound; for the bullet happened to ſtrike on the Breviary which was in his boſom; and ſo by the miraculous Providence of the B. Virgin (to whom he was zealouſly devoted) his life was preſerved. I my ſelf ſaw the Breviary ſome years after; for happening to be on a Saturday at Maſs with Pedro de Maldonado, for on that day in the Church of Merceds, they always ſing Maſs to the Mother of God; I deſired him to let me ſee that Office or Breviary which is now called the Office of Miracle, for I told him, that I was very deſirous and curious to ſay, I had ſeen it: he was pleaſed to comply with my requeſt, and I opened the Book, and found that the Bullet had paſſed the cover, and entered the firſt thirty or fourty pages, and ſome twelve or fifteen leaves farther it had rumpled up together, and had impreſſed the bigneſs and form of the Bullet, as far as to that leaf where the Maſs of our Lady begins; and which in thoſe days they bound up with our Lady's Office and with other Offices of Devotion, as the Bookſellers pleaſed; for then there was not that care taken of Books as hath been ſince that time ordered by the Council of Trent; for then the Breviaries were of that ſize as the Prayers are now for daily Devotions.

That night there was no other encounter than this which happened between Maldonado and Centeno, though ſome Authours make a long relation of men killed and wounded; but certainly it was not true, of which I have as much certainty tainty as a man can have that was not an eye-witneſs; for ſix days after this matter happened, I came to the City with my Uncle John de Vargas and with Captain Rodrigo de Pantoja, and with about nine Spaniards more, who came from a Plantation about thirty Leagues diſtant from Cozco, as did alſo all my family, who fled from Piçarro's party, and came for refuge to that City, with intent to be liſted in his Majeſty's ſervice: but I and my brother followed them, and the next day after I came thither I was brought to kiſs Diego Centeno's hands; and I remember his left-hand was bound up in a piece of black Taffety, and though he was wounded in the Thigh, yet he ſeemed not very lame with it; for, I obſerved, he was ſtanding upon his Legs: he was lodged in the Houſe of Fernando Bachicao, which now belongs to Don Lewis Palomino: All which happened ſome few days after the Feaſt of the moſt Holy Sacrament, in the year 1547. And we have finiſhed the Hiſtory hereof about the ſame month, in the year 1605. and do confirm the truth thereof, which I ſaw with my own eyes.

All the Fight was friendly, and rather in words than actions, for had they been in earneſt, as Hiſtorians ſay, fourty eight men ſo ill armed as theſe were, whoſe chief Arms were onely Daggers faſtned to the end of Staves, would have had a difficult task, to have engaged againſt three hundred men all well armed and diſciplined, as thoſe were under the command of Antonio de Robles.

Captain Antonio de Robles, being thus defeated and abandoned by his Souldiers, fled for Sanctuary into the Convent of Saint Francis, which in thoſe days was on the Eaſt ſide of the City, and not where it now is: from whence Diego Centeno ſent the next day to bring de Robles to him, not with deſign to kill him, for he was a perſon of a gentle temper, and not bloudy, but to perſuade him to ſerve his Majeſty. But Antonio de Robles (as Carate reports of him) was a Youth, and of no great underſtanding, and behaved himſelf as if he had been ſtill Commander in Chief of the City, uttering many inſolent Sayings in favour of Piçarro's Party, and reflecting with ſome diſgracefull terms on the ſervice of his Majeſty: at which Diego Centeno being greatly offended, ſent to take off his Head; and though he was ſufficiently provoked to have hanged him, (as it was generally believed he would) yet being a Gentleman, he was ſentenced to a more honourable death.

Thoſe who were well affected to Piçarro's Party, conveyed themſelves away in the night, and with great expedition travelled to Rimac, where they brought the firſt news to Piçarro of the loſs of Antonio de Robles and his men at Cozco: which though ill news, and deeply reſented by Piçarro, yet he covered and diſſembled his trouble for a time, and gave out his Orders and Commands in ſuch manner as we ſhall declare hereafter: but ſo ſoon as the news of the Victory which Diego Centeno had gained had ſpread it ſelf in the Countries, all thoſe people who were abſconded, and had hid themſelves in parts about forty or fifty leagues round, returned to Cozco in great numbers, amongſt which were divers perſons of quality, and Souldiers of honour and fame, who, joyning with thoſe in Cozco, formed a Body of five hundred men, who with common conſent freely choſe Diego Centeno to be their Commander in Chief; who accordingly gave out Commiſſions both for Horſe and Foot to ſeveral Captains, whoſe names we ſhall mention when we come to relate the Battel of Huarina.

So ſoon as General Centeno had reformed his Forces, he returned to Collao with deſign to fall upon Alonço de Mendoça (who was appointed Governour of the City of Plate by Gonçalo Piçarro) and to reduce him to obedience of his Majeſty either by fair or foul means.

The news of Centeno's ſucceſs at Cozco reached to the City of Arequepa in a very ſhort time, where a certain Captain reſided, called Lucas Martin Vegaſſo an inhabitant of that City, and ſent thither by Gonçalo Piçarro after the Battel of Quitu for Governour of the place. This Captain having not as yet received intelligence of what had paſſed at Cozco, reſolved to bring an hundred and thirty men with him to Piçarro to ſerve him in his Camp; but being on his march ſome few leagues from the City, his own men who went unwillingly upon that ſervice, deſired him to turn to the King's Party, but he ſhewing an averſion thereunto they ſeiſed upon him, and kept him priſoner, that he ſhould not fly from them, nor leave them.

So ſoon as they were returned to Arequepa they received news of all that Diego Centeno had done, and being all Friends and intimately acquainted, they perſuaded Lucas Martin to change his mind and Party, and to ſerve his Majeſty, and to doe that willingly to which he would be compelled by force; and that then they would reſtore him to his command as formerly, and eſteem him for their Captain, and would write word to Diego Centeno that they had all devoted themſelves to his Majeſty's ſervice. At length Lucas Martin complied, but by compulſion and not with a good will, as he afterwards acknowledged.

In Arequepa the Souldiers found thirty or forty thouſand pieces of Eight, which Lucas Martin was ſending to Piçarro, which they took and divided amongſt themſelves, and then marched to Diego Centeno, who gave them a very kind reception, and thanked them for the ſervice and duty they had ſhewn to his Majeſty; and afterwards they all marched in a Body to the Charcas in purſuit of Alonço de Mondoça, who was newly gone out of that Province with three hundred men to joyn with Gonçalo Piçarro.

When both Parties were come near to each other, General Centeno being deſirous not to put matters to the extremity of a Battel, wrote a Letter to him, perſuading him to put up and forget all the ancient grudges and enmities which had happened in the time of Alonſo de Toro and Franciſco de Carvajal, and that he ſhould now eſpouſe his Majeſty's cauſe, and abandon the intereſt of Piçarro, who had renounced all allegiance to his Majeſty, and that he could not longer continue in ſuch a ſtate of Rebellion without incurring the infamous name of a Traitour to his natural King. One of the Prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of Cozco was diſpatched upon this Meſſage; he was a School-maſter, but Pedro Gonçales de Carate had taken him from thence to be an inſtrument of this happy agreement; for indeed he was a man of authority and prudence, and one fit for any employment.

In the mean time, whilſt this School-maſter was thus employed, and treating with Alonſo de Mendoça, endeavouring to reduce him to his duty towards his Majeſty, which he found to be a difficult task, becauſe he thought it diſhonourable to renounce Piçarro: General Centeno received Letters from the Preſident, wherein he informed him, how his Majeſty had given him the Government of that Empire, that the late Ordinances were repealed and made null, and that a general Pardon was granted for all crimes and faults already committed. The which Advice he diſpatched away with all expedition to his Agent the School-maſter, ordering him to make uſe thereof for inducements herewith to perſuade Alonſo de Mendoça, believing that thoſe arguments would be moſt prevalent with him, though he had been much more obſtinate than he was. The matter operated and ſucceeded according to deſire; for ſo ſoon as Mendoça ſaw the Letters and the news he altered his mind, and reſolved to declare for his Majeſty; onely he made this condition, that in caſe he joyned with Diego Centeno, he would command his own Forces and remain chief Captain of them, as he had formerly been: his Souldiers were three hundred in number, all choice men, well armed and well mounted. Diego Centeno aſſented to the condition, not being willing to break off for the inconvenience of two Generals commanding one Army of the ſame Nation; ſo that both Parties met and joyned with all the rejoycing and triumph imaginable. And now (as Carate reports) they finding themſelves a thouſand men ſtrong, reſolved to attack Gonçalo Piçarro, and in their way to ſeiſe upon a certain advantageous Paſs, and to proceed no farther for want of proviſion, but there to expect him. And at this Paſs we will leave them, being near Huarina, where that bloudy Battel was afterwards fought, and return to the Preſident Gaſca, whom we left in his Voyage, ſailing on the ſouth Sea.

CHAP. XI.

The Preſident arrives at Tumpiz; the Orders he iſſued out there. Gonçalo Piçarro ſends John de Acoſta againſt Diego Centeno. Lorenço de Aldana comes near to Los Reyes; and Gonçalo Piçarro adminiſters an Oath of Fidelity to his Souldiers.

THE Preſident having overcome many difficulties in his Voyage, at length arrived ſafe in the Port of Tumpiz with all his Fleet, excepting one Ship, which being a dull ſailor upon a wind, was left behind: the name of the Captain was Pedro Cabrera, who finding it impoſſible to turn to windward with his leewardly Ship, he entred into Port Buena Ventura, and travelled over Land with his ſmall Company, and came to the Preſident at Tumpiz, whom he found there employed in giving out Orders, and making neceſſary proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his Army, which conſiſted now of about five hundred men. At this place he received many Letters from conſiderable perſons, as well Citizens as Captains and Souldiers, to all which he returned civil and obliging anſwers, promiſing them recompence and rewards in the name of his Majeſty. He gave Orders to Pedro de Hinojoſa, whom he had made Captain-General, to march before with the Forces to Caſſamarca, and to joyn with the Party which was there. Paulo de Meneſes was appointed with the Fleet to coaſt all along by the ſhore; and he himſelf with a convenient Guard for the ſecurity of his perſon travelled by way of the Plains, as far as Truxillo, where he received the news of thoſe Captains and Souldiers, who had declared for his Majeſty, and in what places and Countries they remained in expectation of his coming, he diſpatched Meſſengers into all parts, with directions to paſs by way of the Deſart untill they came to the Valley of Caſſamarca, where they were to attend farther Orders. After which he travelled by way of the Plains, and ſent Scouts before to ſee that the way was clear before him.

Whilſt things ſucceeded thus with the Preſident and his Army, Piçarro received news from Cozco of the Victory obtained there by Diego Centeno, of the death of Antonio de Robles, and of the impriſonment of Lucas Martin Vegaſſo, at which he was very much troubled, and ſeeing that fabrick of Empire which he had erected for himſelf, to fall and become daily ruinous, for want of a good foundation, he began to doubt his condition, and fear that he ſhould never attain to that height of Government which he had long fanſied to himſelf. Hereupon in all haſte he ſent to recall Captain John de Acoſta, whom, (as we have ſaid before) he had ſent with ſome Souldiers to Truxillo to ſuppreſs ſome diſturbances which began to appear in thoſe parts. At this time alſo Franciſco de Carvajal cut off the Head of Antonio Altamirano, who carried the Standard in Piçarro's Army, for no other reaſon than that he fanſied, that Altamirano was pleaſed with the news of Centeno's ſucceſs, and that he of late carried himſelf coldly and unconcerned in the ſervice of Piçarro, which was cauſe enough for Carvajal to take away any man's life; the Standard was afterwards conferred on Antonio de Ribera. So ſoon as Acoſta was returned, he ordered him with three hundred men to fall upon Diego Centeno: Martin de Olmos was appointed to command the Horſe, and Diego Gumiel the Foot, with both which perſons I was acquainted: Martin de Almendras commanded the Pikes, Martin de Alarcon carried the Standard, Paez de Sotomayor was Lieutenant-General, and John de Acoſta was Commander in Chief. Theſe Forces were ordered to march to Cozco by way of the Mountains, and in a few days afterwards to deſcend into the Plains, and on all ſides to make War upon Diego Centeno; for above all men living he reſented his carriage towards him, and had moſt cauſe to complain of him, becauſe he had been the firſt and the moſt importunate of any to adviſe and perſuade him to accept and take upon him the Title and Office of Procurator-General of that Kingdom; and afterwards upon a report onely of a general Pardon, and repeal of the late Ordinances (whether true or falſe no man knows) he poorly and meanly deſerted that cauſe which he himſelf had owned and promoted ſo far untill he ſaw him nominated and choſen Governour of Peru; the ſame complaint he made againſt all thoſe who had been inſtruments of his advancement, whom he hoped God would puniſh and avenge his cauſe againſt their falſeneſs and treachery.

Theſe and ſuch like complaints Gonçalo Piçarro often uttered in the preſence of his intimate Friends, though in publick he carried it with good courage, and a chearfull countenance, as he ever did in all his troubles and difficulties; which all Hiſtorians confeſs and report of him when they come to ſpeak of his misfortunes.

To theſe ill ſucceſſes Fortune yet added worſe, for when ſhe begins once to ſhew her diſfavours ſhe contents not her ſelf with a ſingle miſchief. For now it happened in this unlucky conjuncture that Lorenço de Aldana came with his four Ships within fifteen leagues of Los Reyes; and though he was ill provided with Men and Ammunition, and was in want of all Proviſions and things neceſſary, yet he remained ſecurely enough and well ſatisfied upon the news he received that Piçarro had burnt all his Ships which were in that Port: upon which aſſurance he took courage, and with confidence came boldly to the Port of Los Reyes, not with intention to fight with any, but onely to take up ſuch perſons who ſhould eſcape and revolt from Piçarro and his Party. The news of the arrival of theſe four Ships at Huaura, from whence there was no means now left to remove them, was reſented as a common diſgrace and diſhonour to the whole Town: but Gonçalo Piçarro, conſidering how his people fell daily from him, and that there was a general defection in all parts, thought it neceſſary to ſecure them to him by way of Religion; which counſel was given him by the Lawyer Cepeda, who formed an Oath of Fidelity to be adminiſtred to all people; and thereupon the Citizens and Lords who had commands over the Indians, and the principal Inhabitants in all Cities near, and Captains and Souldiers were all ſummoned to take this Oath: upon adminiſtration of which the Lawyer made a ſpeech to the People, telling them how great obligations they had to Piçarro for having ſuſtained thoſe labours and difficulties, and endured Famine and Wars, and paſſed through infinite dangers onely for their ſakes, to ſecure their Lives, Liberties and Eſtates to them, in which they were inveſted, and now peaceably poſſeſſed by the favour of his Brother the Marquis Franciſco Piçarro. And to evidence unto the world the juſtice of his Cauſe, he had diſpatched Meſſengers to his Majeſty with an impartial Narrative of all the tranſactions in theſe Countries, but were intercepted by contrivance of the Preſident, who corrupting the Commanders of his Fleet, deprived him of his own proper Ships, which had coſt him an immenſe Treaſure; and laſtly, had entred within his Dominions, and diſperſed ſeditious Papers in all parts of the Kingdom, to debauch the minds of the People, and ſeduce them from their affections towards him, with intent to raiſe Wars in the Empire: but that Piçarro for his part reſolved to oppoſe them, and he hoped that they would all joyn with him in defence of their Privileges and Eſtates, well knowing, that notwithſtanding the fair pretences of the Preſident, he will, ſo ſoon as he hath gained poſſeſſion of the Countrey, follow the Example of Blaſco Nunnez Vela in execution of the late Ordinances, and ſeverely puniſh all ſuch who ſhall oppoſe him: wherefore to know and diſcover the mind of every man, how he ſtood affected to him, he deſired every perſon freely and clearly to declare himſelf; aſſuring them that he would force no man, but leave them all to their own liberty, either to return to their own Poſſeſſions, or to go to the Preſident, as every one inclined: but as for thoſe who reſolved to ſtay with him, he expected an engagement from them never to deſert or forſake his Cauſe or Intereſt, upon the word of Gentlemen, and under the ſacred aſſurance of an Oath, which ſhould be adminiſtred to them according to the Chriſtian Rites. So ſoon as theſe words were ended, they all cried out, that they were reſolved to dye with Piçarro, and ſuffer a hundred deaths rather than abandon him; in confirmation whereof they took the Oath, and ſigned an Engagement to which a long Roll of hands were underwritten; the Subſcriptions were taken by Licenciado Cepeda, who was the firſt that ſigned the Liſt: but Franciſco de Carvajal, who was a wiſe and a knowing man in the affairs of the world, did often laugh and jeſt at theſe matters in private with his Friends, and would ſay, you ſhall ſee how theſe promiſes will be performed, and what Conſcience will be made of this ſolemn Oath; and uttered likewiſe many other witty Sayings, of which had a Collection been made, perhaps they would have been eſteemed the beſt Apothegms, and the wiſeſt Sentences in the world.

CHAP. XII.

Hoſtages are mutually ſent from one ſide to the other, in which much caution and ſubtilty was practiſed by both Parties. Many principal men of Quality abandon and leave Gonçalo Piçarro.

TWO days after this Oath was adminiſtred, the four Ships under the command of Lorenço de Aldana appeared in the Port of Los Reyes, upon which the City was in a great Conſternation; and Piçarro ordered the Souldiers to put themſelves into Arms, and appear in the Market-place, being then about the number of ſix hundred men; but afterwards cauſed them all to draw up in the field; where, being in publick view, it would be more difficult for any perſon to revolt or forſake his Colours: the Camp was pitched about a League from the City, and about two from the Port; and, to prevent all eſcapes, he kept conſtant Guards and Petrolls of Horſe between the Camp and the Sea, to intercept thoſe who inclined towards the Enemy: but to quiet the minds of the people, and to know and underſtand the pretenſions of Lorenço de Aldana, an Inhabitant of Los Reyes, named John Fernandez, was ſent to remain with Aldana, in nature of a Hoſtage, with intent that he ſhould ſend another in the like quality to make known the deſign of his coming into that Port, and what his pretenſions were. Accordingly Captain Penna was ſent from the Ships, and carried to Gonçalo Piçarro a Copy of the Preſident's commiſſion from his Majeſty, and the general Pardon of all paſt Crimes, with a Revocation of the late Ordinances, which had cauſed all the diſturbances: And in regard his Majeſty was not pleaſed to commit the Government into the hands of Piçarro, Penna had Orders to perſuade him by word of mouth to obey his King, and ſubmit to his Commands. And here Palentino relates what we formerly touched, about ſending Commiſſions; but he is miſtaken in his Diſcourſe, for matters were now much altered, and it was too late to treat of Commiſſions or Delegation of Powers as they were called; for there was nothing now but noiſe and confuſion, and endeavours to eſcape, as will appear by the ſequel of this Hiſtory. Piçarro anſwered ſomething warmly to the Meſſage which Penna had brought him: and bid him tell Lorenço de Aldana and Pedro de Hinojoſa and the reſt who had been ſworn friends to him, that they had falſly betrayed him, and been the occaſion to have him branded with the infamous name of a Traytour, whereas he had never deſerved to be ſo eſteemed; having ſent Ambaſſadours to his Majeſty to render him an account of all the tranſactions of thoſe parts; that his intentions were never to offend the King, but to quiet and compoſe the diſturbances of the Countrey, and order every thing for his Majeſty's better ſervice. He added many other things like a troubled and an angry man complaining of the falſeneſs of friends and ingratitude of men whom he had raiſed and preferred to offices and places of Truſt, in requital of which they had unjuſtly and baſely ſold him; He ordered that Captain Penna ſhould be lodged in the Tent of Antonio de Ribera, without liberty to converſe with any perſon, that ſo the diſpatches and orders he brought might not be divulged amongſt the people; ſome Authours ſay, that the ſame night Piçarro tryed if he could corrupt him with money to ſhow him a way how Aldana's Ship might be betrayed to him, and for that ſervice, he promiſed a reward of a hundred thouſand pieces of Eight, believing, that if he could gain that Ship, the others would of courſe fall into his hands: but Penna made anſwer, that he was not the perſon they took him for; for that all the advantage and intereſt in the world could never prevail with him to be guilty of a Treachery ſo mean and manifeſt as that; and therefore it was an affront to propoſe it to him: the day following Piçarro ordered him to be returned ſafe to the Ships, which was performed according to the faith and pledges which were given: but on the other ſide, the Propoſals made to John Fernandez had better effect; for Lorenço de Aldana having underſtood from Captain Penna, that Piçarro concealed and ſmothered the Letters and Papers which were

ſent him; in the publication whereof the ſucceſs of his negotiation conſiſted; there being no other means whereby the Inhabitants and Souldiers could come to the knowledge of his Majeſty's gratious Pardon for all crimes and faults already committed, and of the Repeal of the late Ordinances, than by theſe Papers and Letters; to diſperſe which he treated with Fernandez, and obtained his promiſe to be inſtrumental therein: to which purpoſe two Copies were drawn both of of the Pardon and of the Repeal of the Ordinances, as alſo of the Letters which were wrote to particular perſons; all which were delivered into the hands of Fernandez, and he ſafely returned aſhoar. So ſoon as he was landed, he went directly to Piçarro, and taking him apart from the company, he told him ſecretly, that Aldana had made him great promiſes, in caſe he would diſperſe amongſt the people thoſe Papers and Letters which contained the pardon and revocation of the late Laws: and to amuſe Aldana with vain hopes, I gave him (ſaid he) my promiſe ſo to doe, and received the Papers, which I here faithfully deliver into your hand: for ſince you have been pleaſed to entruſt me with your perſon, your ſafety, and your eſtate, having had ſo great a confidence in me as to adventure me for a Hoſtage amongſt your Enemies; I reſolve to be faithfull and true to you, and with my other vertues to bequeath that of faithfulneſs and truth to my poſterity: beſides theſe he uttered many other flattering expreſſions wherewith to delude Piçarro and ſettle him in an aſſured confidence of his integrity and reality towards him. Gonçalo Piçarro who was naturally in himſelf of a frank and noble diſpoſition, believed every word that Fernandez had told him; and taking the Papers from him, repoſed an entire confidence in all his actions and dealings: upon which Fernandez gained an opportunity with better ſecurity to publiſh and diſperſe his Papers; thoſe which were for particular friends, in whom he could confide, he delivered with his own hand, and the others he threw in at Windows and put under Doors; ſo that the Contents thereof were ſoon known and divulged over all the Town, which had the effect and iſſue for which they were deſigned, as we ſhall hereafter ſee in the ſequel of theſe matters.

For no ſooner was the ſubſtance of theſe Papers publiſhed, with a particular clauſe, That whoſoever was deſirous to gain the benefit of his Majeſty's gratious Declaration, and eſcape to the Ships, ſhould find Boats ready in the River to receive them and carry them on board, but great Diſturbance aroſe in the minds of the people; for no man knew whom he could truſt, every one growing jealous and ſuſpicious each of other: and indeed there was juſt cauſe for it, becauſe thoſe who had entred into the moſt ſolemn engagements were the firſt who broke them and fled to the Enemy. And though the Camp was pitched at ſome diſtance in the fields, and Orders given out for the Army to march by way of the plains; yet ſeveral principal perſons having obtained licence to goe to the Town, under colour of making proviſion of neceſſaries for their march, returned not again to the Camp, as they had promiſed to Piçarro, but renouncing his cauſe and intereſt, marched away to Truxillo. The moſt conſiderable of theſe perſons were Vaſco de Guevara, Martin de Meneſes, Nicholas de Ribera, Hernan Bravo de Laguna, Diego de Eſcobar, Franciſco de Barlovento, Diego Tinoco, Franciſco de Ampuero, Alonſo Ramires de Soſa, all which had Poſſeſſions of Lands and Eſtates in Los Reyes and Cozco; and beſides them, ſeveral private Souldiers quitted the Service. Of which Piçarro having received intelligence by the Out-guards, he immediately ordered Captain de la Torre with twenty Muſquetiers to goe in purſuit of them and kill them in caſe they refuſed to return. Accordingly Captain de la Torre followed them about eight leagues, and not overtaking them, he turned back, and in his way met with Hernan Bravo, who had for ſome time abſconded himſelf in a Kinſman's houſe in Los Reyes, where fearing to be diſcovered, and conſidering the trouble he ſhould thereby bring upon his friends, he reſolved to adventure abroad and follow the reſt of his Companions, but being unhappily met by Captain de la Torre, he was brought back and delivered to Franciſco de Carvajal, to be hanged for a Runagate.

But it happened that a certain Lady of Quality, named Ynes Bravo, Wife of Nicholas de Ribera, who was one of thoſe lately revolted, was informed that Hernan Bravo, who was her Coſin german, was taken, and would certainly be executed; ſhe with her own mother ſpeedily went to Piçarro's Tent; and though ſhe was conſcious to her ſelf of having perſuaded both her Husband and Kinſman to make their eſcapes; yet being aſſured of the generous and mercifull nature of Piçarro, ſhe confidently caſt herſelf upon her knees at his feet, and with many tears asked the life of her Kinſman: Piçarro, like a Gentleman, preſently lifted her from the ground; and though at firſt he ſeemed averſe and hardly perſuaded to grant him mercy; yet at length ſuffering himſelf to be overcome with the Prayers and Tears of the Lady, and with the Intreaties of thoſe who ſtood by and joined in the Petition, he granted her requeſt; and as a ſignal of the Pardon (according as his cuſtom was in the like caſes) his took off his Cap with the Medal on it, and delivered it to her to be ſhown to Carvajal; the which was brought to him juſt at the moment of time when Hernando Bravo was at the foot of the Tree with the halter about his Neck and ready to be truſſed up: the which ſignal from Gonçalo Piçarro ſerved for a ſufficient Warrant to Franciſco de Carvajal, who was alſo mollified by the Intreaties of thoſe then preſent, who eſteemed themſelves concerned to promote and favour the Lady's Petition. And thus Hernan Bravo de Laguna eſcaped death, whom I knew a long time, and left him living in Cozco, poſſeſs'd of a ſmall Plantation.

Auguſtine de Carate in the ſeventh Book of his Hiſtory Chapter the ſixteenth having related this Paſſage, farther adds a particular which happened upon this Pardon very remarkable, which was this; A certain Captain called Alonſo de Carceres, being then preſent when Gonçalo Piçarro pardoned Hernan Bravo, kiſſed him upon the Cheek, and cryed out with a loud voice, Oh Prince of the World, curſed be he who for fear of death ſhall deny thee: notwithſtanding which, before three hours were ended, both he and Hernan Bravo, and ſeveral others revolted, which was the more ſtrange, in regard that an honeſt and a conſidering perſon might believe that a man who had the halter about his Neck could not in ſo ſhort a time have recovered from the agonies and ecſtaſies of death, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

WHEN ſo many noble and principal Perſons had deſerted Gonçalo Piçarro who had been the chief Inſtruments to incite him to appear in defence of their Lives and Eſtates, a great murmuring and trouble was raiſed in the Camp: for as Carate relates, many perſons were amongſt them, who had from the beginning followed Piçarro, and given him ſuch aſſurance of their faith and fidelity, that no man could reaſonably imagin that they could abandon or betray him: at which Piçarro was ſo enraged and put into that ill humour, that no man durſt to appear in his preſence; and in his paſſion gave Orders to the Out-guards to kill any man whom they found without the Precincts of the Camp: ſoon after which a poor Souldier happened to fall into their hands, upon no other evidence, or preſumption rather, than becauſe he carried two Shirts with him. But nothing could be more infamous and diſhonourable than what happened the night following, when Martin de Robles, pretending to be ſick, that he might have leave to return to the City, ſent ſecret intelligence to Diego Maldonado, who was a rich man, and a Citizen, and the High-conſtable of Cozco, that Gonçalo Piçarro, by advice of his Captains intended to kill him; and therefore out of the ſenſe of friendſhip which was between them, he could not give him better Counſel than exhort him to take care of his own ſafety. Diego Maldonado gave entire credence thereunto, becauſe he remembred that he was once under an ill opinion with Piçarro, when he ſerved the Vice-king againſt him, as hath been formerly mentioned. After which they put him to the torture, upon certain Libells which were ſcattered in Picarro's Tent, at the time when the Battel at Quitu was ready to begin; of all which though he was afterwards found innocent, yet the actions of his friend Antonio Altamirano ſerved afterwards to render him the more ſuſpected.

Theſe imaginations and the apprehenſions of a tormenting death, which was practiſed in thoſe days, ſo operated on the mind of Diego Maldonado, that believing every word that Martin de Robles had told him, he, without making a diſcovery to any of his Servants, or giving order to ſaddle his Horſes, of which he had many good ones in his Stables, went out of his Tent with Sword and Cloak onely; and though he was a man of sixty eight years of age, yet he walked all that night, until he came to certain Cains or Osiers about three leagues distant from the Sea, where the Ships were at Anchor, and there he secretly absconded himself for that time: but then fearing that the day following he should be pursued and taken by them, or at least perish there with thirst and famine; he came from thence, and happily met with an Indian, to whom he revealed the great necessity and danger he was in. The poor Indian compassionating his condition (that Nation being generally of a mercifull nature) conducted him to the Sea, where on the shoar he presently woave a float of Rushes in the manner we have before described, and with which the Indians pass over the Rivers; and thereupon both of them mounting, the Indian brought him safe to the Ships, though not without great danger of being drowned, especially Diego Maldonado, for when they came to the Ships, the Rushes began to be all untied, and for want of good tackle and workmanship the Vessel had like to have miscarried. And thus the good man Diego Maldonado escaped, who was one of the first Conquerours, and whom I left living in Cozco, when I departed from thence; next day very early in the morning Martin de Robles went to the Tent of Diego Maldonado, to see what operation his advices had worked in him: and understanding that he was gone from thence the night before, he went immediately to Piçarro, and feigning much concernment for his services, he told him, Sir, Maldonado is fled; and since it is visible how your forces diminish daily, my opinion is, that you should raise your Camp from hence, and march towards Arequepa; and farther, to prevent Fugitives in their intentions, I would advise you upon no pretence whatsoever to permit any person to return to the City. And as to my own Company, I am secure enough of them, for there is not one of them who demands leave to goe to the City, but give good example unto others; onely with your permission, I would goe to the City with some few of my Souldiers in whom I repose the greatest confidence, and whom I know to stand in want of several necessaries, with which having provided themselves in my presence, I shall then return with them: and with the same occasion I will make search for Diego Maldonado, who, as I hear, is fled to the Monastery of St. Domingo, from whence I will endeavour to bring him to you, by whose exemplary punishment men may for the future be afraid to fly, and abandon your cause and interest. Piçarro reposing great confidence in the faithfulness of Martin de Robles, who was deeply engaged with him in all matters; for it was he who had taken the Vice-king and prosecuted him to death, and performed other pieces of notorious service; he gave him his permission with all readiness to goe to the City: hereupon Martin de Robles in the first place made bold with the Horses belonging to Maldonado, as the confiscated goods of a Traytor, and calling those to him of his Company, for whom he had most kindness and in whom he most confided, who were about thirty in all, he immediately went to the City of Los Reyes, and thence took the direct road to Truxillo, publickly declaring, that they were going to the President, and had renounced Piçarro, who was a Tyrant.

When this News came to the Camp no man would hardly believe it; thinking it impossible for Martin de Robles, who was a person so deeply concerned with Piçarro in all matters, to forsake him at the last. But when the truth was confirmed, it was the common opinion, that that very day the Camp would break up, and every man shift for himself, or that they would kill Piçarro, and make an end of the dispute at one blow: but such was the gentleness and generosity of Piçarro's disposition, that it entred into no man's thoughts to perpetrate so execrable a villany upon his person, all their designs being onely to leave and revolt from him.

Howsoever Piçarro put a good countenance upon all his misfortunes, pretending to esteem lightly of those who had denyed him, and saying, that if he had onely ten good friends, who would stick by him, he should not despair of making a new Conquest of all Peru, as Palentino says in the sixty fourth Chapter of his Book.

CHAP. XIV.

Licenciado Carvajal, Graviel de Rojas, and ſeveral other Citizens and Souldiers of note fly from Piçarro.

BUT theſe frequent revolts did not end with the flight of Martin de Robles, but rather a general defection was feared; for the night following Lope Martin Prereyra of the Portugal Nation made his eſcape: he was one of the firſt Conquerours, and one with whom I was well acquainted: whereupon Gonçalo Piçarro, to prevent other eſcapes, at leaſt on that ſide of the City, he ordered Licenciado Carvajal with a party of Horſe to guard that part, and not to ſuffer any perſon to paſs that way. One would have thought that this Carvajal had given ſufficient aſſurances and pledges of his Fidelity, that his faithfulneſs to the Cauſe ought not to be ſuſpected; and yet for all this he fled away and revolted, and by his example opened a door for every man to eſcape away and be gone; for he was followed by all his Troop of Horſe, as alſo by Pedro Suarez de Eſcobedo, Franciſco de Eſcobedo and Jeronimo Eſcobedo, who were his Kinſmen, and all took the great Road to Truxillo; theſe alſo were accompanied with Licenciado Polo, Marcos de Retamoço an Enſign of good eſteem, Franciſco de Miranda and Hernando de Vargas, with many Souldiers of chief renown. The flight of theſe perſons could not be ſo concealed but that it was quickly made known to the next Quarter, from whence Graviel de Rojas followed the ſame example, who was the perſon on whom Piçarro had not long before conferred the honour of carrying the Standard, which he had taken from Don Antonio de Ribera, whom he had left in Los Reyes to govern the City, becauſe he was a perſon of great abilities, and related to him by kindred, and engaged with him as deeply as any in all his deſigns. Graviel de Rojas was followed by many others, amongſt whom were his two Kinſmen Graviel Vermudez and Gomez de Rojas, both Perſons of Quality: the flight of theſe Officers was not preſently known abroad, becauſe the Quarters of Licenciado Carvajal were in the Out-guards, which Gonçalo Piçarro and his Souldiers eſteemed to be well ſecured by them, and repoſed all confidence imaginable in their fidelity: but ſo ſoon as it was divulged, it cauſed great noiſe and rumour in the Camp; and Piçarro himſelf was particularly concerned for Licenciado Carvajal, and was grieved that he of all the men in the world ſhould forſake him: and conſidering what could be the cauſe of his diſcontent or diſguſt, he was ſorry that he had not married him to Donna Franciſca Piçarro his Coſin-german, ſuppoſing that if he had ſo done, he had obliged him by perpetual bonds of alliance; and again he fanſied that he muſt have been diſobliged, becauſe having nominated him to have commanded ſome Forces, he had afterwards put John de Acoſta over his head: of all which he complained to Franciſco Carvajal, his Lieutenant General, blaming him for giving him the ill counſel which had diſobliged his Kinſman: to which Carvajal made anſwer, that ſince the Licenciado had been ſo bold and daring as to forſake and abandon his cauſe even in his preſence, and was ſo reſolved upon it as to adventure his life in the Act; it was better to be rid of him than to entertain him in his ſervice, ſince he might have carried three hundred men away with him, in caſe he had employed him in the place of Acoſta. In the like manner (ſaid he) ſuch men as theſe turned to your ſide and party, at a time when their occaſions required your aſſiſtence to help them to their Eſtates, and to conſerve their Lives and Honours; and at that time they denyed and renounced the Emperour, they perſecuted his Vice-king to the death: and now the tide being turned, they deny, and ſell you, and entirely abandon you: and, why? for no other cauſe certainly, than that they think they have no farther need of you; their Eſtates and Lives being now ſecured to them: ſuch men as theſe, both here and in all other parts of the World, adore no other God than the Idol of their own intereſt: and having paid you like men of that ſtamp, their deſerts will be recompenſed to them in their own coin.

This was the ſaying of the Lieutenant General, and he proved a true Prophet in it; for I ſaw many of theſe things verified in my time; for none of theſe people, at leaſt very few of them, died in their beds, but were afterwards killed in thoſe inſurrections which ſucceeded theſe troubles. The whole party of Piçarro began now to deſpair and to faint in their courages by this defection of Carvajal and ſo many perſons of note: for ſince ſuch a Gentleman as he was ſo deeply engaged in this cauſe, having cut off the head of the Vice-king, and who had given other evidences of his zeal for it, had revolted and fled, what could be judged of the affections of others who had neither the guilt nor thoſe engagements upon them? for the day following, when the Army was on their march, as many as could privately convey themſelves away made their eſcape; and at length the defection became general, and Souldiers openly and in the ſight of Piçarro and his Camp turned their Colours and marched away: amongſt which, two Horſemen of good reputation, named Pedro Villadan and John Lopez, declared openly for his Majeſty, and that Gonçalo Piçarro might be confounded, who was a Traytor and a Tyrant: theſe were quickly followed by two others, called Franciſco Guillada and John Paez de Soriano: Piçarro intended to have ſent after them, but he had none whom he could truſt or be aſſured that they would not have born them company in their deſign of revolt: Wherefore he haſtned his march as faſt as he could to Arequepa by way of the Plains, and yet many of his Infantry forſook him, leaving their Muſquets behind them; with which they ſuppoſed the Picarriſts would be contented and not purſue them. In fine, as Auguſtine Carate ſaith in the ſixth Book, Chapter the ſeventeenth, ſo many had left him that his whole number was reduced to two hundred men, as appeared at the Muſter taken in the Province of Nanaſca, which is not above ſixty leagues from Los Reyes. Franciſco de Carvajal, who was an experienced Captain, got all the Arms of the Fugitives together, intending to arm other Souldiers with them, in caſe any would come in to their Party.

CHAP. XV.

The City of Los Reyes declare for his Majeſty, and ſet up his Standard: Lorenço de Aldana comes aſhoar: A great Confuſion and Diſturbance in Los Reyes.

NOR did the ill fortune of Piçarro ſtop here with the general revolt of his Army, which was now reduced from a thouſand unto two hundred men: but all things turning contrary; thoſe forces which he left in the City of Los Reyes for the guard and defence of it, and in whom he confided as his beſt and moſt faithfull friends, who were obliged to him on the ſcore of alliance and many other arguments, did now renounce him and declared for the King: for Piçarro had not gone above two days march on his way to Arequepa, and not above fifteen leagues diſtant from the City, when Don Antonio de Ribera, whom Piçarro had made Governour of the City, joining with the Juſtices Martin Piçarro and Antonio de Leon and other Inhabitants, who upon pretence of ſickneſs or infirmities of old age, had obtained licence from Gonçalo Piçarro to remain behind, (to whom they reſigned up their Arms and Horſes) ſpread the Standard of the City, and let fly the Colours in the open Market-place, and gathering what people they could declared for his Majeſty, publiſhing by out-cry the general Pardon, and the revocation of the late Ordinances as delivered by the Preſident.

Palentino relating this paſſage, ſays, that it was done by order of Gonçalo Piçarro, and that he had left inſtructions with his Governour ſo to doe; that thoſe who had forſaken his Party might not gain the honour they pretended unto and expected by their revolt: and yet Palentino contradicts himſelf again in it, and ſays, that it was not to be believed, and that it was onely a report of ſome diſaffected perſons; though in truth Piçarro did leave ſuch inſtructions with Don Antonio de Ribera; for his ſake onely, that he might ſave himſelf, and gain favour with the Preſident Gaſca: for Piçarro was well aſſured, that ſo ſoon as he was out of ſight he ſhould be out of mind, and that after his departure the City would throw off all reſpect reſpect and fidelity to him, and follow the example of his Captains and Governours in other places: and therefore that Antonio de Ribera, whom he entirely loved both on the ſcore of alliance and of paſt ſervices which he had done to the Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro his brother, he gave him ſecretly his conſent to make a ſurrender of the City; that thereby he might conſerve himſelf and his Niece Donna Franciſca Piçarro, Daughter of the Marquis, who remained under his Guardianſhip.

The News of this Change in the City was ſoon carried to Lorenço de Aldana, who was ſurprized with extraordinary joy to hear it, for he did not expect ſo ſudden an alteration; and was riding at anchor at a good diſtance from the ſhoar, looking out with his Boats to take up ſuch as made their eſcapes from the City, to ſecure which he ordered Captain John Alonſo Palomino with fifty Souldiers to row along the ſhoar; ſuſpecting that Gonçalo Piçarro would return again to the City to prevent Plots which might be there contriving againſt him: and to have the better and more ſpeedy intelligence of the proceedings of Piçarro, he ordered twelve of thoſe perſons who had revolted to him, and who hereby had given undenyable proofs of their fidelity; to be mounted on Horſe-back, to ſcout abroad and travers all the ways and roads near the City. He alſo gave Orders to Captain John Yllanes, who was Commander of a ſmall Frigate, to coaſt along the ſhoar of the South-ſea; and at ſome convenient place to land a Friar and a Souldier; who were to carry Letters and Diſpatches from the Preſident directed to Captain Diego Centeno, and ſeveral Letters to particular perſons then in company with Diego Centeno, and others to perſons of great reputation and eſteem then engaged with John de Acoſta, the Contents of which were chiefly to inform them of the State and Succeſſes of the Empire; the which were diſperſed abroad over all the Countrey by the Indians, and by their means came to the hands of thoſe to whom they were directed, which produced many ill effects, to the prejudice and deſtruction of Acoſta, as will appear in the ſequel.

We ſhall now touch upon ſome matters particularly relating to Lorenço Aldana, who was a perſon with whom I was acquainted. For both Sea and Land being diſturbed and moved with inteſtine troubles, Aldana acted, and ſent all his diſpatches and orders from aboard his Ship, being unwilling to truſt himſelf aſhoar; for fear leſt ſome treacherous perſon ſhould deſign to kill him, and fly to Gonçalo Piçarro; for (as Hiſtorians report) there were people who revolted to Piçarro, as well as from him to the King; with which apprehenſions and jealouſies he remained aboard untill he received certain intelligence that Gonçalo Piçarro was removed eighty leagues from the City of Los Reyes, and indeed by that time this News came, he was removed at the diſtance of a hundred and ten leagues from thence. And then, adventuring aſhoar with all his Captains and Souldiers, he was received into the City with great joy, being met by all the Inhabitants, which though few, yet the very Children came in to make up the number. The charge of the Ships was committed to the care of John Fernandez the Sheriff of the Town, with the uſual formalities required in ſuch caſes: And now Aldana being with his men lodged within the City, he endeavored to get all the Arms and Ammunition into his hands; but whilſt he was buſie and intent on theſe matters, a flying report came, that Gonçalo Piçarro was returning again towards the City; and that he was not above four leagues off, and though there could be no ground to imagine ſuch a rumour to be true or poſſible; yet ſuch was the conſternation, that no man had power to conſider the probability of the report; but every one out of the abundance of his fear ſhifted for himſelf. Thoſe who were unprovided of Horſes fled to the Seaſide to ſecure themſelves within the Ships; thoſe who had Horſes travelled away, and took the common way to Truxillo; others who were not poſſeſſed with ſo violent a fear, concealed themſelves within the Oſier-gardens and other ſecret places; and in this manner they lay perdue or hidden for a whole night and a day, untill ſuch time as certain intelligence came that the report was falſe. And then they all returned again to the City unleſs ſuch who had travelled away at a farther diſtance.

Auguſtine Carate writes, that Lorenço de Aldana came aſhoar upon the ninth of September, 1547. where we will leave him for awhile, to ſpeak of John de Acoſta, who was now on his march towards Cozco by way of the mountains conſiſting of three hundred Souldiers under the command of a Major General, a Standard-bearer, and other Officers, as if it had been a great Army.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVI.

The Captains and Souldiers fly from John de Acoſta. Gonçalo Piçarro comes to Huarina, from whence he ſends a Meſſage to Diego Centeno; with his Anſwer thereunto.

WHEN John de Acoſta came near to Cozco, they received intelligence of the unfortunate ſucceſs of Gonçalo Piçarro, and of the general revolt of his People from him; to conceal and ſmother which all endeavours were uſed but all in vain, for many of the Letters which were diſperſed abroad fell into the hands of Officers and Souldiers, which made a full diſcovery of all matters; and though none durſt to confide in each other ſo far as to diſcourſe and communicate the news; yet by ſome accident or other the Advices became the publick talk: and then the Major-General Paez de Sotomayor and Captain Martin de Olmos (with whom I was acquainted) reſolved to kill John de Acoſta, which deſign was ſo ſecretly carried, that one did not know the intention of the other, but onely by certain conjectures and circumſtances; and in like manner at a diſtance treated with ſome Souldiers in whom they thought they could beſt confide: but the Plot was not contrived ſo ſecretly but that it came to the ears of Acoſta, who became thereby more watchfull, and doubled the Guards about his Perſon with thoſe of whoſe faithfulneſs he was beſt aſſured.

The two General Officers growing jealous hereupon, and knowing that John de Acoſta was one day retired within his Tent, and in ſecret conference with Captain Martin de Almendras, and another intimate Friend of his, called Diego Gumiel, and fearing that they were plotting to kill them, they reſolved to revolt, ſince they were diſappointed in their deſign of killing Acoſta: and accordingly paſſing their word in ſecret one to the other, without farther delay they mounted on Horſeback with thirty men following them with their Arms, and in ſight of the Camp marched boldly away towards Los Reyes. The principal perſons hereof were Paez de Sotomayor, Martin de Olmos, Martin de Alarçon chief Standard-bearer, Garci Gutierez de Eſcobar, Alonſo Rengel, Hernando de Alvarado, Martin Monge, Antonio de Avila and Gaſpar de Toledo. John de Acoſta made purſuit after them, and overtook three or four of them and put them to death; but finding it in vain to proſecute them farther, he deſiſted and followed his way towards Cozco, where he took away the white Staves from the Sheriffs of the Town, who were appointed by Diego Centeno, and placed others in their ſtead.

And here he found Orders from Gonçalo Piçarro to come with all haſte poſſible to Arequepa, and to joyn his Forces with him there. Accordingly John de Acoſta marched out of Cozco, but before he was twelve leagues advanced on his way, Martin Almendras (who was the perſon in whom he moſt confided) fled from him carrying thirty of his beſt men with him, and returning again to Cozco he took the white Staves away from the Sheriffs, whom John de Acoſta had conſtituted, as if the ſucceſs of great matters had depended thereupon; and ſo he went to Los Reyes, to the great admiration of Acoſta, who wondered much that a man ſo much eſteemed and obliged by Gonçalo Piçarro, ſhould deſert him who had treated him like a Son, out of reſpect to the memory of his Uncle Franciſco de Almendras, who was killed by Diego Centeno.

John de Acoſta durſt not adventure to purſue Martin de Almendras, leſt all his Souldiers ſhould follow the like example, and therefore he took the direct way to Arequepa by long marches, but ſtill his numbers decreaſed by two and three in a company, ſo that by the time he came to Arequepa to joyn with Gonçalo Piçarro he brought not above a hundred men with him, as is confirmed by Palentino Chapter ſixty eight of the ſecond Book, and by Carate, the ſixth Book, Chapter eighteen. And now having loſt their Honours by being outlawed and proclaimed Traitours, and their Eſtates, which remained in the power of the Enemy, there was nothing more to ſave but their lives onely, and how that ſtake might be conſerved was their onely conſultation.

In

In fine, Piçarro and his Captains resolved to take their march by the way where Diego Centeno was quartered, because it was the passage to the high Mountains of Antis, which are to the eastern parts of Peru; in which quarters they designed to gain some Province to make their aboad, in case they might there be suffered to remain in quietness; and if not, they intended then to proceed to the Kingdom of Chili, to assist in the Conquest of that warlike people, supposing that, being then without the limits of Peru, they might more easily obtain the benefit of the general Pardon by such new services. And in case that Diego Centeno should interrupt them in their passage, they then resolved to break through him, and either overcome or dye, though they knew that he had much the advantage in his numbers. And departing from Arequepa with this design, they came at length by the usual marches near to Huarina, where the way leads to those Mountains.

Diego Centeno, having constant Advices of the motion of Piçarro, left his own quarters well fortified, and burnt the Bridge which is made over the Channel, whereby the Lake of Titicaca empties it self, that he might give a stop to the Enemy's passage; and, trusting much to the courage and resolution of his Souldiers, he resolved to engage him (if possible) in a Battel.

But Gonçalo Piçarro, endeavouring on the contrary to avoid fighting, sent a Messenger to Centeno with a Letter, putting him in mind of the ancient friendship and confederacy between them, when they conquered Collao and the Charcas, and the many kindnesses and good offices he had done him, both at that time and since; and particularly that he had given him his life when he killed Jasper Rodriguez and Philip Gutierez for the very same Plot in which he was concerned; for though he was in the List with the other Conspiratours, and was well assured that he was one of the principal of them, yet he granted him his Pardon against the opinion and sense of all his Friends. He farther desired him to recall to mind that he, that is Centeno, had been one of the first and chief of those who promoted him to the Office of Procuratour-General of that Kingdom, that he had followed him under that Character to the City of Los Reyes, and had continued with him untill he saw him advanced to the Government of Peru: wherefore, forgetting all that was past, he desired him to enter into a Treaty with him relating to matters which might tend to the common benefit of themselves and of all the Countrey, and that he would accord with him in any reasonable Propositions, as if he were his own Brother. This Letter was sent by a Souldier called Francisco Vosso, the Husband of Joanna of Leyton, of whom we have formerly made mention; who for his relation to Francisco de Carvajal was employed, as a person of great trust and faithfulness. Augustine Carate, in the second Chapter of his seventh Book, saith, that this Souldier delivered the Letter to Diego Centeno, and offered to serve him, and at the same time advised him that Diego Alvarez, Ensign of his own Company, kept a correspondence with Piçarro; but Centeno thought not fit to examine the matter, or punish the Ensign, because he had discovered to him all the particulars, and assured him, that the correspondence was carried on with design of service unto him. Diego Centeno returned an Answer hereunto with great civility, giving him to understand that he did gratefully acknowledge the many good offices which he had received from him; in return whereof he did heartily advise and intreat him, to take into serious consideration the true circumstances of the present Affairs, and the gratious Declaration of his Majesty to pardon all past offences: And in case therefore that he would come in and return to the Service of his Majesty, he would promise to be his Advocate to intercede with the President in his behalf, and that he might be confident to obtain all the advantageous and honourable conditions he could desire, without hazard of his Life or Estate. And he did farther assure him, that he would be his Friend and his Associate in all matters whatsoever but those wherein his allegiance and duty towards his Prince were concerned. These and the like complements he returned in answer to his Letter. Thus far Augustine Carate.

CHAP. XVII.

Diego Centeno writes to the Preſident, giving him an account of theſe matters by the ſame Meſſenger which Piçarro had ſent to him. The Preſident comes to Sauſa where he meets Franciſco Voſſo.

Centeno being well aſſured of the good will and affection which Voſſo bore to his Majeſty's Service, by that free manner with which he offered it, and by the diſcovery he made of the correſpondence which the Enſign held with Piçarro; he thought fit to ſend the very ſame Meſſenger to the Preſident, with Letters giving him a relation at large of all which had paſſed untill that time, and how he had ſo environed Piçarro on all ſides, that he could not eſcape from him. He acquainted him how ſtrong he was, and how weak Piçarro, and that he hoped to overcome him without fighting. He farther acquainted him with the Meſſage brought to him by Franciſco Voſſo, and for better confirmation he ſent him the very Letter. Moreover Centeno acquainted Voſſo with the anſwer he had given to Gonçalo Piçarro, and told him, that he truſted him with that diſpatch to carry it unto the Preſident; and to bear his charges in ſo long a Journey he gave him the value of a thouſand pieces of Eight in Gold; and farther directed him, that after he had been a ſhort time at Piçarro's Camp, and had delivered his Letters, and given a relation of all matters, he ſhould then buy the beſt Mule he could find to carry him with all ſpeed poſſible to the Preſident; and in regard he was well acquainted with the ſtate and condition of both Camps, his directions were to inform the Preſident with the circumſtances of affairs on both ſides, in reſpect to the number of people, and the manner how they were armed. And becauſe his buſineſs was now to act a double part, he gave him a Grant in the name of his Majeſty of certain Lands or Plantations in Arequepa which were vacant, ſigned by his own hand, deſiring the Preſident to confirm the ſame in reward of the Loyalty and Services of Franciſco Voſſo.

Accordingly Voſſo returning again to Piçarro was ordered by him to acquaint Franciſco de Carvajal with all the particulars of what he had ſeen and heard from Centeno, becauſe that Carvajal having been his intimate Friend and Patron, he would no doubt freely open himſelf, and declare whatſoever had paſſed between him and Centeno. Carvajal examined him as to all matters, and Voſſo fully anſwered and ſatisfied him in every thing; namely who were the Captains both of Horſe and Foot, and what was the number of his Souldiers; and confeſſed that he had received the information from Centeno himſelf, who was ſo free with him as to acquaint him with the ſubſtance of the Letter which he had wrote to Gonçalo Piçarro in anſwer of his; confirming the ſame by word of mouth that he would be his Advocate with the Preſident, and intercede with him to pardon them both as to Life and Eſtate, and would doe him all other good offices, provided he would return to his allegiance and the duty he owed unto the King.

Carvajal, having heard and examined all the matter, brought Voſſo to Piçarro to tell the ſtory himſelf, who having repeated all as is before related, and particularly that Centeno offered to be his Advocate and Interceſſour: Piçarro turned away in a rage, and ſaid, that he ſcorned to receive favours from him who had been ſo much obliged to his Brothers and himſelf: and underſtanding that the Letter contained little more than that, he refuſed to reade it; and, like a furious and deſperate man, he ordered the Letter to be publickly burned, to ſhew that he would enter into no Treaty with him: And not to diſcourage his Souldiers, he ordered Voſſo to report, that Centeno had not above ſeven hundred men, though in reality he was above twelve hundred men ſtrong.

Voſſo having thus related all this matter, and delivered his Meſſage; by means of a Friend of his, (to whom he did not communicate the Secret) he bought a good Mule, which coſt eight hundred pieces of Eight, and the next night he mounted thereon, and by break of day had travelled twelve leagues from the Camp

Camp on his way toward the Preſident, paſſing by Arequepa where his Wife and Children were. When Piçarro received the news of the flight of Voſſo, he wondred much at it, and whiſpered it to Carvajal, and told him, that he did not now think it ſtrange that many of thoſe who had great obligations ſhould deſert him, ſince Voſſo, who was his Servant, and tied to him in duty and with all the bonds of humanity, had denied him. Carvajal anſwered, that it was no ſtrange thing to him, for that he looked on Voſſo to be in the number of thoſe faint-hearted men, who, being afraid, reſolved to ſecure themſelves by a Pardon, which was the condition of moſt of thoſe who had followed his Party; and on the contrary, it plainly appeared that ſuch as were courageous and had been the leaſt obliged were ſtill fixed and conſtant to their Party: And that it was one of the miſeries of this world, that no man reſpects or honours another but for his own intereſt, and that ſo ſoon as he finds he hath no farther need of his aſſiſtence and favour, he preſently forgets all former ties of benefits received.

And now the falſity and treachery of Voſſo being clear and apparent, and the agreement between him and Centeno being diſcovered, Piçarro complained of his misfortune in conferring his favours on thoſe who had proved moſt ungrateſull; and, being full of anger and deſpair, he reſolved (ſince there was no place left for Treaty) to venture all upon the ſucceſs of a Battel, and either overcome or dye.

The Preſident, whom we left on his way from Truxillo to Los Reyes, had by this time received news of all matters which Gonçalo Piçarro had acted in that City, and how his people had deſerted and fled from him. And whereas he underſtood from thoſe very perſons who were come in to him that Piçarro was marched along the Coaſt towards Arequepa, he ſent Orders to the Captains who were quartered in Caſſamarca to march with their Troops in good order to the Valley of Sauſa, becauſe he underſtood that that was a good Countrey and a good quarter for plenty of Proviſions, and a convenient ſituation for people to come in, and for receiving ſuch who fled from Piçarro. Having given theſe Orders he marched forwards, and as he travelled intelligence was brought him of the ruinous condition of Gonçalo Piçarro, that of all his Army he had not two hundred men remaining, who alſo expected an opportunity to eſcape; that Acoſta was in no better a condition, for that of the three hundred men with which he marched out of Los Reyes above two hundred had deſerted him with their Captains and Officers; that the City of Los Reyes had declared for the King, and that Lorenço de Aldana was poſſeſſed of the Government, and lay in the Port with his Ships.

The Preſident being much encouraged with this good news, diſpatched freſh advices thereof to his Captain-General Pedro de Hinojoſa, ordering him to march with all poſſible ſpeed to Sauſa; which he accordingly did, and not to loſe time he paſſed by Los Reyes, and took the ſhorteſt cut by way of the Mountains and came to Sauſa, where, meeting with his former Captains, they all rejoyced to ſee and meet each other. And here the Preſident remained ſome days, during which time he ſet up Smiths Forges for making and repairing Arms, and appointed ſeveral Officers: and in ſhort, did all that became an able and a diligent Captain; and to forward him in this work his Officers and Miniſters were as diligent and as active as he, omitting nothing which might tend to the deſtruction of their Enemy, leſt they ſhould fall again into his power whom they had denied.

Theſe good ſucceſſes and proſperous proceedings were increaſed by the happy news which Voſſo brought, declaring the low and mean condition of Piçarro's Army, and the welfare and numerous increaſe of that of Centeno's, of which Voſſo aſſured the Preſident, having ſeen both Armies, and been an eye-witneſs of the ſtate and condition of both. Voſſo delivered his Letters together with the Grant which Centeno had given him of a certain Plantation, which the Preſident readily confirmed; and indeed it was his misfortune that the Gift was of no greater value, for had it been one of the beſt Baronies in Peru, there would have been no ſcruple in the conveyance of it, in reward of the good news he brought; which was ſo conſiderable and ſo well regarded, that Orders were thereupon iſſued to ſeveral Captains to give a ſtop to their farther Leavies of men, ſince that Diego Centeno had force ſufficient without other aſſiſtances to ſubdue and deſtroy Piçarro. And here we will leave them in their conſultations and rejoycings at Arequepa, to recount the cruel Battel of Huarina, which happened in thoſe days.

CHAP. XVIII.

Piçarro reſolves to give them Battel. Acoſta is ſent to alarm the Enemy in the night. Diego Centeno draws out his Men, and Piçarro doth the like.

Gonçalo Piçarro and his Captains being enraged with anger and diſdain, to find, whilſt they were treating of peace and accommodation, that the Enemy had corrupted their Meſſenger, and ſeduced him from the faith and duty he owed to his Lord and Maſter; whereupon, blinded with madneſs and rage they reſolved to purſue their march, and forcibly make their way through the midſt of their Enemies, and either to dye or conquer.

This reſolution was taken at a conſultation held by Piçarro and his Officers on occaſion of the flight of Franciſco Voſſo; and accordingly now to put it in execution, they forbiſhed and prepared their Arms to march towards Huarina; but firſt they gave out a report, that they intended by ſome other way to divert Centeno from giving them any interruption in the Paſs they deſigned; and to make this report the more credible, they ſent a meſſage to Franciſco de Eſpinoſa to provide them with Indians and proviſions on their way by thoſe parts. Howſoever the true deſign of Piçarro was diſcovered to Centeno by means of the Indians, who by order of Don Chriſtoval Paullu Inca (of whom we have formerly made mention) were very diligent and faithfull to acquaint Centeno with all the motions of his Enemies.

By theſe means Centeno being truly informed of the way and courſe which Piçarro intended to take marched forth to ſtop and interrupt him in his paſſage; and thereby came ſo near each to the other that the Scouts met and called to each other, and then returned to carry the advice. So ſoon as Centeno received this intelligence of their near approach, he put his people into a poſture of defence, and drew them out all night into form of Battel, having been formerly well acquainted with the alarms and ſurpriſes which Piçarro had often given him in the night. And yet for his care and vigilance Acoſta made ſuch an attempt upon him in the night with twenty Muſquetiers as put all the Camp into confuſion; and the affrightment was ſo great, that Carate ſaith, in the ſecond Chapter of his ſeventh Book, that many of the Souldiers fled to their Tents, and the people of Valdivia left their Pikes and ſhamefully ran away; and that Acoſta retreated again without the loſs of one man. Thus far Carate. What he farther adds concerning the people of Valdivia is this; There was a certain Captain, ſays he, named Pedro de Valdivia, who, being in Chili, received intelligence of the great ſtirs and troubles which were in Peru, and to be the better informed thereof, and perhaps to intereſt himſelf on one ſide or the other, he came with many followers, and ſailing along the Coaſt of Peru, he received information of the ill condition of Piçarro, and that the Preſident Gaſca was then in Sauſa preparing to march againſt him; whereupon Pedro de Valdivia reſolved to go himſelf in Perſon to the Preſident, and to liſt himſelf with him in his Majeſty's Service, and to travel with the leſs Train he diſmiſt his men and ſent them to joyn with Centeno; and theſe are thoſe Valdivians, who, as Carate ſaith, ſhamefully ran away.

The day following, as is reported, both Parties marched in ſight of each other, with their men drawn up in Battalia. The Forces of Centeno (as Lopez de Gomara reports) were twelve hundred and twelve men ſtrong; Carate ſaith that they were ſomething under a thouſand; Palentino calls them above nine hundred; but for my part, I have received it from very good hands that they were twelve hundred; of which there were two hundred and ſixty Horſe, a hundred and fifty Fire-locks, and about eight hundred Pikes and Lances. All the Infantry he drew up into one Body, flanking the Lances with the Fire-locks, though indeed the Flanks were very thin.

The Captains of Foot were John de Vargas Brother to Garçilaſſo de la Vega, my Lord and Father, Franciſco de Retamoſo, Captain Negrul, Captain Pantoja and Diego Lopez

Lopez de Cuniga; theſe five Captains with their Enſigns marched on the left Wing and in the Van of all about twenty paces diſtant from the reſt of the Squadron.

Theſe were immediately followed by eleven Files of the choiceſt men in the Squadron, in nature of a Forlorne Hope: After theſe came the Enſign-bearers carrying their Colours, and then followed the Lances and Pikemen interlined with the Muſquetiers.

The right Wing of the Infantry was ſupported with three Troops of Horſe, whoſe Captains names were Pedro de los Rios a Native of Cordoua, and of as noble deſcent as any in that City, alſo Antonio de Ulloa born at Carceres, a Gentleman of a very ancient Family, and with them was joined Diego Alvarez born at Almendral, who carried the Royal Standard. Diego Centeno being then ſick was not amongſt the Troops, nòr preſent in the Battel, but was carried up and down in a Chair giving orders and directions. This Squadron, conſiſting of a hundred and ſixty Horſe, was commanded to charge the left Wing of the Enemy: likewiſe Centeno flanked the left Wing of his Foot with ninety ſeven Horſe which belonged to Arequepa, and to the City of Plate, whoſe Captains were Alonſo de Mendoça and Jeronimo de Villegas, and all commanded by the Major-General Luys de Ribera; and the Serjeant-Major of this Army was Luys Garcia de Sant Mames.

On the other ſide the Lieutenant-General Franciſco de Carvajal formed his Squadron with the flower and choiceſt men of the Militia of Peru; and it was pity that ſuch ſtout and excellent Souldiers did not take the right ſide, and employ themſelves in ſervice of the King their Lord and Maſter: this was the cauſe which moved Hiſtorians to write with ſuch defamation of a man ſo experienced in War that he knew to a point how many Lances were requiſite to give check-mate to a Party, and had as much advantage over others in War as an expert Maſter at the Game of Cheſs hath over a young beginner or learner. Accordingly with great art he drew up in Battalia his little Army of four hundred men upon the Plains, of which eighty five were Horſe, ſixty Pikes and Lances and about two hundred and fifty Fire-locks: howſoever many Authours make Piçarro to have been of a greater force, and Centeno of a far leſs; perhaps to abate the glory of Franciſco Carvajal in caſe he conquered Centeno; but theſe Writers underſtood not the Secret, nor found out the true cauſe of the Victory on one ſide, and the defeat of the other, which we ſhall ſpeedily relate.

Carvajal drew up in admirable Order his ſmall Squadron in an open Plain, where were no Buſhes, nor any thing elſe to hinder the ſhot of his Harquebuſiers: the Captains of which were Diego Guillen and John de la Torre; and Carvajal himſelf commanded his own Company compoſed of ſtout Souldiers, and excellent Marksmen. And though John de Acoſta commanded at that time a Troop of Horſe, yet he changed that day with Captain Guevara for his Foot Company, becauſe Guevara was lame and could not fight otherwiſe than on Horſe-back: theſe four were Captains of Foot, and Hernando Bachicao commanded ſixty Lances and Pikes; and both Wings were interlined with Harquebuſiers on one ſide and the other.

Amongſt the Captains of Horſe Gonçalo Piçarro was bravely mounted and armed with a good Coat of Mail, and over it a Coat of green Velvet, which I have ſeen him wear, and over all he had a looſe Garment of crimſon Velvet ſlaſhed; on each hand of him were Licenciado Cepeda, who was Captain of Horſe, and Bachiller Guevara.

Franciſco de Carvajal was Commander in Chief of this whole Squadron of Horſe, and poſted himſelf on the right Wing of the Foot, not exactly joyning to them, but advanced about fifty paces before, that the Muſquetiers might have the more room to play their ſhot; for in them he repoſed his greateſt aſſurance of Victory.

Carvajal was armed like a Commander of Horſe, with Coat of Mail, and Gantlet, and a Head-piece, which they call a Burgonnon, with a cloſe Bever, furniſhed with ſuch croſs Bars as they put upon the Hilts of their Swords; over theſe Arms he wore a Coat of green Cloth, of a ſad and deep colour, and he was mounted on a common Pad, like a poor Souldier, not to be known. And in this manner were his Troops ranged, whilſt he, to put them into good order, rode to the Front and Rere, and was preſent in all parts and places to give his directions and word of command.

Thus were both Armies drawn up, and at a diſtance of about ſix hundred paces faced each other. Thoſe of Centeno's ſide remained ſo confident of Victory, that when they went out of the Camp, they ordered their Indian Servants to provide their Dinner with a double portion ready againſt their return, that they might entertain their Friends, when they had ſubdued them, and taken them priſoners.

But the Indians, who feared that this vanity and confident boaſtings portended ſome ill, anſwered their Maſters, and asked them where they ſhould drive thoſe Herds of Cattel, to ſecure them againſt their Enemies; who though few in number, will yet, ſaid they, be your Maſters; and this they uttered with that earneſtneſs and confidence, that many of the Spaniards grew ſo angry and outrageous to hear them, that they were ready to beat them, and with this paſſion they entred into the places and poſts appointed them in their reſpective Squadrons. One of theſe was Martin de Arbieto, who diſcourſing with a Friend of his upon what the Indians had ſo unluckily preſaged; at the ſame time came one Gonçalo Silveſtre, who reported the ſame as the Indians had prognoſticated: And they had ſcarce advanced a few paces forward before one Julio de Hojeda, who was an Inhabitant of Cozco, and one of the firſt Conquerours of Peru, came roaring, and ſwearing ſaid, that he could ſcarce forbear killing his Indians, for ſaying that we ſhould be defeated this day. How theſe doggs ſhould come to ſay theſe things, I know not, unleſs they being Witches, converſe with the Devil. At the ſame inſtant came another Inhabitant of Cozco, called Carrera, who ſaid the ſame things; and another alſo came to report the ſame News, ſo that it came by ſix or ſeven hands; who ſcorning to give credence to the vain preſages of their Indians, poſted themſelves in that Squadron of Horſe which flanked the Infantry in the left Wing.

CHAP. XIX.

The Battel of Huarina. The Strategem which the Lieutenant General Carvajal uſed. The particular Exploits of Gonçalo Piçarro and of other Cavaliers of renown and good fame.

BOTH Squadrons being drawn up in the Field ſtood facing each other for a long time without moving, and being in this poſture, Gonçalo Piçarro ſent his Chaplain, called Father Herrera, to Diego Centeno, requiring him to permit him a free paſſage to depart, and not force him to make his way by Battel; and in caſe he would not grant his requeſt, he did then proteſt againſt him for all the loſſes, damages and bloud which ſhould enſue thereupon. The Chaplain came with his Crucifix before him, but the Guards ſtopped him, upon ſuſpicion that he came as a Spy to diſcover their numbers and order. The Biſhop of Cozco and Diego Centeno who were together at the ſame time, ſent for the Chaplain, and having heard what he had to ſay, he was ordered to be brought into the Biſhop's Tent.

The Forces of Diego Centeno, having information of the Meſſage which the Prieſt brought, and being confident and aſſured of Victory, were reſolved to gain the honour of being the firſt to make the on-ſet: and accordingly moving towards the Enemy they had ſcarce advanced a hundred paces before they made a ſtand. Franciſco de Carvajal ordered his men to keep their ground, being deſirous to have the Enemy come up to them, and to encourage and provoke them thereunto, he ſent John de Acoſta with thirty Muſquetiers to begin a skirmiſh, and to make a ſeeming retreat, to draw the enemy to follow them. The other ſide drew out an equal number to engage with them; but no hurt was done, for they fired at ſuch a diſtance that the Bullets could not reach home.

Hiſtorians write, and particularly Auguſtine Carate, in the third Chapter of his ſecond book, hath theſe words; Franciſco de Carvajal, ſaith he, ſeeing the Camp of Diego Centeno to make a halt, ordered his own Souldiers to advance ten paces forwards; which when Centeno's Souldiers obſerved, they cryed out, that the Enemy gained honour over them; and thereupon began to march in a full body: at which at which Picarro's men made a full ſtop, and ſtood ſtill in expectation of the Enemy's coming up to them; and by the way as they approached, Carvajal ordered ſome few ſhots to be made at them, to incite them to return whole vollies; which ſucceeded accordingly, for they advanced faſt, and charged with their Pikes, firing as they went at the diſtance of three hundred paces: all this while Carvajal fired not one Muſquet, till the Enemy was come within ſhot, and then they poured whole ſhowers of Bullets on them; which coming from expert Marks-men, above a hundred and fifty men were killed at this firſt charge, and amongſt them two Captains; ſo that the whole Body began to be diſordered; and at a ſecond charge they were put into confuſion, and plainly ran away.

Thus far Carate, who wrote all the particulars at the beginning, middle and end of this Battel: and the like Relation is given by Gomara and Palentino, with little or no difference. I ſhall repeat their Narratives, and add what I have heard reported from both ſides.

It is ſaid, that the reaſon why Carvajal would not advance, but ſtood ſtill to keep his ground untill the Enemy made the firſt on-ſet, was this, The whole body of his Muſquetiers were not above two hundred and fifty men in all; yet they had ſix or ſeven hundred Fire-arms, being ſuch as had been left them by the fugitive Souldiers; theſe Arms ſome few days before the Battel were fitted up, and new fixed and delivered to the hands of the Souldiers, ſo that ſome Souldiers carried three, ſome four Muſquets; and becauſe it was difficult for a Souldier to carry ſuch a heap of Arms on his ſhoulders, it was thought moſt convenient to ſtand ſtill and expect the coming of the Enemy.

This Franciſco Carvajal was certainly as great a Captain as any was in his time; and whatſoever he ſaid or acted was accompanied with much ſharpneſs and dexterity: and therefore we will mention ſome few ſayings of his, which he uttered during the time that theſe matters were tranſacting.

Two days before this Battel, a certain Souldier of his of good fame and eſteem came, and deſired him to give him a little Lead to make ſome Bullets againſt the day of Battel. How, ſaid Carvajal, I cannot believe that a Souldier of your worſhip's quality ſhould be without Bullets when the Enemy is near: Really, Sir, anſwered the Souldier, I have none: Your Worſhip muſt pardon me, replyed Carvajal, and give me leave not to believe you; for it is impoſſible you ſhould be without Bullets. The Souldier finding himſelf thus urged, in truth, Sir, ſaid he, upon the word of a Souldier, I have but three. Oh, Sir, anſwered Carvajal, did not I tell you, that your Worſhip being the man you were taken for, could not be without Bullets; and therefore I deſire you to lend me one of your three, to beſtow upon another; and then kill me to day a Bird with one of the two remaining, and a man with the other on the day of the Fight; and then I will require you to ſhoot no more. By this ſaying, Carvajal would give us to underſtand, that if every Muſquetier could but kill his man, the Victory would be ſecure and certain. But howſoever, he largely ſupplied the Souldier with Ammunition and Arms, as he did all the others who had occaſion of Powder and Bullet: in this pleaſant manner he treated with his Friends; but when he came to deal with his Enemies, he treated them at another rate, with all gravity, caution and reſervedneſs required.

Another quaint ſaying of his was expreſſed to his Muſquetiers in ſight of the Enemy; when he adviſed them to level their Arms from the Girdle downwards, and not from the Breaſt to the Head upwards: For, look you, Gentlemen, ſaid he, Bullets are apt to riſe, and that which miſſes, though but two Fingers breadth, is loſt, and cannot doe execution; but that which flies low, and grazes ten paces off, may yet have ſome effect: And in caſe you wound your Enemy either in the Thighs or Legs, he muſt fall, and become diſabled; when, on the contrary, a man may receive a ſhot either in his Arm or Body, unleſs the wound be mortal, he may yet continue fighting. Upon this ground, and for this reaſon, he ordered his Muſquetiers not to fire above a hundred paces diſtant from the Enemy; which, as Carate ſaith, did ſuch cruel and terrible execution, that in the firſt ranks of Captains and Enſigns, and in the eleven files which were in the Van before them, there remained not ten men found, all being killed or wounded; which was a ſad caſe, and much to be lamented. In like manner theſe Shot gauled the Horſe very much, of which Alonſo de Mendoça and Jeronimo de Villegas were Captains; ſo that ten or twelve of the Cavaliers were diſmounted, and and amongſt them was one Carrera, whom we have formerly mentioned. One of the Colonels, named Luys de Ribera, conſidering that in caſe the Horſemen were detached by degrees and ordered to charge the Foot, they would all be killed one after the other, before they could be able to come up to the Enemy; and therefore Orders were given, that they ſhould charge Piçarro's Horſe; who ſeeing the Enemy coming upon them, kept their ground, and ſtirred not one ſtep forward, as the Lieutenant General had directed; that the Muſquetiers might not loſe their Shot, nor advantage of their Vollies, as the Enemy came up to them: but when he ſaw that Centeno's Horſe had paſſed the right wing of the Foot; he then advanced thirty paces forward, to receive the charge of the Enemy. Centeno's Horſe riding upon a full trot, over-bore Piçarro's Horſe, and trampled and trod them under foot, as if they had been ſo many Sheep, ſo that (as Hiſtorians agree, and I with them) Men and Horſe were overthrown; and ſcarce ten Men of all their numbers remained who were not diſmounted. One of theſe thus hardly beſet was Gonçalo Piçarro himſelf, who being ſingle and divided from his Company, haſtened up to join with his Foot. But being known by three Cavaliers of chief note, they fell upon him with intent to kill him or take him priſoner: one of them was called Franciſco de Ulloa, another, Michael de Vergara, and the other, Gonçalo Silveſtre: This latter aſſailed Piçarro on the right ſide, Vergara on the left, and Ulloa joined with Vergara. Theſe two came up ſo cloſely to Piçarro, that they gave him many Stabs under the Ribs, but good Arms defended him. Michael de Vergara made a loud Out-cry, and ſaid, This Traytor Piçarro is my prize and my priſoner. In this manner they all four purſued him, till he came up to the Foot; but the Horſe on which Gonçalo Silveſtre rode moſt troubled and endangered him, for, being a nimble Horſe and in a full carriere, he came ſo cloſe up to him that Silveſtre took hold of the Horſe's pectoral, and ſtopped him in his courſe, which when Piçarro perceived, he turned about his body to him, and with a ſhort Cutlace, which was hanged with a Ribon on the wriſt of his right hand, he gave three Cuts upon his Horſe, one of which lighted upon his Noſe, and cut off his Lips, ſo as the Teeth were laid bare upon one ſide; another Cut he gave him over the Noſtrils; and the third took him over the hollow of his right eye, though without hurt to his ſight. And this Piçarro performed with ſo little concernment, as if he had been engaged in ſports of the Ring or other Feats of Arms. And this very ſtory I heard from Gonçalo Silveſtre himſelf, who often amongſt other particulars of this Battel recounted this paſſage, and the ſame I have heard confirmed by divers others. And that all four of them purſued him up to his body of the Foot.

CHAP. XX.

The Story of the cruel Battel of Huarina is farther continued, ſeveral Feats of Arms performed therein. The Victory is gained by Piçarro.

WHEN the Souldiers ſaw him coming they knew him to be Piçarro, and charged with their Pikes to receive and defend him. Silveſtre perceiving that he had not wounded Piçarro with all the Stabs he had given him on his ſides; he ſtopped his hand, and gave a Cut on the Blade-bone of his Horſe's Shoulder, but the wound was ſo inconſiderable, that after theſe matters had paſſed, and the Wars were at an end; this particular was ſcarce judged worthy to be mentioned, leſt it ſhould accuſe his Arm of faintneſs and want of ſtrength: but this ſmall wound was again returned by Piçarro's Souldiers, who ſallying forth to kill thoſe who purſued him, wounded Gonçalo Silveſtre's Horſe in the head with a Lance, which made him riſe up on end; and then another with his Lance ran Silveſtre himſelf through both his Arms: the Horſe with the ſmart of his Wounds

floundred and tumbled on all four; with the force of which the head of the Lance broke off in his Arms; but howſoever the Horſe bounſing up, carried off his Maſter with more danger than what is here expreſſed. But Michael de Vergara was more unfortunate, for he in the heat of his Fury fanſying that the Traytor Piçarro was his priſoner, purſued him within three or four files of the Enemy, where they knocked him down, and cut both him and his horſe into pieces.

Nor did Franciſco de Ulloa ſucceed better, for as he was turning his horſe to eſcape, a Muſquetier clapt the noſe of his Gun on the reins of his Back, which paſſed clear through him; and another Souldier at the ſame time, cut his horſe over the huckſons of his hinder leggs, and though he was hamſtringed thereby, yet he was a horſe of that ſpirit, that he carried his Maſter off above fifty paces, and then both of them fell dead together; all which I have learned and heard ſo very particularly that the colours of their Horſes were deſcribed: This was the iſſue of the Fight between the Horſe of Piçarro and Centeno, which was ſo bloudy that a hundred and ſeven horſes lay dead within the field where the Battel was fought, which contained not above two Acres of ground beſides thoſe which fell at ſome farther diſtance off, and yet all the number of horſe on one ſide and the other did not amount to above a hundred and eighty two. The matter was very ſtrange, and indeed no man believed the report, untill my Father Garçilaſſo de la Vega did aſſure them upon his word, that he had counted them one by one, and that out of curioſity, he had taken the account, by reaſon that the Battel was ſo exceeding bloudy that no man would hereafter believe, that out of ſo ſmall a number ſo many ſhould be killed.

When Diego Centeno's Horſemen ſaw that Piçarro was retreated into the Body of his Infantry, they then charged thoſe few Horſe of the Enemy which remained with ſuch ſucceſs, that they killed them almoſt all to the laſt man, ſo that the Victory was clear as to them: One of thoſe who were killed was Captain Pedro de Fuentes, who had been Governour to Piçarro in Arequepa; he was knocked down with one of thoſe Clubbs which the Indians uſe in the War; by the ſtrong Arm of a Horſeman, who riſing high from his Saddle, gave him ſuch a blow with both hands on his Helmet, as beat it into pieces, and daſhed out his Brains, ſo that poor Pedro fell down dead upon the very place. Captain Licenciado Cepeda was grievouſly wounded with a Cut over his Face and bridge of his Noſe, and was taken priſoner, I remember that I ſaw him at Cozco, after he was cured, with a patch of black Taffaty of a Finger's breadth over the Scar. At this time Hernando Bachicao, who commanded the Lances under Piçarro, hearing the Enemy ſound the Levets of Victory, ran over to Centeno's ſide, and called Witneſſes that he was come over to the King's ſervice, and claimed the privilege of the Proclamation of general Pardon. But the other Squadron of Horſe belonging to Centeno, which flanked on the right Wing of the Infantry, and commanded by Pedro de Los Rios, and Antonio de Ulloa, charged the left Wing of Piçarro's Foot, as was ordered at the beginning of the Battel; but they were ſo warmly received with ſuch a volly from the Enemy, that Captain Pedro de Rios was killed, and many others, before they could come to cloſe with them; whereupon they wheeled off, and would not adventure to engage farther with that Squadron, which was too hot for them, being well fortified with Pikes and Fire-arms: Howſoever paſſing along the left Wing and the rere-guard of Piçarro's Forces, they were much gaulled with Shot from them; for that Squadron was well guarded with Yllapas, which in the Indian tongue ſignifies thunder and lightning; and indeed it proved ſo to that noble and flouriſhing Army of Diego Centeno, which conſiſted for the moſt part of Gentlemen, mounted on the beſt Horſes which at that time were to be found in all Peru, and which were for the moſt part that day deſtroyed in that bloudy and unfortunate Battel. Piçarro had a deſire to have charged the Enemies horſe in perſon, and fought it out with them to the laſt, but Carvajal adviſed him not to doe it, but to keep his ground, and leave the management unto him; and do not doubt (ſaid he) but very ſpeedily you ſhall ſee your Enemies routed, taken and killed. Centeno's Horſe having rallied into one body, after they had paſſed the two Wings of Piçarro's Squadron, were yet more warmly received by the Rere-guard which Carvajal commanded to fire briskly upon them; which they performed with ſuch ſucceſs, that they killed many of them, and put them into diſorder, and forced them to quit the Field; the which action was performed in ſo ſhort a time that ſcarce had Centeno's Trumpets finiſhed their Levet which ſounded Victory, before before it was begun on Piçarro's ſide: which when Hernando Bachicao perceived, he returned back to his former Squadron, crying out Victory as loud as any. One of the Horſemen on Centeno's ſide, born at Herrera de Alcantara, (whoſe name I have forgotten, running away, in his Flight and full carriere, accidentally happened to paſs by Franciſco de Carvajal ſitting on his ſmall Nag, as we have before mentioned, and not knowing who he was, gave him a ſtroak with a broad Sword over the Vizard of his Head-piece, which being given with a ſtrong Arme and a good Will, the Sword entred deep within the Iron, but yet went not ſo far as to wound him: at which thoſe who ſaw it wondered very much; and after the Battel was ended, and all things quiet, Carvajal ſhewed the Head-piece to Gonçalo Piçarro, and ſaid to him, what do you think, would have become of me, had I not been guarded with this defence? One third part of Diego Centeno's Foot were all ſlain, as is mentioned before; another third part of them, when Victory was founded on their ſide, were licenſed to plunder Piçarro's Camp, and accordingly they ſacked a great part of it; but this proved their ruine, and was a great occaſion of the loſs of the day. The remainder of the Infantry, which were not above ſixty in all, were left at puſh of Pike with Piçarro's Souldiers, ſeconded with a Party of John de Acoſta's. A certain Souldier of Centeno's ſide, called ——Guadramiros (whom I knew) a Man tall of Stature, and well ſhaped, of a peaceable diſpoſition and more a Courtier than a Souldier, gave Acoſta a puſh with his Pike in the Throat; and the head of the Pike remaining within the fleſh, he gave him with the Staff end ſuch a blow over the Shoulders, that Acoſta was therewith knocked down, with his Heels up in the Air: at the ſame time a Neger chanced to come in, whom I knew, called ——Guadalupe, and gave him a cut over both the Calves of his Leggs; but the Neger being a weak little fellow, and the Sword as dull and as black with ruſt as the Maſter, he rather bruiſed the fleſh than cut it.

At length Piçarro's men coming to handy-blows with thoſe of Centeno's, they killed them almoſt all: but John de Acoſta ſaved both Guadramiros and Guadalupe from being killed: for he interpoſed himſelf between them and thoſe who would have killed them, and cryed out a-loud, that they deſerved Quarter and alſo Honour and Reward: What I have ſaid here I knew to be true; for afterwards I took acquaintance with Guadalupe, when he was a Muſquetier in one of the Companies belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro, quartered at Cozco, where he was gallant in his Habit, and dreſſed up in Feathers as gay as a Peacock, becauſe every one reſpected him for his courage and bravery. And here I muſt beg the Reader's pardon for having deſcended thus far to trivial particulars, having onely an intention hereby to confirm the truth of my Narrative by the Teſtimony of having been an Eye-witneſs to the foregoing Tranſactions.

CHAP. XXI.

The number of thoſe who were killed and wounded on both ſides, with other particular Succeſſes: as alſo what was acted by Carvajal after the Battel.

THE eſcape of Guadramiros was after the Battel ended, and after the Victory plainly appeared for Gonçalo Piçarro; for on his ſide were ſlain about a hundred men, of which ſeventy odd were Horſemen, and about fifteen Foot, beſides thoſe which were wounded, amongſt which were Captain Cepeda, John de Acoſta, and Captain Diego Guillen. On Diego Centeno's ſide above three hundred and fifty were killed, and amongſt them their Major General, and all the Captains of Foot, with their Enſigns, being the Flower of their Army, and the choiceſt Men amongſt them; beſides which Pedro de Los Rios, Captain of Horſe, and Diego Alvarez, who carried the Standard, dyed on the place. There were, beſides thoſe that were ſlain, three hundred and fifty wounded, of which above an hundred and and fifty dyed for want of able and experienced Chirurgeons, and of Balsams, Plasters and other Medicaments; and the extreme colds of the Countrey contributed much thereunto; for though that Countrey is within the Tropicks, yet the Colds are often very intense, by reason of the high Winds and lofty Mountains. Gonçalo Piçarro followed the pursuit with seven or eight lamed Horses; with which they entred the Tents of Centeno, rather to own and publish the Victory, than to offend the Enemy; for as Gomara saith, in Chapter 182. the Conquerours themselves were so ill treated, that they were not able to pursue or offend the Enemy. On one side, where this Battel was fought in that great Plain, was a long Bog or Marsh, and about thirty or fourty paces broad, but so shallow as would scarce serve to cover the Fetlocks of a Horse. Before they came to this Bog, one of Piçarro's Souldiers called to one of Centeno's, whom he saw covered with bloud, both he and his Horse. Do you hear, Sir, said he, Your Horse will fall presently: at which saying Centeno's Souldier was much troubled, because he trusted to make his escape by the goodness and strength of his Horse.

This person was Gonçalo Silvestre, of whom we have formerly made mention; and it was he from whom I received the Information of many of these Passages: and he told me moreover, that turning his face to the left-hand, he saw Gonçalo Piçarro himself, with some few of his men, marching softly to Centeno's Tents, crossing himself as he went, and crying with a loud voice, Jesus, What a Victory is this! Jesus, What a Victory is this! which he repeated many and many times. A little before they came to the Bog, a certain Souldier of Piçarro's side called Gonçalo de los Nidos, overtook Gonçalo Silvestre; whom Silvestre had a little before taken Prisoner, and upon his asking Quarter and his Life, he gave him his liberty, without the least hurt done to him: When Nidos knew that Silvestre was his Enemy, he cryed out, Kill that Traytor, Kill that Traytor: upon which Silvestre turned to him, and calmly said, Sir, I beseech you let me alone to dye in peace; for in the condition that I and my Horse are, we cannot live many minutes without giving you the trouble to kill us. No, said he, No; Damne me, Thou shalt dye by my hand. Silvestre looking well upon him, and finding him to be the man to whom he had newly given Quarter: Good Sir, said he, be patient, and use me with the like mercy that I shewed to you. But Nidos roared out then louder, and cryed, Thou art the Rogue: Damne me, I am resolved for that very reason to kill thee, and tear out thy Heart, and throw it to the Dogs. Silvestre told me, that if this fellow had answered him in more moderate and civil terms, he should certainly have yielded to be his Prisoner; but finding him so ungratefull, rude and barbarous, he resolved to fight with him, if his Horse were able to stand against him: this discourse passed between them as they were wading over the Bog or Marsh, which was no place for a Combat; but so soon as they were over, Silvestre spurred up his Horse, to try his strength and mettle; and finding him therewith to spring forward and answer the Spur, as if he had received no hurt; and throwing up his Head, snorted out some of the bloud which issued from the wounds on his Nostrils on his Master's Clothes; which when Silvestre perceived, he rode away a gallop, seeming to fly, that he might draw the fellow farther from his Party: accordingly Nidos pursued him, crying out aloud, The Traytor runs, and The Coward runs: but so soon as Silvestre had drawn him at a convenient distance from his Companions, he returned upon him, and gave him a stroke about the middle with a rusty Rapier, which he had taken from a Neger in the Battel; for he had broken the two Swords which he had brought with him that day into the Field; for, as the manner was for good Souldiers, he came doubly armed, that is, with one Sword in the Scabbard by the side, and another fastened to the Pommel of the Saddle. Nidos was not wounded with the blow, but onely being well affrighted, ran away to his Party, crying out, They kill me, They kill me; for Cowards are always more valiant with their Tongues than with their hands. Gonçalo Piçarro being an Eye-witness himself of what had passed, and of the Bravery of Silvestre, sent Alonso de Herrera after him, to persuade him with good words and fair terms to come in and yield, that he might doe him honour, and reward him for his Gallantry and Valour. Alonso de Herrera hastened what he could after him, but his Horse was so wounded, that he could not put him out of his Trot, and soon afterwards he dyed of his Wounds; howsoever Herrera called after him to return, swearing, that if he would come back, his Master, the Governour, would doe him more honour in one day, than he should receive from the King in all the days of his life; but Gonçalo Silveſtre returned him no anſwer, but ſpurred up his Horſe and went away. This Story I have heard from thoſe of Piçarro's Party, and likewiſe from Silveſtre himſelf, and on the report of both ſides I relate it here.

Gonçalo Piçarro, in purſuance of his Victory, thought not fit to enter Centeno's Camp, having underſtood that his Souldiers were in it already, and were plundering the Tents in great heat and fury: wherefore, returning to his own Camp, he found it had alſo been pillaged by Centeno's Souldiers, at the time when they thought the Victory was theirs, and that they had taken from thence all the Horſes and Mules they could ſeiſe, which were now uſefull in their flight. Franciſco de Carvajal on the other ſide purſued the Victory, not to kill Spaniards, with Clubs which two Negroes carried, as Palentino reports Chapter the eightieth, and ſays, that he killed above a hundred; which certainly had been a very cruel action: but it is good neither to flatter men with praiſe who do not deſerve it, nor yet to calumniate or accuſe wherein men are not guilty: the truth is, Carvajal killed none after the Battel, but remained ſatisfied with his Victory, which he had obtained ſolely by his own good management and induſtry, (as was manifeſt) and might be attributed to his great skill and experience in martial affairs; and therefore he might well triumph and glory, that he himſelf had killed a hundred men in that Battel, ſince the whole ſucceſs of that day was effected by his extraordinary conduct. Lopez de Gomara, Chap. 183. reflects on the words of Franciſco de Carvajal, and deſcants farther upon them, and ſays, that he boaſted of the ſatisfaction and pleaſure he had in killing a hundred men, amongſt which one was a Friar, who ſaid Maſs: but if this report be not true, we may then lay the cruelty at the door of this Authour, and not of this great Souldier, who onely gloried in his Victory, &c. Thus far Gomara.

Franciſco de Carvajal, having atchieved ſo much honour and glory, careſſed and dealt kindly with his Enemies; for the next day after the Battel, being informed that ſeveral principal men of note, belonging to Centeno, and profeſſed Servants to his Majeſty, were wounded, and lay concealed in the Tents of ſome of his Souldiers, who out of friendſhip took care for their cure, he with all diligence made ſearch after them, which all people imagined at firſt was with deſign to kill them; at length he found eight of them, one was Martin de Arbieto a Biſcayner, a perſon of noble deſcent and valiant, of whom we have formerly made mention, and whom we ſhall have occaſion to name hereafter; another was a Gentleman of Salamanca, called John de St. Miguel; another was a Gentleman born at Caſra, named Franciſco Maraver. I knew them all three, and the other five alſo, but I have forgot their names; all which Carvajal finding very much wounded, he ſpoke particularly to every one of them, and told them that he was troubled to ſee them in that condition, and deſired them to take care of their recovery, to which if he could contribute, he deſired them freely to command it of him, aſſuring them, that he would be as carefull of them as of his own Brothers; and that when they were cured he would readily grant them their freedom and liberty to depart; but if they would reſolve to ſtay with him, he would make it his buſineſs to ſerve them all the days of his life. Moreover he cauſed Proclamation to be made thorough the whole Camp, That what Souldiers ſoever belonging to Centeno which lay wounded, ſhould freely diſcover themſelves and demand help for their cure, which ſhould be adminiſtred to them, and money, if they wanted it, and he promiſed to take the ſame care of them as he did of his Lord the Governour. This policy Carvajal uſed to allure the hearts of the Souldiers to his Party: for he was not ignorant, that benefits and careſſes are more prevalent than rigour and cruelties; the which he exerciſed towards his declared enemies ſtanding in defiance, but was more gentle and complemental with ſuch as he perceived inclinable to his Party.

CHAP. XXII.

Gonçalo Piçarro issues out Orders to bury the Dead. He dispatches Officers into divers parts. The flight of Diego Centeno; and what happened to the conquered Party.

SO soon as Gonçalo Piçarro returned to his Tent, he found my Father there, and desired him to lend him his Horse, Salinillas, untill his own were cured of the slight wound which Gonçalo Silvestre had given him; which being granted, he mounted thereon, and taking a turn round the Field, he gave order to bury the dead, and to take care of such as were wounded; which he found for the most part stripped of their Clothes by the Indians, who, without regard to Friend or Foe, made all prize which came within their power: the common Souldiers were all buried together promiscuously in ten or twelve great Pits, which were made for that purpose; but the Bodies of Noblemen and Persons of Quality were carried to the Village of Huarina (which was near thereunto, and for which reason this Fight was called the Battel of Huarina) and there they interred them in a small Church built by the Indians themselves, in which they were taught the Articles of the Christian Faith, when things were in peace, and when the time was proper for it: and there those Bodies rested for the space of four years, untill the troubles being at an end, and the Empire flourishing in peace, those Bodies were taken up and carried to the great Church of a City which the Spaniards had lately founded and called it the City of Peace, where they were re-buried with much Solemnity, Masses and Sacrifices, which continued for many days. The Gentlemen of Peru did generally contribute to the expence hereof, in regard they were all related to the dead, either by Kindred or by Friendship. Gonçalo Piçarro having buried the dead, and taken care of the wounded, dispatched away Officers into divers parts to provide necessaries which were wanting. Dionysio de Bovadilla was sent to the City of Plate, to bring what Silver he could get for payment of the Souldiers. Diego de Carvajal, surnamed the Gallant, was dispatched to the City of Arequepa on the same errand, and Captain John de la Torre was sent to Cozco; all three were attended with thirty Musquetiers apiece, who had commission to press what men they met, and bring them to the place where Piçarro lay encamped.

But now to return to Diego Centeno (of whom we have for some time been silent) He was sick, as Authours write of him, having been six times let bloud too in the distemper of a Pleurisie; and therefore was not actually present in the Fight, but was carried about in a Chair, from whence seeing the slaughter of his men, and the loss of the day, he left his seat and mounted on his Horse, which was led near to him: and being overcome with the fear of death and the desire of life which is natural to all men, he fled away, not staying for the Bishop or any other; but onely with the company of one Priest called Father Biscayner, he took his way over the Desarts and Mountains, leaving the high way, the better to elude the devices and strategems of Carvajal, and came at length to the City of Los Reyes; so that neither Carvajal nor any of his own side knew what was become of him, that he seemed to be vanished like an Apparition, or carried away by some strange Enchantment. And though he was informed that the President Gasca was in the Valley of Sansa, which was in his way, yet he thought not fit to go thither, but wrote a Letter to him by the Father Biscayner, to excuse his non-attendance, being forced to go first to the City of Los Reyes to provide himself with such necessaries as were requisite for his own person, and agreeable to the quality of that Office and Dignity in which he had served. And here we will leave him at Los Reyes to speak of Francisco de Carvajal, who was wandring about the Countrey in search, as Authours say, of Don Fray John Solano, Bishop of Cozco, against whom he was highly incensed, saying, that whereas he ought to have been in the Church, praying unto God for the peace of Christians, he was turned Souldier, and was become a chief Officer in the Army of Diego Centeno: but being not found, nor known where he was, he hanged up a Brother of his called——— Ximenez, and a certain Friar who was a companion to the Biſhop, and ſo proceeded on his march to Arequepa: where we will leave him alſo, to tell what became of thoſe who fled from the Battel, that by the ſhort relation we make thereof, the Reader may imagine the ſad and miſerable condition of thoſe who fled from the Battel, wounded and ill treated without Victuals or Chirurgeons, nor ſo much as a Cottage or Shed to cover themſelves that night, againſt the exceſſive colds which are conſtant in thoſe Deſarts; which is moſt terrible and grievous to conſider.

Gonçalo Silveſtre having thus eſcaped out of the hands of Gonçalo Piçarro and his Souldiers, went directly to his Tent, where the firſt thing he demanded of his Indians, was the Budget in which they put the Inſtruments for ſhoing their Horſes; for it was the cuſtome then, and many years after, for every Spaniard to be prepared to ſhoe his own Horſe, in caſe he ſhould caſt a ſhoe on the Road, and accordingly every one carried with him, when he travelled, a Pouch or Budget containing about two hundred Nails, and four Shoes well fitted, with Hammer, and Pinchers, and Shaver to pare the Hoofs: and indeed it was neceſſary to go ſo provided, in regard there were no Smiths Forges in the way, nor in any places but where Spaniards inhabited, which were commonly ſixty leagues diſtant from each other; and the ways being rugged and rocky, it was neceſſary for every Horſe-man to go ſo provided: though now I am informed that in theſe days that convenience is found every where, and that in every Inn maintained by Spaniards, there is a Smith's Forge for accommodation of Travellers. Howſoever I am ſure that I learned ſomething by that ancient cuſtome, for I knew how to ſhoe my Father's Horſes, and to let them bloud when occaſion offered: for this reaſon Silveſtre calling for theſe Inſtruments, and for a Scarlet Cloak dyed in Grain, which was the habit of Perſons of Quality, he departed thence, leaving his Indians ſad and melancholy, and complaining that he gave no belief to them when they fore-told this unhappy misfortune, which if he had done, they might have ſaved and ſecured all their goods. Thus left he his Indians without any care or proviſion made for them; and on the way he ſaw great numbers of people flying away, as well Spaniards as Indians, not knowing which way to go, but as fortune directed them. Amongſt theſe, about a little more than a quarter of a league from the Camp, he overtook a Spaniard that was wounded, riding on a ſmall Nagg; he had ſeveral wounds, but one eſpecially on the Reins of his Back, ſo that he could not ſit upright, but lay along with his Face on the Horſes Neck: an Indian Woman walked by his Horſes ſide; her left hand ſhe laid on his wound, and in her right ſhe had a ſtick to ſwitch up the Horſe; and ſaid to her Maſter, pray doe what you can to get out of the hands of theſe Traitours and Rebels, and do not fear that I will ever leave you untill I ſee you again ſafe and ſound: but Silveſtre got before him, and overtook divers others ſhifting for themſelves as well as they could. By that time that he had got a little more than three leagues from the Camp, he left the common way, and got into a by path, where was a Hole or Pit covered with Buſhes and green Graſs, which was all the Provender he could give that night to his Horſe; but for himſelf he had neither Supper nor Bed: in this place he alighted and unbitted his Horſe, who was ſo hungry that in a ſhort time he left neither Graſs nor Buſh, but ate all up, which Silveſtre was ſo pleaſed to ſee that the good fare his Horſe found ſerved him alſo in the place of a Supper. About two hours after above twenty Spaniards, ſome wounded and others ſound, came to the ſame place, with as many Indians, who were very ſerviceable to them at that time, for they lighted them up a Candle, and divided the Mayz amongſt them which they carried for their own proviſion. The poor wounded men knew not what to doe, ſighing and groaning with the pain of their wounds; amongſt them there was one man who between himſelf and his Horſe had twenty three wounds great and ſmall. But God provided for them in this great extremity; for as they were ſitting, they eſpied an Indian carrying a Hamper made of Straw in form of a Cheſt, to him they went and opened the Hamper in hopes to have found proviſions, but there proved to be nothing but tallow Candles, which this Indian, on ſuppoſition of better booty, had robbed from the Tents; for the Spaniards in ſuch Hampers as thoſe, which are very light and portable, uſually carry proviſions and accommodations for their Journies. The Indians ſeeing the Candles, told their Maſters that they were able to cure the wounded wounded with the Tallow, mixed with the dung of Cattel (of which there is great ſtore in that Countrey) which having dried and beaten to a powder, they heated it with the greaſe, and made it as hot as they could well endure it, and firſt having probed the depth of the wounds with ſome Bodkins which the Spaniards carried with them, they poured it into them, and this ſerved for a Balſame which not onely ſtenched Bloud but healed the Sores, without other remedies; which was recounted afterwards as a mercy of God, and a miracle of Divine Providence to that Party, which in their extremity had found ſo ſovereign a cure: preſently after mid-night they began again to travel, dividing into ſeveral parties, that the Enemy might not be induced to purſue them, on the report of many gotten into a Body.

About fifteen days afterwards Gonçalo Silveſtre met with the Spaniard who was wounded, with his Indian Woman, and found him well and ſound, in a Village of Indians, where were about fifteen or twenty Houſes; for ſhe had carried him thither amongſt her own Friends and Relations, where they cured him, and entertained him with what proviſions their Countrey afforded. Theſe paſſages I received particular information of from good hands, which happened in that deſart Countrey: there were many other accidents of greater importance than theſe, of which not having had particular information I forbear to write them; and leave them to the contemplation of the Reader, who in his thoughts may imagine the miſeries which followed after a cruel Battel, in a Countrey diſinhabited, and in a Deſart without relief. I ſhall now return to a deſcription of the place where this Battel was fought, and ſay ſomething of what the three Authours write concerning the exploits which were performed by Garçilaſſo de la Vega my Lord and Father.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Authour confirms the truth of what he hath ſaid; and to ſatisfie thoſe who do not believe him, he boaſts of what Hiſtorians write concerning his Father.

Franciſco Lopez de Gomara, Chap. 182. relating the Battel of Huarina, and giving an account of the numbers of thoſe who were killed and wounded, ſaith, that Piçarro had been in great danger had not Garçilaſſo de la Vega lent him his Horſe, &c.

Auguſtine de Carate, Book the ſeventh, Chapter the third, diſcourſing of this Battel, ſaith that the Horſe ſeeing the rout which was given to the Foot, engaged the Enemy's Horſe, and in that charge Gonçalo Piçarro had his Horſe killed under him, without other hurt to himſelf, &c. Diego Fernandez alſo, Book the ſecond, Chapter the ſeventh and ninth, ſpeaking of this Battel, ſaith, as follows;

Pedro de los Rios and Antonio de Ulloa charged the Horſe on the other Wing, and engaged not with the Foot, as was ordered; which they performed with ſuch ſucceſs that they diſmounted the whole party of Piçarro, ſcarce ten men remaining in the Saddle; and therewith being as it were aſſured of Victory, they began to rifle their Enemies, make them Priſoners, and take away their Arms. In this encounter Piçarro himſelf was diſmounted, which when Garçilaſſo obſerved, he alighted from his Horſe, (for he was one of thoſe who continued in the Saddle) and lent it to him, and helped him to get up. Licençiado Cepeda was one of thoſe who had yielded and taken quarter; but Hernando Bachicao, giving the day for loſt paſſed over to Centeno's party.

Though all theſe Authours agree in theſe particulars concerning my Father, yet I am well aſſured of the truth of what I have wrote; and that the Horſe which Piçarro received from my Father was not in the heat of the Fight, but afterwards: but I do not wonder that Hiſtorians ſhould be ſo informed, for I remember that ſome School-fellows of mine, who were born of Indian Women, told me the ſame;

ſame; and that they had heard what Diego Fernandez relates, how that he alighted, and lent Piçarro his Horſe, and helped him to get up. And to undeceive the World in this particular; my Father (after the Battel of Sacſahuana) gave information before the Juſtice by an Officer of the Exchequer, and with the Teſtimony of twenty two Witneſſes, all of Centeno's Party, who declared, that at the time when Piçarro deſired my Father's horſe, there was not one man of Centeno's Army within half a league of him; and that the Wound which Piçarro's horſe had received was ſo inconſiderable, that notwithſtanding the ſame, he might have fought that whole day upon him if occaſion had been. I have heard it alſo reported, that Piçarro's horſe was cut over the huckſons or hamſtringed, as Franciſco de Ulloa's horſe was; but it was a falſe report and information; as it was alſo, that the horſe recovered, and yet dyed twenty two leagues diſtant from the place of Battel; but the truth is, the horſe dyed for want of diet and good government: for though the Farrier who took care of Piçarro ſtables, called Meſcua, a Native of Guadalaxara (with whom I was acquainted) did uſe to give that horſe water a little warmed, and therein flower of Mayz: yet the Groom forgot to give that in charge to the Indian who led the horſe well covered and warmly clothed againſt the exceſſive colds of that Countrey: and the Indian, not knowing the rules which the Farrier had given, ſuffered the horſe to drink, as he was paſſing a brook, as much water as he pleaſed, with which being preſently taken with a chilneſs, he fell into a ſhivering, and dyed four leagues from that water.

Thus the Hiſtorians had ſome grounds to write what they did concerning my Father, and I had reaſon to give a truer information; not to excuſe my Father in hopes of favour or reward, but out of affection to truth it ſelf. As to the Offence which is objected againſt my Lord Garçilaſſo, I have been puniſhed and done penance for it, though I committed not the Crime. For when I came to petition his Majeſty for ſome reward for the ſervices of my Father; and that in conſideration thereof the Eſtate which came by my Mother might be reſtored to us, which by the extinguiſhment of two Lives was eſcheated to the King: which when I had preſented before the Royal Council of the Indies, and made it appear how great the ſervices of my Father had been: and that thoſe Lords were convinced of the clearneſs of my pretenſions; yet Licenciado Lope Garcia de Caſtro (who was afterwards made Preſident of Peru) being then in the Chair, asked me, what reward I could expect the King ſhould give me? conſidering that the ſervices my Father had done for Piçarro at the Battel of Huarina were ſuch as had given him the Victory. And when I replyed, that the information was abſolutely falſe; How, ſaid he, can you deny that which all Writers of theſe matters do affirm? And therewith they excluded me from all pretenſions, not onely on account of my Father's ſervices, but of my own. And though I had many merits on my own ſcore to alledge, yet I could not procure to be heard: for I could have related, how I had ſerved under Don Alonſo Fernandez de Cordoua and Figueroa, under Marquis de Priego, Chief of the family of Aguilar, under Don Franciſco de Cordoua (who is now in Heaven) and ſecond Son to that Great Don Martin de Cordoua, Count of Alcaudete, Lord of Monte-mayor, and Captain General of Oran. I have alſo ſerved his Majeſty in quality of Captain of four ſeveral Companies; two of which were in the time of Philip the ſecond of glorious memory; and the other two under his brother Don John of Auſtria, now alſo in Heaven, who were pleaſed as ſignals of their favours to gratifie me therewith; not that I pretend to have merited them from that Prince; but onely his Highneſs obſerving in me a readineſs of mind and affection to ſerve him, accepted my endeavours and was pleaſed to recommend me to his Brother. And yet notwithſtanding ſo prevalent were the prejudices I lay under, that I durſt neither revive my old pretenſions nor alledge my later ſervices: for which reaſons, being caſhiered the Army, I was ſo poor and naked in clothes, and ſo indebted, that I durſt not return again to the Court, but retired my ſelf into an obſcure corner of ſolitude and poverty, where (as I declared in my Preamble to the Hiſtory of Florida) I paſſed a quiet and a peaceable life, as a man looſe and diſengaged from the World, and the mutability, without hopes or great expectations: and indeed I have no reaſon for it, becauſe the beſt part of my life is paſſed already, and for the future God will provide, as he hath hitherto done. Pardon me this impertinent digreſſion, to which my troubles and oppreſſions have tranſported me; for it may well be allowed to me, who have wrote the Lives of so many men, to relate some few passages of my own misfortunes.

But to return to what the aforesaid Authours have written concerning my Father: I must confess that there is no reason for me to contradict the testimony of three such important Witnesses, nor is it reasonable for me to expect, that any one should yield entire credence to me who am a party in the case. For my own part, I am satisfied within my self, that I have declared nothing but the truth, and let other men judge as they please: I am sufficiently contented, that the character which they have given of my Father should pass for true: and I do much avail and value my self on the honour of being the Son of so courageous, resolute and valiant a Souldier, as he; who in the heat of a Battel so cruel and bloudy as is before repeated, durst adventure (as Historians write) to alight from his Horse, and spare him for his friend; and amidst of much danger could bear that presence of mind, as to help to set him on Horse-back. And if this action gave a turn to the fortune of the day, and obtained the Victory for Piçarro, certainly there have been none, or at least few of these examples in the World.

These Trophies of Honour atchieved by my Father, I gladly assume unto my self: for the desire of honour is so natural to all men, that even those who have no vertue or worthiness to boast of, yet rather than want some little glitterings of imaginary honour, will glory in that which is their shame: but some may object, and say, that my Father acted against his Majesty's service: To which I make answer, that laying that matter aside; the Action in it self was brave and merits a due honour and renown. But to return to those who fled from the Battel, amongst which the Bishop of Cozco was one; and he, having departed from Centeno without any regard to either side, or concerning himself farther with them, returned to his Cathedral Church, but he was in too much haste to visit it, or to make any stay there. In company with him were Alonso de Hinojosa, John Julio de Hojeda, with about fourty other principal Citizens and Souldiers, whom I saw in that City, but yet cannot remember their Names, except those three formerly mentioned. The Bishop (as I have intimated in another place,) lodged in my Father's house with about fourteen or fifteen more, and next morning early they met in the lesser Square of the City near to the Convent of our Lady of the Merceds; and thence they travelled, and took the direct way to Los Reyes; because they understood that John de la Torre pursued hard after them; of whose successe we shall speak in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Proceedings of John de la Torre in Cozco; and what was acted by other evil Ministers in other parts.

CAptain John de la Torre pursuing those who were fled from the Battel came to the City of Cozco; where he executed his Justice on John Vasquez de Tapia, who had been Mayor of the City for the King: he likewise hanged his Collegue or Coassessour named Licenciado Martel. These men lost their lives for want of due regard to themselves: for they resting confident of Centeno's successe against Piçarro, acted with great zeal in the King's service against such as were of the disaffected Party: and yet they took these matters into so little consideration, that though they saw the Bishop fly away, yet they resolved to stay by it, and not quit the City, untill John de la Torre came, who made them pay for their errour and incogitancy with the loss of their lives: but as to the common Souldiers he issued a Proclamation of Pardon to all those who would list themselves in his Company. Then he gathered all the Arms he could, and erected triumphal Arches, and prepared all things with magnificence and ostentation for the reception of Piçarro, who, as he pretended, was coming to that City, to enjoy the fruits and happy consequences of his Victory: And here he leavied money for payment of the Army, and and ſent Officers to all parts round to bring in Proviſions for their ſupport. Amongſt theſe Pedro de Buſtincia (who was nobly deſcended and married to the Lady Beatriz Coya, the legitimate Daughter of Huayna Capac) was diſpatched to the Province of Antahuylla, which is a Countrey abounding with all ſorts of Proviſions: on this ſervice this Gentleman was employed as the moſt proper perſon, becauſe that out of reſpect to the Lady he had married, the Caciques and their Subjects would with all readineſs apply themſelves, and bring in what Proviſions he ſhould require: but he was very unfortunate in this undertáking, for it coſt him his life, and very inconſiderate to engage himſelf in danger which he might have excuſed and avoided. As we ſhall find in the ſequel.

Dioniſio de Bovadilla was ſent by Piçarro to the City of Plate with Inſtructions to bring what money he could raiſe out of Piçarro's own Eſtate, or out of his Brother's, together with what Tribute and Rent was due from the Indians to thoſe whoſe Eſtates were confiſcated for adhering to the King: and having hereby raiſed great ſums both of Gold and Silver, he returned with all expedition to Gonçalo Piçarro, whom he found in Cozco, where he was well received for the ſervice he had done, in bringing ſo conſiderable a ſupply for payment of the Souldiers. Diego de Carvajal, ſurnamed The Gallant, was employed to Arequepa with the like Commiſſion; but (as Palentino, Chap. 82. reports) he treated many Women of that City very ill, becauſe their Husbands were ſaid to be in the ſervice of his Majeſty, and in confederacy with Diego Centeno, plundering them of all they had, even to their wearing Garments: and it is farther ſaid, that he and one of his comrades, called Antonio de Viezna, raviſhed two Women, who in rage, and for ſhame of the affront, took Mercury and poiſoned themſelves; imitating the example of the chaſt Lucretia, who on the like occaſion deſtroyed herſelf.

But men, from ſuch Outrages as theſe, deſerve not the name of Gallant, being ſuch abominable Villains as want words to expreſs their Iniquity: for he that would be eſteemed a Gallant, ought not to derive that Title from his Attire or Dreſs, but from his Words and Actions, which challenge an eſteem and love from all men; but theſe men ſoon afterwards received the reward due to their deſerts. Nor was the behaviour of Franciſco de Eſpinoſa leſs ſcandalous in his journey to the Charcas, but rather worſe, if worſe can be. For in his paſſage he robbed and plundered all he could find, which (as a certain Authour ſays) amounted to the value of ſixty thouſand Ducats: and in Arequepa he killed two Spaniards, one of which had Lands and Command over Indians: in the City of Plate, he hanged a Judge and an Officer of the Court; and all four of them, for no other reaſon, than becauſe they had ſerved the King: and in his return to Cozco he burn'd ſeven Indians, upon pretence that they had given information of his departure to certain Spaniards who were fled from him. All which he acted without Commiſſion or Order from Gonçalo Piçarro or his Lieutenant General, but merely out of his own arbitrary Power and Luſt, intending thereby to evidence his great zeal to the cauſe of him, who was not pleaſed with ſuch ſervice; for when he was informed of his Cruelties, he abhorred both his perſon and his actions; for Piçarro was of a merciſull nature, and did neither approve of theſe nor other Cruelties committed by Carvajal of the like nature.

But to divert the Reader awhile from the ſad relations of ſuch Barbarities; we will mention one generous action performed by a perſon infamous in thoſe days: whereby it will appear that he was not altogether ſo wicked as Hiſtorians deſcribe him.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Gratitude which Franciſco de Carvajal ſhewed in Arequepa to Miguel Cornejo, in return of thoſe benefits and kindneſſes which ſome years before he had done for him.

WE have now an occaſion preſented to declare ſome good actions performed by Franciſco de Carvajal in lieu of the many bad ones which Writers report of him. We formerly left him on his way to Arequepa, in purſuit of his flying Enemies: Upon News of his approach, not onely thoſe who fled from the Battel of Huarina, but likewiſe the Inhabitants, who were about fourty in number, abandoned the City, and took the way to Los Reyes along the Sea-coaſt. So ſoon as Carvajal was entred into the City, and had received information of their flight, without ſtop, or ſtay, or repoſe ſo much as of one hour, he diſpatched twenty five of his chief and choice Harquebuſiers after them, commanded by an experienced Souldier; who had all been inſtructed in the School of an excellent Maſter, and were for their bravery termed his Sons: and theſe made ſuch expedition in the purſuit of them, that they overtook them two days journey from Arequepa, and ſeizing upon every one of them, they brought them back again to the City, not ſuffering one man of them to eſcape. Amongſt theſe was a noble Gentleman, one of the firſt Conquerours, and an Inhabitant of that City, called Miguel Cornejo; who had ſome years before much obliged Franciſco de Carvajal when he came firſt into Peru, before he had Lands or Eſtate, or had acquired any Fame, or Reputation, or Intereſt in that Countrey: the manner of it was this; Carvajal travelling with his Wife Donna Catalina Leyton, one maid-ſervant and two men-ſervants, came to Arequepa, where finding no Inn nor Houſe of entertainment to receive him, he remained in the Streets: for it is to be noted, that in thoſe times, and many years afterwards, there were no Houſes of publick entertainment in all Peru; nor were there any when I came from thence, in the year 1560; but Travellers were uſed to take up their quarters with the Inhabitants of the Countrey or Province; for ſuch was the generoſity of thoſe Gentlemen in thoſe days who had Lands and Indians allotted to them, that they frankly received all Strangers into their Houſes, affording them entertainment not onely for days and weeks, but alſo for months and years, and likewiſe furniſhed them with Clothes untill ſuch time as they were able to provide for themſelves; the which generous and obliging uſage was the common cuſtome and practice of that whole Countrey. In this condition was Franciſco de Carvajal in that City without friend or acquaintance, or houſe whereunto to reſort, and ſo remained for the ſpace of three hours on horſe-back with his whole family in a corner of the Market-place; when Miguel Cornejo having taken notice of him, as he was going to Church, at his return went up to him, and asked him what his buſineſs was ſo long there, ſince for above three hours he had obſerved him in that place? Sir, anſwered Carvajal, I have no kindred, friends or acquaintance in this Countrey, and there being no Inns or places of publick entertainment whereunto I might goe to be received, I am enforced to ſtay in this corner of the Street. To which Miguel Cornejo replyed, Your Worſhip hath no need of another Inn than my Houſe, whereunto if you pleaſe to goe, you ſhall find us all ready to ſerve you to the utmoſt of our power. After this he carried them to his Houſe and entertained them untill ſuch time as that Marquis Don Franciſco Piçarro beſtowed ſome Lands and Houſes on Carvajal in that City; for he was one of thoſe choice Souldiers which Don Antonio de Mendoça, Vice-king of Mexico, ſent to the aſſiſtence of the Marquis Piçarro, when Prince Manco Inca had raiſed great Forces againſt him, as we have formerly related in its due place.

When Franciſco de Carvajal underſtood that Miguel Cornejo was amongſt the priſoners that were taken, he cauſed them all to be brought to his preſence, and having ſeen Cornejo, he took him aſide, and began very kindly to complain and chide him. Is it possible, said he, that you should fansie and imagine me to be so ungratefull as to forget the kind and charitable entertainment I received from you, some years past in this very City? or to believe, that in return thereof I should not embrace all occasions to make known my gratitude? is it possible for me to be so short of memory as not to remember how kindly you took me and my Family to your own home, (when there was no place to receive us) and entertained us there for days and months, untill such time as Marquis Piçarro, of glorious memory, had made other provisions for me. And having ever conserved the thoughts hereof in my mind, I carried great respect to every thing wherein you were concerned; for though I had sufficient information, that Diego Centeno was concealed within your possession, and though I knew the very Cave it self where he was hid, and nourished by your Indians, yet I winked at it, and took no notice thereof, that I might not give you trouble, nor bring you under a prejudice or ill notion with my Lord the Governour. I might then easily (if I had pleased) sent some Files of Musquetiers and have brought Diego Centeno to me; but for your sake I forbore to persecute him, notwithstanding the mortal enmity between us. Nor indeed did I much value him; for he who could submit to take his refuge in a Cave was not much to be feared; not doubting but whensoever he should adventure again abroad, and dare to take up Arms against my Lord the Governour, I should drive him into another Cave, as I have done since his flight from Huarina, where by the blessing of God, and assistence of Friends, I gained a signal Victory. And now, since for your sake I took not vengeance on an enemy whom I had within my power, how much more should I respect your person, and those whom you own for your friends and acquaintance? and to assure you of these my real intentions, I give you free leave to return unto your home, and there repose and rest with as much freedom and security as you can desire. And also you may assure all the Inhabitants of this City, and all such as were taken and brought back in your company, that for your sake they are pardoned and exempted from that punishment which their offences have deserved. And herewith he acquitted and dismissed Miguel Cornejo, and freed the City of the fears and apprehensions they were in for having with zeal and affection shewed themselves active in his Majesty's Service, and for the assistance they had given to Diego Centeno. This Story I learned, not onely by common report, but from the particular relation of Gonçalo Silvestre, who was a professed enemy to Francisco de Carvajal, as he was a fast and faithfull friend to Diego Centeno, having adhered to him and accompanied him in all his adversities and misfortunes till the day of his death, as will appear hereafter. And on this occasion I produce this authentick Witness to confirm the truth of what I have spoke; for I pretend to flatter no man, but really and truly to lay down matters of fact according as they have passed.

Carvajal, having gathered what Arms and Horses he could find in Arequepa, returned to Piçarro, who was still on his march to Cozco: for by reason of the many sick and wounded in the Camp, he was forced to continue longer at Huarina than was intended. And here it is very observable, that those of Piçarro's Party who were rich took care and compassion of the wounded men belonging to Centeno, and dividing them amongst themselves carried them to their own Tents, where they provided for their maintenance and cure. It was my Father's lot to have twelve assigned to him, of which six dyed on the march, and six happened to live and recover. I knew two of them, one was called Diego de Papia, a Gentleman of good Quality, and a person of vertue, who made many gratefull acknowledgments for the care which was taken of him. When I came for Spain I left him in the House of Diego de Silvia, who was Godfather to me at my Confirmation. The other was called Francisco de Penna, whose name agreed well with his nature, which signifies a Rock, and indeed so hardy was he, that though he had received three great slashes on the Crown of his Head, from the first to the last of which there was about three fingers distance; and though his Skull was so broke that the Chirurgeon was forced to take out some Bones; and having no better Instruments to trepan his Head, he made use of a Smith's Pincers in this operation, yet had he the fortune and strength to recover. And this farther shewed the soundness and hardiness of his complexion, that, notwithstanding all these wounds, and the unfitness of the Instruments that he recovered without Fever, or any other accident; and yet kept no rule or regimen in his Diet, but ate whatsoever was set before him. The which indeed was very strange, and never heard or seen before; and so might well be called Francisco Penna rather than de Penna, which is Francis Rock, and not Francis of the Rock. And having said thus much, it will be now time for us to return to the President.

CHAP. XXVI.

How the Preſident and his Army received the ill news of the Victory of Piçarro; and what new Orders he made.

HOW vain and ſhort are the proſperities and ſucceſſes of this life may appear by what happened in the Valley of Sauſa, where we left the Preſident and his Army full of joy and contentment upon the good news which Franciſco Voſſo lately brought concerning the flouriſhing condition of Centeno's Army, which was much ſuperiour to Piçarro's both in Men, Arms and Horſe. In confidence of which the Preſident, and thoſe who were of his Council, reſolved to raiſe no more men, but to disband the Army which they had already formed, and diſmiſs the Souldiers who were come from ſuch diſtant Countries and Provinces; for that it ſeemed an unneceſſary and fruitleſs expence to keep ſo many men in pay in expectation of an Enemy already preſumed to be overcome and defeated. And this courſe was ſo far reſolved, that (as Auguſtine Carate ſaith in the fourth Chapter of his ſeventh Book) the Army was juſt upon the point of being disbanded; the which he expreſſes in theſe words: At this time came intelligence to the Preſident of the Defeat given to Diego Centeno, which he took much to heart, though he expreſſed not ſo much publickly, but ſeemed to carry it outwardly without much concernment: all which happened ſo contrary to the common expectation of the Army, that many of the Officers were of opinion, that the Preſident had no need to raiſe an Army, for that Diego Centeno had a ſufficient force to overthrow Piçarro, &c. Thus far Carate.

But as it was the good fortune of the Preſident, ſo it was the misfortune of his Enemies that this determination was not put in execution; nor was it ſo much as known that this matter was ever deliberated or deſigned to be made publick; for if the Army had been disbanded, it had certainly been very difficult to have raiſed another of the like nature, or ſo well provided with Men and Ammunition as this was. As matters were in this agitation the Biſhop of Cozco arrived at Sauſa, with the ill news of the Rout and Defeat of Diego Centeno, of all which he having been an eye-witneſs was beſt able to give a relation. The Preſident, and other Inhabitants of that Countrey, who had Baronies and commands over the Indians, were greatly ſurpriſed and troubled at the news; finding that the heat of War, which they conſidered lately as extinguiſhed, was now again inflamed, with ſuch advantage to the Enemy, that their cauſe ſeemed almoſt deſperate, and the Rebels in a ſtate not to be reduced. Howſoever the Captains and Souldiers, who live by War, were not in the leaſt diſturbed at this news; for War is their livelihood and trade, from whence they derive their Honours and Eſtates, and eſpecially in the Empire of Peru, where the reward of Souldiers and Adventurers is Command, and diviſion of Lands, and a Barony over Indians. The Preſident being deſirous to hold up the hearts of his people, which he found drooping, put the beſt countenance he could upon the matter, and made them a ſhort Speech in this manner: That Succeſſes of this nature were uſual and common over all the world, and were incident to War; and that theſe things were intended for the good of God's People, who were to give thanks to his Divine Majeſty for having granted to Piçarro a Victory, with intent to bring greater miſchiefs on his head, and that having filled up the meaſure of his iniquity, his ruine and downfall would be the greater. And to obtain this great bleſſing, he adviſed every Officer to be vigilant and diligent in his ſtation, and to order and diſpoſe all things in ſuch a method and readineſs as might enable them to contend with ſuch an Enemy. He added farther, that there was no need for him to move and incite Cavaliers ſo well experienced in War as they were to actions of bravery and to martial exploits; for that he was to follow their example, and take their counſel and advice in matters of greateſt importance: In fine, he told them, that he was well aſſured that they would direct every thing in the beſt manner to the Service of his Majeſty, who would gratifie their fidelity with rewards agreeable to their merits, and make them Lords of that whole Empire.

Having ended this Diſcourſe, he ordered the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado to go to Rimac, to bring thence the Forces which remained there, as alſo the Guns from the Ships, and other Ammunition, which came from Spain, together with what Money, Arms and Horſes, and other proviſions for War which he could find at that place. He farther ordered, that all Artificers and other Workmen ſhould act and labour with all diligence in their ſeveral employments; namely in making Muſquets and Fire-arms, Gun-powder, Bullets, Pikes, Helmets, Croſlets, &c. all which the Indians made of Copper with great ingenuity; and the Artificers applied themſelves thereunto with great alacrity and Art, being chief Maſters and excellent Workmen in their reſpective Trades. Likewiſe Captain Alonſo Mercadillo was diſpatched away to Huamanca, and after him Martin Lope Luſitano with fifty men to ſeiſe the paſſage towards Cozco, and ſuccour ſuch of Centeno's men who were wandring and diſperſed in thoſe parts. And here we ſhall leave the Preſident in his preparations to ſpeak of Gonçalo Piçarro, whom we left in the field of Huarina, where that famous Battel happened.

CHAP. XXVII.

Licenciado Cepeda and others adviſe Piçarro to make an Agreement and Peace with the Preſident. His Anſwer thereunto. The death of Hernando Bachicao. Piçarro makes his entry into Cozco.

Goncalo Piçarro, having performed the laſt office to the dead, he reſolved to march towards Cozco, but he was forced to defer it for ſeveral days by reaſon of the wounded men, who were not in a condition to travel; and at length they marched very eaſie and ſhort Journies: whilſt they were thus on their way Licenciado Cepeda put Piçarro in mind of a promiſe he had made him ſome days paſt, to enter into a Treaty with the Preſident Gaſca whenſoever any ſeaſonable and convenient opportunity ſhould happen, which might induce the Preſident to admit of ſome fair and moderate terms: of this opinion with Cepeda there being divers others, the matter was debated at a general Council of Officers, who for the greateſt part were inclinable to peace and accommodation, and urged Piçarro ſo earneſtly thereunto, that he became very angry and diſpleaſed with their importunities; as is confirmed by Gomara, Chap. 183. in theſe words: In Pucaran ſome hard words paſſed between Piçarro and Cepeda touching a Treaty with Gaſca; for Cepeda urged that it was very ſeaſonable to enter into Articles, and put him in mind of his promiſe given him at Arequepa: but Piçarro being carried away with the opinion of others and the air of his late fortune, denied that the time was convenient, for that propoſitions for peace would argue weakneſs and fear, which would cauſe many to leave their Colours and fly to the Enemy, and diſcourage thoſe Friends who were then actually with Gaſca: of thoſe who were of the opinion of Cepeda, Garçilaſſo de Vega was one. Thus far Gomara. But Piçarro rejected this Counſel which was good and wholſome, and took that which was given him by young and raſh men, ſuch as John de Acoſta, Hernando Bachicao, John de la Torre, and others, who being puffed up with their late ſucceſs at the Battel of Huarina, thought themſelves invincible, and would hearken to no Propoſals or Articles leſs than an entire ſurrender to them of the whole Empire of Peru. Two days after this Conſultation, the Lieutenant-General Franciſco de Carvajal returned from his Journey to Arequepa; and two days afterwards he hanged up Hernando Bachicao, for having at the Battel of Huarina paſſed over to the Enemy's ſide. And though Carvajal was not ignorant of this fact on the ſame day when it was done, yet he deferred this puniſhment untill a fitter ſeaſon, not thinking it fit to interrupt the joy of that ſignal Victory by the ſadneſs which the death of ſo ancient a Captain, and ſo zealous for the cauſe, as was Hernando Bachicao would cauſe. At length, length, after a long Journey, cauſed by ſhort marches for the ſake of thoſe who were wounded, Piçarro and his Souldiers arrived at Cozco.

Captain John de la Torre had prepared to make for him a ſolemn entry under triumphal Arches which he had erected over the Streets, and adorned them with Flowers of various colours after the Indian manner in the times of their Incaes. The firſt that led the way were the Infantry with their Banners diſplayed, marching three by three in a Rank, every Captain at the head of his Company; then followed the Horſe in the like order; after which, and that the Souldiers were lodged in their quarters, followed Piçarro himſelf attended onely by his own Servants and the Inhabitants who accompanied him; for he thought it not convenient to be introduced by his Souldiers, leſt it ſhould ſeem as if he gloried in an entire Victory over his Enemies, and made a Triumph before Conqueſt. As he entred, all the Bells of the Cathedral and Convents were rang out, and the Indians of the City, being drawn up in the Streets and publick places of the City, gave loud acclamations as he paſſed, calling him Inca, and giving him thoſe other titles of Majeſty which they uſed to beſtow on their own natural Kings in days of triumph, the which was performed by order and direction of John de la Torre. The Trumpets alſo ſounded, with Violins and other Inſtruments of Muſick in which Piçarro much delighted, and had excellent good of that kind. The firſt place he entred was the Church of our Lady of the Merceds, where he adored the moſt Holy Sacrament, and the Image of the Virgin his Mother and our Lady. From thence he walked on foot to his Lodging, which was provided for him at the Houſe of one of his chief Officers called Alonſo de Toro, which is ſituate over againſt the Convent of the Merceds. I my ſelf accompanied them into the City, having gone out the day before to meet my Father as far as Queſpicancha being three leagues diſtant from Cozco; part of the way I walked on foot, and I was carried part of it by two Indians, who by turns took me on their Shoulders: but at my return a perſon leading a Horſe gave me leave to ride, ſo that I ſaw every thing which I have here related, and ſuch particular obſervations did I take thereof, that I could aſſign the very Houſes and Chambers, where every Captain was quartered, for I knew them all; and though it be ſixty years ago ſince that time yet I remember the very places and Houſes where they lodged; for we conſerve things better in our memory which we ſaw in our youth than what we have obſerved in our riper years. Gonçalo Piçarro and his Souldiers being thus entred into Cozco, Franciſco de Carvajal attended to give out neceſſary Orders, and make ſuch proviſions as were requiſite to carry the War forwards: he repaired the Arms which were broken, or become defective in the late Battel of Huarina, he cauſed Powder and Bullets to be made, and new fixed ſuch Arms as were not uſed, and omitted nothing in order to carry on the War. Of Arms he had great ſtores; for he had gathered all thoſe which Centeno's Souldiers had left in the Field, and thoſe which belonged to the men ſlain on both ſides, and of thoſe who had been deſerters; all which he repaired and re-fixed with great care and curioſity: and of all ſorts of offenſive Arms he moſt eſteemed of Fire-arms, ſaying that the Gentiles had wiſely armed their God Jupiter with Thunder and Lightning, which was an Engin that killed at a diſtance as well as near. He cauſed alſo Pikes to be made, and though they had no Aſh in that Countrey out of which to frame them, yet they had another ſort of Wood, as ſtrong and proper as that; He alſo provided great quantities of Cotten for making Matches; and, in fine, he omitted not the leaſt matter which might be requiſite or uſefull in its time and ſeaſon: in all which matters he applied himſelf with that diligence, that he was never idle, and ſeemed not to allow himſelf time either to eat or drink.

His cuſtome was always to ride upon a Mule of a pyed colour, I never ſaw him on any other Beaſt during the time he continued at Cozco, and before the Battel of Saçahuana; ſo earneſt was he at his work, that day and night, whenſoever he was met by his Souldiers, they always found him employed: And becauſe he knew that they would murmur to ſee him ſo buſie, he would always, when he paſſed by them, with his Hat in his hand, ſalute them, and inſtead of ſaying, I kiſs your hands, he would ſay, What you can perform to day defer not till to morrow, and this ſaying he conſtantly had in his mouth. And when they asked him what time he took to eat? and what time to ſleep? he would make anſwer, That thoſe who had a mind to work had time for every thing. Amongſt all theſe exerciſes and contrivances, Carvajal could not conceal his own fierce nature, which ſhewed it

ſelf it ſelf in a piece of cruelty acted at Cozco, upon a noble Lady belonging to Arequepa, whom he ſtrangled in Cozco: for ſhe, like a Woman, after the Battel of Huarina, vented many opprobrious ſpeeches againſt Piçarro; ſaying, that the time would come when his tyrannies would have their end, like thoſe of more powerfull Governments, ſuch as the Greeks and Romans, which were all brought to deſtruction: and ſo violently would ſhe expreſs her ſelf without any diſcretion, fear or wit, that Carvajal cauſed her to be ſtrangled, and afterwards hanged out at a Window looking to the Street.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Impriſonment and Death of Pedro de Buſtincia. Captains are choſen and made by the Preſident. Of his departure from Sauſa and arrival at Antahuaylla.

IN revenge of this murther it ſeems as if God had ſuffered another of the like nature to be committed about that time in the Royal Army, that ſo Franciſco de Carvajal might not have cauſe without ſome croſs accident to pleaſe himſelf in ſo deteſtable an action as the murther of a ſimple Woman: Gonçalo Piçarro was greatly troubled at it, and expreſſed his reſentments of it in ſecret to certain Friends, though he did not make known ſo much of his mind to Carvajal, who was well acquainted with the tender heart of Piçarro, and knew that he would have prevented him in the execution of his ill deſign, in caſe he had been acquainted with his intended cruelty; and for that reaſon he privately ſtrangled her in his Chamber, and afterwards hanged her out at the Window. Now in return of this murther another followed by the death of Pedro Buſtincia, who being ſent to make proviſions for the Army in Antahuaylla and the parts thereabouts, as hath been mentioned before; Alonſo Mercadillo and Lope Martin, who were two Captains of the contrary party, and ſent upon the ſame deſign, having notice thereof, reſolved to beat up Buſtincia's Quarters in the night, and take him, if it were poſſible, by whom they might be certainly informed of the condition and ſtate of the Enemy. Lope Martin ſo well managed his buſineſs, that though he was inferiour in number to Pedro Buſtincia, yet he ſo ſurpriſed him in the night, that he took him priſoner: to which action twelve of Centeno's Souldiers contributed very much; for though they promiſed to joyn with Piçarro yet their hearts failed them when they came to fight in his cauſe, for they being pleaſed with any ill ſucceſs which could befall him, made no reſiſtance; ſo that Lope Martin took Buſtincia and all his men, of which they killed three; one of which being of Piçarro's Souldiers to ſhew himſelf more brave than the reſt, dyed in the conflict, though there was very little or no oppoſition; the other two, who were Levantines, (or people of the Eaſtern Countries, called the Levant) availing themſelves much on their bravery, boaſted that they had killed ten men at the Battel of Huarina, by which vain words they brought death upon themſelves; for it was believed that they were not men of ſuch gallantry, but ſome of thoſe who had been taken lately or wounded. Lope Martin ſet the twelve Souldiers of Centeno at liberty, but Piçarro's men with Buſtincia he carried away priſoners, being greatly pleaſed and proud of ſo good a prize. The Preſident received Martin very kindly, and by means of Centeno's men he became informed of the true ſtate and condition of Piçarro's Army, as far as he could deſire to know. Pedro de Buſtincia was not contented quietly to remain a priſoner in the hands of the Preſident, but he muſt needs be talking, thinking it a piece of gallantry amidſt his Enemies, to praiſe the great actions and exploits of Piçarro, and extoll them to the skies; which he ſo boldly affected that he incurred the ſame fate with Donna Maria Calderon, as before mentioned; for as there was the ſame ſimilitude in their indiſcreet and paſſionate words, ſo it was thought fit that they ſhould be equalled in the puniſhment, and accordingly he was ſtrangled, and his Body publickly expoſed.

Pedro

Pedro de la Gaſca, Preſident of his Imperial Majeſty, having ſummoned all the Captains and Souldiers who were in Quitu, Caſſamarca, Rimac and other parts; and who accordingly appeared at the Rendezvous, and having ordered the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado (as we have hinted before) to goe to the City of Los Reyes to raiſe Men and to provide Horſe and Arms and Money and Spaniſh Cloth for the uſe of the Army, and to bring the Guns from the Ships; all which being accompliſhed, and ſufficient Ammunition and Victuals provided; it was determined that the Camp ſhould remove from Sauſa to meet Gonçalo Piçarro; and Officers were appointed for better Government of the Army; as the three Hiſtorians agree, and particularly Carate in the fourth Chapter of his ſeventh Book hath theſe words.

The Camp was ordered, ſaith he, in this manner: Pedro Alonſo de Hinojoſa continued in the Office of General, as was agreed when he firſt ſurrendred up the Fleet at Panama. The Mareſchal Alonſo Alvarado was made Lieutenant General, Licenciado Benito de Carvajal, Standard Bearer General, and Pedro de Villa-vicencio was made Serjeant Major. The Captains of Horſe were Don Pedro Cabrera, Gomez de Alvarado, John de Saavedra, Diego de Mora, Franciſco Hernandez, Rodrigo de Salazar and Alonſo de Mendoça. Captains of Foot were Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla, Paulo de Meneſes, Hernando Mexia de Guzman, John Alonſo Palomino, Gomez de Solis, Franciſco Moſquera, Don Hernando de Cardenas, Admiral Andagoya, Franciſco de Olmos, Gomez Darias, Captain Porcel, Captain Pardavel and Captain Serna. Captain Graviel de Rojas was made Maſter of the Ordnance. In company with the Preſident were the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes, the Biſhops of Cozco and Quitu, and Father Thomas de San Martin, Provincial of St. Dominick's Order; with many other Friars and Prieſts. At the laſt Muſter there were liſted ſeven hundred Muſquetiers, five hundred Pike-men and four hundred Horſemen: the which number increaſed to a thouſand nine hundred by that time that they arrived at Xaquixaguava: and ſo the Camp removed from Xauxa on the twenty ninth of December, in the year 1547. and marched in good order towards the City of Cozco, and endeavoured to find ſome ſhallow place, where they might with the leaſt danger foard over the River of Avancay. Thus far Auguſtine Carate: ſo that beſides the four principal Officers, viz. the General, Lieutenant General, Standard-bearer and Serjeant Major; there were ſeven Captains of Horſe, and thirteen of Foot, beſides the Maſter of the Ordnance, who were all Noble, and perſons of Quality (moſt of which I knew) and with theſe Officers and Forces the Preſident removed his Camp from Sauſa, to find the Enemy, and came to Huamanca, where being great want of Proviſions, they were forced to proceed forward in all haſte to the Province of Antahuaylla with intention to winter there; being a Countrey (as we have ſaid before) abounding with all ſorts of Proviſions. At this place the Preſident with his whole Army made ſome ſtay in expectation of the coming of the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado, who brought new Recruits commanded by their own Captains, and were (as Auguſtine Carate reports) about three hundred men, of whom we ſhall ſpeak more in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Captains and principal Men of Quality, and Souldiers who came to Antahuaylla to ſerve his Majeſty. And the great joy there was at their Arrival.

THE Preſident quartered his Army in Antahuaylla for above the ſpace of three months; during which time the People flocked in to him from all parts: amongſt them was Alonſo de Mendoça, who eſcaped from the Battel of Huarina (whom we forgot to mention in the due place) and was preferred to the Command of Captain of Horſe. About a month and a half after, the Preſident entered into Antahuaylla, the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado came thither with a hundred dred Souldiers, bringing the Cannon with him, with part of the Money, Arms and Spaniſh Cloths: the remainder he left behind, and was afterwards brought by the Accountant John de Carceres, by which the neceſſities of the Souldiers were abundantly ſupplied. In like manner the Licenciado Pedro Ramirez, Judge of the Court at Nicaragua, came thither with about twelve Horſemen in his company, having left about a hundred and twenty Foot-ſouldiers on their march thither, who came in about eight days after. The Admiral Belalçacar came in thither alſo with about twenty Horſe in his Company, having travelled four hundred leagues. Captain Diego Centeno brought in thirty Horſe of thoſe who had eſcaped from the Battel of Huarina and met together on the road, one of which was his dear Companion Gonçalo Silveſtre, and Partner in all his misfortunes: Beſides thoſe here named were many other Souldiers of leſs note and fame, who in all made up a Body of three hundred men. The Preſident rejoiced much to ſee his Army ſo much increaſed, and courageous, and to conſiſt of men who came from far Countries to ſerve his Majeſty; and particularly he was pleaſed to ſee Diego Centeno who was a perſon of loyal Principles, and endued with excellent parts both of body and mind, for he was much a Gentleman, and a moſt comely Perſon.

The laſt who came to the Army was Pedro de Valdivia, Governour of Chile, with about eight men on Horſe-back: In praiſe of whom Palentino hath ſpoken very fine things. And Carate, in the fifth Chapter of his ſeventh Book uſeth theſe words:

The Preſident having removed his Camp from the Valley of Sauſa; Pedro de Valdivia, who was Governour in the Province of Chile came in to his aſſiſtence. This Valdivia came by Sea to Los Reyes, with intention to furniſh himſelf there with men and ammunition, cloathing and other neceſſaries for the total ſubjection of that Countrey: but being landed there, and underſtanding the ſtate of the troubles then in tranſaction; both he and his men reſolved to employ themſelves in this War; and accordingly, with great quantities of Money which they brought with them, they took the direct way towards the Preſident, to whom the perſon of Valdivia was of great uſe and reputation: for though many rich Men and other principal Captains had followed the Preſident before Valdivia appeared, yet no perſon was eſteemed ſo experienced in War as he; and whoſe Art and Skilfulneſs in Military diſcipline might be oppoſed to the Strategems and Contrivances of Franciſco de Carvajal, to whoſe Government and Induſtry Gonçalo Piçarro had been beholding for many of his Succeſſes, and more particularly in the late Battel of Huarina againſt Diego Centeno: ſo that the Preſident's whole Army was affrighted and remained in apprehenſion of this perſon, untill they recovered their ſpirits and courage by the coming of Valdivia. Thus far Auguſtine de Carate: who after he had praiſed Pedro de Valdivia very much, he extols Franciſco de Carvajal much more, and with very good reaſon, for certainly he was far the beſt Souldier of any that was come into the new World. Diego Fernandez the Hiſtorian having confirmed what is before related of Pedro de Valdivia, adds farther in his ſecond Book, Chap. 85. as follows verbatim. And in regard ſome curious Reader may deſire to know the cauſe and reaſons which might move Pedro de Valdivia to undertake this voyage, I ſhall, for better underſtanding of this Hiſtory, deliver the cauſes and reaſons which might excite him thereunto.

The Governour Pedro de Valdivia being in his Provinces of Chile, received intelligence, that Gonçalo Piçarro was in Arms againſt his Majeſty. And ſome ſay that Letters and Correſpondences paſſed between them, which if ſo, 'tis certain Valdivia concealed them, as if no ſuch thing had ever been. His chief buſineſs was to borrow Gold of thoſe men, whom he knew to be monied men; upon pretence that he might therewith ſend Franciſco de Villagra to Peru to raiſe men, to make an entire Conqueſt of that Countrey; but notwithſtanding all his importunities, he could not find a man who would lend him a farthing. Whereupon Pedro de Valdivia ſummoned them all together, and told them, that ſince they reſolved not to lend him the Gold he would borrow of them; he gave free licence to as many as pleaſed to go to Peru; where ſhewing the quantities of Gold they brought with them, it would bring their Countrey into reputation, and be a means to invite people to come and plant there. Hereupon many prepared for the voyage, and intended to embark in the Port of Valparayſo (which is about ten leagues diſtant from the City of Santiago) and with them Franciſco de Villagra was to goe alſo, being ing the perſon deſigned to bring people from Peru: Valdivia remained in the City of Santiago: And when all people were in a readineſs and prepared for their Voyage, he came privately out in the night, juſt at the time when all people were embarked, and were at the mouth of the harbour. Pedro de Valdivia over-taking them there, cauſed great ſtore of Meat to be dreſſed, and invited them all aſhoar to dinner to the number of about twenty perſons; all which came willingly to receive the favour of his invitation: ſo ſoon as the dinner was done, and the table taken away, he earneſtly recommended Franciſco de Villagra to them (whom he eſteemed as his own Son) and deſired them, that ſince he went with them on the ſame deſign, to bring people to inhabit and increaſe their Countrey; they would lend Villagra ſome Gold in caſe his occaſions ſhould require it, the which every one promiſed to doe with great readineſs. After which Valdivia walked out of the Arbour where they ſate, and as if he intended to look towards the Sea; he on a ſudden leaped into a Boat, and rowed aboard a Ship, where he ſeized on all the Gold which imported above eighty thouſand pieces of eight; howſoever he noted the quantity and paſſed to every man's credit the ſums which concerned him. The perſons he took with him for his companions were Jeronimo de Alderete, Gaſpar de Villaroel, John de Cepeda, Captain Jofre, Lewis de Toledo, Don Antonio Beltran, Diego Garcio de Corceres, Vincentio de Monte, and Diego Oro his Secretary: Before whom he declared that he went to ſerve his Majeſty againſt the Rebels under the command of Piçarro. And leaving thoſe aſhoar to whom the Gold belonged, he appointed Franciſco de Villagra to be his deputy Governour, and therewith immediately ſet ſail. Being arrived in Peru, they received intelligence that the Preſident was on his march towards Cozco; whereupon they made the beſt of their way to Lima; where having ſupplied themſelves with all things neceſſary, they went to Andiguaylas, where they underſtood that all the Army was quartered and remained untill the rains were paſs'd, and the Summer ſeaſon entred, which was fit for action. Thus far Diego Fernandez Palentino, who wrote this particular Act agreeable to the many Tricks which are now practiſed in the World; and to which the Devil gives colour and reputation under the guiſe and appearance of Reaſon of State.

The coming of Pedro de Valdivia with the Captains and Souldiers with him; who were perſons of Noble Families, did much encourage and give life to the Souldiers of Centeno, whoſe ſpirits were become low and drooping by reaſon of the late Defeat; ſo that there was great joy and triumph over the whole Camp, which they teſtified by their ſports of Running at the Ring and other Paſtimes of that kind. But Sports and Mirth have the ſame operation as Muſick hath on the ſpirits of men, for thoſe who are merry, it rejoices; and thoſe that are ſad, it makes more melancholy. The Preſident with all his Army made his Winter quarters in Antahuaylla; the Winter was very ſevere by reaſon of the continual Rains which rotted the Tents; and the common Souldiers by reaſon of their bad lodging, and unaccuſtomed to the climate, fell ſick and infirm; but ſuch was the care of the Preſident, that he provided an Hoſpital for them; the chief Chirurgeon and Phyſician of which being Father Franciſco de la Rocha, born at Badajoz, a Friar of the Order of the Holy Trinity, very few died or miſcarried.

CHAP. XX.

The Army leaves Antahuaylla, and passes the River Amancay. The difficulties they found in passing the River of Apurimac, over which they design to make four Bridges. Carvajal's Counsel is rejected by Gonçalo Piçarro.

THE extremity of the Winter season being past, the President resolved to leave Antahuaylla, and goe in quest of Gonçalo Piçarro, who was in Cozco; and accordingly he marched with his Army to the River of Amancay, which the Spaniards call Avancay, and is about twenty leagues distant from that City. When they came thither, they found that the Bridge had been burnt; for (as we have said before) all the Bridges of that Countrey were made of Twists of Osiers; whereupon they determined to repair it again, which was easily effected, the River being narrow, and some of the old work remaining: having passed this River the most difficult task was how to pass the River of Apurimac: it seemed impossible for them to go over by the Banks of the high Road, because the chanel is there very broad; it was yet more narrow at the place where the * Posts were fixed on each side, and yet from the one to the other 'tis above two hundred paces wide: besides which there was a greater difficulty to overcome; and that was in case they took that way, they were to travel over a desolate and an unpeopled Countrey, where few Indians inhabited, and those so very poor, that they had scarce Bread or Provisions to sustain themselves. Atlength they resolved to pass the Army over one of the three Bridges, which they intended to make over the River above, where the chanel is contracted by the mountains on each side. One of these places was called Cotapampa, the other, which is higher, Huacachaca, and the uppermost Accha. And though the access to any of these places by reason of the high and cragged Mountains seems impossible for an Army, and for any to conceive who hath not seen them; yet they resolved to overcome the difficulties by reason that there was no other way besides that. And to amuse the Enemy, they seemed as if they intended to make four Bridges, at four several places; and to make them believe so, they caused about fifteen or twenty loads of Osiers to be carried to every of the four places; whereas to make one of those Bridges, at least four thousand loads of Osiers and Rushes are required, besides great quantities of Ropes and Cables, all which were provided at the charge and pains of the poor Indians. The places where these Bridges were to be formed were to be surveyed by some particular persons, whose care it was to provide materials for the same; as Palentino confirms, Chap. 86. Pedro Alonso Carasco was appointed to goe to the place near the common road, Lorenço Martin to Cotapampa, Don Pedro Puerto Carrero and Thomas Vasquez to Accha, Antonio de Qinnonez and John Julio de Hojeda to Guacachaca. I was acquainted with all these Gentlemen, when they lived at Cozco, and four of them were of the first Conquerours: And having surveyed all these four places, they concluded that the most easie passage might be made at Cotapampa; which they put in execution with great secrecy, that the report thereof might not come to the knowledge of the Enemy. The persons applied themselves to their respective stations, as was ordered; and in the mean time the President marched his Army with invincible difficulty over craggy Rocks and Mountains covered with Snow; which, as divers Authours report, is so white and glittering, that with looking thereupon many people lose their sight; though it is probable, as we have said in another place, that the whiteness thereof dazles the eyes, and the force of the object weakens the optick nerve, which may so continue for three or four days, and not longer. And here we shall leave them for some time, labouring under the great difficulties of their march, to relate the Contrivances of Francisco de Carvajal, who was solicitous to sustain and augment the greatness of Piçarro. Soon after the President had removed his Camp from Antahuaylla, and was on his march towards Cozco, Gonçalo Piçarro received intelligence thereof; for from time to time

to time he had advices of whatsoever was acted in the Enemies Camp: In the time of War, Indians were not persons to keep a Secret, for they served for Spies on both sides; because being doubtfull to which the Victory would incline, they endeavoured to gratifie both parties; that so the Conquerour might not return them ill for the good Offices they had done him. And though we have in another place touched on the Treachery of the Indians in this particular, yet here more especially we are concerned again to repeat it, because the Secret which the President on this occasion committed as well to the Indians as to the Spaniards was (according to the opinion of Historians) of high concernment. And though Gonçalo Piçarro received certain intelligence that the President was marching towards him, and was ignorant of none of his proceedings, yet he thought not fit to obstruct him in his march or defend the difficult passes (of which there were very many) but onely to keep his own ground, and expect the coming of Gasca; for having been flushed with many Victories, he did not doubt of the constant success of fortune. On the other side Francisco de Carvajal, who day and night applied his thoughts to military Affairs, that he might promote Piçarro to the Government of that Empire, observing in him a strange negligence of his Affairs, and without other Counsels than onely to give the Enemy battel; he went to him, and desired his consideration of some matters which he had to impart to him. Sir, said he, considering the late Successes, and the present state of your Affairs, and the dubious fortune of War, I would not advise you to hazard your whole stake on the uncertainties of a Battel, but rather endeavour to avoid fighting, and prolong the War untill such time as some happy conjuncture happens to secure your Affairs. To which end I will lay before you what may be said concerning the state of both Armies, that so I may acquit my self in all points relating unto your self, and to that cause in which we are so deeply engaged.

Now, Sir, in order to obtain victory over your Enemies, it is in the first place necessary for you to abandon this City and leave it wholly dispeopled; the Mills must be broken down, all Provisions taken away, the Inhabitants forced to take refuge in other places, and all their Goods, and what else is not portable or to be carried with them, consumed and burnt; so that there may remain nothing which may be of use and relief for the Enemy. There are two thousand men marching against us, half of which are Seamen and a sort of raw Souldiers who are almost naked, without Hose or Shoes to their Feet, and half starved; and live onely in hope of coming to this City, where they may satisfie their hunger, and be clothed: in which when they shall find themselves disappointed, and nothing but misery and desolation, they will be totally discouraged, and the President will be forced to disband them, having no possibility to support and sustain them.

In the next place I would have all Centeno's Souldiers dismist; for knowing themselves to be a conquered people, they can never be good friends: You have at least five hundred men, who since the Battel of Huarina are come in to you, to partake of the benefits of your Victory, all which are choice men, who will never leave you, or forsake their Colours in the greatest extremities. I would have two parties of Musquetiers, of fifty men each, detached from the main Body, and sent to the right-hand of the way, and to the left; with orders to march twenty or thirty leagues distant from the Army, and to seize all Cattle and other Provisions they can meet; and bring them to us, and what cannot be carried with them, to burn and destroy, that nothing thereof may remain for subsistence of the Enemy. In this manner your Camp will be supplied and fed with Kids and Sheep and other Provisions of the Countrey, and with whatsoever the fresh Provinces, through which we are to pass, do afford: whilst the Enemy pursuing us with two thousand men, half of which are useless, will find themselves in great wants and necessities; and then the other half, which are Souldiers and men experienced in War, will be starved for want of Provisions, which they must be forced to fetch from parts above a hundred leagues distant from them; for all the Victuals which the Countreys afforded through which they passed are already consumed, and they must daily leave those parts at a farther distance in case they pursue after us.

But indeed such a pursuit with a thousand men will be almost impossible, so that they must be constrained to divide their Forces into two bodies, against any one of which singly your men will have the advantage. And in case you shall be willing to decline fighting, you may march from one Province to another, and protract the War; and so tyre the Enemy, as to force them to yield to you, or else to grant you such advantageous termes as you shall require.

But Gonçalo Piçarro rejected this Counsel, as in no manner agreeable to his honour; for that it argued cowardise to fly from the Enemy, and that a retreat of this nature would cast a blemish and shadow upon the lustre and glory of all the brave actions he had performed. To which Carvajal replyed, that this was not to lose Honour but to improve that which was already acquired; for it was the part of great Captains and men experienced in War, to know how to protract it, and with military Strategems to weaken and destroy an Enemy, without adventuring on the hazards of a Battel, which is so doubtfull, that neither Party can upon the greatest advantages remain assured of Victory: hereof many instances might be produced in the World; but we shall need no other than that of the Battel of Huarina; of Victory in which, the Enemy remained so confident, that we are informed, they gave order to their Servants to provide a double allowance of meat at their tables, for entertainment of such prisoners as they should take in the Fight. And, Sir, consider farther, that this Victory was a particular mercy and favour of God Almighty towards you, and was not obtained by force of Arms or humane Policy; nor is it reason to tempt God again or expect the like miracles from him. To which Piçarro replied, that he knew not how to turn his back upon his Enemy, and therefore resolved to live in hope, and make trial once more of his fortune: having great confidence, that he who had given him so many Victories, would not leave him at last, or suffer him to be overcome. Thus ended the Discourse, without approbation by Piçarro. Palentino in Chap. 88. relates part thereof, and that Carvajal concluded, saying, Sir, be pleased to doe, as I advise you; and as for Centeno's men, dismiss them all, for being conquered men, they will never be true friends; for if you resolve upon a Retreat, you will be better without them.

All these particulars are wrote by Diego Fernandez, and agree very well with the Genius of Francisco de Carvajal, who was a man of great parts and abilities, though never sufficiently known or fathomed by his own people, nor yet by strangers. Now if we would know the true ground and cause why Piçarro did not approve of this nor other Counsels which were given him by Carvajal; no other reason can be assigned than that from the very day that a Consultation was held at Los Reyes, whether the President Gasca was to be received or not, and that Carvajal was of opinion that the terms were good which were offered, and that they should enter into a Treaty, and examine the Power and Instructions which Gasca brought: from that very time he lost his Credit with Piçarro, who ever afterwards suspected the reality of all the Counsels he proposed, which did not exactly square with his own advice and reason; and indeed Piçarro was of an humour not to admit of any advice but what proceeded from himself, affecting always to have the reputation of a Governour and Manager of all affairs. And as it is natural for mankind to hate and detest a Partner in Government and Rule; so did Piçarro more easily admit of a prejudice against Carvajal; which though grounded on a false imagination, yet so deeply did it take place with him, and possess his fancy; that all the future Services which Carvajal performed and the Miracles he acted at the Battel of Huarina could not avail to root out that suspicion he had conceived of him. And indeed this proved fatal to Piçarro, for those who are acquainted with these Secrets attribute his more speedy destruction and downfall to this Jealousie and Suspicion which he had conceived against Carvajal.

Lope Martin lays three Strannes of the Bridge over the River. The Spies of Gonçalo Piçarro cut two of them off. The great disturbance which this occasioned in the Royal Camp. Carvajal gives order to John de Acosta to defend the pass of the River.

THE Gentlemen before mentioned, to whose care it was committed to make the Bridges, had provided all the materials required thereunto. Lope Martin the Portugues, to whom it belonged to erect that at Cotopampa, expecting the Army in a day's time; laid the first three Strannes on the Waters, which are the foundation of the Bridge; though he had received orders not to lay any untill the coming of the President.

Howsoever Martin, to shew his diligence and to anticipate a day, adventured to lay them, which proved a matter of great trouble and inconvenience to the President, Officers, and to the whole Army: for the Spies of Piçarro, being three Spaniards and eight Indians, tracing along the banks of the River, perceived the three Strannes which were cast over to their side, and the little care there was to defend them, adventured the night following to cut them with hatchets and to set them on fire; and proceeded so far in their design, that they cut two of them before the guards could come from the other side: but what they most apprehended, was, that the Enemy would hereby receive intelligence of their design; and before they could pass the Army over, they would have time to hinder and disturb them in their passage; so that they should be constrained either to force their way with great danger and hazard; or otherwise to make their passage at Accha, which would be both incommodious to the Army, and a discouragement and a loss of reputation; and on the other side it would raise much the spirits of the Enemy, who might also give them the like interruption at Accha. Having considered these matters, it was concluded, that the onely secure remedy and prevention was expedition; and accordingly it was ordered, that immediately after Valdivia and Captain Palomino, the General should march with the Companies of Pablo de Meneses and Hernan Mexia, (which were Musquetiers) and endeavour, if it were possible, to reach the Bridge that night; and to pass over upon Floats to the other side, both to defend the Bridge, and to give assistence to the workmen employed in stretching the Strannes and fastning the Ropes. Graviel de Rojas was also appointed with his Cannon to hasten to the River, that his Indians which belonged to the Artillery might also lend a helping hand to the Work. Orders were also given to the other Companies to follow the General, with whom the President seeming to entertain discourse, he accompanied him so far, untill he came to the Banks of the River, the Bishops soon followed after, whilst the Mareschal remained to command the Camp, &c. Thus far Palentino.

And here we will leave the President and his Captains on their way, and employed in repairing and making their Bridge; to relate what Gonçalo Piçarro and his Officers were contriving at the same time, and what Francisco de Carvajal was projecting to countermine his Enemies, with the Strategems of War in which he was chiefly practised. So soon as the Spies brought advice of what was doing at the River of Apurimac, Gonçalo Piçarro called a Council of War, and communicated to them the News which was brought to him, desiring their opinion of what was to be done for defence of the Pass, and what advantage might be taken on the Enemy in this present Conjuncture. Carvajal, who was the most ancient and principal Captain, first answered and said, Sir, This day it is my turn to act, nor doth it belong to any person to go upon this exploit but my self. No, Father, replied Piçarro, for I have need of your person and counsel to be always near me on all emergencies which may happen, we have young and stout Captains with us, any of which will be ready and fit for this Work. Carvajal replied again; This Enterprise, Sir, belongs to me, and I beseech your Lordship not to deny deny me the benefit of this good fortune which now offers it ſelf in theſe latter days of my life, whereby I may conſummate the laſt of my atchievements with a glorious and final Victory over all your Enemies; which petition if you are pleaſed to grant me, I dare promiſe and aſſure you on the faith of a good Souldier, within the ſpace of four days to plant the Imperial Crown of this Empire upon your head. And ſince your Lordſhip hath by good experience proved the extraordinary zeal and paſſion I have conceived to ſee you exalted to a degree of Majeſty (of which I have given ſufficient teſtimonies) I beſeech your Lordſhip again and again not to deny me the favour of this requeſt, which I onely beg for the greater exaltation of your Lordſhip, my own honour, and welfare of your party and well-wiſhers.

Piçarro repeated the ſame words again, and told him that he was well enough aſſured of his good will and affection towards him, and would never forget the ſignal actions he had performed, which had maintained and ſupported him in that ſtation wherein he at preſent moved: And for that reaſon he could not eaſily ſpare him, or ſee him removed at a diſtance from him, who was his Father and his Parent. Upon this denial, it being put to the queſtion who ſhould command the Party ſent upon this exploit, John de Acoſta was the perſon who by general conſent was choſen; for he was not onely a favourite to Piçarro, but one, as Hiſtorians ſay, employed on ſuch like actions as this, and perhaps on greater, as often as occaſion offered; for he was eſteemed to be ſtout and brave, and indeed he was ſo: But Courage is not the onely endowment required in a Captain, but there muſt alſo be Prudence and Conduct, which were greatly wanting in this Perſon: and though Carvajal was endued with both, yet theſe Counſellours, obſerving the inclinations of Piçarro towards him, complied rather with the affections of their Prince than with ſuch meaſures as agreed beſt with the neceſſity of the times.

Franciſco Carvajal ſeeing that John de Acoſta was the perſon appointed for that exploit, he turned towards him and ſaid; Captain, Since you are ſo happy as to be employed on this glorious action, and to take from me the honour and fame which I ſhould win, be pleaſed to receive theſe inſtructions from me, which if well obſerved and executed, you will certainly be victorious, and return with the Crown of this Empire, which I have ſo often promiſed to our Lord the Governour. The Rules which I would give you are theſe; I would have you depart from hence about nine a Clock in the morning; the Bridge I reckon to be about nine leagues from this City; and ſo on a moderate march, neither too faſt nor too ſlow, you may by two a Clock in the afternoon travel four leagues, where you may ſtay an hour, and eat, and refreſh your ſelves and your Horſes; and from thence ſetting out about three a Clock, upon a ſlow and eaſie march, you may get to the top of the Hill, which borders upon the River, by nine a Clock at night; for I would not have you be there ſooner than about that time; a little below the top, at a league and half diſtance from the Bridge, there is a pleaſant Fountain of clear Water; at this place eat your Supper, and take your repoſe, cauſing your Bed to be made with four good Quilts, and a clean pair of Holland Sheets, lay your ſelf thereupon, and put a dozen Muſquets under your Pillow charged with Powder, and without Bullets, for you will have no need of ſhot. The Preſident and his Souldiers, let them make what haſte they can, will not be able to reach the Bridge untill ſuch an hour the next day; and though all the Devils in Hell aſſiſt them they will not be able to lay the firſt Stranne untill the evening, and the ſecond they will endeavour to lay in the night. After which they will begin to paſs about nine a Clock at night, and ſuch as are got over will begin to climb the Hill without Rank or Order, having no jealouſie or ſuſpicion of an enemy, believing it impoſſible for us to have made ſo ſpeedy a march thither as we have done. Such as have been the firſt to paſs will immediately make to this Fountain, with deſire to quench their thirſt with this pleaſant Water, and may be come near your Bed about twelve a Clock at night, at which time cauſe the Muſquets to be fired which you laid under your Pillow, which having done, without other delay, or ſo much as ſeeing the enemy, I would have you return to the City, and then we will immediately plant the Crown on the Head of our Lord the Governour. Theſe Inſtructions and Rules Carvajal, who was wiſe and experienced in the War, gave to Captain John de Acoſta, who acted ſo contrary thereunto that he not onely miſſed of the Crown

but loſt the lives of all thoſe who belonged to their Party, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

To perform this action two hundred choice Souldiers were detached and mounted on Horſe-back, and with them thirty Lances; and to march with the leſs incumbrance, they were to carry no Baggage but ſuch as was neceſſary for the Men, and Horſes, and Mules. And as to the ſaying of Carvajal, that he ſhould make his Bed with four Quilts and a pair of Holland Sheets, and that the Muſquets ſhould be charged with Powder onely and without Shot, his meaning was, that he ſhould make all haſte poſſible, and that onely by giving the Enemy a true alarm, without farther action they ſhould overcome and defeat them. And as to his ſaying, that though all the Devils in Hell ſhould help them, &c. it was to expreſs the diligence and expedition the Enemy would uſe in framing the Bridge; the which was the uſual form and manner which this great Captain uſed in expreſſing his mind.

CHAP. XXXII.

The Preſident comes to the River of Apurimac. The difficulties and dangers they find in the paſſage. John de Acoſta defends the Paſs. The little care and ill Conduct he ſhewed in all this action.

NOtwithſtanding all the haſte and diligence the Preſident and his Captains could make they could not reach the Bridge that night, but were forced to ſtop two leagues ſhort, by reaſon that it was dark; but ſo ſoon as the Moon aroſe they began their Journey again, being forced to walk a great part thereof on foot, by reaſon of the ruggedneſs of the way. About eight a Clock in the morning they arrived at the Bridge, and with all the diligence they could uſe they could not lay the firſt Stranne before noon. The ſecond was fitted and laid about ſeven a Clock in the evening, over which they caſt boughs and thin boards faſtned together with ſplit Canes. About ten a Clock at night the firſt Ranks began to paſs; and ſome few Souldiers were ferried over in a float hewed out of a piece of Wood which they call Maguey, which is very light, and ſomething like thoſe Goards or Calabaças which grow in thoſe Countries, and may be as thick as a man's Leg: theſe Boats are drawn with Cords from one ſide of the River to the other. The Horſes ſwam over with great danger of being drowned; for on the ſides of the River there being no place made for them to enter in gently, they forced and plunged them in from the ſide of the Bank, where the ſtream was ſo rapid that it carried them down and caſt them againſt the Rocks, where, meeting with whirlepools, they were turned quite round, and therein (as Carate reports, Book the ſecond Chapter the fifth) above ſixty Horſe were drowned, and many others were lamed. And though that Countrey was not a place for Horſes to fight in by reaſon of the Rocks and mountainous ways, yet they haſtned over with all diligence poſſible, leſt the Enemy ſhould ſurpriſe them before they had finiſhed their paſſage. And indeed there was good ground to apprehend the coming of the Enemy, for the paſſage was very dangerous in the time of War, which Carvajal ſo well knew that he deſired no other advantage over the Enemy than that. And indeed the difficulties of that River are ſuch, and the Mountains on each ſide are ſo rocky and high, that they are at leaſt two leagues perpendicular in height, the which I can atteſt, having ſeen them my ſelf. And therefore it was not without reaſon that Carvajal demanded this employment for himſelf, and when he was denied, that he complained of his hard fortune; being well aſſured, in caſe they would have intruſted the management of this action unto him, to have returned with Victory; for he knew and was acquainted with the difficulty of the paſſage at Cotapampa.

By

By means of the great diligence which was uſed half the Army was paſſed over by midnight: The firſt that were over, putting themſelves into the beſt order they could, began to climb the Mountain, being deſirous to poſſeſs themſelves of the top before the Enemies were come (which was the greateſt danger they feared) for having ſeiſed that Paſs, they might ſecure the way, and facilitate the aſcent of the whole Army. Thoſe in the Van having gotten half way up the Mountain, a falſe alarm was given, no man knows how nor from whence, which cauſed ſuch a general conſternation and confuſion, that many of thoſe who were not as yet paſſed over, both Horſe and Foot ran away as if they had been purſued; and ſo general was the affrightment and terrour, that the Captains Porcel and Pardaue, and Gabriel Rojas Captain of the Ordnance, and divers other Souldiers of note, who were in the Rere Guards and in the main Body, ſeeing with what confuſion and diſorder the Souldiers were put into flight, ſaid one to another, if this alarm be true we ſhall all be loſt and defeated this night. But as good fortune would have it, the alarm proving falſe, the diſturbance and noiſe was quieted, and thoſe that fled rallied again, and every one made the beſt of his way that he could. Thoſe who were in the Van, and were the firſt to climb the Mountain, were likewiſe ſtruck with the ſame terrour, and ran away with their Arms: but the alarm appearing to be falſe, they proceeded on their way, and came to the Fountain before break of day; which was the place where John de Acoſta was to have lain in wait for them, had he obſerved the Orders of Franciſco de Carvajal, in performance of which the whole fortune and ſucceſs of that day depended. Thoſe who came to the Fountain, having quenched their thirſt with thoſe pleaſant Waters, proceeded on their way, and having got to the top of the Mountain, they put themſelves into a Body; but they were ſo few, and thoſe without any Commander, that fifty men might eaſily have defeated them: howſoever in a ſhort time after their numbers increaſed, for the General Pedro de Hinojoſa, and the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, who had paſſed the Bridge, and remained at the foot of the Mountain, animated the Men, and encouraged them to make good their aſcent: The other half of the Army, being affrighted with the late alarm, did not paſs the Bridge with their Ordnance untill nine a Clock in the morning; which having done, they marched after their companions with all diligence imaginable; and here we will leave them to ſee what was become of John de Acoſta, who was departed from Cozco to hinder the Enemy from paſſing the River.

This Captain having received his Inſtructions and Diſpatches from the Lieutenant-General, departed from the City with two hundred Muſquetiers mounted on Horſe-back, and thirty Lances, all choice men; and having marched the firſt four leagues, he there ſtaid and lodged all night, contrary to the orders and directions which had been given him; and ſo negligent and careleſs he ſeemed to be, that two of his Souldiers took an opportunity to leave him, and give advice unto the Enemy of his coming: The next morning about ſeven a Clock he began his march again, and that day another of his Souldiers ran away, called John Nunnez de Prado a Native of Badajoz, who gave intelligence of the diſtance, the Enemy was from them, and of the Orders given by Carvajal, which were ſo exact and regular that every thing was meaſured by hours and leagues; which gave the Preſident and his Captains ſome thoughts and apprehenſion of matters which were to ſucceed: for when they underſtood, that an alarm was to be given at ſuch an hour in the night, they were extremely fearfull leſt it ſhould cauſe ſome great diſorder; for if the late falſe alarm had put them into the confuſion before mentioned, what could they imagine would be the effects of a true alarm, cauſed by a ſurpriſe in the night? but by the negligence and unactive ſpirit of John de Acoſta none of theſe matters were put in action, but all the methods and rules failed; which was objected to Gonçalo Piçarro as a failure in his conduct, as Auguſtine Carate, Book the ſeventh Chapter the fourth, intimates, where ſpeaking of the Squadron which the Preſident formed of Indians and Negroes, he adds farther,

That when John de Acoſta ſent his Spyes to ſurvey the number of the Enemy's Camp, and receiving a report that they were very numerous, he durſt not engage with them, but returned again for a greater force; by which over-ſight and default the Preſident gained time to finiſh his Bridge, and tranſport his Souldiers. And here it is that Piçarro was much blamed for his conduct, for had he placed onely a hundred men at each of theſe Paſſes, it had been impoſſible for the Enemy to have made good their way over the Water: with which ſaying Carate ends that Chapter.

Chapter. And indeed he had much reaſon for this Aſſertion; for certainly that paſſage is ſo difficult and horrid as cannot be expreſſed or deſcribed. When John de Acoſta underſtood by his Scouts that he was not far from the deſcent of that ill way, he advanced with ſix Horſemen to take a view of the Enemy, and finding that they had already poſſeſſed themſelves of the top of the Mountain, and were ſo very numerous, he durſt not engage with them: the truth is, they deceived him much in their numbers, and made him believe they were many more than in reality they were; for, as Hiſtorians ſay, they mounted their Indians and Negroes on Horſes and Mules, and put Lances and Partiſans into their hands, and drew them up into a martial poſture; and that the Enemy might not diſcover the quality of this Rabble, they placed three or four Files of Spaniards in the Front well appointed and armed, to cover the Negroes and Indians in their diſguiſe; and then of the Infantry they formed another Squadron of the like condition. The Hiſtorians add farther, that Acoſta, to amuſe Piçarro and make him believe that he would doe ſomething, ſent for a recruit of three hundred Muſquetiers; but he having not acted according to any of thoſe Rules which Carvajal had given him, the deſign was loſt; and when the Recruits came to him, finding himſelf unable to engage with the Preſident, he retreated to Cozco without any action, to give an account to Piçarro of what had paſſed, and that the Preſident approached near unto the City.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Gonçalo Piçarro publiſhes his Orders for the Army to march out of Cozco. Carvajal diſſuades him from it, and puts him in mind of a Prophecy relating to his life. The Preſident marches towards Cozco. The Enemy goes forth to meet him.

THE deſign of John de Acoſta failing, Piçarro reſolved to march forth and meet the Enemy, and give him Battel; for having formerly had ſucceſs againſt Indians and Spaniards, he took the greater confidence to adventure all his fortunes on the hazard of War. In order hereunto he made Proclamation that in four days time every man ſhould put himſelf in a readineſs to march to Sacſahuana, being four leagues from the City; but Piçarro having made this publication without the knowledge or privity of his Lieutenant-General, Carvajal was much troubled at it, and told him, that it was by no means proper, or agreeable to the welfare of his affairs to go forth to meet the Enemy; for that was to eaſe the Enemy of a trouble and take it upon himſelf; I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid he, to believe me in this matter, and leave the conduct of it to me. To which Piçarro anſwered, that at Sacſahuana he had made choice of a ſpot of Land very advantageous for him, and where the Enemy could onely attack him in the Front, and that he doubted not to gain a Victory with his Cannon onely. Sir, replied Carvajal, in this Countrey we cannot miſs every where of ſtrong and faſt places, and I know particularly, (if you will be pleaſed to leave it unto me) to chuſe you ſuch a place where you may be aſſured of Victory. My meaning is, that whereas you deſign to march four leagues to meet the Enemy, that you rather change your courſe to the contrary way, and expect their coming at Orcos, about five leagues from hence on the other ſide; which if you are pleaſed to doe, you ſhall then ſee the trouble and confuſion this farther march of five leagues will cauſe amongſt the Enemy, and the difficulties they will have to purſue you: And then having leiſure to ſurvey the ground, you may make choice of the moſt advantageous ſituation to give Battel. And I do again and again beſeech you to retreat back, rather than proceed forward to meet the Enemy, the which I would perſuade you unto though there were nothing more in it than merely what ſome judicial Aſtrologers have prognoſticated concerning your life; namely, that ſuch a year you ſhall run a great hazard to loſe it, but in caſe you then eſcape you ſhall live long in great happineſs and proſperity. The year which threatens your life according to their preſages is almoſt expired; for not many months, or weeks remain before that time determines, which I would therefore adviſe you to protract by a handſome retreat from the Enemy: this I ſay, that you may neither have cauſe to complain of your own raſhneſs, nor your Friends and well-wiſhers to lament your want of conſideration in making too ſlight an account of ſuch predictions: for though there be no certainty in judicial Aſtrology, yet at leaſt it will be good to ſpend out the time, if poſſible, to ſee whether ſuch preſages prove true or falſe. I am well aſſured that the Enemy cannot force you to fight; and perhaps there may be many reaſons which may perſuade you to avoid it, untill ſome greater advantage offers than at preſent appears. Why ſhould we adventure that which we may eaſily avoid, in caſe we intend to travel from one Countrey to another with pleaſure and eaſe, whilſt the Enemy in purſuit of us endure all the inconveniences of a long march and hardſhips which famine and want muſt bring upon them; and in this manner we may ſpin out the time untill the bad influences are paſt which threaten you, and till the days return which the Aſtrologers aſſure you will be more propitious. Piçarro anſwered in few words, that he was reſolved not to make a retreat either far or near, it not being conſiſtent with his honour and reputation; but to follow his fortune, and expect the Enemy at Sacſahuana, and be his deſtiny what it would, he determined to give the Enemy Battel at that place, without regard either to the Moon or Stars. Herewith the diſcourſe ended, at which Carvajal was greatly troubled and complained amongſt his friends and familiar acquaintance, that his Lord the Governour reſolved upon a moſt pernicious courſe, eſpecially in this critical time of his life, which was more dangerous than any other: in this opinion all others did concur, and were much afflicted to ſee him thus reſolute and without regard to his ſafety or condition to deliver up himſelf (as it were) into the hands of his Enemies: there was no doubt but he was a man of great underſtanding; and therefore we may attribute this violent tranſport to the influence of the Stars, which carried him beyond his reaſon, and cauſed him (as it were) to offer the Knife to his own Throat, and reject the reaſonable counſel of his Major-General.

But we muſt return again to the Preſident, and often change our hands from one party to the other. The paſſage being now made free and open by the retreat of John de Acoſta, the Royal Army had liberty to march without fear or danger of an Enemy; but by reaſon of the great incumbrances of Cannon, Ammunition and Proviſions, four days were ſpent before they could clear themſelves out of that uneaſie paſſage, of which three days were required to march from the River to the top of the Mountain, where the Army was drawn up: from which place the Preſident gave command to march the Army with great order; howſoever the ways were ſo narrow and rugged, and the Baggage ſo great that the Officers could not obſerve that rule they deſired; and notwithſtanding all their endeavours, the longeſt march they could make in a day was not above two leagues, and ſometimes but one, and then perhaps they were forced to ſtay a day or two untill the Rere could come up.

In the mean time Gonçalo Piçarro haſtned his Men out of Cozco, and to march unto Sacſahuana, where he deſigned to expect the Enemy and give them Battel. His Captains were all young and ſtout, and ſuch as depended moſt upon their own bravery and courage, in confidence of which they chearfully haſtned out of Cozco, to anticipate the day which ſhould make them Lords and Maſters of all Peru. But Carvajal and thoſe of his opinion, who were the moſt ſober and conſiderate, were very unwilling to meet the Enemy, not having men in whom they could put any confidence; for amongſt their own Party were three hundred of thoſe Souldiers which belonged to Diego Centeno, who had been lately overcome, and many of them as yet not cured of their wounds: and therefore in reaſon ought to be eſteemed for ſuch who deſired their overthrow and deſtruction; or at leaſt would run away in the day of Battel, and diſcourage thoſe who were faithfull Friends to Piçarro.

Theſe conſiderations adminiſtred juſt cauſe of fear and danger; to divert which Carvajal often turned to diſſuade Piçarro from that fatal Counſel, which would inevitably betray him to a loſs of his life, eſtate, honour and every thing that was dear unto him. But ſo God ordained it (as thoſe of the contrary party ſaid) that that Piçarro having completed the meaſure of his iniquity was blindly carried to receive the puniſhment he deſerved. The which obſtinacy ſo diſpleaſed ſeveral of his people, that they purpoſed to have left him if poſſibly they could: and I can confidently aver, that after the Battel of Sacſahuana, and when all things were quieted; I have heard ſome principal Officers who belonged to Piçarro ſay, that if he had followed the advice and counſel of his Major General, they would never have left him, but have died with him: for they eſteemed Carvajal as an Oracle, and entertained ſuch an eſteem of his knowledge and experience in War, that they doubted not of the ſucceſs in all matters where his counſel was followed. But Piçarro perſiſting in his fatal reſolution, marched out of Cozco towards the latter end of March in the year 1548, and in two days came to Sacſahuana, being greatly hindred by his Carriages, Artillery and Baggage, for he was well furniſhed with all proviſions for War, ſo as not to want any thing in caſe the Enemy ſhould ſtay or linger in their coming. And though (as we have ſaid) this action was contrary to the ſenſe and opinion of moſt men; yet, finding Piçarro fixed and reſolute in his determination, none durſt to diſſuade or endeavour to alter his mind: and in regard theſe men evidently ſaw that he went poſitively to ſacrifice himſelf and them to manifeſt deſtruction, every man began to provide for his own intereſt and ſafety; and to abandon Piçarro whom they ſaw plainly offering up himſelf to death in the moſt flouriſhing ſtation of his life, being in the two and fourtieth year of his age; during which time he had been victorious in all the Battels he fought either againſt Indians or Spaniards, and had not above ſix months before obtained that famous Victory at Huarina, which gave him a character above any in this new World: all which fortunes and ſucceſſes were changed, and buried in the Valley of Sacſahuana.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The two Armies meet in Sacſahuana. Gonçalo Piçarro ſhews a diffidence of thoſe Souldiers which belonged to Diego Centeno; and the expectation the Preſident had, that thoſe men ſhould revolt to his ſide. The Offers and Proteſtations which were made by Piçarro. The Anſwer given by Gaſca. It is reſolved to decide the Difference by Battel. The Order of the Royal Army.

Gonçalo Piçarro drew up his Army in a certain place of that Valley, having a River behind not very broad, and a craggy Mountain, and both ſo met together, that the ſituation was naturally ſtrong, and covered the Army on all quarters in ſuch manner that it could not be attacked in the rere nor on either ſide, but on the front onely. This River, towards the Mountain, is fortified with great Water-galls, cauſed by the ſtreams which fall from above: between which and the River Piçarro pitched his Tents, leaving the Plain between the Water-galls and Mountain free and open for drawing up the Army. The Preſident (as we have ſaid) making ſhort marches, arrived in this Valley three days after Piçarro; and three days paſſed with ſmall skirmiſhes and piqueering between ſmall parties; which were of no great moment; by which time all the Imperial Army was come up. The Armies faced one the other for two days afterwards, without engaging; all which time Piçarro and his Captains kept a ſtrict eye and watch on their Souldiers, that none of them ſhould run over to the Preſident. And now one would think, that a Commander, who voluntarily marched to meet his Enemy, ſhould have great confidence in the fidelity of his Souldiers; and not doe as Piçarro, who too late began to diſtruſt Centeno's men, of which there were no leſs than three hundred in the Army; and began to approve the Counſel of Carvajal, who perſuaded him long ſince to diſmiſs thoſe men, of whom there being no aſſurance, they were unfit to be entruſted with ſo great a concernment, wherein Eſtate, Life and Honour did conſiſt. This particular is alſo noted by Lopez do Gomara, Chap. 186. in theſe words:

Piçarro, ſays he, marched out with above a thouſand Spaniards, of which two hundred were Horſe, and five hundred and fifty Muſquetiers; but he was very doubtfull of four hundred who had ſerved under the command of Centeno, which cauſed him to keep a ſtrict guard over them; and to kill ſome of them with Lances who attempted to make an eſcape, &c. Thus far this Authour.

But on the contrary, The Preſident remained with aſſurance of the faithfulneſs of thoſe who revolted over to his Party: particularly (as that Authour reports in the ſame Chapter, which is very long) he was well ſatisfied in the Promiſe which Licenciado Cepeda ſent him by Friar Antonio de Caſtro of the Order of Preachers, who was Prior at that time of Arequepa, that in caſe Piçarro came not to terms of agreement with him, he was reſolved upon breaking off the Treaty, to paſs over to the Emperour's Service.

With this aſſurance the Preſident held a Conſultation with his Captains, whether it were beſt immediately to engage or decline Fighting for ſome time: And though they were all of opinion, that to avoid the effuſion of bloud it were better to forbear; yet, conſidering the neceſſities they ſhould be ſpeedily forced into for want of Proviſions and of Wood, and more eſpecially of Water, which they brought from far, whilſt the Enemy was abundantly ſupplied therewith; it was reſolved to engage the next day; leſt theſe inconveniences happening by ſuch delays, the Souldiers being enforced by hunger ſhould run to the Enemy: but on the ſame Piçarro ſent ſome Articles and Proteſts to the Preſident, as the ſame Authour expreſſes in theſe words.

Piçarro ſent two Prieſts one after another, to require Gaſca to ſhew to him in writing, his Commiſſion and Command of the Emperour: and that in caſe it did appear in the original writing that his Majeſty did enjoin him to leave the Government, he was ready to yield all obedience thereunto, to reſign up his Power and to abandon the Countrey. But in caſe he refuſed ſo to doe, he then declared, that he was reſolved to give him battel, proteſting againſt him for all the bloud and miſeries which ſhould thence enſue. Gaſca being informed that theſe Prieſts had been dealing with Hinojoſa and others, to ſubvert them from their duty, he cauſed them to be deteined, and ſent word to Piçarro, that he was ready to grant free Pardon to him and all his Followers; adding how great honour he had gained in being the principal inſtrument to procure a revocation of the late Ordinances which would now be completed in caſe he would accept of the grace and favour of his Majeſty, and enter into the number of his faithfull Servants: that all thoſe who were engaged on his ſide would have eternal obligations to him for obtaining a Pardon for them, and putting them into a condition of ſafety and riches, without the hazard of Battel, wherein they may be ſlain or be taken Priſoners, to receive the puniſhment of their Rebellion. But all theſe words were wind, and they might as well be preached in the Deſart to the Woods and Rocks as to minds ſo obſtinately inclined, or to deſperate men, and ſuch as believed themſelves invincible; and the truth is, their Camp was well fortified by the ſituation of the place, and was well furniſhed with all Proviſions, and attended by the ſervices of Indians. Thus far are the very words of Gomara. And whereas he ſays, that the Indians were very ſerviceable to them is moſt true; for generally the Indians ſerved Gonçalo Piçarro with more affection than others; by reaſon that he was one of the firſt Conquerours whom they called Children of the Sun, and Brothers to their Kings the Inca's; and therefore gave them the title of Inca's; and particularly they bore a ſingular love and reſpect to Gonçalo Piçarro for being the Brother of the Marquis Franciſco Piçarro; they bewailed his death with much tenderneſs and compaſſion.

The night before it was reſolved to give the Enemy Battel, John de Acoſta was appointed to attack them with a body of four hundred men, in which he was the more forward, in hopes to recover the Credit he had loſt in the late Deſign; by his miſcarriage in which, he was taxed of negligence and want of knowledge in War: and it was well known how much Carvajal lamented his misfortune, by being denyed the conduct of that Affair whereby he hoped to have crowned all his former Actions, and conſummated the glorious exploits of his old age. But whilſt

John

John de Acoſta was juſt ready to make an Attempt of Surpriſe upon the Enemy, news was brought, that one of Centeno's Souldiers was fled to the other Party; whereby fearing that the deſign was diſcovered, that reſolution was laid aſide, much to the ſatisfaction of Piçarro, who was of opinion that his advantage was greater in a full engagement with the whole Body, than to skirmiſh and fight in ſmall parties: and thus much Gomara confirms, and ſays, that Piçarro told Acoſta, that there was no need to adventure his perſon where the Victory was ſecure and already certain. And indeed the confidence of Piçarro and his Officers was grounded on a belief, that every individual Souldier would fight as valiantly as themſelves, which certainly, if they had, it would have gained them the Victory: but their errour ſoon appeared; for neither did thoſe who were reputed valiant, fight like ſuch, nor men of leſs eſteem ſhew themſelves cowards.

The Advice which the Souldier brought who fled from Piçarro, that John de Acoſta was deſigning to ſurprize them and beat up their quarters; cauſed the Preſident to draw out his men and put them into array, in which poſture they continued the whole night, and endured ſo much cold, (as the Hiſtorians Gomara and Carate write) that they were not able to hold their weapons in their hands. But ſo ſoon as it was day, being the ninth of April 1548. the King's Army drew farther out into the open field, and into a larger quarter than the night before. The Infantry were all joined in a Body conducted by their reſpective Captains, and ſupported on each hand with wings of Muſquetiers; and flanked on the left with two hundred Horſe, whoſe Captains were Diego de Mora, John de Saavedra, Rodrigo de Salazar and Franciſco Hernandez Giron, whom Carate calls Aldana: on the right were the Captains Gomez de Alvarado, Don Pedro Cabrera, and Alonſo Mercadillo, with other two hundred Horſe appointed to defend the Royal Standard, which was carried by the Licenciado Carvajal, in the ſame rank with theſe Captains.

On the right hand of theſe (at ſome diſtance from them) Captain Alonſo de Mendoça and Diego de Centeno were ranked with ſixty Horſe under their command, all which, or the greateſt part of them, conſiſted of thoſe who eſcaped from the Battel of Huarina; who would have no other Captain than Mendoça, becauſe he had been their Companion and fellow Souldier in all their travels and ſufferings: and theſe drew up near the River to ſuccour and receive ſuch as ſhould revolt over to their Party; for they expected many to fly over to them from all quarters of the Army; and on this quarter eſpecially there appeared moſt difficulty and danger. Captain Graviel de Rojas was induſtriouſly employed in planting his Cannon in the field, which he with much labour performed by reaſon of the Rocks and ruggedneſs of the way. The General Pedro de Hinojoſa, the Lieutenant General Alonſo de Alvarado, and the Serjeant Major Pedro de Villa-vicencio, and the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, diſpoſed the other Troops and Companies in their due Places. In the Rere of all was the Preſident with three Biſhops, viz. of Cozco, of Quitu and Los Reyes, with the principal perſons of the Order of Preachers, and Friars of the Order of our Lady of Merced, with a very great number of Church-men and Friars, who followed the Camp; for guard of whom a Party of fifty Horſe were appointed, and to defend them in caſe any misfortune ſhould happen.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Succeſs of the Battel of Sackſahuana, to the time of the total defeat of Gonçalo Piçarro.

SO ſoon as it was day Gonçalo Piçarro commanded them to beat a march, and drew out his men into the Plain which lyes between the River and the Mountain: he alſo commanded a Plat-form to be raiſed and the Cannon mounted. It is ſaid alſo, by Gomara, that he committed the charge of drawing up the Army to Licenciado Cepeda, becauſe that Carvajal was ſo angry and diſpleaſed that his his Counſel was not followed; that giving all for loſt he refuſed to take any charge of the Army, but entered himſelf into the ranks of the Infantry, to fight like a private Captain: for which reaſon Hiſtorians make no mention of Carvajal in all this action.

Whilſt the Officers were thus buſily employed in diſpoſing the Army in their ſeveral Stations, Garçilaſſo, my Lord, came out from amongſt them, and upon pretence that his Indian had neglected to bring him his Lance, he deſcended down towards the River, calling out with a loud voice to his Indian; and ſo ſoon as he was got below the Clifts of the Water-galls, he haſtned with all ſpeed poſſible towards the Royal Camp, and having paſſed the wet ground which was between the two Armies, and which drains it ſelf in the River, he then aſcended into the upper grounds, and in the view of both Armies, he preſented himſelf before the Preſident, who received and embraced him with open Arms; and ſaid to him, Seigniour Garçilaſſo, I have long expected that you ſhould render this ſervice to his Majeſty: To which Garçilaſſo replied, That he had long been a priſoner without liberty, and reſtrained from making this open demonſtration, but ſtill had a heart and good will thereunto. Piçarro was much troubled at the departure and loſs of Garçilaſſo; yet, not to diſcourage his own men, he ſeemed to make light of it; and meeting with a Coſin German of my Father's called Gomez Suarez de Figueroa, he ſaid, Garçilaſſo hath left us, and do not you think now, that he will be in a fine condition, in caſe we ſhould get the Victory? and thus did he ſtill flatter himſelf with hopes of ſucceſs, which in a ſhort time after failed, and he undeceived. My Father's eſcape was, as now related, though the Hiſtorians tell us firſt of the flight of Licenciado Cepeda, and then of my Father and others, as if they had all gon away together, but their information was not ſo particular as mine: but there is another Writer, who relates the matter as I have done, and names my Father in the firſt place, and then a Coſin of mine, and others, and that Gonçalo Piçarro was greatly afflicted and troubled for it: And then proceeding on with his Story, he ſays that Licenciado Cepeda ſoon followed after them. The truth is, Garçilaſſo de la Vega fled ſingly without other company, and that he contrived his eſcape in thoſe three days that Piçarro was in the field before the Enemy was come up, during which time he ſurveyed the ground and places over which he might paſs with moſt ſafety; and then it was that he plotted, that his Indian ſhould not bring his Lance, that he might have an excuſe to depart from his company; and that he paſſed under covert of the Clifts, by the River ſide; the which Particulars I heard from himſelf, together with the ſeveral paſſages and ſucceſſes of that great action, when he had leiſure freely to diſcourſe thereof in the times of peace and ſettlement. I have alſo heard Garçilaſſo, my Lord, ſay, that after Gonçalo Piçarro had taken away his horſe Salinillas at the Battel of Huarina, as is before mentioned, that he purpoſely omitted to buy himſelf another, that ſo Piçarro obſerving him on foot, might be moved either to return his horſe to him again, or ſupply him with ſome other: and accordingly it happened, for that four days before Piçarro marched out of Cozco, to fight the Battel at Sacſahuana, he returned him his horſe Salinillas, which was ſo welcome to him, that when he ſaw him in his Stable, he thought that ſome Angel from Heaven had brought him thither. I have not repeated theſe Particulars to excuſe my Father, for all thoſe matters are already paſt, but to relate the truth of things, with the circumſtances of days, hours and moments; for I intend neither to accuſe nor reflect on any man, but like a plain Hiſtorian to lay down matter of Fact. And ſo accordingly let us return to the ſucceſs of that Battel.

Piçarro Forces were drawn up according to the direction of Licenciado Cepeda: and by the ſide of the Mountain a Party of Muſquetiers were detached to skirmiſh with the Enemy: to oppoſe which the Captains Hernan Mexia de Guzman and John Alonſo Palomino were commanded out with their Companies, and cauſed them to retreat without loſs or hurt on either ſide. In the mean time the Cannon plaid on both ſides: but that of Piçarro's did no execution, becauſe the Preſident's Forces being drawn up in a low ground, they ſhot over: but the Preſident's Cannon being planted to more advantage, commanded the Enemy's Camp on all ſides, ſo that two men were killed with the great ſhot, one of which was Page to Piçarro. Whilſt Licenciado Cepeda was drawing up the Forces his eyes were ſtill towards the way where he might beſt eſcape to the Enemy; and feigning, as if he looked for a more advantageous ground, ſo ſoon as he found himſelf at ſome convenient

diſtance off he ſet ſpurs to his Horſe, which was a very comely Beaſt of a dark Cheſnut colour, having his neck, breaſt and hinder parts covered with a thick Bull's Hide dyed black, that it looked very handſomely, and was a new ſort of ornament and covering which I never remember to have ſeen before, nor ſince to the day that I left that Countrey: but this new ſort of hooſing was at that time very dangerous to the Maſter, being particularly noted and known thereby; for he no ſooner began to run towards the Enemy but he was known and purſued by Pedro Martin de Don Benito, mounted upon a large Horſe thin and lean, but in good breath, and as I remember he was of a bayiſh colour, and ſo ſwift that he ran three foot for the other's one, and ſo fetched upon him that he came up with Cepeda juſt as he entred upon the wet ground, which was near the Preſident's Camp, and there he gave his Horſe ſuch a ſtroke with his Lance on the hinder parts that he bore him down into the mire, and gave another wound to Cepeda in the right Thigh, and had certainly killed him, had not four Cavaliers under the command of Alonſo de Mendoça, placed there on ſuch occaſions, come in to his reſcue. Had not the Horſe been overcharged with the weight of his Bull's Leather, he had certainly out-run and eſcaped the Lance of Pedro Martin de Don Benito, who was mounted on an old lean Jade; and having performed this piece of bravery he returned again to the main Body of his Forces; but Licenciado Cepeda being relieved by the timely ſuccours which came to his aſſiſtence, he was taken out of the mire into which he was fallen, and conducted to kiſs the Preſident's Hand, who received him with great joy, and, as Gomara ſaith, kiſſed him on the Cheek; looking upon him for ſo conſiderable a perſon, as that by his deſertion Piçarro was overcome. Thus far Gomara.

After his example many other Souldiers both Horſe and Foot came flocking in from all ſides; amongſt them was Martin de Arvieto, of whom we formerly made mention in the Battel of Huarina, and promiſed to relate ſeveral things of him, of which this particular ſhall ſerve for one. He was well mounted on an excellent Horſe, carrying his Lance in his Wreſt, which ſort of Weapon began to be out of uſe in thoſe days; this Martin Arvieto was accompanied by a Souldier called Pedro de Arenas, born at Colmenar de Arenas, he was little of ſtature, but a neat nimble fellow, and eſteemed honeſt, and a good Souldier; he was mounted on a pretty dapper Mare of a brown Bay, with white ſtreaks, but ſmall and fit for the Maſter, and was more proper to ride about the ſtreets than for an engagement in Battel; and becauſe Arvieto had taken him under his protection, he held his Horſe in with a ſtiff hand, that he might not leave his Companion; which Pedro Martin obſerving, who had already run four or five Footmen thorough with his Lance, immediately purſued after them: Martin de Arvieto who led the way, paſſed eaſily over the mooriſh ground, but Pedro de Arenas's Mare floundred in it, and after two or three plunges ſhe threw her Rider into the mire and dirt, and the girts of the Saddle broke. Arvieto turning about and ſeeing his Comrade in the dirt, interpoſed between him and Martin de Don Benito, which when Benito ſaw, and that Arvieto intended to fight him, he ſtopped his Horſe and ſtood ſtill: whereupon Martin de Arvieto called upon him, and ſaid, Advance Raſcal, and let us try which of us hath ſucked the better milk: but Benito accepted not the challenge, but returned again to his companions. Pedro Martin made many of theſe ſallies, and at laſt a ſhot took him on the right hand, with which his Lance falling, he came to Piçarro without it, and told him, Sir, I am now diſabled, and unfit farther for your ſervice, and thereupon he retired into the Rere of the Horſe. During which time all the Souldiers that could, as well Horſe as Foot, fled over to the Royal Camp; which when Franciſco de Carvajal ſaw, and that, by reaſon of Piçarro's obſtinacy, who perſiſted ſtill in his own humour, all was brought to deſtruction and ruine, he began to ſing with a loud voice; Thus, Mother, doth the wind carry away my hairs two by two, and in this manner continued ſinging, and jeſting upon thoſe who rejected his counſel, untill there was not one man remaining. At length the right Wing of Muſquetiers, pretending unto great Faith and Loyalty, deſired leave to be detached from the reſt of the Body to skirmiſh with the Enemy, which being admitted, and they drawn out, ſo ſoon as they found themſelves at ſome diſtance off, they all ſet to running, and came over to the Preſident; which when he and his Officers obſerved, they reſolved to decline fighting, in expectation that in a very ſhort time all the Forces of Piçarro would come over to them; the which accordingly ſucceeded; for a party of thirty Horſe being drawn out to purſue the Foot,

Foot, followed the ſame example, and ſurrendred themſelves likewiſe to the Preſident: in like manner forty Muſquetiers of the left Wing took the ſame way without any purſuit made after them; for marching off in a Body they often faced about, intending to defend themſelves in caſe they ſhould meet any oppoſition: And moreovet by this time Alonſo de Mendoça and Diego Centeno, with a party of ſixty Horſe, had placed themſelves between the Enemy and the Bog, to ſuccour ſuch as ſhould make their eſcape. Carvajal all this time continued his Song, roaring it out aloud as he ſaw the parties run away. The Pike-men, finding themſelves naked and forſaken on both ſides by their Muſquetiers, and no poſſibility for them to make their flight, upon pretence of skirmiſh with the Enemy, all on a ſudden threw down their Arms and fled by ſeveral ways, which put an end to all Piçarro's Forces. This was the ſucceſs of the Battel of Sacſahuana, if ſo it may be called a Battel; in which there was neither blow with a Sword, nor puſh with a Lance, nor Muſquet ſhot of Enemy againſt Enemy, nor nothing more than what is before related: and ſo ſudden was the deſtruction of Piçarro, that if we ſhould enlarge thereupon it would take up more time in the reading than there was in the tranſaction thereof. On Piçarro's ſide, as Gomara reports, ten or twelve were killed; all which dyed by the hand of Pedro Martin de Don Benito, and other Officers in purſuit of the Fugitives, but by the Forces of the Preſident not a man was ſlain: though Hiſtorians ſay both Parties were within ſhot of each other, and whole Vollies were interchanged; yet it is certain they were above five hundred paces diſtant each from the other: On the other ſide but one was unluckily killed by the miſchance of a ſhot from his Companion.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Gonçalo Piçarro ſurrenders himſelf, judging it leſs diſhonourable ſo to doe than to turn his back and fly. The diſcourſe which paſſed between the Preſident and him. The impriſonment of Franciſco de Carvajal.

THE Pikemen having thrown down their Arms, Gonçalo Piçarro and his Captains were ſurpriſed with a ſtrange aſtoniſhment, being an Act contrary to all expectation: And then Piçarro, turning his face to John de Acoſta, ſaid, Brother John what ſhall we doe? Acoſta, preſuming on his valour more than on his own diſcretion, anſwered, Sir, let us fight and dye like old Romans. No, ſaid Piçarro, it is better to dye like Chriſtians. Gomara, upon this occaſion, Chap. 186, ſaith, that his words were like a good Chriſtian and a valiant Man, for he judged it more honourable to ſurrender than to dye, for that he had never turned his back to his Enemy, &c. And he adds farther, that Piçarro ſtill kept himſelf in a very excellent garb, mounted on a brave Horſe of a Cheſnut colour; he was armed with a Coat of Mail, and over it a Waſtcoat of Sattin well beaten with many doubles, and on his Head he wore a Helmet and Bever of Gold, &c. Auguſtine Carate ſays, that the Coat which he wore over his Arms was of an incarnation Velvet, covered almoſt all over with boſſes of Gold; and that he ſaid to John de Acoſta, ſince all people are going over to the King, I alſo am going likewiſe, &c. Having ſaid this, he proceeded to the Royal Camp, with thoſe Captains who were contented to follow him; namely John de Acoſta, Maldonado, John Velez de Guevara; and as he was going in this manner, he met with Pedro de Villavicencio; whom he obſerving to be well attended, asked who he was, and underſtanding that he was the Serjeant-Major; he ſaid to him, I am Gonçalo Piçarro and am going to render my ſelf to the Emperour: having ſaid this, he yielded up to him his Dagger which he carried in his hand, for that (as Carate ſaith) he had broken and ſpent his Lance upon his own people which fled from him. Villavicencio was very proud of this his good fortune, and with many fair words returned him thanks for the great favour

he

he had done him; and therefore in complement would neither require his Sword nor his Dagger which was girt about him, which was of conſiderable value, the Hilt being all of beaten Gold: proceeding a little farther, he met with Diego Centeno, who ſaid, my Lord, I am heartily ſorrow to ſee your Lordſhip in this condition. Gonçalo Piçarro ſmiled hereat a little, and replied, Captain Centeno, there is nothing to be ſaid more upon this matter, my buſineſs is finiſhed to day, to morrow you your ſelves will lament my fall; and without interchanging more words, he was carried directly to the Preſident's Quarters, who received him in ſuch manner as the three Authours agree; whoſe words we will faithfully repeat. Carate, Book the ſeventh Chapter the ſeventh, ſaith; And ſo he was carried before the Preſident, between whom ſome ſpeeches paſſing which were judged to be bold and ſeditious, he was committed to the cuſtody of Diego Centeno, &c. Gomara, Chapter 186. ſaith, Villavicencio, being proud of ſuch a Priſoner, conducted him forthwith to the preſence of Gaſca; who, amongſt many other queſtions, asked of him, whether he thought he had done well in raiſing War againſt the Emperour? to which Piçarro replied, Sir, I and my Brothers gained this Countrey at our own coſt and expence, and therefore I thought it no crime to aſpire unto the Government, having his Majeſty's word and Commiſſion for it. Gaſca in anger twice commanded that he ſhould be taken from his preſence, and the cuſtody of him was committed to the charge of Diego Centeno, who petitioned for the ſame. Palentino, Chap. 90th. relates the diſcourſe which paſſed on this occaſion, as follows; Gonçalo Piçarro, ſaith he, was carried before the Preſident, and being alighted from his Horſe, he made his humble obeiſance to him: the Preſident laid his faults before him, and would have comforted him, but Piçarro continuing ſtill inflexible and obſtinate; anſwered, That it was he who had gained that Countrey, and putting a ſmooth gloſs on his actions, endeavoured to juſtifie whatſoever he had done; which ſo provoked the Preſident that he retorted very ſeverely upon him in preſence of many ſtanders-by, and told him plainly that whatſoever he could pretend had not ſufficient force to cauſe him to ſwerve from the duty he owed to his Prince, much leſs to become ungratefull and obdurate; for granting that his Majeſty had conferred the favour and honour on his Brother the Marquis to govern this Countrey, yet conſidering that thereby he had raiſed both him and his Brothers from a mean and poor to a rich and high condition, and advanced him from the dunghill to a conſiderable degree, it ought to be ſo owned and acknowledged; eſpecially ſince in the diſcovery of that Countrey there was nothing due to him: it is true his Brother might pretend to ſome merit therein, but he underſtood ſo well the favours his Majeſty had conferred upon him as to eſteem himſelf obliged for ever to continue loyal and within the terms of duty and reſpect: Piçarro would have made ſome reply, but the Preſident commanded the Marſhal to take him away, and deliver him into the cuſtody of Diego Centeno. Thus far Palentino, and with him the other two Authours agree; but all of them are ſo ſhort in the relation they give of this matter, that we think it neceſſary to recount the ſtory more particularly as it paſſed, which was this;

When Gonçalo Piçarro came to the place where the Preſident was, he found him alone with the Marſhall; for the other Commanders, aſhamed to ſee him whom they had denied and ſold, retired at ſome diſtance from them: the ceremonies of reſpect which were made paſſed on Horſeback, for Piçarro did not alight ſeeing that every man kept himſelf on his Saddle, as did alſo the Preſident; and the firſt thing he asked him was, Whether he thought he had done well in raiſing the Countrey againſt the Emperour, and making himſelf Governour thereof contrary to his Majeſty's will and pleaſure, and in killing his Vice-king in a pitch'd Battel: To which he made anſwer, that he had never made himſelf Governour, but was raiſed thereunto by the Judges, who, at the requeſt and deſire of all the Cities of the Kingdom, had given him a Commiſſion in purſuance and confirmation of that Act of Grace which his Majeſty had conferred on his Brother the Marquis, impowering him to nominate a perſon to ſucceed him after his life; and that it was manifeſt and notoriouſly known to all the world that he was the perſon nominated by his Brother: and that having gained the Kingdom, it was but juſt that he ſhould be made Governour of it. And as to the Vice-king, he was adviſed by the Judges, as a thing lawfull and tending to the quietneſs and peace of the Empire, and to his Majeſty's ſervice, to drive out a perſon from amongſt them who was ſo little fit and qualified for Government: and as to his death he was not concerned in it; but he having oppreſſed the people, and put many to death without either Reaſon or Law, was in revenge thereof killed by thoſe whoſe Kindred, Friends and Relations were murthered by him. If thoſe Meſſengers and Miniſters he ſent to his Majeſty to render him an account of the ſtate of his Affairs here (who were the Men who ſold and betrayed him) had been admitted and impartially heard, no doubt but his Majeſty would have accepted his ſervices, and taken other counſels and meaſures than what now appear: for whatſoever he acted then was at the perſuaſion and with the concurrence of the Inhabitants and Repreſentatives of the ſeveral Cities; and was made to believe by Judges and learned Counſellours, that what he acted was agreeable to Law and Equity.

To which the Preſident made anſwer, That he had ſhewed himſelf very ungratefull and undeſerving the gratious favour of his Majeſty towards his Brother the Marquis, whom he had enriched, and, with all his Relations, had raiſed from the duſt to eminent degrees of Wealth and Honour; and that as to the diſcovery of the Countrey, he himſelf had contributed nothing thereunto. Well, replied Piçarro, then let my Brother have the ſole honour of this Diſcovery, yet it cannot be denied but that he had need of the help and aſſiſtance of all the four Brothers, together with the aid of all our Family, and of ſuch as were allied to it. The favour which his Majeſty ſhewed to my Brother conſiſted onely in a bare Title without Eſtate or Revenue thereunto belonging: and if any one ſhall ſay the contrary, I deſire them to aſſign the place where ſuch Eſtate or Revenue remains. And to ſay that we were raiſed from the duſt, ſeems ſomething harſh and ſtrange, for it is well known that we entred Spain with the Goths, and have been Gentlemen for many Ages of an eminent and ancient Family. His Majeſty according to his will and pleaſure may beſtow Offices and places of Truſt on men of obſcure originals, and raiſe them from the duſt who were born in it: And if we were poor we ſought our fortune through the world, and by our induſtry we acquired this Empire, which we have preſented to his Majeſty, though we might have appropriated the ſame unto our ſelves, as others have done who have been the Diſcoverers of new and unknown Countries.

The Preſident, angred at theſe ſayings, cried out twice with a loud voice, Take him away, take him away, This Tyrant is the ſame to day as he was yeſterday: then Diego Centeno came and took him into his cuſtody, having (as we have ſaid) deſired that Office of the Preſident. The other Captains were ſent to different places, to be kept under ſafe Guards; but Franciſco de Carvajal, though an aged man of eighty four years, out of a natural deſire to prolong life, made his eſcape and fled: he was mounted on a Horſe of a light Cheſnut colour, and ſomething old; I knew him, and that he was called Boſcanillo; he was a well-ſhaped Horſe, and had been excellently good in his time: and being now to paſs over a narrow Stream or Brook (as there are many in that Countrey) he haſtily plunged down a Bank of eight Foot deep to the Water, and on the other ſide it was as high to get up, and very rocky, ſo that having paſſed over he laboured much to aſcend the Bank: Carvajal, being old and corpulent, could give no help to his Horſe; for if he had onely held by his Main he had got over, but ſwaying too much upon one ſide, he pulled the Horſe upon him, and both of them fell together into the Brook, and he under his Horſe; in which condition his own Souldiers ſeiſed and took him and carried him away priſoner to the Preſident, in hopes by ſuch a preſent and piece of ſervice to obtain their own Pardons.

CHAP. XXXVII.

What passed between Francisco de Carvajal, Diego Centeno and the President. The imprisonment of the other Captains.

UPON the rumour that Carvajal was taken prisoner, the Souldiers came flocking to see a person so famous as was this Francisco de Carvajal, and instead of comforting him in this affliction, they put lighted Matches to his Neck, and endeavoured to thrust them down between his Shirt and his Skin; and going in this manner he espied Captain Diego Centeno, who had newly placed Gonçalo Piçarro in his Tent under a safe Guard, and committed him to the charge of six faithfull and trusty Friends; and being come out into the Field, Carvajal seeing him, cried out aloud, Captain Diego Centeno, you ought to esteem it as a particular service that I come to render my self into your hands: the meaning of which was, that he having been the Lieutenant-General of an Army, and one who had often overthrown him in fight, and particularly at Huarina, did now in respect to him yield himself his Prisoner rather than to any other; which, according to the ceremonies of War amongst Captains and Souldiers, is esteemed a high complement; and that now he might satisfie his revenge upon him, and triumph over his Enemy. Diego Centeno turning his face about, and seeing that it was Carvajal who called upon him; Sir, said he, I am sorry to see you in this distress: I believe you, said Carvajal, to be a Christian and a Gentleman, and that you will deal with me accordingly, and that you will command these Gentlemen here not to treat me as they have done, meaning the lighted Matches; which when Centeno understood, and that the Rabble was not ashamed to persist and own the fact in his presence, thinking to please him by this usage of his Enemy, he bastanadoed them with his Cane, being a sort of Seamen and Clowns who followed the Camp, and acted according to their breeding. Centeno, having freed him from that vile sort of people, delivered him into the custody of two Souldiers, who were to guard him, and not suffer any injury or affront to be done him; and as they were carrying him away they met with the Governour Pedro de Valdivia, who desired of Centeno to grant him the honour of conducting the Prisoner before the President; which was assented unto, conditionally that he should afterwards send him to his Tent, being desirous to be his keeper, because he believed that in what place soever else he should be committed, he would be ill treated and subjected to many insolences and affronts, in revenge of the former cruelties he had done to others. And being brought by Valdivia before the President, he reproached him with the tyrannies and cruelties he had committed upon his Majesty's Subjects against the publick peace, and the allegeance he owed unto his Sovereign. To all which Carvajal answered not one word, nor submitted himself, nor seemed to give any attention to what was said to him; but turned his eyes on each side of him, with a grave and majestick look, as if he had been Lord Paramount of all those people who were about him; which when the President perceived, he commanded him to be taken and carried to Diego Centeno, who placed him in a Tent apart from Piçarro, where they might have no society or converse together, nor see each other any more.

All the other Captains and Officers were likewise taken, some the same day, and others afterwards, so that not one of them escaped, excepting Captain John de la Torre, who lay concealed four months at Cozco in a poor straw Cottage of an Indian Servant of his, without any knowledge or tidings of him, as if he had been sunk under ground, untill such time as a Spaniard unluckily made a discovery of him, not knowing that it was he, and then he was taken and hanged, though a long time after the others.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of the many Viſits which were made to Carvajal in Priſon, and the Diſcourſe which paſſed between him and thoſe who went to make their Triumphs over him.

ALL the Particulars which we have related concerning the Battel of Sacſahuana were acted and performed by ten a clock in the morning upon the ninth of April 1548. for matters beginning very early, all was ended and quieted by that hour: immediately hereupon the Preſident diſpatched away two Captains to Cozco, both to apprehend and ſeiſe thoſe who were fled, and to prevent the Diſorders of ſuch who intended to plunder and ſack the City. In the Evening many principal Perſons and Captains went to make their Viſits to the Priſoners, ſome out of friendſhip to them, others becauſe of their relation and alliance, and others for the ſake of their Countrey: ſome went to comfort them, and others out of intereſt and deſign to diſcover their Eſtates and Riches which they might inherit: onely thoſe who made their Viſits to Carvajal, could have none of theſe Conſiderations, for he had neither Friend, nor Kinſman, nor Countrey-man; and indeed it was no time then for any man to make known his friendſhip towards him. Howſoever many Gentlemen of quality made their Viſits to him, eſpecially young men who were free, and aiery, and curious, and went rather to triumph over him than to condole with him. But Carvajal was too wiſe and knowing of the World to regard them, but ſcorned and contemned them; as we ſhall ſhortly relate, when we come to repeat his ſeveral apt ſayings, which I heard from thoſe who were preſent that day, of which the Hiſtorians make mention of ſome; but in a different manner; and I ſhall add ſome others which they have omitted.

Carvajal being in priſon, a certain Merchant came to him, and with much concernment told him, that ſome Souldiers under his command, had at ſuch a place robbed and taken from him the value of many thouſands of Ducats in merchandiſe; and I exſpect, ſaid he, to receive ſatisfaction from you who was their Captain and Commander, and ſince you are ſhortly to dye, I charge this debt upon your Conſcience. Carvajal looking about him, and ſeeing the Scabbard remaining in the Belt after they had taken away his Sword, he took it, and gave it to the Merchant; Here, Brother, ſaid he, take this in earneſt and in part of what I owe you, for there is nothing more left me: the which he ſaid to convince the man of his ſimplicity and folly in demanding the reſtitution of thouſands of Ducats from him, who had nothing remaining beſides the Scabbard of a Sword: ſo ſoon as this fellow was gon out, in comes another with the like demand: and having not wherewith to ſatisfie him; he anſwered, that he did not remember he owed any man a farthing, unleſs it were three pence to a Tripe-woman, who lived near the Gate of Arenall at Sevile: And thus he anſwered one folly with another, to convince Fools who came to demand reſtitution of vaſt Sums from him, whom they ſaw without Hat or Cloak, and almoſt quite ſtripped by thoſe who had taken him Priſoner: And indeed Carvajal himſelf was the richeſt Prize of any that was taken that day; for he always carried his wealth with him, which was in Gold, and not in Silver, for the better convenience of its carriage: we might add divers other ſayings which paſſed that day between him and men of mean condition, but we ſhall leave them, to recount other Stories between him and perſons of of greater quality: Amongſt which there came in one who was a man of faſhion and a Captain, very chearfull and brisk, and a great Courtier, and very quick in his Repartees; and amongſt the reſt of his vertues, he was much addicted to whoring and drinking, and made open profeſſion of them. And having diſcourſed ſome time with Carvajal, at the concluſion of all he told him, that he had managed many weighty things wherewith he had defiled his conſcience; and that ſince he was ſpeedily to dye, he exhorted him to examine himſelf, to repent of his Sins, to confeſs them, and ask pardon of God. Sir, anſwered Carvajal, you have ſpoken like a Chriſtian and a Gentleman as you are: and pray alſo apply ply the ſame Counſel to your ſelf, which will be as wholſome for you as for me: And now pray do me the favour to reach me a cup of that liquor which the Indians are drinking: the Gentleman preſently aroſe from his Seat, and without other reply, went and fetched a Diſh of that liquor, and brought it to Carvajal; who received it; and to ſhow his compliance with the Gentleman's kindneſs, drank it, and threw the diſh from him: And thus this Spark was repaid for his good Counſel; by which he was put ſo out of countenance, that when he afterwards jeſted with any of his friends, and that any of them found him too nimble in his Repartees; they would ſay, Away, away, Let us goe to Carvajal, and he will ſet us all at rights. Another Gentleman of good quality, younger than the other, but looſe and extravagant in the vices of his youth, and who took pleaſure to publiſh and boaſt of them; began to preach to Carvajal in the ſame manner as the other had done, ſeeming very zealous for his Repentance, being ſhortly to dye. To which Carvajal made this anſwer, You have ſpoken, Sir, like a Saint, but we have this Proverb, A young Saint, and an old Devil: with which this young Gentleman was put to ſilence. But another Gentleman received ſeverer language from him, being known to come with intention to ſcorn and triumph over him, rather than to admoniſh or comfort him: for his Salutation was this; I kiſs your Worſhip's hands, Good Seignior Lieutenant General: For though your Worſhip would have hanged me at ſuch a place; yet, (having now forgotten it) I come to know wherein I may ſerve you, which I ſhall readily perform without remembrance of my late ill uſage. Sir, replied Carvajal, What is it you can doe for me, which you offer with ſuch mighty oſtentation and gravity? Can you ſave my life? If you cannot doe that, you can doe nothing; When, as you ſay, I would have hanged you, I could have done it if I had pleaſed: but perhaps you were ſo much a Raſcal, that I did not think you worth the hanging; and now, forſooth, you would ſell me what you have not. Go your ways, in the Name of God, before I ſay worſe to you. In this manner did he ſcorn and triumph over his Enemies, and never did he carry himſelf with that conſtancy of mind, authority, gravity and ſteadineſs as he did that day when he was taken. I was acquainted with all thoſe three Gentlemen whom I have here mentioned, but it is not reaſon to name any man, but on occaſion of ſome great action: but they all afterwards became Citizens of Cozco, and had the beſt quarters of that City aſſigned to them.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Captains who were executed, and how their Heads were ſent into divers parts of that Kingdom.

TO the preceding Diſcourſes we ſhall add this one of a different nature to all the reſt. There was a certain Souldier called Diego de Tapia whom I knew, and of whom I have made mention in our Hiſtory of Florida, lib. 6. chap. 18. and who had been one of Carvajal's Souldiers, and much eſteemed by him, becauſe he was a good Souldier, active and fit for buſineſs. He was of little ſtature, but well ſhaped and had revolted over to Carvajal before the Battel of Huarina; this poor fellow, coming to Carvajal, wept, and ſhed many tears with great tenderneſs: alas, Sir, ſaid he, Father, how much am I troubled to ſee you in this diſtreſs; I wiſh to God, that my life might ſatisfie for yours, for it could never be better offered than for you. Alas, Sir, how much am I grieved for you! had you fled, and made your eſcape with me, it had fared otherwiſe with you. To which Carvajal replied, I do not doubt of the ſorrow and ſenſe you have of my condition; and I am much obliged to you for the expreſſions you have made of your good will to me, offering to exchange your life, to purchaſe mine. But tell me, Brother Diego, ſince we were ſuch great and intimate Friends, why thou didſt not tell me of thy intention to be gone, that we might have fled away together? With which Anſwer the Standers-by were much pleaſed, pleaſed, and laughed, wondering to ſee ſuch preſence of mind and readineſs of ſpirit in a man of his condition to reply ſo aptly on every thing that was ſaid to him. All this and much more paſſed between Carvajal and others, on the very day of this Battel, or rather a Defeat without a Battel: But as to Gonçalo Piçarro, he remained alone, and no company admitted to ſee him, becauſe he ſo deſired it: unleſs Diego Centeno and ſix or ſeven principal Souldiers more, who were ſet over him for his guard.

The day following Gonçalo Piçarro and his Lieutenant General, with all the Captains taken, were brought to Execution, as Gomara relates, chap. 187. and particularly nominates John de Acoſta, Franciſco Maldonado, John Velez de Guevara, Dioniſio de Bovadilla, Gonçalo de Los Nidos; and ſays, that of the laſt of them, they drew his Tongue out at the Nape of his Neck; but he alledges no reaſon for it; onely we may believe, it was for treaſonable words ſpoken againſt his Imperial Majeſty: all theſe and many others were hanged; and though they were Gentlemen, yet they loſt their privilege by becoming Traytors and Rebels to their King: After they were executed, their Heads were cut off, and ſent into divers parts and Cities of the Countrey: The Heads of John de Acoſta and Franciſco Maldonado were pitched upon Iron Spikes in the Market-place of Cozco, which I ſaw there, though Palentino, chap. 92. ſaith, that Acoſta's Head was ſet up at Los Reyes: the Head of Dioniſio de Bovadilla, and another with his, was carried to Arequepa; and thereby that which the good Lady Joan de Leyton preſaged of this Bovadilla, was accompliſhed; ſaying, when he carried the Head of Lope de Mendoça to be ſet up in that City, that they ſhould in a ſhort time take that Head down, and ſet up his in the place thereof. The ſeveral Authours write, that they haſtned the execution of Gonçalo Piçarro and of his Officers concerned with him, with all expedition poſſible; for they conceived that the Countrey could not be ſafe and in peace whilſt they were living. Piçarro received ſentence to have his Head cut off for a Traytor, his houſes in Cozco demoliſhed, and the ground ſowed with Salt, and thereon a Pillar raiſed with this Inſcription, Theſe are the Dwellings of that Traytor Gonçalo Piçarro, &c.

All which I my ſelf have ſeen performed and acted, and thoſe very houſes razed to the ground, which were once the lot of Gonçalo Piçarro and his Brothers, when the Countrey was divided: that place in the Indian Tongue was called Coracora, which is as much as to ſay, The Herb-garden. Piçarro, as we have ſaid, was deteined a Priſoner in the Tent of Captain Diego Centeno, where they uſed him with the ſame reſpect as had been given him in the time of his greateſt Proſperity: all that day he would eat nothing, though invited to it, but walked up and down the whole day very penſive and full of thoughts. After ſome hours in the night he called to Centeno, and asked him whether he was ſecure for that night? his meaning was, whether they would kill him that night, or let him live untill the next day; for he was not ignorant that his Enemies thirſted after his bloud in ſuch a manner that every hour ſeemed a year to them untill he was diſpatched out of this World. Centeno anſwered, that he might reſt ſecure as to that, howſoever his mind was unquiet; he lay down after Mid-night and ſlept for about the ſpace of an hour, and then ariſing again, he walked untill break of day; and ſo ſoon as it was light, he deſired to have a Confeſſour, with whom he remained untill Noon: where we will leave him for awhile to entertain our ſelves with a Narrative of the manner how Carvajal behaved himſelf that day, which in reality was not ſo wild and extravagant as one of our Authours reports it to have been; but in a far different manner, as I ſhall relate with great truth and impartiality: Nor am I moved to ſpeak favourably of him in reſpect to former benefits and engagements which I have received from him; but rather the contrary, for he deſigned to have killed my Father after the Battel of Huarina, and ſought for ſome pretences for it, ariſing from jealouſie and his own vain ſuſpicions. Howſoever an Hiſtorian ought to lay aſide all prejudice and malice againſt any perſon, nor ſpeak out of favour or affection, but clearly to relate matter of fact for information of poſterity in after-Ages: And accordingly I proteſt as a Chriſtian, that I have abreviated many particulars, and omitted divers circumſtances of things that I might not ſeem biaſſed towards any perſon, or plainly to contradict the allegations of the aforeſaid Authours, and particularly Palentino, who came late into this Countrey; and took up many Fables which the common People reported for Truths, according to the ſeveral Factions and Parties which they followed.

The

The things which I have ſaid already, and what I ſhall hereafter add more diſtinctly, I took up at firſt in the time of my youth, as I heard them accidentally diſcourſed amongſt men: for indeed about that time, and for ſome years afterwards, there was ſcarce any meeting of Perſons of Quality but where theſe paſſages were the common entertainment: Afterwards, in my more ripe years, I received a farther information thereof from thoſe who had been Guards to the perſons of Carvajal and Gonçalo Piçarro: for the Tents wherein theſe two perſons were lodged were near to each other; ſo that the Souldiers who were appointed to be their Guards, being Perſons of Note, did often change their ſtations, and paſs from one Tent to another: and upon their Teſtimonies who have ſeen and heard theſe Matters I ground my Relation.

And now to ſhew the difference between the particulars related by this Authour touching the behaviours of Carvajal and Piçarro after their impriſonment: and that which we have written and ſhall write hereafter, we ſhall extract ſome few ſayings of them, which indeed are nothing but vulgar talk and ſtreet-news, and not received by Perſons of Quality and underſtanding. That which Palentino ſaith, Chap. the 90th, is this: Then they carried Franciſco de Carvajal before the Preſident; who was taken in the purſuit as he was fallen in a Bog; and as he was conducted by Pedro de Valdivia, the Commonalty was ſo incenſed againſt him, that they would have killed him; which Carvajal perceiving, deſired the Preſident not to hinder them, but ſuffer them to kill him in that very place. It happened at that time, that the Biſhop of Cozco came to him, and ſaid, wherefore was it, Carvajal, that thou killedſt my Brother? for he had hanged his Brother Ximenez after the Battel of Guarina: To which he anſwered, that he had not killed him: Who was it then, ſaid the Biſhop? His own deſtiny, ſaid Carvajal: with which the Biſhop growing angry, and laying before him the crime he committed in the murther of his Brother, he bore up to him, and gave him three or four blows over the Face with his Fiſt.

In like manner much People flocked in upon him, giving him opprobrious language, reviling him for the many ill and cruel actions that he had done; to all which Carvajal was ſilent, and made no reply; At that time Diego Centeno coming in, reproved the people for their rude treatment of him; which cauſed Carvajal to look earneſtly upon him; and ask him, who he was, that dealt ſo civily with him: Centeno replyed, Sir, do not you know Diego Centeno? In truth, Sir, ſaid Carvajal, I have ſeen your back parts ſo often, that coming now to ſee your face; I ſcarce knew you: meaning the purſuits he had made after him: Howſoever Centeno was ſo little offended at this reply, that he followed him into the Tent, where he was detained priſoner, and ſtill continued to offer him all the ſervices which were in his power to doe for him, though he was well aſſured, that if he were in his condition, he would not ſhew the like to him; which when Carvajal heard, he made a little pauſe and ſtop, and ſaid, Seignior Diego Centeno, I am no ſuch Child or Fool, as with the fear and apprehenſion of death, to be moved unto ſo much folly and vain hopes, as to requeſt of you any kindneſs or good Office; nor do I remember at any time, in the beſt days of my life, that ever ſuch a ridiculous propoſal was made to me as this formal offer of ſervice which you make me; which having ſaid, they carried him into the Tent.

In all the Royal Army there was but one man killed, of Piçarro's there were fifteen; which happened according to the diſpoſition of Divine Providence; that his Majeſty might have occaſion thereby to exerciſe his mercy and clemency towards Piçarro and his Souldiers. And thus did God out of his infinite compaſſion put an end to theſe troubles, with ſo little effuſion of bloud as this which happened: which indeed was very ſtrange, in caſe we conſider, that on both ſides there were fourteen hundred Muſquetiers, ſeventeen pieces of Cannon, above ſix hundred Horſe, with a great number of Piques and Lances: for when the King's party perceived in what manner their Enemies were loſt and defeated, they had nothing to doe, but to receive them, and give them quarter when they ſurrendred, &c.

In the following Chapter, which is the ninety firſt, having related the ſentence which was paſſed upon Gonçalo Piçarro; he there adds, that when ſeveral gave their Votes to have his quarters ſet up in the publick places of the City, the Preſident, out of reſpect to the Marquis, his Brother, refuſed to give his conſent thereunto: and that at his death he ſhewed himſelf very penitent for the ſins he had committed committed againſt God, the King and his neighbours. The ſame day Franciſco de Carvajal was executed: he was drawn and quartered; and his quarters diſpoſed of in divers places about the City of Cozco: but his Head with that of Piçarro's was carried to Lima: and Piçarro's houſe likewiſe in that City was demoliſhed, and the ground ſtrewed with Salt, with a Motto or Inſcription ſet thereupon. This Carvajal, from the time that he was taken, to the time that he was executed, ſhewed as little fear and apprehenſion, and was as little concerned at the approach of death, as he had been at any time of his greateſt proſperity: for when the ſentence was declared to him, he received it without any alteration or change in his countenance; and ſaid, 'Tis no matter, I can but dye. That day in the morning Carvajal asked how many had been executed; and when it was told him, that none had been as yet; he ſaid, your Lord Preſident is a very merciſull Prince, for if the fortune of the day had been ours, I ſhould at one ſitting have diſpoſed of the quarters of nine hundred men. He was hardly perſuaded to come to confeſſion, for he told them, that he had confeſſed lately; and when they talked to him of reſtitution, he laughed aloud; ſaying, that he had nothing to ſay as to that point; and ſwore that he owed nothing to any perſon, unleſs half a Royal to a Tripe-woman who lives at the Gate of Arenal in Sevile, which debt he made at the time when he remained there in expectation of a paſſage into the Indies; being on the hurdle to be drawn and crouded into a Hamper inſtead of a large Flaſket; he ſaid, Children and Old men are put into Cradles: and being come to the place of execution, the people crouded ſo to ſee him, that the Hang-man had not room to doe his duty; and thereupon he called to them, and ſaid, Gentlemen, pray give the Officer place to doe Juſtice. In fine, he died more like a brave Roman than a good Chriſtian. Thus far Palentino, whoſe relation ſeems to be grounded on the report of ſome perſons who hated Carvajal for the evil he had done them, and not being able to wreak their anger on his perſon, would ſatisfie their revenge upon his fame and reputation.

CHAP. XL.

What Franciſco de Carvajal ſaid and did on the day of his death, and what account Authours give of his condition and skilfulneſs in War.

BUT now to return to what this Authour ſaid. It is not to be believed, that a Biſhop ſo religious as he of Cozco was, ſhould either in publick or in ſecret ſtrike an old man of eighty four years of age; nor is it probable that Diego Centeno who was a diſcreet and judicious perſon ſhould offer his ſervice with ſo much complement as is reported, to a man whom he knew would be executed in a few hours. Nor can we think that Franciſco de Carvajal, of whom all Writers give the character of a ſober, diſcreet perſon; and in teſtimony thereof publiſh many of his wiſe and ſententious ſayings, ſhould utter ſuch vile and unſeemly expreſſions as are before related: Nor yet are theſe ſtories to be fathered on the Authour, who no doubt heard and received them in the City, where they were framed and vented, and may properly paſs for Shams, which are lyes formed and coloured to paſs for truths. For Franciſco de Carvajal did not diſſemble his knowledge of Centeno, but diſcourſed with him, as is mentioned; and I am well aſſured thereof from the teſtimony of thoſe who that very day were preſent at the meeting of theſe perſons. And though Gomara, in Chap. 187. confirms almoſt the ſame, yet it is with ſo little difference, that 'tis probable Palentino took it from his Narrative. For ſo it was, that a Souldier of principal rank amongſt thoſe of Peru, coming into Spain, ſoon after Gomara's Hiſtory was publiſhed, accidentally met with this Authour in the Streets, and having ſome diſcourſe with him upon ſeveral paſſages, he asked him, how he durſt adventure to print ſo manifeſt a lye, when no ſuch thing paſſed; and thereunto thereunto added ſeveral other affrontive words, not convenient to be reported here. For which Gomara could make no other excuſe, than that he did not frame the Story himſelf, but received it from others whoſe paſſion might cauſe them to ſpeak malitiouſly: to which the Souldier replied, that it was the part of a diſcreet Hiſtorian not to take up reports upon common hearſay, but to weigh every thing with mature deliberation, ſo as neither to praiſe men who are worthy of commendation, nor yet defame ſuch who deſerve honour and high eſteem; and hereupon Gomara departed from the Souldier greatly troubled, that he ſhould ſay in his Hiſtory, that Carvajal did not know to Centeno. And as falſe it is, that Carvajal ſhould ſay, that he would have diſperſed the quarters of nine hundred men through thoſe fields, for certainly he never was ſo vain and inconſiderate to utter ſuch matters. And now I ſhall tell what I heard from thoſe who were in company with him all that day; and I much depend upon their Relation, having been educated with them from nine years of age untill I came to be twenty, when I left my own Countrey, and went into Spain: The truth of which Story is this; So ſoon as it was day, Franciſco de Carvajal ſent to call to him Pedro de Lopez de Caçalla, Secretary to the Preſident Gaſca; and after he had diſcourſed with him for ſome time in private, he drew out three very fine Emeralds, with a hole drilled through them to hang on a ſtring; two of them were of an oval form, and the other round, which he tied upon his left Arme: and taking the biggeſt of them apart from the reſt, he ſaid, Mr. Secretary, this belongs to the Heirs of Antonio Altamarino, and is valued at five thouſand pieces of Eight, which make ſix thouſand Ducats: I deſire the favour of you, to ſee it reſtored to the true Proprietor: the other belongs to ſuch an one (whoſe name I have forgot) which is valued at four thouſand pieces of Eight; and in like manner I deſire you to ſee it given to the right Owner. This, which is the leaſt, is my own; which I deſire you to ſell for me, and whatever it produces, to employ it in Maſſes, to be ſaid for my Soul, that God may accept thereof, and pardon my Offences. The Secretary, not pleaſed with this offer, told him; that he expected from him ſome larger offers of reſtitution, and that if he were diſpoſed ſo to doe; he would add ten thouſand pieces of Eight of his own, to make up his a greater ſum, and that he would beſtow it, as he ſhould direct. Sir, ſaid Carvajal, I never raiſed this War, nor was I the cauſe of it; and that I might avoid all Engagements therein, I was upon my Voyage into Spain, and advanced ſeveral leagues on the way: but being diſappointed of means to eſcape; I took the ſide which fell to my Lot, as Souldiers of fortune uſe to doe; and as I did when I ſerved the Emperour in quality of Serjeant Major, under Vaca de Caſtro, who was Governour of this Kingdom. If there have been Robberies and Plunderings on either ſide committed, we muſt attribute them to the natural effects of War: for my own part, I took nothing from any man, but contented my ſelf with what was given me out of free-will: and at the concluſion of all, they have taken every thing from me, I mean, what was given me, and what I poſſeſſed before the beginning of this War. All which I refer to the infinite mercy of God our Lord, whoſe pardon I beg for all my Offences, and that he would proſper and preſerve you, and repay you the charity you have offered me; for the Good-will ought to be eſteemed for the Deed. And thus ended this Diſcourſe with the Secretary. In the afternoon the Secretary ſent him a Confeſſour, as he deſired, whom he entertained with his Confeſſion untill towards the Evening; and in the mean time the Officers of Juſtice ſent two or three times to haſten his diſpatch, that the ſentence might be executed: but Carvajal was deſirous to protract the time till night, that he might ſuffer in the dark. But it was not granted him, for the Judge Cianca and the Major General Alonſo de Alvarado, who had paſſed ſentence upon him were very importunate to have him diſpatched, untill which time every moment ſeemed weeks and years. Atlength being brought out of the door of the Tent, he was crouded into a ſort of Basket in nature of a hurdle, drawn by two great Mules which had not gone above three or four paces before he was overturned, with his face on the ground; and lifting up his head, as well as he was able, he called out to thoſe who followed him, Gentlemen, conſider, that I am a Chriſtian, which was no ſooner ſaid, than he was raiſed up again by at leaſt thirty of the Prime Souldiers belonging to Diego Centeno: and one of them particularly told me, that when he came to the Basket, he thought it had been one of the largeſt ſize, but when he came to put his hand under it, he found that he was ſo thruſt and crouded into it, that he could not get out one of his Armes, he was so penned within; so that they were forced to carry him to the foot of the Gallows, which was erected on this occasion. All the way he went he said his prayers in Latin, which the Souldier, who gave me this relation, did not understand; the two Priests who went along with him did ever and anon put him in mind to recommend his Soul unto God; to which Carvajal made answer, So I do, Sir, and said no more: in this manner being come to the place of execution, he submitted with all humility to his death, without speaking a word, or shewing any misdemeanour. Thus dyed the brave Francisco de Carvajal, of whom at his death Gomara, Chap. 187. gives this Character:

He was eighty four years of age when he died, he had been an Ensign at the Battel of Ravenna, and Souldier under a very great Captain; he was the most famous Warriour of all the Spaniards, who had passed into the Indies, though he had no great parts, nor great experience. But I know not what Gomara means in so saying; for what greater testimonies can a chief Officer give of his abilities and experience than to overcome in Battel, and know how to gain Victories over his enemies. Some Historians say of him, that he was born in a certain Village of Arevalo, called Ragama; it is not known of what Family he was, onely that he had been a Souldier all his life, and was an Ensign at the Battel of Ravenna; and, as hath been said, he was present when the King of France was taken prisoner at Pavia: he was also at the sacking of Rome, but got nothing there, it happening to him, as to other good Souldiers, that whilst they are fighting the Cowards run away with the booty. Three or four days after the Town was taken and sacked, Carvajal finding that no share of the prey fell to him, he entred into a Notary's or Scrivener's Shop, where he found great numbers of Writings, Bills, and Bonds, and Conveyances of Estates, all which Carvajal seised upon, and carried away four or five Mules lading thereof, and lodged them at his own Quarters: so soon as the fury of the plunder was over, and that things began to be quiet, the Scrivener returning to his House perceived that all his Writings were carried away, and considering that no man could make any benefit thereby, he hunted up and down all the Town for them, and at length finding them in Carvajal's hands, he agreed for a thousand Ducats to have them restored; which enabled him to make a Voyage to Mexico, with his Wife Donna Catalina Leyton; though some, as we have said, will not allow her to be his Wife: howsoever it is certain he was married to her, and she was generally esteemed for his Wife over all Peru, and for a vertuous Woman of noble extraction; for the Family of the Leytons is very ancient in the Kingdom of Portugal. From Mexico (as we have said) Carvajal passed to Peru; and in all the course of his life the War was his delight, and the thing which he loved and adored, availing himself more on the reputation of a Souldier than of a good Christian: and this is the character which all Authours give of him; though generally speaking, he was not so bad as is reported, for he esteemed it the principle of a good Souldier to be a man of his word, and he was very gratefull for any benefit, gratuity, or kindness given or shewn to him. Augustine Carate, speaking of Carvajal, Book 5. Chap. 14. hath these words;

He was a man of a middle stature, very corpulent, and of a ruddy and sanguine complexion; he was very skilfull in military affairs, having always been practised in War: he was very patient of labour and hardship, much more than was agreeable to his age: for it is strange to consider, that neither day nor night he put off his Arms, nor did he lie on a Bed when it was necessary for him to take his natural rest, but onely reposed himself on a Chair with his Arm under his Head. He was so great a lover of Wine, that when he found no Spanish Wine he would drink of that Liquor which the Indians use, which never any Spaniard, that I have seen, did ever delight in. He was very cruel in his nature; for he put many people to death upon very slight causes, and some without any fault or cause at all; onely for reasons of State, or conservation of the military Discipline: and when he put them to death he did it without any remorse or compassion, passing upon them jeers and sarcasms, and shewing himself pleasant and facetious at that unseasonable time. In short, he was a very bad Christian, as he shewed both by his words and actions. Thus far Augustine Carate.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Cloaths which Franciſco de Carvajal wore, and of ſome of his quaint Sentences and Sayings.

Franciſco de Carvajal did much value himſelf on the trade and formalities of a Souldier; he commonly wore, inſtead of a Cloak, a Mooriſh Bornoz or Plad of a brown Colour, with a Fringe and a Cape to it; in which habit I have often ſeen him. On his Head he wore a Hat, having the brims lined with black Taffaty, and a plain Silk Hatband, with a plume of white and black Feathers taken from the Wings and Tails of common Cocks or Hens, twined one within the other in form of an X, the which piece of gallantry he affected, that his Souldiers might follow his example, and wear any Feathers whatſoever; for he would often ſay, that Feathers were the proper badge of a Souldier and not of a Citizen, for that which was the dreſs of one was a ſign of fantaſtical lightneſs in the other: and that he that wore this Device did thereby promiſe great valour and bravery; that is, That he would fight with one ſingly and kill him, ſtay for two, and not fly from three: and though this was not Carvajal's ſaying, but an old Proverb amongſt the Souldiery relating to their Feathers, yet he was a man who, on all occaſions, uttered many quaint Sayings and Sentences full of wit and pleaſantneſs: I wiſh I could remember them all for divertiſement of the Reader, but ſuch as I can call to mind, and are modeſt and civil, I ſhall repeat; for he uſed much liberty in his ſpeech, and ſome undecencies which are not fit to be mentioned.

Carvajal meeting upon a certain time with a Souldier who was crooked in his Body, and very ill ſhaped, asked him, Sir, What is your name? to which he made anſwer, that it was ——Hurtado, which is as much as a thing ſtoln. I for my part, ſaid Carvajal, ſhould be troubled to find you, much more to ſteal. Carvajal marching one day with his Troops, chanced to meet with a Friar, who was a Lay-brother, and as there were no Lay-Friars at that time in the Countrey, and I know not whether any of them are come thither ſince, he ſuſpected that he was a Spie, and would have hanged him; but to be the better aſſured thereof, he invited him to dinner; and then to make an experiment whether he was a Friar or not, he ordered his Servants to give him drink in a Cup ſomething bigger than ordinary, to try if he took it with both hands, or with one; and ſeeing that he took it with both hands, he became aſſured that he was a Friar, and ſo called to him, Drink it up, Father, drink it up, for it will give you life: meaning that if he had not drank it in that manner he ſhould have been confirmed in his ſuppoſition, and would moſt certainly have hanged him.

Carvajal having one of his greateſt enemies in his power, and intending to hang him; the Priſoner asked him in a kind of menacing way what reaſon he had to put him to death, and ſaid, Sir, Pray tell me plainly what reaſon you have to kill me? Oh, ſaid Carvajal, I underſtand you well, you are deſirous to be eſteemed a Martyr, and lay your death at my door: Know then that I hang you for being a loyal Servant to his Majeſty; go your ways then, and take your reward for your faithfulneſs and allegiance, and with that he ſent him to the Gallows.

Carvajal travelling in Collao met with a Merchant who had employed about fourteen or fifteen thouſand pieces of Eight in Merchandiſe, which he had brought from Spain to Panama, and ſaid to him, Brother, according to the cuſtome of War, all theſe goods belong properly to me. The Merchant, who was a cunning fellow, fitted and ready for ſuch replies as ſuited beſt with Souldiers and his humour, anſwered him chearfully, Sir, Whether War or Peace this Merchandiſe is yours, for we are Partners, and in the name of both of us I traded at Panama, and intended to have divided the gains between us; and in token thereof I have brought with me from Panama two Barrels of red Wine, and two dozen of Iron Shoes, and Nails for your Mules; for in thoſe times (as we have before mentioned) every Shoe for Horſe or Mule was worth a Mark in Silver; which having ſaid, he ſent for the Wine and Horſe-ſhoes, and in the mean time produced the Writing of Partnerſhip between them. Carvajal received the Wine and the Horſe-ſhoes very kindly, and to ſhew how well he accepted them, he gave him Commiſſion to be a Captain, with a Warrant requiring the Indians to ſerve him upon the way, and to furniſh him with neceſſaries for his Journey; and farther commanded, that no Merchant in Potocſi ſhould open his Shop or ſell any thing untill his Partner had cleared his hands of all his Merchandiſe. The Merchant, proud of theſe favours, went his way and ſold his Goods at the rates he pleaſed; and having gained above thirty thouſand pieces of Eight, he returned to Carvajal, and to ſecure himſelf of his favour, he told him, that he had gained eight thouſand pieces of Eight in Partnerſhip with him, and that four thouſand, which was the moiety thereof belonged to him: Carvajal, to make his Souldiers merry, began to ſpeak in the Merchant's phraſe and ſtyle; and told him that he could not be ſatisfied with a general account untill he ſaw his Book. The Merchant readily drew it out, and read the ſeveral parcels; as, Imprimis, for ſo many pieces of Cloth of Gold; Item, ſo many pieces of Sattin, ſo many of Velvet, ſo many of Damask, ſo many fine Cloaths of Sigovia Wool, ſo many pieces of fine Holland and Cambrick, and ſo ſeveral of them with their prices, which he brought from Spain; the laſt parcel of all was three dozen of Combs, which amounted to ſo much. Carvajal was ſilent untill he came to this parcel; and then he cried out, hold, hold, reade that parcel once again; which when he had done, he turned about to his Souldiers, and ſaid, Do not you think, Gentlemen, that he charges me over much in this parcel of Combs? The Souldiers laughed heartily to hear him ſtop at this matter of the Combs, and to paſs by all the groſſer ſums preceding. Thus was the Partnerſhip diſſolved, and Carvajal, having taken his ſhare of the gains, diſpatched away his Partner well treated and favoured by him; as he did all thoſe who brought him any benefit.

This paſſage, or ſome other very like it, a certain Authour relates in a different manner, which was this: Carvajal, purſuing after Diego Centeno, happened one day to take three of his Souldiers, two of which being the moſt conſiderable, he hanged up preſently; and coming to the third, he found him to be a ſtranger and a native of Greece, called Maſter Franciſco, and pretended to be a Chirurgeon, though in reality he knew nothing of that Profeſſion; and this fellow, as the greateſt Miſcreant of the three, he ordered ſhould be hanged on the higheſt Gibbet: Franciſco, hearing this Sentence, ſaid to him, Sir, Why will you trouble your ſelf to hang ſuch a pitifull Raſcal as I am, who am not worth the hanging, and who have never given you any cauſe of offence; and, Sir, I may be uſefull to you in curing your wounds, being a Chirurgeon by my profeſſion: Well, ſaid he, go thy ways, and I pardon thee for whatſoever thou haſt already done or ſhalt doe for the future, on condition that thou cure my Mules, for I am ſure thou art more a Farrier than a Doctour. Maſter Franciſco, having got free by theſe means, in a few months time afterwards he made his eſcape, and ſerved Diego Centeno, and after the Battel of Huarina being again taken, Carvajal ordered that he ſhould be hanged; but Maſter Franciſco deſired his Worſhip's excuſe, for that at ſuch a time he had pardoned him both for what was paſt and what ſhould be hereafter: and hereof I challenge your paroll, as becomes the honour of a Souldier, which I know you highly eſteem. The Devil take thee, ſaid Carvajal, and doſt thou remember this now? I'll keep my Promiſe, go, look after my Mules, and run away as often as thou wilt; if all the enemies of my Lord the Governour were like thee we ſhould ſoon be Friends. The ſtory of Maſter Franciſco is told of a certain Prieſt in the ſame manner onely with change of Perſons.

In his purſuit after Diego Centeno he took three perſons of thoſe which he called Weavers or Trimmers; who, as their neceſſities urged them, ran from one ſide to another; and of this ſort of people he pardoned none, but hanged as many of them as he could catch: and having hanged two of them, the third thinking to plead ſomething for his pardon, told him, that he had been his Servant, and had eaten often of his Bread; his meaning was, that often times, as a Souldier, he had eaten with him at his Table. Curſed, ſaid Carvajal, be that Bread which hath been ſo ill employed: and turning to the Executioner, take me this Gentleman, and hang him up on the higheſt branch of yonder Tree, having had the honour to eat of my Bread. And leſt this Chapter ſhould be over long we have thought fit to divide it into two parts.

CHAP. XLII.

Of other paſſages like the others; and what happened by a Boy who touched one of the Quarters of Carvajal.

WHEN he marched out of Cozco to go to Collao with three hundred Souldiers after him, all drawn up in form of Battel; for he was much pleaſed to ſee his men well exerciſed and marching in good order. A little more than a league from the City, he obſerved one of his Souldiers to ſeparate from the reſt of the Company, and to retire behind a Rock in the way for his natural eaſement: Carvajal, who remained always in the Rere, the better to obſerve the march of his Troops, ſeemed very angry and much diſpleaſed with the Souldier for leaving his Rank; the Souldier excuſed himſelf, being urged by his natural neceſſities. How, ſaid Carvajal, a good Souldier of Peru, who is the beſt Souldier in the world, ought to eat his Loaf of Bread at Cozco, and caſt it out again at Chuquiſaca, which are two hundred leagues diſtant each from the other.

At another time Carvajal travelling with five or ſix Companions, they brought him a roaſted Leg of Mutton of that large kind of Sheep which are in that Countrey, and which are half as big more as thoſe are in Spain: One of thoſe in the company called Hernan Perez Tablero, who was a familiar Friend of Carvajal, offered to be Carver, and as a bad Husband in his Office cut out large ſlices: What doſt thou mean, ſaid he, to cut out ſuch great pieces? I give every man, anſwered he, his proportion; it is well done, ſaid Carvajal, for the Devil is in his Gut who comes for more.

When Carvajal was returned victorious from the purſuit he had made after Diego Centeno, he made a Banquet at Cozco, and invited all his Captains and chief Officers thereunto: and though Wine was dear at that time, and worth three hundred pieces of Eight the Arrobe, or twenty five pounds weight, being about ſix Gallons Engliſh meaſure, yet the Gueſts drank freely of it, and not being accuſtomed to drink Wine, they were all ſo diſordered that ſome fell a-ſleep in their Chairs, others on the Floor, ſome tumbled down, and every one was ill accommodated and in diſguiſe; which when Donna Catalina Leyton, coming forth from her Chamber, ſaw, ſhe, in a ſcorning manner, ſaid, alas for poor Peru, that thou ſhouldſt have the misfortune to be governed by ſuch people as theſe; which when Carvajal heard, Peace, ſaid he, you old Jade, and let them ſleep but two hours, for there is not one of theſe fellows but is able to govern half a world.

At another time, having impriſoned a rich man for ſome words which he was accuſed to have ſaid againſt him, and having detained him in priſon for want of due evidence and proof of matters againſt him, though he ſeldom ſtood upon thoſe niceties to diſpatch his Enemies: The poor man finding that his Execution was delayed, he imagined, that the onely way to ſave his life was to ranſome himſelf with money; for it was well known that Carvajal had on the like occaſion taken the preſent and been reconciled: upon this ſuppoſition, he ſent for a Friend of his and deſired to bring him two Ingots of Gold, which he had laid in ſuch a place, which being brought to him, he ſent them to Carvajal, deſiring him to hear his Cauſe, and his Anſwers to the Accuſations of his enemies: Carvajal having received the Gold, went to viſit the Priſoner, whoſe lodging was in his Houſe: And the Priſoner pleading that he was falſly accuſed, deſired him to be ſatisfied with the miſery he had already ſuffered, and that he would pardon him for God's ſake, promiſing for the future to become a true, faithfull and a loyal Servant to him, as he would find in time. Carvajal, taking his Ingots of Gold, ſaid with a loud voice (that the Souldiers in the yard below might hear him) Why, Sir, having ſo authentick Writings and Papers to ſhew as you have, did not you produce them before: Go your ways in God's name in peace, and live ſecurely, for though we are againſt the King, it is not reaſon that we ſhould likewiſe be enemies to the Church of God.

We have formerly in another place related how Carvajal ſtrangled Donna Maria Calderon, and hanged her out at a Window of her Lodgings; we were then very brief in this narrative, and did not plainly ſpecifie the particular words and reaſons, not to interrupt, by a long digreſſion, the proper current of the Hiſtory, we ſhall now ſupply that defect in this place. Donna Maria Calderon, though reſiding in her enemies quarters, and in their power, yet made it her common diſcourſe in all companies, to ſpeak openly againſt Gonçalo Piçarro; and notwithſtanding Carvajal, to whom the informations were brought, did twice or thrice admoniſh her to be leſs liberal in her language, and to be more prudent and cautious in her ſpeeches, as did other Friends who wiſhed her well; howſoever ſhe made no uſe of this good counſel, but vented her paſſion with more liberty and indiſcretion than before: whereupon Carvajal went one day to her Lodging, and told her (Lady Goſſip) I am come to cure you of your too much prating, and I know no other remedy for it than to choak you: but ſhe, following her pleaſant humour, and thinking that Carvajal was in jeſt; away, ſaid ſhe, you drunken Fool in the Devil's name, for though you jeſt, I will ſtop my ears to you, and not hear: in earneſt, ſaid he, I do not jeſt; for I come to cure you of too much loquacity: for that you may not prate as you have done, I come to ſtreighten the wideneſs of your Throat; and to ſhew you that I am in earneſt, behold here are my Ethiopian Souldiers at hand who are to doe you this ſervice; for he always carried three or four Negroes with him for ſuch Offices as this: hereupon he went his way, and his Myrmidons immediately ſtrangled her, and hanged her Body out at a Window looking to the Street; and as he was under, he caſt up his eyes and ſaid, Upon my life, Lady Goſſip, if this be not a remedy to affright you from too much talking, I know not what other means to uſe.

Carvajal being at a certain City where his Souldiers were quartered upon the Inhabitants, and having occaſion to march from thence, two months afterwards he returned again to the ſame City; where an Officer of the Town, fearing that they would quarter the ſame Souldier upon him which formerly had been with him, went to Carvajal and deſired him that that Souldier might not be put upon him: Carvajal underſtanding him, gave him a nod inſtead of other anſwer: And coming to the place where quarters were to be aſſigned to the Souldiers, he ſaid to every one of them particularly; Go you to ſuch a place, and you to ſuch a place, and ſo diſpoſed of every one of them as if he had carried a liſt of the Inhabitants names in writing; at length coming to the Souldier before-mentioned; and you, Sir, ſaid he, go to ſuch a Houſe, which was far from the Chamber where he formerly quartered: Sir, replied the Souldier, I deſire to go to my old Landlord, where I am well known; No, ſaid Carvajal, I would have you go to the place which I aſſign you: but the Souldier would not be ſo anſwered, ſaying, that he had no need to change his quarters, where he was ſo well entertained before; and then Carvajal, moving his head with great gravity, I would have your Worſhip go, ſaid he, to the place I have appointed for you, where you will be very well treated; and if you want any thing more, my Lady Catalina Leyton will be near at hand to ſerve you: and then the Souldier, underſtanding that he ſhould be well provided for, accepted his offer, and ſaid no more.

The Head of Franciſco de Carvajal being cut off, was carried to the City of Los Reyes, and there fixed upon the Gallows in the Market-place, in company with the Head of Gonçalo Piçarro; his Quarters, with thoſe of other Captains concerned in the ſame condemnation were ſet up in the four great Roads which lead to the City of Cozco. And in regard that in Chap. 33. of the fourth Book, we have promiſed to give an account of the poiſon with which the Indians of the Iſland of Barlovento did uſually infect their Arrows, by ſticking them in the fleſh of dead men: I ſhall, in confirmation thereof, relate what I ſaw experienced on one of the Quarters of Carvajal, which was hanged up in the High-way which leads to Collaſuya, which is to the South-ward of Cozco. The thing was this:

One day, being Sunday, ten or twelve Boys of the ſame School with me, whoſe Fathers were Spaniards and Mothers Indians, all of us under the age of twelve years, walking abroad to play, we eſpied the Quarters of Carvajal in the Field, at which we all cried, let us go and ſee Carvajal; and being come to the place, we perceived that the Quarter hanging there was his Thigh, very fat, ſtinking and green with corruption. Hereupon one of the Boys ſaid, that none of them durſt go and touch him: Some ſaid yes, ſome ſaid no; with which they divided into two parties, but none durſt come near it, untill one Boy, called Bartholomew Monedero, more bold and unlucky than the reſt, How, ſaid he, dare not I? and with that ran and thruſt his middle Finger clear through the Quarter; upon which we all ran from him, him, and cried, Oh the ſtinking Raſcal, Oh the ſtinking Rogue, Carvajal is coming to kill you for being ſo bold with him; but the Boy ran down to the water, waſhed his finger very well, and rubbed it with dirt, and ſo returned home; the next day, being Monday, he came to the School with his Finger very much ſwelled, and looked as if he wore the Thumb of a Glove upon it; towards the evening his whole hand was ſwelled up to his very Wriſt; and next day, being Tueſday, the ſwelling was come up to his very Elbow, ſo that he was then forced to tell his Father of it, and confeſs how it came: for remedy of which, Phyſicians being called, they bound a ſtring very ſtrait above the ſwelling, and ſcarrified his Hand and Arm, applying other Antidotes and Remedies thereunto; notwithſtanding which, and all the care they could uſe, the Boy was very near death: and though at length he recovered, yet it was four months afterwards before he could take a Pen in his hand to write. And thus as the temper of Carvajal was virulent and malitious in his life-time, ſo was his fleſh noxious after his death, and gives us an experiment in what manner the Indians empoiſoned their Arrows.

CHAP. XLIII.

In what manner Piçarro was executed. Of the Alms he deſired might be given for his Soul after his death, with ſome account of his diſpoſition and natural parts.

AND now in the laſt place we are to give a relation of the dolefull end of Gonçalo Piçarro, whom we left in confeſſion all that day, and untill noon of the next day, untill the Officers were called to dinner, but he refuſed to eat, and remained alone untill the Confeſſour returned, and ſo continued in confeſſion untill it was very late: in the mean time the Officers of Juſtice being impatient of delay, were ſtill going and coming to haſten the diſpatch; and one of the moſt grave and ſevere amongſt them, being troubled to ſee the time thus paſs away, cried out with a loud voice; what will they never have done, and bring forth this man? at which ſaying all the Souldiers were much offended, and uttered many ſcandalous and reviling words againſt him, moſt of which, though I well remember, yet I am too modeſt to repeat them here, or name the perſon: for he retired without replying one word, leſt he ſhould provoke the Souldiers to farther anger, whoſe diſpleaſure he much feared for what he had already expreſſed: but preſently afterwards Gonçalo Piçarro came forth and was ſet upon a Mule purpoſely provided for him; he had his Cloak on, and his hands looſe, though ſome Authours write, that his hands were bound; yet about the Mule's neck, a halter was tied to comply with the formality of the Sentence: in his hands he carried the Image of our Lady (to whom he was greatly devoted) praying her to intercede for his Soul. Being come half way to the place of Execution, he deſired a Crucifix (which one of the Prieſts who attended him, of which there being about ten or twelve) gave into his hands; which he exchanged for the Image of our Lady, kiſſing firſt with great humility the hem of her Garment: upon the Crucifix he fixed his eyes ſo ſteadily that he did not remove them from that object untill he came to the Scaffold, which was purpoſely erected for his execution; and being mounted thereupon, he went to one ſide of it, and from thence made his Speech to the Souldiers and Inhabitants of Peru, who flocked from all parts thither, few being abſent, unleſs thoſe who had been of his party, and were revolted from him; and of them alſo ſome were preſent in diſguiſes, and not to be known, and then he ſpake with a loud voice in this manner;

Ye know, Gentlemen, that my Brothers and I have gained this Empire, and that many of you are poſſeſſed of Lands and Baronies, which my Brother the Marquis conferred upon you; and many of you here preſent have received them from me. Moreover many of you owe me money, which I have freely lent to you, and others have received them as a gift and not as a debt. I for my part dye poor and without any thing, that not ſo much as the cloaths upon my back are my own, but the fees belonging to the Executioner, for the ſervice he doth in cutting off my Head; ſo that I have nothing to give for the good and benefit of my Soul. Wherefore, I beſeech you, Gentlemen, as many of you as owe me money, to beſtow the ſame in Maſſes to be ſaid for my Soul; having full aſſurance in God, through the meritorious bloud and paſſion of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt his Son, and with the aſſiſtence of your charity, that he will pardon my Offences and receive me to Mercy. And ſo Farewell.

Scarce had he ended his requeſt for Charity, before the Sighs and Groans of the People were loudly heard; and many Tears were ſhed by all thoſe who heard thoſe dolefull and ſad expreſſions. Then Piçarro kneeled down before the Crucifix which was placed on a Table ſet upon the Scaffold. Then came the Executioner, John Enriquez, to bind a Handkirchief about his Eyes: but Piçarro deſired him to forbear, ſaying, that there was no need of it: and when he ſaw him draw his Hanger to cut off his Head; he ſaid, Honeſt Jack, doe thy Office handſomely; meaning that he ſhould doe his buſineſs at one blow, and not in a mangling manner, as ſome have done: then ſaid the Executioner, I promiſe your Lordſhip that it ſhall be ſo done as you deſire: and having ſo ſaid, he lifted up his Beard with his left-hand, being above a Span long, and cut round, as they uſed to wear them in thoſe days; and with a back-ſtroak cut off his Head at one blow, as if he had ſliced a leaf of Lettice; and holding his Head in his hand, the body remained ſome time before it fell. And this was the end of this great Man. The Executioner would afterwards have ſtripped him, but that Diego Centeno, who was come to lay him in his Coffin, redeemed his Cloaths by promiſing a recompenſe for them to the Executioner: ſo his Corpſe were carried to be interred at Cozco in his own Cloaths, for want of a winding Sheet, which none would beſtow, and were buried in a Convent of our Lady of the Mercedi, and in the ſame Chapel where lay the bodies of the two Diegoes de Almagro, Father and Son, whoſe Fates had been the ſame; for they had been equally concerned in gaining the Countrey; and all three were put to death and buried upon Charity; and after all this, as if there had wanted Earth or Land in the Countrey, they were all three buried in the ſame Grave: And that none of them might have cauſe to boaſt of his fortune above the other; all their conditions were made equal; and all three may be compared with that of Franciſco Piçarro, who was Brother of one and Companion of the other who was put to death (as before related) and buried afterwards upon Charity: and thus may theſe four Brothers and Companions be compared and made equal in every thing. So that now, If a man ſoberly and impartially conſiders the courſe of this World, he will ſee how well and in what manner it rewards thoſe who ſerve in their generation; ſince this was the recompence of thoſe who gained and conquered the Empire called Peru. None of the three Authours make mention of the Charity which Piçarro begged at his death; perhaps becauſe they would not grieve the Readers with ſo melancholy a Story; but, for my part, I write all things plainly and without any diſguiſe.

The fury of the War being over, the Inhabitants of the Empire cauſed Maſſes to be ſaid in their reſpective Cities for the Soul of Gonçalo Piçarro, both in compliance with what he requeſted of them at his death, as alſo from a Principle of gratitude to him who had ſaved their liberties, and laid down his life for the publick welfare. His Head with that alſo of Franciſco de Carvajal was carried to the City of Los Reyes, (which was built and founded by his Brother the Marquis.) And here, being pitched upon Iron Spikes, they were ſet upon a Gallows in the publick Market-place.

Gonçalo Piçarro and his four Brothers (who have ſupplied us with matter for a long Diſcourſe in this Hiſtory) were born in the City of Truxillo, which is in the Province of Eſtremadura, which we mention in honour thereunto, for having produced ſuch Heroick Sons, who conquered the two Empires of the new World, namely, Mexico and Peru; for Don Hernando Cortes, Marquis Del Valle, who ſubdued Mexico, was alſo born at Medell, which is a Town in Eſtremadura. Alſo Vaſco Nunnez de Valvoa, who was the firſt Spaniard that diſcovered the South-Sea, was a Native of Xerez de Badajoz; and Don Pedro de Alvarado, who, after the Conqueſt of Mexico, paſſed into Peru with eight hundred men, of which Garçilaſſo de la Vega was one of the Captains, and Gomez de Tordoya, were Natives of Badajoz; to which we may add Pedro Alvarez Holguin, Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del

Barco

Barco his Companion, with many other Gentlemen of the Families of Alvarado, and Chaves, and other persons of Quality engaged in the Conquest of those Kingdoms; who were all, or the most of them, Natives of Estremadura; and for that reason many Souldiers born in that Province, following their Countrey-men of note, were employed in that Enterprize: wherefore, in honour thereunto, we ought not to cover the names of such Sons in obscurity, who have signalized themselves to the World by such Heroick Actions. Gonçalo Piçarro was of the name of the Piçarro's, which is a Family of ancient blood, illustrious and well known over all Spain; Don Hernando Cortes, who was Marquis Del Valle, was by the Mother-side of that Family, called Donna Catalina Piçarro; so that this Lineage is worthy of honour, being entitled to the Conquest of two Empires.

Besides the Antiquity of this Family, Gonçalo Piçarro and his Brothers were the Sons of Gonçalo Piçarro, a Captain of the Guards in the Kingdom of Navarre; which is an Office of great reputation in that Countrey, for that all the Souldiers thereof are to be Gentlemen of ancient Families, or such as have obtained this Honour by some great and heroick Action: the which Office is of so great esteem; that, to my knowledge, a Grandee of Spain, called Don Alonso Fernandez de Cordova, and Figueroa, Marquis De Priego, Chief of the House of Aguilar, availed himself much on the Honour of being Captain of Horse in the Kingdom of Navarre, which Office he continued untill the day of his death, and was much honoured by all the Souldiers of those parts.

Gonçalo Piçarro was a very comely person in the shape of his Body, of a pleasing countenance, of a confirmed health, and one who could endure all hardships, as hath been proved by this History: He was an excellent Horseman in both Saddles, either riding short, or with long Stirrups; he was an excellent Markesman, either with Gun or Cross-bow: with a black-lead Pencil he could draw any thing in the Wall which he desired; and was the most dexterous with his Lance of any man that ever passed into the new World, of which many famous men of those times give testimony. He was a great lover of good Horses, and kept many of them in his Stables. At the beginning of the Conquest he had two of a Chest-nut colour, one of which he called the Clown; because he was not well shaped, but very good for service, the other he called Zaynillo. Some Gentlemen of that time being in conversation together, one of them who had been a Companion with Gonçalo Piçarro gave this Character of him, which I heard from his own mouth. When Gonçalo Piçarro, said he, was mounted on his Zaynillo, he no more valued a Squadron of Indians, than if they had been a swarm of Flies: he was of a noble nature, clear and sincere, without malice, fraud or designs: he was a man of truth, confident of his friend and of those whom he thought to be so, which proved his ruine. And because he was a man without cheats or fraud, he was judged by Writers to be weak in his understanding: but they doe him wrong, for certainly he was of a clear head, and naturally inclined to vertue and honour, he was of an affable disposition, and generally beloved both by friends and enemies; and, in short, was endued with all the noble Qualities, which become a great Person. As to riches gained by his own industry; we may properly say, that he was Master of all the wealth of Peru, which he possessed and governed for a long time, and with so much justice and equity, that the President did him the right to praise and commend his Government, as we have before declared. He conferred upon others great and large proportions of Land, and jurisdiction over Indians, that many of them amounted unto ten, others to twenty and thirty thousand pieces of Eight of yearly revenue: he was a very good Christian, and zealously devoted to our Lady the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, as the President gave testimony in the Letter which he wrote. He never denyed any thing which was asked for the sake of our Lady, though of never so great an importance: which being known to Francisco de Carvajal and his Officers; when they had a mind to put any man to death, they would never suffer his Petition to come to the ears of Piçarro, lest they should ask a thing in the name of our Lady, for whose sake he was resolved to deny nothing. He was much beloved for his moral Vertues and military Exploits: And though it was convenient for the Service of his Majesty to take away his life, yet generally his death was lamented for the many Excellencies with which he was endued; so that I never heard any that spake ill of him, but all well and with great respect, as became a Superiour. And whereas Palentino saith, that many gave their opinion, and did earnestly insist, that he ſhould be quartered, and his Limbs hanged up in the common high-ways leading to Cozco, is a moſt falſe relation: for never was any ſuch thing either imagined or contrived: for if ever any ſuch thing had been intended, it would certainly have been diſcourſed of in the times of peace and ſettlement, as many other things were, which were at firſt great Secrets, and afterwards made known and divulged to all the World: Nor indeed can it be believed that ſuch a thing could be, for all thoſe of the Council (excepting the Preſident himſelf) had many and great obligations to Gonçalo Piçarro, having received ſignal honours and benefits from his hands: and therefore it was not likely they would paſs an infamous ſentence againſt him, though it was neceſſary for the ſervice of his Majeſty and the peace and quietneſs of the Empire, that they ſhould give their aſſent unto his death.

CHAP. I.

New Orders published by the President for suppressing Rebels. The Offences which the Indians took to see Spaniards whipped. The great Trouble the President had to answer the Demands of Pretenders; and how he went from the City to make a Division of Lands.

NOR did the Troubles end here in this Empire called Peru, nor were all the Insurrections suppressed by the Defeat of Gonçalo Piçarro and his Captains, but rather were the Spirits of men more furiously inflamed than before, as will appear by the sequel of this History: for we must know that after the Victory obtained at Sacsahuana, the President dispatched that very day to Cozco two of his Captains, Hernando Mexia de Guzman and Martin de Robles, with some Souldiers in whom they most confided, to seise those of the Enemies Party who were fled thither after the Defeat, and to prevent their own Souldiers from plundering or doing spoil in the City, and from taking private revenge by bloud or otherwise, under the pretence of Liberty of War, as it was said some designed to doe. The day following, after the execution of Gonçalo Piçarro, and his Associates, the President raised his Camp from that famed field, and marched towards the City, which though but four leagues from thence, yet he was two days on the way; and in that time he detached a Party of trusty Souldiers under the command of Captain Alonso de Mendoça, with Instructions to march into the Charcas and Potocsi, and to seise and take the Captains which Gonçalo Piçarro had sent into those parts, namely, Francisco de Espinosa, and Diego Carvajal, the Gallant, of whom we have formerly made mention; and Licenciado Polo Hondegardo received a Commission to be Captain General of those Provinces; with Orders to punish those who had favoured the Cause of Piçarro, and likewise those who did not engage themselves in the service of his Majesty, but stood neuters, neither acting as Traytors, nor professing themselves loyal; and therefore were severely fined for their cowardise and want of duty. With Licenciado Polo Captain Graviel de Rojas was also dispatched in quality of Treasurer for his Majesty, to collect the Fifths and Tribute of the Royal revenue, with the Fines which the Governour should inflict on Traytors and Neuters. Out of which, as Augustine Carate saith, Book the seventh, Chapter the eighth. Licenciado Polo in a short time raised a million and two thousand pieces of Eight, for that Graviel de Rojas dying on his journey to the Charcas, Polo was forced to execute the Office of Treasurer in his stead: And in the mean time, whilst these things were acting in the Charcas, the Preſident remained in Cozco, entertained with ſumptuous Banquets and Sports, to teſtifie the Joy they conceived for the late Succeſſes; and to ſee the Feaſt of Bulls and other Divertiſements of like nature, he had a Seat erected in the Court-yard of my Father's houſe; on which occaſion I had an opportunity to ſee his perſon, as I have before mentioned. And, moreover, he gave a Commiſſion to Judge Andres de Cianca and to Major General Alonſo de Alvarado to puniſh Rebels according to Law. Many Souldiers of note, who had been of Piçarro's Party were hanged, many quartered, and above a hundred Spaniſh Souldiers whipped by four and ſix in company; of which I was an eye-witneſs my ſelf, when being a Boy I went amongſt the reſt to ſee this puniſhment. At which the Indians were greatly offended, and wondred to ſee Spaniards inflict a chaſtiſement ſo infamous as that on their own Nation, for though they had ſeen many of them hanged, yet they had ſeen none whipped untill that time. And for the greater diſgrace they cauſed them to ride upon Sheep, which are Beaſts of burthen in that Countrey, and not on Horſes or Mules; and in that manner take their whipping; after which they were condemned to the Gallies. At that time the Preſident cauſed a general Pardon to be proclaimed, clearing and acquitting all ſuch from fault and puniſhment who had come in and revolted to the Royal Standard at the Battel of Sacſahuana; and abſolved of all Crimes during the Rebellion of Gonçalo Piçarro, though they had been guilty of the death of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and other Miniſters of his Majeſty: which Pardon did extend onely as to Life and criminal Matters; reſerving ſtill a right unto the King to fine them as to Goods, and to proceed againſt them in civil Caſes: for that Carate ſaith, Book 7. Chap. 8. that Gonçalo Piçarro had made ſatisfaction for them by his own death. And now, ſince the Victory was gained, and things reduced to peace and quietneſs, the Preſident found himſelf in much more trouble, and with a greater weight of buſineſs on his Shoulders than in the time of War, for that then the Officers concurred with him to ſupport part of the Burthen; but now in Peace, he was ſingly engaged to ſuſtain the Importunities and ſolicitations of above two thouſand men, who challenged Pay and Rewards for their paſt Services; in which every one of the meaneſt ſort pretended to ſo much merit that he thought he deſerved the beſt Plantation in all Peru. And as to thoſe perſons who had really been ſerviceable and uſefull to the Preſident in the Wars, they became infinitely troubleſome and importunate in their Petitions, ſo that the Preſident, to eaſe himſelf a little of theſe urgent addreſſes, reſolved to take a journey of about twelve leagues to the Valley of Apurimac, to have more leiſure at that diſtance to make the Diviſions which were required of him; and with him he took the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes for his Companion, and alſo Pedro Lopez de Caçalla his Secretary; and that he might not be interrupted in this buſineſs, he commanded, that neither Citizen nor Souldier, nor any other perſon whatſoever ſhould attend or follow him to that place. Moreover he commanded, That no Inhabitant of all Peru ſhould return to his own home untill he had ſet out and allotted unto every man his Diviſion; by which continuance of the people in Cozco, he imagined that he ſhould ſecure the Commonalty from making any Mutinies or Inſurrections: but his chief deſign and care was to diſperſe the Souldiers in divers parts of the Kingdom, and to employ them in new Conqueſts, as had been the Maxim and Policy of thoſe who firſt conquered this Empire: but the Preſident being obliged in haſte to leave thoſe Kingdoms, had not time to diſperſe his Souldiers, as was deſigned; by which means new Troubles aroſe from Male-contents, who thought they had reaſon to complain.

CHAP. II.

The Preſident, having made the ſeveral Aſſignments of Land, went privately to the City of Los Reyes: And writes a Letter to thoſe for whom no Proviſions were made, which cauſed great Diſturbances amongſt them.

THE Preſident being retired into the Valley of Apurimac was employed there for the ſpace of three months and more, about dividing to every man his proportion of Lands, during which time he received Addreſſes and Petitions from many perſons, ſetting forth their ſervices and ſufferings; of which little or no notice was taken, becauſe that the ſcheme of all matters was already drawn, and a repartition of the Lands was reſolved upon and made amongſt the principal Officers under the command of Pedro de Hinojoſa, as was capitulated and agreed when the Fleet belonging to Gonçalo Piçarro was ſurrendred to the Preſident, as is confirmed by the Hiſtorians of that time. The Preſident having made the Diviſion on no better grounds, nor with other meaſures than thoſe which he and the Archbiſhop Don Jeronimo de Loayſa, (who were both Strangers to the Countrey) had contrived, he went to the City of Los Reyes, and ordered the Arch-biſhop within ten or twelve days afterwards to repair to Cozco, and then to publiſh the Diſtributions which he had gratiouſly made: and in regard ſome were ſo unfortunate as to have no proviſions made for them, he wrote them a conſolatory Letter, ſignifying his hearty deſires and his real intentions to gratify them as occaſion ſhould offer. The Letter which he wrote to them was this; extracted verbatim from the Hiſtory of Palentino; the Superſcription whereof was this;

To the Right-noble and Right-worſhipfull Lords and Gentlemen and Sons of Gentlemen who are Servants to his Majeſty in Cozco.

WHEREAS it often happens that men are ſo blinded with affection and love to their own Affairs, that they overſee all others, and cannot make free uſe of their reaſon to render thanks to thoſe who have highly merited their gratefull acknowledgments; I have reſolved to write theſe lines to you, whereby to juſtifie my ſelf; beſeeching you to conſerve them as a memorial in my behalf; and to let them remain with you as a teſtimony of that eſteem which I have already gained with you, and which I promiſe to improve by the ſervices I deſign for every one of you, ſo long as I ſhall live in Peru, or in any other parts whatſoever. But not to inſiſt on any private or particular ſervice which I have rendred to any ſingle perſon amongſt you; I ſhall onely ſay in general, that I have not omitted any thing wherein I might have been inſtrumental to promote that ſervice. For I dare boldly ſay, that in all the Wars made in Peru, or out of it, 'twas never heard or ſeen that ever ſuch vaſt charges were made in ſo ſhort a time, and expended on ſo few people: and what Lands were vacant or without Proprietors, I have divided amongſt you with as much juſtice and equality as I have been able; with conſideration both day and night of every man's merit, which hath been the meaſure and ſtandard upon which I have proceeded; and which ſhall ever be my rule ſo long as I ſtay in Peru; and I ſhall be carefull to divide and diſpenſe amongſt you onely his Majeſty's loyal Subjects, according to your ſervices and loyalty to the Crown, whatſoever remains undiſpoſed with excluſion of all others, untill you are fully ſatisfied. And that you may enjoy the ſole benefit of this rich Countrey to your ſelves, I will not onely endeavour to baniſh thoſe out of it who have been actually in rebellion, but ſuch alſo who have ſtood Neuters, and have not acted as you have done: and that untill you are fully repaired and made eaſie in your fortunes, I will not ſuffer any new Gueſts either out of Spain, or the Continent, or from Nicaragua, Guatimala or New-ſpain, to enter into this Countrey, or to poſſeſs any part or ſhare thereof to your prejudice or diſadvantage. And ſince I proteſt that all which I ſay is true, and that I have not been able to doe more

for

for your ſervice and advantage, than what I have already done, I earneſtly entreat you to follow the example of God himſelf herein, that is, to accept of the real endeavours and good-will of the perſon: and on this conſideration let every one ſatisfie himſelf with his lot, which though not ſo large perhaps as he expected, yet it is as great as the diviſion and thing would bear, and leſs than the Diſtributor deſired, and which he will increaſe when enabled by any fortunate opportunity. And now after all my travels and labours both by Sea and Land which I have ſuſtained in this laſt period of my life, I pretend to no other reward than the ſatisfaction of having acted according to that Talent which God hath given me, by which I have diſcharged my conſcience towards God as a Chriſtian, towards the King as a faithfull Subject, and towards your ſelves as became a good neighbour and a true ſervant. And indeed, if you take not things, and underſtand them in the ſame manner, you ill requite the love and affection I bear you, and the care and labours I have ſuſtained for your intereſt, conſidering that on my part there hath been no failure or omiſſion to advance the ſame. And ſince, for the better ſettlement of the Courts of Judicature and the Affairs of Lima, it is neceſſary for me to be there preſent, I have deſired the moſt Reverend Father in God, the Archbiſhop to ſupply my preſence with you in the City, and in my name to offer to you what I can doe at preſent, and what I ſhall be able to doe for the future. And having not farther to add; I beſeech God, that I may live to ſee you all in great proſperity and plenty, and employed in his holy ſervice as fully and as happily as you your ſelves deſire,

Given at Guaynarima, on the 18th day of Auguſt, 1548. Subſcribed,

Your Servant,

the Licenciado Gaſca.

Beſides this Letter and Inſtructions given to the Archbiſhop, he gave it in charge to the Father Provincial, Frier Thomas de San Martin, that he ſhould make a Sermon on the day of the Publication, and therein exhort the Pretenders to be contented every man with his portion allotted; and to deal with them in private, and perſuade them thereunto. All which Hernandez Palentino writes more at large, which we have abbreviated, to avoid prolixity and tediouſneſs to the Reader; and is as followeth:

When it was known in Cozco that the Preſident was retired privately to avoid the troubleſome importunities of the People; one Captain Pardaue, being in diſcourſe with other Captains; on my Conſcience ſaid he, this Madalena de la Cruz is retired ſome where privately to put an Harana upon us, for in Peru they call that Harana, when a man who hath loſt his money at gaming plays ſome Trick or Sham to avoid payment. And amongſt other Nick-names given the Preſident, they called him Madalena de la Cruz, which was as much as Cheater or Sorcerer, and was the name of that Woman who was puniſhed by the Officers of the Inquiſition in Cordoua: And the truth is, the Preſident, not to hear ſuch inſolent Speeches as theſe, retired from Cozco that he might have liberty to make the Diſtributions, and removed farther from it when they were publiſhed, as Palentino ſaith in the ſecond Part, and Chapter the firſt of his Hiſtory, in theſe words:

It was well known that the Preſident abſented himſelf from Cozco, that he might not be preſent at the time when the Diſtribution of Lands was publiſhed; for he was prudent and ſubtile, and underſtood by good experience the nature of the Countrey; and feared much the Inſolences of the Souldiers, and to hear their Complaints, Oaths and Curſes: And indeed herein he was not deceived; for when the Arch-biſhop was arrived at Cozco, where almoſt all the Inhabitants and Souldiers were aſſembled, expecting to receive great proportions of Lands and Government: they appeared quiet and orderly: but ſo ſoon as the publication was made, on the 24th of Auguſt, being the Feſtival of Saint Bartholomew, whereby finding themſelves much diſappointed of their hopes, they began to curſe and ſwear, and to utter many ſeditious expreſſions againſt the Preſident and his Government, to that high degree, that all things ſeemed to tend to mutiny and a new rebellion. Hereupon they began to enter into Cabals and ſecret Conſultations, how in the firſt place they might kill the Judge Andres de Cianca, and the Arch-biſhop, whom they eſteemed the Authours of the Diſtributions. The cauſe and ground of their fury and rage they alledged to be the allotment made of principal Places and Lands to thoſe who had been the Followers and Abettors of Gonçalo Piçarro, and who had favoured that party which had been in Arms againſt the King: but the relation of theſe matters is more fully made by Franciſco Lopez de Gomara, Chap. 188. in theſe words:

The Preſident, ſaid he, went to Apurima twelve leagues diſtant from Cozco, where he conſulted with the Archbiſhop of Los Reyes, and his Secretary Pero Lopez about the diviſion of Lands, which were to be made and diſtributed amongſt ſeveral perſons, to the value of a million and a half of yearly rent, with a hundred and fifty thouſand Ducats in Gold, which he had raiſed from divers who were in preſent poſſeſſion: he married many rich Widows to ſuch as had well ſerved the King; he increaſed the Revenue and Eſtate of others who were already poſſeſſed of Lands, ſo that ſome had a yearly Revenue made up to them of a hundred thouſand Ducats; which was an Eſtate for a Prince, if the Inheritance had been theirs; but the Emperour would allow no other Eſtate but for life: but he who had the greateſt Eſtate aſſigned to him was Hinojoſa.

Gaſca himſelf went to Los Reyes to avoid the complaints, curſes and damning of the Souldiers, and perhaps for fear of worſe: And to make publication of the Lands allotted and divided, the Archbiſhop was ſent to Cozco; and to take thoſe off to whom nothing was given, a ſmooth Letter was wrote to nouriſh them with future hopes and expectations; but the furious Souldiers were neither appeaſed with the air of ſmooth words, nor the gentle exhortation of the Archbiſhop. Some complained of Gaſca for giving them nothing; ſome becauſe they had leſs alotted than what was expected; and others, becauſe thoſe who had diſſerved the King had the greateſt proportion; ſwearing that they would accuſe him before the Council of the Indies: of which number were the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado and Melchior de Verdugo, who afterwards drew up a formal accuſation againſt him, and preſented it to the chief Baron of the Exchequer. In ſhort, their whole diſcourſe tended to Mutiny and Sedition: the Archbiſhop and Judge Cianca, Hinojoſa, Centeno and Alvarado were to be apprehended and impriſoned: and a Petition was to be made to the Preſident Gaſca, that he would be pleaſed once again to reviſe the allotments that were made, and to divide them into leſſer parcels, or to grant Penſions to ſuch as wanted them; and in caſe their expectations were not anſwered, they then reſolved to take them by force. But the Plot being diſcovered before it came to maturity, Cianca the Judge apprehended the chief Leaders, and puniſhed them; wherewith the troubles were appeaſed. Thus far Gomara.

CHAP. III.

Some Marriages were made up between rich Widows and the Pretenders. The allotments aſſigned to Pedro de Hinojoſa and his Companions. The novelty which theſe things cauſed amongſt themſelves.

THIS Authour makes a large diſcourſe concerning the Widows of thoſe times; for we muſt know, that in the late Wars many Husbands being killed who had great Eſtates in Land, and commands over Indians, their Eſtates fell to their Widows: and leſt theſe Women ſhould marry with thoſe who had been Rebels to the King, the Governour thought fit to make matches for them, and to appoint them Husbands with whom they ſhould marry; many of which lived happily with them; but others, who had the ill fortune to be joyned with old men, were not ſo well contented as they had been with thoſe they had loſt. The Wife of Alonſo de Toro, who was Major-General to Gonçalo Piçarro, and had great Poſſeſſions, was married to Pedro Lopez Caçalla, Secretary to the Preſident Gaſca. The Wife of Martin de Buſtincia, who was the Daughter of Huayna Capac, who held the Eſtate in her own right, and not of her Husband, was married to a good Souldier and a very honeſt man, called Diego Hernandez, of whom it was reported, but falſly, that in his younger days he had been a Taylor; which being known to the Infanta or Princeſs, ſhe refuſed the marriage, ſaying, that it was not reaſonable to marry the Daughter of Huayna Capac Inca with a Ciracamayo, that is, in the Indian Tongue, a Taylor; and though the Biſhop of Cozco, and Captain Diego Centeno, and other perſons of Quality preſſed the marriage, they could not prevail: wherefore they engaged her Brother Don Chriſtoval Paullu to uſe his intereſt, and perſuade her to it, who accordingly, taking her aſide into a corner of the Room, told her, that it was not convenient for her to refuſe that marriage; for that ſhe would ſo diſoblige the Spaniards that for ever after they would become mortal enemies to their Royal Family and Lineage and never more be reconciled to them. At length ſhe, aſſenting to the advice of her Brother, though with a very ill will, was brought before the Biſhop, who was pleaſed to honour the marriage by celebrating the Office himſelf: and, asking the Bride by an Indian Interpreter, whether ſhe would marry that man; the Interpreter asked her whether ſhe would be the Woman of that Man, for in the Indian Tongue they have no word for Marriage or Wife; to which the Bride made anſwer in her own Language, Ychach Munani, Ychach Manamunani; which is, Perhaps I will have him, and perhaps I will not have him: howſoever the marriage went forward, and was celebrated in the Houſe of Diego de los Rios a Citizen of Cozco, and both the Husband and Wife were alive, and cohabited together when I left Cozco. Many other Marriages like this, were contracted all over the Empire, being deſigned to give Eſtates to Pretenders, and to ſatisfie them with the goods of other men: and yet this way could not give full contentment, for ſome eſteemed the Eſtates that came by their Wives to be too ſmall and inconſiderable; and others whoſe luck it was to have ugly Women loathed them, and complained of their fortune; and thus it fared with theſe men as with others in this world, wherein is no entire ſatisfaction. The unequal diviſion of the Land, as Authours ſay, was the cauſe and ground of all the enſuing troubles and mutinies; for unto Pedro de Hinojoſa they gave all the Indians which belonged to Gonçalo Piçarro in the Charcas, which yielded an hundred thouſand pieces of Eight every year, beſides a rich Mine of Silver, which made the Revenue of this Gentleman to amount unto two hundred thouſand pieces of Eight a year: for it is incredible to think the vaſt quantities of Silver that are every year digged out of the Mines of Potocſi, which were ſo great, that Iron was become more valuable than Silver. Tapacri fell to the lot of Gomez de Solis, which was worth forty thouſand Crowns yearly; and Martin de Robles had an Eſtate of the like value given him. But Diego Centeno, though he had ſuſtained all the labours, and performed the ſervices before related, yet having not been concerned in the ſurrender of the Fleet at Panama, he was excluded from all other Eſtate than that onely with which he had formerly been inveſted, called Pucuna; nor were others of his Companions in the leaſt conſidered: but Lorenço de Aldana had an addition granted to his former Eſtate in the City of Arequepa, which both together were valued at fifty thouſand pieces of Eight yearly rent. To Don Pedro de Cabrera a diviſion was made of ſome Lands in the City of Cozco called Cotapampa, the Revenue of which was reckoned at fifty thouſand pieces of Eight yearly rent. Another to the value of forty thouſand in Gold was conferred on Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla in the Province of Parihuanacocha, which yields moſt Gold. John Alonſo Palomino received an additional increaſe to his former Eſtate, which both together might make up a rent of forty thouſand Crowns. Licenciado Carvajal had a like Eſtate given him, though he enjoyed it but for a ſhort time; for being Recorder of Cozco, he was unfortunately killed by a fall from a Window, from whence he threw himſelf headlong out of deſpair and love to a certain Lady. I remember I ſaw him buried on St. John Baptiſt's day: but Hernan Bravo de Laguna was to content himſelf with a meaner lot of eight thouſand pieces of Eight Revenue, not having the merit of thoſe to pretend who ſurrendred up the Fleet to the Preſident at Panama, who were all, ſome more and ſome leſs, very conſiderably rewarded; and indeed thoſe Gentlemen did juſtly deſerve a recompenſe, being the firſt who gave a turn to the ſcale, and the principal Inſtruments to reduce the Empire of Peru to the obedience of his Majeſty, which was entirely loſt when the Preſident at firſt entred into it, as is apparent to thoſe who have read this Hiſtory. The Lots given to the reſt in other Cities of Peru were not ſo advantageous as thoſe before mentioned: for ſome which were poor were improved with the adjunction of thoſe more rich; and ſome were divided and given to others; but how poor ſoever they were eſteemed, the meaneſt of them was valued at eight, nine, and ten thou-

to

ſand pieces of Eight of yearly Revenue: ſo that the ten lots and diviſions which we have mentioned to have been aſſigned in the Charcas, in Arequepa and in Cozco, did in the total amount unto five hundred and forty thouſand pieces of Eight coined, which make Ducats of Caſtile near ſix hundred and fifty thouſand. So ſoon as the Archbiſhop Loayſa, and the Secretary Pero Lopez de Caçalla came to Cozco they publiſhed the lots and diſtributions which were made; and read the Preſident's Letter to thoſe unhappy men for whom no proviſion was found: and the Father Provincial made a Sermon perſuading them to patience, which operated little upon them; for they flew out in oaths, curſes and opprobrious ſpeeches againſt the Government, as all Authours confirm: admiring at the wonderfull profuſeneſs and prodigality which was uſed towards thoſe men who in reality deſerved nothing: for it is moſt certain, that amongſt thoſe to whom diſtributions were made of forty or fifty thouſand pieces of Eight of yearly rent, there were ſome, who, being conſcious of their engagement on Piçarro's ſide, and their evil actions in denying the Vice-king Blaſco Vela Nunnez, againſt whom they raiſed Arms, perſecuted him to the death, and afterwards fixed his head upon the Gallows; theſe men, I ſay, and others, as Hiſtories record, who having impiouſly rebelled againſt his Imperial Majeſty, expected death, or at leaſt baniſhment; would have been ſufficiently contented and thought it a mercy to enjoy onely the benefit of the general Pardon, without other rewards or proviſions made for them: an example whereof may be given of Martin de Robles, who, when he underſtood what allotment was made him, was ſurpriſed with the exceſs of ſuch abundant favour: and in ſenſe thereof, ſaid to thoſe who ſtood by; 'Tis well, 'tis well, but ſo much good is no good; meaning that it was not good for thoſe who deſerved ſo little to be rewarded ſo much. Some few months afterwards this Martin de Robles was fined by Sentence of the chief Juſtices in the ſum of twelve hundred Ducats, for having been acceſſory to the impriſonment of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, and engaged in the cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro; the which Fine was adjudged to be given to Diego Alvarez Cueto, who was Brother-in-law to the Vice-king, and who proſecuted de Robles and others of Piçarro's Party. And when this Sentence was notified to him: What, ſaid he, no more, I that was the man who took the Vice-king? No, ſaid the Clerk, your Fine is no more. Well, anſwered he, I could have been contented with ten times as much. And thus preſumptuous and boaſting they were of the exploits they had done that they valued themſelves much upon them, and adventured to utter theſe and many other bold Sayings on this matter, in preſence of the Preſident himſelf, of which we ſhall ſpecifie ſome few particulars hereafter, and omit others, which are not fit to be here mentioned.

CHAP. IV.

Franciſco Hernandez Giron, without any reaſon, ſhews himſelf greatly diſpleaſed for the diviſion which was allotted to him: a Commiſſion is given him to make a new Conqueſt. The puniſhment of Franciſco de Eſpinoſa, and Diego de Carvajal.

NOtwithſtanding theſe rich and large diſtributions of above two millions and a half of yearly Revenue; which one Authour ſays was but a million, and another a million and forty odd thouſand pieces of Eight; yet the Pretenders were not ſatisfied, and generally complained, ſome becauſe they had no ſhare allotted, and others were ſcandalized to ſee thoſe rewarded with ſuch exceſs of prodigality who never had been concerned in the Conqueſt of the Countrey; nor rendred other ſervice to his Majeſty than onely to riſe in Rebellion againſt him, to kill his Vice-king, and afterwards to ſell and betray the Tyrant unto the Preſident, whom before they had foſtred and maintained: but he who appeared publickly

the moſt diſcontented of any was Franciſco Hernandez Giron, who having not ſerved formerly in Peru, but in Paſto onely, where (as Palentino ſaith) he never had more than an Eſtate of ſix hundred pieces of Eight a year; And now there being a proportion ſet out to him of about ten thouſand pieces of Eight a year, called Sacſahuana, which was in Cozco, and formerly belonged to Gonçalo Piçarro; this Gentleman ſo diſdained the meanneſs of it, that he could not forbear publickly to expreſs his diſlike; and, conceiving a high eſteem of his own merit, he grew angry that any man ſhould be preferred or rewarded above himſelf: and to that exceſs and diſorder did his paſſion lead him, and tranſport to thoſe indecent expreſſions, that his words were eſteemed ſeditious, and not leſs than ſavouring of Treaſon: in this humour he asked leave of the Arch-biſhop to goe unto the Preſident and complain of his hard-uſage; for that he, who had ſerved the beſt of any, and therefore deſerved the beſt ſhare, was turned off with the meaneſt allotment. The Arch-biſhop reproved him for his inſolent language, and denyed him leave. But Franciſco Hernandez made bold to take that which was refuſed him; giving out abroad, that he was going to the City of Los Reyes, to make his complaints unto him, who ought to conſider them: which being made known to Licenciado Cianca, who was by joint Commiſſion with the Arch-biſhop made Governour and chief Juſticiary of Cozco; he wrote him a Latter, adviſing him to return, and not augment the Troubles and Mutinies which were in the Kingdom, and which were apt to be inflamed by the Diſcontents of many perſons, who had much more reaſon to complain than himſelf; that he would doe well to conſider and take care how he forfeited all other his former Services by ſuch mutinous practices as this, which would render him odious to all his Majeſty's Officers and Miniſters. The Meſſenger who carried this Letter, overtook him in Sacſahuana, being about four leagues diſtant from the City, which when Hernandez had read, he made this Anſwer, That he thought fit to be abſent in that conjuncture, not to be concerned in the Mutinies and Troubles which he ſaw were coming; for he knew that the Souldiers would preſs him to be their Leader and Commander in chief; and moreover, that he was going to communicate many other matters unto the Preſident for his Majeſty's Services; to which he added divers other impertinences, diſpleaſing to Cianca: at which the Judge being greatly moved, he preſently diſpatched Letters to Captain Lope Martin, (whom Palentino calls Alonſo de Mendoça) and who, as we ſaid before, was ſent to the Charcas, to ſuppreſs Inſurrections, that with half a dozen of his moſt faithfull Souldiers he ſhould intercept Hernandez in his journey or cauſe him to return back again to Cozco. The day following Lope Martin with his ſix Souldiers accordingly ſet out, and taking the ordinary journeys of four or five leagues a day, he overtook Hernandez in Curampa, about twenty leagues from the City, who intended now to play a double game; for on one ſide, he was willing to ſhew his readineſs to ſerve his Majeſty; and on the other ſide, he deſigned to give contentment to the Souldiers, by whom he was deſirous to be eſteemed a Favourer of their pretenſions and reaſons of complaint; as will appear by the Anſwer he gave at his return to the Judge Cianca when he was brought before him. For in excuſe he alledged, that he abſented himſelf from the City, that the Souldiers might not engage him in the Mutinies they intended, and force him to be their General; Upon which Allegation the Judge committed him to priſon in the Houſe of John de Saavedra, who was one of the principal Citizens of Cozco; and having made Proceſs againſt him, he remitted him to the farther cenſure of the Preſident, and ſuffered him to go upon his paroll, and upon Oath taken, that he would proceed directly and preſent himſelf before his Superiours. Accordingly Hernandez went to the City of Los Reyes, but was detained three months on the way, becauſe the Preſident at firſt would not ſee him, nor give him admittance into the City, untill at length he received licence and the favour to kiſs the Preſident's hand: ſome days after which, the Preſident, being deſirous to comply with his Martial Spirit, and to clear the Kingdom of a ſort of inſolent and mutinous Souldiers, conferred the honour of a Commiſſion on him, impouring him to make a Conqueſt of the Chunchus, with the Title of Governour and Captain General of all that Countrey, which he ſhould conquer at his own coſt and hazard, excepting out of his Commiſſion thoſe Frontiers which bordered on his Conqueſt, namely, Cuzco, the City of La Paz, and the City of Plate: Franciſco Hernandez was much pleaſed with his Commiſſion, intending thereby to gain an opportunity to rebell againſt his Majeſty;

jesty; which had been long in his mind, and which he at length put in execution, as we shall find by the sequel: and in order thereunto he remained in Rimac untill such time as the President embarked for Spain, as shall be declared hereafter. During the time that the President was employed in the Valley of Apurimac, in sharing unto every man his proportion and lot; the Judge Cianca received intelligence, that the Licençiado Polo, who was sent to be Judge in the Charcas, had taken Francisco de Espinosa and Diego de Carvajal the Gallant, and sent them prisoners; who were the two persons employed by Gonçalo Piçarro in Arequepa and the Charcas, after the Battel of Huarina, and there committed those disorders which we formerly mentioned: but these men, before they came to Cozco, wrote a Letter to Diego Centeno, intreating him to intercede for them, and at least obtained so far a remission of their Crimes, as might not extend unto life, but unto banishment out of the Kingdom. In answer hereunto Centeno replyed, That he should gladly comply with their request, in case the enormity of their Crimes were capable of so much mercy, and could admit of excuse and alleviation before the Lords the Justices; but since they had been so cruel as to burn seven Indians alive without any cause or provocation, he feared that the Gate was shut to all mercy, nor durst any Man appear with arguments of intercession in a cause so vile and dark as theirs. Some few days after this Answer was given, these Offenders were brought to Cozco, where they were hanged and quartered, and their Quarters disposed in several ways, to the great satisfaction both of Indians and Spaniards, who rejoiced to see a Cruelty so justly revenged.

CHAP. V.

The Government of Chile is given to Pedro de Valdivia. The Articles which his own People prefer against him; and by what means he is freed by the President.

AMongst the many great Divisions and Distributions made by the President Gasca in the Valley of Apurimac, the Government of the Kingdom of Chile was conferred on Pedro de Valdivia, with Title of Governour and Captain General of that great Kingdom containing five hundred leagues in length; and moreover, he received a full Commission to divide the Countrey amongst the Adventurers and such as had deserved well of the Crown. The benefit of which Commission Pedro de Valdivia enjoyed a long time with great prosperity and affluence of fortune, untill his Riches became his snare, and were the cause of his ruine, together with a hundred and fifty Spanish Gentlemen more who were all slain with him, as we have already related in the first part of this History, in the Life of Inca Yupanqui; and have there anticipated this Story, which was memorable and worthy observation, and inserted it out of its due place, in regard the Successes of that Kingdom were impertinent to our purpose: but the present passages belonging to the Dominion of Peru fall within the verge of our History, and are the proper subject of our Discourse, of which Diego Hernandez, a Citizen of Palencia, gives this account in one of his Chapters, the Title of which is this:

That by the same humane Laws some men may be condemned and put to death, and others guilty of the same Crime may be freed and acquitted.

The same Authour hath another Chapter, number 94. the Title of which is this:

In what manner the President sent to take Pedro de Valdivia. The Articles which the People of Chile preferred against him, and in what manner the President brought him off.

It hath been already mentioned in this Hiſtory how Pedro de Valdivia came out of Chile, and how afterwards the Preſident made him Commander of the Provinces he ſhould conquer. And to prepare himſelf for that undertaking, Valdivia went from Cuzco to the City of Los Reyes, with intent to furniſh himſelf there with all neceſſaries, and what might be required for that Conqueſt. And having raiſed his men, of which ſome were of thoſe who had been baniſhed out of Peru, and others condemned to the Gallies for having been concerned in the late Rebellion; and having provided all other matters, he cauſed them to embarque on ſome Ships which ſet ſail from the Collao of Lima, but Pedro de Valdivia went himſelf by Land to Arequepa. And whereas at this time ſeveral Complaints were brought againſt him to the Preſident, accuſing him to have carried with him ſeveral condemned perſons, and that many outrages were committed on the way by People who had his command and authority ſo to doe; Orders were ſent to Pedro de Hinojoſa to intercept him in his way, and by ſome dexterous management to bring him back to the Preſident. Pedro de Hinojoſa accordingly met him, and asked him civilly, whether he would not return again, to give ſatisfaction to the Preſident, for what was alledged againſt him; which Valdivia refuſing to doe, Hinojoſa accompanied him in a friendly manner for a whole day's journey; when watching his opportunity he ſeiſed upon him with ſix Muſquetiers, and brought him back to the Preſident; by which time ſeveral of the Plaintiffs from whom Valdivia had taken the Gold, as before mentioned, were come from Chile, and had preferred Articles in writing againſt him, wherein they accuſed him for having taken the Gold from them, for having killed many perſons unjuſtly, and that he lead a diſſolute life with a certain woman; that he was in confederacy with Gonçalo Piçarro, and went from Chile, with deſign and intention to join with him, beſides many other treaſonable things of which they impeached him; and in concluſion, they deſired, that he might be condemned to pay and return the Gold he had taken from them.

The Preſident found himſelf much perplexed and ſtraitned in this matter, for in caſe he condemned Valdivia, he abſolutely deſtroyed his voyage, which tended to the quiet and benefit of Peru, by clearing the Countrey of ſo many leud and inſolent Souldiers as were to accompany him. And in caſe the taking away the Gold were proved upon him, and he not compelled to make reſtitution, it would be ſuch a piece of injuſtice, as would tend much to the diſreputation of the Preſident, and make a great noiſe and out-cry in the Countrey: And being in this ſtrait, a contrivance was made to avoid the reſtitution, which was in this manner. Before it was ordered, that Copies ſhould be given to Valdivia of the Accuſation and Articles preferred againſt him, or any ſummary information; a rule was given, that firſt a ſolemn Inquiſition ſhould be made in the Office of the names of all thoſe perſons who were concerned in the Bill againſt the Defendant; the which was to be done in that ſlight manner, that the reaſon for which it was required might not be diſcovered. And when it appeared by the Bill, that all the People of Chile were concerned as Plaintiffs, and were all Parties and intereſted in the Demand; none of them could lawfully be made a Witneſs or give legal teſtimony in their own Cauſe; he then ordered, that Valdivia ſhould have a Copy of the Bill, and give in a ſpeedy Anſwer; the which he accordingly did; denying every thing that was alledged againſt him: it then lay upon the Plaintiffs to prove all by their Witneſſes. The Cauſe coming to a tryal, and no teſtimony produced, beſides that of the Parties intereſted; the Preſident proceeded, ex officio, to ſentence in favour of Valdivia. And though ſomething was proved of his intention towards Gonçalo Piçarro, yet the Preſident declared, that neither for that, nor other matters, he found ſufficient reaſon to divert Valdivia from his intended Conqueſt; howſoever he took ſecurity from him, not to entertain any of thoſe who were baniſhed for their Rebellion: And alſo that he would ſend a Judge upon the place, to make a ſtrict inquiſition concerning the Gold, and gave Valdivia particularly in charge to give ſatisfaction for the ſame: which he promiſing to perform, the ſuit was diſmiſt, and he permitted to proceed to Chile. Thus far Palentino, who therewith concludes this Chapter.

CHAP. VI.

The unfortunate death of Diego Centeno in the Charcas, and of Licenciado Carvajal in Cozco. The foundation of the City of Peace, the Courts of Judicature are setled in Los Reyes.

After that the President Gasca had finished the Distribution of Lands as he designed in Apurimac, and was gone to Los Reyes; the Inhabitants and chief Lords of Peru took their leaves of him, in order to return to their own homes, Cities and Places of aboad; some to take possession of their new Estates, and others to repair their old, which were gone to ruine and decay by the miseries of the War. Amongst the rest, Diego Centeno went to his Estate, in the Village of Plate, now called the City of Plate, by reason of the vast quantities of Silver which they daily dig out of that Hill adjoining to it, called Potocsi; where his intention was to get what Silver and Gold he could, and therewith transport himself into Spain, to render an account unto his Majesty of all the Services he had done for his Imperial Crown; which his Majesty taking into his gratious consideration might gratifie him with some reward, which the President had omitted to doe, for which neglect he esteemed himself highly affronted. This resolution being discovered to some friends with whom he consulted; his intention presently took air and was divulged through the whole Kingdom, being wrote in all Letters and Papers of advice, which greatly offended the Government, to hear that a person so considerable as Centeno was preparing to carry his Complaints into Spain: some of the great Officers then in power being jealous of his Design, would have persuaded him not to goe, on pretence of friendship to him; but finding that they could not prevail, they resolved on another course more certain and secure than the former, which was this; Some of the Neighbours thereabouts out of malice, and some out of ignorance, wrote a Letter to Diego Centeno, desiring him to come to the City of Plate, where they might consult amongst themselves concerning his Voyage into Spain, and other matters of their own, which they would recommend to be communicated by him to his Imperial Majesty. Centeno accordingly prepared for his journey to the City; which being known to his Indians, they earnestly persuaded him not to goe, having received some private intimation, as they said, from their familiar spirits, of an intent to kill him: but Centeno was the more resolved, because he would shew how little he valued the superstitious witchcrafts and presages of the Indians. Great was the joy which those who invited him shewed at his arrival, but some Souldiers, who had been his friends and companions at the time when he was pursued by Francisco de Carvajal, and in the Battels of Huarina and Sacsahuana privately suggested their fears for his appearance there; telling him, that the prediction which his own Indian servants had made known to him, the same was also confirmed by those of that City, and signified to their Masters: the which his friends interpreted for a sinister omen, though in reality there appeared no outward cause or reason to suspect it. But Centeno carried the matter high, and slighted the vain superstition of the Indians; saying that their conversation was with the Devil, who was the Father of Lyes, and therefore no credence was to be given to their presages: but a short time shewed the vanity of his confidence, for having been four days in the City, he was solemnly invited to an entertainment in the house of a certain Gentleman, whose name it is not necessary to specifie here, but onely to recount the matter of fact like an Historian, without other reflexion; seeing that the persons themselves are now in place, where they have given an account of this action. In short, at this Banquet such a dose of poison was prepared, and given to Centeno so privately and undiscovered, without any present symptoms or torments in the Bowels, as did his business, and dispatched him in three days. His death was greatly lamented by all sorts of People in the Kingdom, for he was a Gentleman of much goodness and affable deportment, which had gained him a general affection and esteem. He had been concerned in all the exploits and atchievements of that Countrey, having been one of thoſe who had entred with Don Pedro de Alvarado, and engaged with him in the Conqueſt of the Empire: the news of his death being come into Spain, his Brother gave a relation of the manner of it to the Emperour Charles the Fifth, and that he had left two natural Children, a Son and a Daughter, who were poor and deſtitute; becauſe the Eſtate which their Father had from the ſervices of Indians, ended with his death: in conſideration of which his Majeſty gratiouſly conferred for a portion to the Daughter the ſum of twelve thouſand ducats of Caſtile, and ſettled upon the Son Gaſpar Centeno, who was a School-fellow of mine, an Eſtate of four thouſand pieces of Eight of yearly rent, to be paid out of his Majeſty's Royal Treaſure in the City of Plate. I have heard that this Eſtate was made an inheritance for ever, but I know not how to believe it, becauſe I did never hear that any Eſtate of inheritance was ever charged on the King's Treaſury but for one Life or two at moſt. Some few months after the death of Centeno, Licenciado Carvajal came alſo to an unfortunate end in Cozco, as we have hinted before, by a fall from a high Window; for without any reſpect to his Office, as Judge, they cut the Cords of the Ladder by which he came up, and went down. Many other men died, and came to unfortunate ends in divers Cities of Peru, by which Lands and Eſtates over Indians became void, and places made for other Pretenders, by which the Preſident had opportunity to gratifie many who were aggrieved to have been left out of the laſt Diviſion: but men were not ſatisfied herewith, but as diſcontented and complaining as before, as will appear by what follows; for every man fanſied that his Services merited the whole Empire of Peru.

Now in the mean time, whilſt theſe violent Deaths and Misfortunes happened in the City of Plate and in Cozco, the Preſident Gaſca was intent to the repairs of the City of Los Reyes, and to erect a new Court of Chancery there, which continues to this day. He alſo contrived ways to people the City of Peace. As Diego Hernandez Palentino declares in the ſecond Book of the firſt Part of his Hiſtory, in theſe words:

Don Jeronimo de Loayſa (ſays he) was diſpatched away with this Letter, which he was to carry to the City of Cozco; and was that which the Preſident wrote to the Souldiers who were left out of the diſtribution and had no Eſtate allotted to them, as before mentioned, which cauſed great diſturbances, as that of Franciſco Hernandez, whoſe rebellion proceeded from that cauſe alone. The Preſident Gaſca departed from Guanarima, and went to the City of Los Reyes; and in his journey he gave a Commiſſion to Alonſo Mendoça to be Governour of the New Colony which was founded in Chuquiabo, and called our Lady of Peace; which name was given to it by the Preſident, becauſe it was founded in the time of Peace, after ſo much War which had haraſſed that Countrey; and becauſe it is the middle way between Arequepa and the Charcas, which are a hundred and ſeventy leagues diſtant from each other; and is alſo the mid-way between Cuzco and the Charcas, being in like manner a hundred and ſeventy leagues, and being the road between ſuch conſiderable Cities, it was conceived neceſſary to have a City founded there, for the convenience of Travellers, and to prevent Robberies and Violences which were committed in thoſe parts. And having ordered all things in this manner, he proceeded in his journey to Los Reyes, and made his Entry into that City on the ſeventeenth day of September, being there received with all the ſignal demonſtrations of joy that could be expreſſed with Sports and Dances, Feaſts and Revels. The Preſident entered with the Royal Seal before him, to ſignifie his intention to erect a Court of Chancery in that City. The Seal and the Preſident had a rich Canopy over them; the Seal was on the right hand incloſed in a rich Caſe, and carried on a white Horſe covered with a Foot-cloth of Tiſſue to the very ground, and which was lead by the Reins by Lorenço de Aldana, the Chief Juſtice, and the Mule of the Preſident was lead by Jeronimo de Silva, the Mayor of the City. Lorenço de Aldana and the other Officers who bore up the Sticks of the Canopy were clothed with Garments of Incarnation Sattin, and went bare-headed. The Guards who were appointed to attend the Seal and the Preſident had Liveries beſtowed on them at the coſt of the City; as had all the Dancers and Actors cloaths and properties given them of Silk with divers colours. And the Dancers came forth in their ſeveral Orders, repreſenting the Cities and principal People of Peru; every one repeating a Diſtich or two ſignifying the fidelity of their People towards the Emperour.

LIMA.

LIMA.

I am the City of Lime,
Who came the firſt in time,
All happineſs to bring Unto our Lord the King.

TRUXILLO.

I'm called the City of Truxillo,
Who with true Loyalty
Came with my men to ſerve his Majeſty.

In like manner,

Pyura, Quito, Guanuco and the Chachapoyas; alſo Guamanca, Arequipa, Cozco and the Charcas, preſented themſelves before the Preſident with Verſes to the ſame ſubſtance as before; which being all in Dogerel rithm, were ſcarce worthy of a Tranſlation into Engliſh; and indeed the Authour is of the ſame opinion, for he ſaith, that they were ſo dull and inſipid, that they ſavoured more of Indian than Spaniſh compoſure.

But to return now to the Reaſons which Palentino gives for the foundation of the City of Peace, which we have already mentioned; we cannot allow that the prevention of Robberies could be any motive or reaſon for the building of that City: for ſuch hath been the generoſity of that Empire called Peru, of which may be ſaid what cannot be ſaid of any other Kingdom of the World, namely, that from the Conqueſt thereof, which was in the year 1531 to this very time, which is towards the end of 1610, it was never known or heard that either publickly or privately any Robberies had been committed; nor have any Merchants and Dealers ever been aſſaulted on the highway, though they have been known to carry with them vaſt quantities of Gold and Silver over Deſarts and Mountains for the ſpace of three or four hundred leagues; and have travelled with ſuch ſecurity, that they adventured to lye in the fields day and night without other defence or guard than their mere Tents, which is a thing ſo commendable, as is ſpoken of both in the Indies and in Spain greatly to the honour and praiſe of this Empire. We mean, that ſuch ſecurity as this, is in time of Peace, and not in the time of War; for then, as we have ſaid before, there is nothing but ſpoil and robbery where Violence and arbitrary Power, and not Law, prevail.

CHAP. VII.

The Cares and Troubles which the Preſident Gaſca ſuſtained. How he puniſhed ſome People that were in a Mutiny. With what Patience he endured ſeveral inſolent Speeches of the Souldiers: and how he pacified and ſatisfied the Pretenders.

THE Courts of Judicature being now eſtabliſhed in the City of Los Reyes; the Preſident applied himſelf to order ſuch matters as tended to the quiet and ſecurity of the Empire, and appointed that the Goſpel and Chriſtian Doctrine ſhould be taught and preached to the Natives. He commanded alſo, that a general ſurvey ſhould be made of all the Diviſions which had been made, and of the Tributes which the Indians were to pay to their Lords, which were moderately impoſed and regiſtred, ſo that it ſhould not be in the power of the Lords at any time to raiſe that Rent or Tribute. In which affair Licençiado Cianca, one of his Majeſty's Judges was employed, and to that purpoſe he was ſent to the City of Los Reyes, having firſt ſuppreſſed a ſmall mutiny cauſed at Cozco by the Diviſions lately lately made, and puniſhed the Authours of them. For he hanged a Souldier and baniſhed three others; but not to make any greater combuſtion, he proceeded no farther in the Examination, nor in the puniſhment. But the Preſident, whoſe Maxim it was to govern with gentleneſs and moderation, was pleaſed to take off the Sentence of Baniſhment and interdiction, before it was demanded; for conſidering the nature of the People, and the juſt reaſon which moſt of them had to complain, he thought it not convenient to be over ſevere and rigorous in his juſtice. The Judge Cianca, by order of the Preſident, appointed and ſubſtituted John de Saavedra to be Deputy in his Office, who was a Gentleman of Noble birth, born at Seville, and had a conſiderable Eſtate in Indians alloted him in that City of Cozco. Alſo the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado was by Commiſſion from the Preſident made Governour of the new Plantation, and was eſpecially to take care to People the City of Peace: for at the beginning that City had both thoſe Names, and Alvarado had a particular intereſt to take care thereof, becauſe his Eſtate was adjoining thereunto. At this time the People flocked from all parts of the Empire to the City of Los Reyes to kiſs the Preſident's hands and return him thanks for the diſtributions he had allotted to them. In like manner many principal Souldiers who had long ſerved his Majeſty came with their Addreſs to demand a reward for their ſervices, and ſatisfaction for the late injury and injuſtice which was done them; in that their Friends and Companions to whom pay was due, were put to death for demanding the ſame; and that Act of asking their Pay was interpreted as a piece of diſobedience and treaſon againſt his Majeſty. At the ſame time came the News of the death of Diego Centeno, Graviel de Rojas and of Licenciado Carvajal, and of other Inhabitants deceaſed. And though the Preſident was ſufficiently informed of their juſt demands and reaſons of complaint; yet the Souldiers with much importunity would lay their caſes before him; beſeeching his Lordſhip with much paſſion, that he would be pleaſed to cauſe a new review and inſpection to be made into the late Diviſions, that ſome parts thereof might be clipt and lopt off from the exceſſive and exuberant allotments of ſome men, and conferred upon them; whereby they might be enabled to eat and not ſtarve with hunger, whilſt thoſe who ſerved the late Rebel, were plentifull and eaſie in their fortunes, and died with extreme gluttony and luxury. The ſame is confirmed by Gomara, chap. 188. in theſe words. Laſtly, ſaith he, they reſolved to deſire the Preſident to review the late Diviſions made, and to give them their ſhare thereof or grant them Penſions; and if not, then they were reſolved to take them by force, &c. Thus far Gomara.

The Preſident was troubled and wearied out of his life with the importunities of ſo great a number of Pretenders; every one of which was ſo opinionated of his own Merits; that if in one day all the wealth of Peru had been vacated, and to be diſtributed, it would have been too little to anſwer the expectation of ſo much arrogancy and pride which appeared in theſe bluſtring Souldiers who exalted their merits above all expreſſion. Notwithſtanding which the Preſident, by his prudence and dextrous management, entertained them for a year and a half in that City, without trouble or mutiny: howſoever this ſort of inſolent Souldiers could not be ſo well contained within their bounds of moderation and duty, but that ſometimes they broke out into mutinies and rebellious Speeches; all which, as Hiſtorians ſay, the good Preſident ſuſtained with great patience and moderation, and thereby gained a greater Victory, by ſubjecting his own paſſions, than he had done by the Conqueſt of that whole Empire; ſome particulars of which I have heard in that Countrey, and others ſince I came into Spain, the leſs provoking and inſolent of which I will repeat here, and omit the moſt inſolent and abominable, as not fit to be expreſſed.

The Preſident being in perpetual trouble and unquietneſs, cauſed by the daily importunities of the Pretenders; thought fit to make uſe of a certain Captain, whom I knew, to eaſe him of the many ſolicitations and addreſſes which were made to him; and therefore ſaid, Captain, pray help me to undeceive this People, and let them know, that the King hath not wherewith to relieve them, nor I to order or diſtribute to them. To which the Captain made anſwer, pray, Sir, undeceive them your ſelf, who have been the perſon that deceived them; for, for my part, I know not what to ſay to them; to which the Preſident made no reply, ſeeming not to have heard him. Another Souldier of meaner degree deſired him to reward his ſervices: Honeſt Souldier, ſaid the Preſident, have patience, for I have not wherewith to doe it, all being already divided and distribution made. Sir, replied the Souldier, give me then that Cap of yours with which you have deceived so many, and I shall esteem my self well rewarded therewith. The President, looking upon him, said no more than, Go your ways in God's name.

Another person, who took upon himself the name and Title of a Captain, though in reality he was not, for I knew him well: but he had an Estate given him with Service of Indians to the Value of seven or eight thousand pieces of Eight a year: and he boldly required the President to better his Estate by some additions thereunto, as he had done to many others, who had not deserved half so much as he; for I, said he, have been one of the first Discoverers and Conquerours of Chile. And there hath no action of moment passed in all this Empire wherein I have not been concerned for service of his Majesty, for which I deserve great rewards; to which he added many arrogant Speeches and Bravadoes full of Vanity and Pride; atlength the President being over-tyred and wearied therewith, said to him, Good Sir, be gone, you have enough for a person of your quality, for I have heard that you are the Son of——— in your own Countrey, naming his Father's Trade. The Captain, for so I call him, presently replyed, He lyes who told your Lordship so, and so doth he who believes him: and therewith he presently went out of the room, fearing lest some body should lay hands upon him for his saucy Speeches: but the President patiently endured all these affronts, saying, he was to suffer and sustain much more for the service of the King his Master; besides which gentleness, he used the Souldiers with much civility, and entertained them with hopes and assurance to provide for them hereafter. As Diego Hernandez confirms in the first Book of the second Part of his History, Chap. 3. in these words: We are to observe, says he, that during all the time that the President remained in Lima, being about seventeen months, great numbers of People flocked thither to demand relief for supply of their necessities and reward of their services: for, as hath been said, many of the King's servants, who were left out in the first division, greatly complained of their hard usage. About this time several Estates fell to the King by the death of Diego Centeno, Gabriel de Rojas, Licenciado Carvajal, and others; and consequently there was some more matter and substance wherewith to answer the expectation of some Pretenders; but this not being a full supply, served onely to increase the troubles of the President, who by his gentle and civil Answers gave a general satisfaction to all people. Some of the Pretenders kept a secret correspondence with the Underclerks to give them information how Estates were distributed; and those communicated all to the Captains and Souldiers with whom they had friendship; and some had a sight of the Books themselves, wherein they saw to whom such Lands were given, and to whom such a Command and Lordship: and it is now commonly believed that those Books were falsified, and that the President himself, who was a subtile, understanding person, did connive thereat, and give permission to have the particulars secretly exposed; so that every one might be the better satisfied with his Lot, especially when they saw themselves nominated and designed to such an Estate: and it is certain that there are some men, who to this day are of opinion, that they are deprived of the Lot and Portion which the President appointed for them; and one person so entertained the thought thereof in his head, that he became mad when he found himself disappointed. But the President Gasca's great care and incumbence was to carry with him a good sum of Gold and Silver to the Emperour, of which he had already amassed a million and a half of Castellano's, which being reduced to Spanish Crowns, of three hundred and fifty Maravedis to the Crown, made two millions and a hundred thousand Crowns, besides the Treasure which had been expended in the late War. And now the time for the President's departure growing near (which was a happiness greatly desired by him) he hastned with all expedition possible to be gone, lest some dispatch should arrive to detein him longer in the Kingdom. And having finished and completed the remaining part of the Divisions, he folded and sealed them up, with order, that they should not be opened and published untill eight days after he had set sail from the coast, and that the Arch-bishop should confirm the Divisions he had made, by Act and Deed from himself. After this, upon the twenty fifth day of January the President went from Lima to Collao, a Port about two leagues distant from the City; and upon Sunday following, before he had ſet ſail he received a Pacquet from his Majeſty which ſeaſonably came to his hands, and therein his Majeſty's Royal Signature, to take off the perſonal Services.

And now, whereas he was very ſenſible that the Countrey was much unquiet and diſcontented, and full of ill affected men, by reaſon of the Diviſions made of Guaynarima; and becauſe many of the King's true and faithfull Servants were left deſtitute and unrewarded, whilſt thoſe who had taken part with Gonçalo Picarro had ſhared amongſt themſelves the richeſt and beſt of all the Countrey: And being now reſolved upon his departure, he publiſhed a Proclamation whereby he ſuſpended the execution of his Majeſty's Royal Signet for taking off perſonal ſervices untill he had rendered a relation to his Majeſty of the true ſtate of that Countrey, and of what elſe he conceived appertaining to his Majeſty's ſervice, alledging his power ſo to doe, in regard his Commiſſion and Authority did not ceaſe untill he had perſonally appeared in the preſence of his Majeſty, and given him a verbal account of his Affairs, and received his pleaſure therein. And ſo on Monday following he made ſail, carrying all the Gold and Silver with him which he had been able to gather. Thus far Palentino, who therewith concludes the Chapter.

CHAP. VIII.

The cauſe of the Stirrs and Inſurrections in Peru. Some Perſons condemned to the Gallies are entruſted to Rodrigo Ninno to conduct them into Spain: His great diſcretion and wit, whereby he freed himſelf from a Pyrate.

NOW as to what this Authour mentions touching the ſuſpenſion which the Preſident made of that Act, whereby his Majeſty takes off the perſonal ſervices, that is, the ſervices which Indians perform to the Spaniards: It is clear and apparent that thoſe late Ordinances executed, with the rigour and ill nature of the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela, were the cauſe of all thoſe Commotions which haraſſed the Empire, and took away the life of the Vice-king, and had been the deſtruction of ſo many Spaniards and Indians as have been related in this Hiſtory. And whereas the Preſident himſelf brought the revocation of theſe Ordinances, and by means thereof and by his wiſe and diſcreet management, the Empire was again recovered and reſtored to the obedience of his Majeſty. It neither ſeemed juſt nor decent for his Imperial Majeſty, nor agreeable to the particular honour of the Preſident to introduce thoſe new Laws and Statutes again which were formerly rejected and made void, eſpecially that of freeing the Indians from perſonal ſervices towards their Lords, which was the chief cauſe of all the complaints and troubles amongſt them: for which reaſon the Preſident often ſaid to ſeveral of his friends, that he was reſolved not to put that Law in execution untill he had firſt by word of mouth diſcourſed with his Majeſty of the inconvenience thereof; well knowing by experience, that that Law would never be digeſted by the people, but always prove a Scandal and Offence, and perhaps put all things again into confuſion and embroile, whenſoever the ſame were but moved, or intreaty onely to be put in execution. But the Devil (as we have before mentioned) deſigning to interrupt the peace of that Countrey, that thereby he might hinder the propagation of the Goſpel and the increaſe of Chriſtianity, contrived all means to unſettle and disjoint that Kingdom, and in order thereunto he ſo blinded the underſtanding of the Lords of the Privy-council, that they perſuaded his Majeſty to take ſuch meaſures as tended to the great prejudice and confuſion of that Kingdom; and hence thoſe Wars had their original, which ſucceeded to thoſe lately ſuppreſſed, being carried on by Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla and Franciſco Hernandez Giron, whoſe pretence and quarrel was the ſame good old Cauſe, onely to free themſelves from the uneaſie burthen of thoſe Statutes, Statutes, which cauſed all that noiſe and effuſion of ſo much bloud. As we ſhall make appear in its due place, and confirm the ſame by the teſtimony of Diego Hernandez, whom we ſhall have occaſion to quote in divers places.

But to turn the courſe of this Hiſtory from ſo melancholy a ſubject to ſomething more divertiſing and pleaſant; we are to know, that whilſt theſe matters were in agitation, a Letter was directed to the City of Los Reyes from Hernando Ninno, Mayor of the City of Toledo, to his Son Rodrigo Ninno, of whom we have formerly made mention in the fourth Book of the ſecond Part, wherein his Father required him (the Wars with Gonçalo Piçarro being ended) to haſten into Spain, to take poſſeſſion of an Eſtate which a Kinſman of his had left him to inherit.

The departure of this Gentleman, who had always approved himſelf loyal to his Majeſty's ſervice in the late Wars againſt the Rebels, was judged by the Preſident and the other Officers a fit and convenient opportunity for ſending thoſe eighty ſix Souldiers into Spain, who for taking part with Piçarro had been condemned to the Gallies: and accordingly this matter being intimated to Rodrigo Ninno and repreſented as a ſervice acceptable to his Majeſty, he accepted the ſame, though much againſt his Will, knowing that the charge of eighty ſix perſons condemned to the Gallies could not but occaſion much trouble and inconvenience to him: howſoever the hopes of a reward prevailed above the thoughts of the trouble; ſo that he provided his Arms and other neceſſaries for conducting thoſe People, with whom he departed to Los Reyes, being in all eighty ſix Spaniards; amongſt thoſe, there were ſix Muſicians, who had formerly ſerved Gonçalo Piçarro, whom I knew, and as I remember, one of them was called Auguſtine Ramirez born at Mexico, his Father was a Spaniard, and his Mother an Indian: they were all excellent Maſters of Muſick, and carried their Inſtruments with them, and therewith entertained company whereſoever they came; and by the liberality of ſome Gentlemen, who came to hear them, they received that which ſerved them to bear the charge of their voyage.

With fair weather and wind Rodrigo Ninno happily arrived at Panama, having along the coaſt of Peru received aſſiſtence for ſecurity of his Priſoners, who were during that time ſubmiſſive and humble, being conſcious to themſelves how much they had offended his Majeſty within that juriſdiction: But being departed from Panama and Nombre de Dios, ſome of them took the opportunity to make their eſcape, to avoid rowing in the Gallies; for the truth is, Rodrigo Ninno had not a ſufficient Guard with him to ſecure ſo many; nor did the Preſident and his Miniſters ſupply him therewith, imagining that the ſole authority of Ninno was ſufficient to keep them in ſubjection; though in reality they could not find men in that Countrey who would be perſwaded to take upon them the charge to conduct ſo many Gally-ſlaves into Spain. With this care and trouble Ninno, ſailing near the Iſles of Cuba and Saint Domingo, eſpyed a French Pyrate, who gave him chaſe, for at that time no other Nation uſed thoſe Seas but that onely. The Spaniſh Captain who was unprovided of Men and Arms for his defence, and knowing alſo that he carried an Enemy within his Veſſel, bethought himſelf of this Stratagem which was as diſcreet as pleaſant. He armed himſelf from head to foot, and with his Corſlet and Plume of Feathers in this Head-piece: and with his Partiſan in his hand went and ſtood by the Main-maſt; all his Seamen and others he commanded to be concealed under the Decks, and his Muſicians with their inſtruments to aſcend upon the Poop, and to ſtrike up and play when the Enemy came near them: all things being thus ordered as Ninno had directed, the Ship ſailed on her courſe, without fear as it were or apprehenſion of the Enemy, who ſtill gave them chaſe, not doubting of a good prize: but ſo ſoon as they came up with them, and ſo near as to hear the Muſick, and ſeeing few or none appear above deck, they began to imagin, that that Veſſel belonged to ſome perſon of Quality who was baniſhed for Treaſon againſt the King, or that was diſpoſſeſſed of his Eſtate by ſome Law-ſuit or other device; and that being thereby become deſperate, they believed he had ſet himſelf to Sea, and turned Pyrate, like themſelves, to repair his fortunes with what booty and prize offered on the Seas. The French-man with this imagination left off his chaſe, not daring to engage with Rodrigo Ninno, permitting him to purſue his Voyage. This Story was told to the Preſident, as he paſſed thoſe Iſlands into Spain; which the Inhabitants received from the relation of that Pyrate, whom under aſſurance of a white Flag and Articles of Truce they adventured to ſupply with Proviſions for his money, which much pleaſed the Preſident when he thought how good a choice he had made of a knowing and faithfull perſon, for ſo weighty a truſt as this of the Gally-ſlaves.

CHAP. IX.

All the Gally-ſlaves make their eſcape from Rodrigo Ninno, excepting one who remained with him, and him he drove away with Cuffs and Boxes with his Fiſt upon his Face. The Sentence which was paſſed on him in this caſe. The Favour which the Prince Maximilian ſhewed to him.

Rodrigo Ninno having got out of the hands of the Pyrate by his Strategem of Muſick, proceeded on his Voyage, and came to Havana where moſt of his Gally-ſlaves, having not had a ſufficient Guard to ſecure them, made their eſcapes: others of them fled away at Cartagena, and others at the Iſlands of Terceras, ſo that when they came to paſs the Bar of Saint Lucar, there were not above eighteen remaining of the whole number of eighty ſix; and between that and the Port of Seville ſeventeen found means to run away; ſo that when Rodrigo Ninno came to diſembark, he had onely a poor ſimple fellow of all his company remaining; whereas, according to contract made with the Preſident at Los Reyes, he was to have delivered the whole number of eighty ſix at this place: wherefore Ninno entered into Seville with his ſingle Gally-ſlave at a Back-gate of the City called Carbon, which is little frequented either by thoſe who go in or come out.

Rodrigo Ninno finding himſelf in the middle of a Street when no perſon appeared, catched hold of his Gally-ſlave by the Collar, and, with his Dagger in his hand, ſwore by the life of the Emperour, that he would give him twenty Stabbs: but, ſaid he, I will not doe it, becauſe I will not foul my hands with the bloud of ſo dirty a Villain as thou art, who having been a Souldier in Peru, haſt yet the baſe and poor ſpirit to become a Slave in the Gallies. Why didſt not thou run away as the other eighty five have done? Get thee gone in the Devil's name, for I had rather goe alone, than thus ill-attended; and having ſaid thus much, he gave him three or four good Cuffs on the Ear, and ſo let him goe: And therewith Rodrigo went directly to the Farmers of the Cuſtoms, to give them an account of the great care he had taken of the Gally-ſlaves; but that wanting men to guard and ſecure them, they were all eſcaped; and indeed he was in great apprehenſions and fear of his own Life, lying at the mercy of ſo many men who had a power over him greater than his. The Commiſſioners of the Cuſtom-houſe were much amazed to hear this Story, and knew not what to ſay to it, untill farther Examination.

In the mean time, this laſt Gally-ſlave, according to his own baſe ſpirit, talked at large of this matter in the firſt Victualling-houſe he came unto; and told all the particulars which Rodrigo Ninno had either ſaid or done: this Story filled all the Town with diſcourſe, and came at length to the hearing of the Commiſſioners, who thereupon ſeized upon Ninno; and the King's Attorney accuſed him with high aggravations of his fault, alledging that he had given liberty to eighty ſix of the King's Slaves, for every one of which he ought to pay the value and price of ranſome. The Suit againſt him was proſecuted, and Rodrigo Ninno, not being able to juſtify himſelf, he was condemned to ſerve the King with his Horſe for the ſpace of ſix years in Oran, and with two other Companions at his own charge, and that in the mean time he was not to return to the Indies. But Ninno appealed from this ſentence to the Prince Maximilian of Auſtria who then governed Spain in the abſence of his Imperial Majeſty who was his Uncle: His Highneſs inclined a favourable Ear to the Advocates of Rodrigo Ninno, who gave him a large account of all the Services which Ninno had performed againſt the Rebels, and how ill he had had been treated by thoſe who had joyned with Gonçalo Piçarro, and how he had been employed by the Vice-king Vela Nunnez to ſeize on certain perſons, and how ill he was treated by them, becauſe he would not take their party, as we have at large mentioned in the eleventh Chapter of the fourth Book, and ſecond Part. They alſo related the Trick he plaid the Pyrate at Sea, how the Gally-ſlaves eſcaped from him, and how he releaſed the laſt of them, and what words he ſaid to him. All which the Prince heard with his uſual favour and clemency, and was ſenſible that the eſcape of the condemned men was cauſed by default and omiſſion of thoſe whoſe buſineſs it was to provide ſufficient Guards, and that Ninno lay at the mercy of the Slaves, to whom he was beholding for not killing him. When the Agents obſerved how gratiouſly the Prince underſtood the cauſe of Ninno, they begged the favour that the Offenders might be admitted to the preſence of his Highneſs, which being granted, and that Ninno made his appearance accordingly, the Prince put ſuch pertinent queſtions to him as any Learned Lawyer or Counſellour could have done: Art thou, ſaid he, the man to whom eighty ſix Gally-ſlaves were entruſted? and that they all fled from you, and made their eſcape excepting one? and did not you beat that ſingle fellow from you, and cauſed him alſo to run away. Moſt Serene Prince, anſwered Rodrigo Ninno, I could not doe more than what I did, for they did not furniſh me with Men and Guards ſufficient to ſecure ſo many men; God knows my heart, and the World hath received ſufficient teſtimonies of my duty and ſervice towards his Majeſty. And as to the Gally-ſlave, whom I drove from me, I had compaſſion of him, for, methoughts, it was pity to commit that poor Raſcal alone to the Gallies, and force him to labour for all the others who were fled from me: nor was I willing to have his Curſes, or reward him ſo ill as to put him into the Gallies, becauſe he had been more true and faithfull to me than all his other companions. And now I refer my ſelf to the juſtice of your Highneſs, to be puniſhed in caſe my crimes or faults deſerve your royal diſpleaſure. No, anſwered the Prince, it is they who are to be blamed, and are accordingly to be puniſhed, and not you: for as to your part, you have done like a Gentleman, and therefore I acquit you from the ſentence, ſo that you have free liberty to return to Perú, when you pleaſe. Rodrigo Ninno kiſſed his hands, and gave humble thanks to his Highneſs, and ſome years afterwards, he returned to Peru, where he more at large related theſe matters which we onely touch upon in brief: and openly profeſſed, that in all Spain he found no friend to ſpeak in his behalf and favour, but onely the good Prince Maximilian de Auſtria, whom God preſerve and maintain with increaſe of Honour and Dominion. Amen.

CHAP. X.

The ſecond Diviſion of Lands is publiſhed. The Preſident departs for Spain. The death of Licenciado Cepeda. The coming of the Preſident to Panama.

THE Preſident Gaſca with ſuch impatience deſired to acquit himſelf of the Government that every hour ſeemed a year, whilſt he remained in that Office, and therefore uſed all poſſible endeavours to quicken his diſpatch. And that he might not be longer detained, he left order (as Palentino before ſaith) with the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes to publiſh after his departure the ſecond diviſion he had made, ſigned with his own hand: and having (as he ſuppoſed) made a ſufficient proviſion for all things and diſpoſed matters in their due form and manner; he embarked with all ſpeed, and ſailed from the Port called Callao, making his Croſs upon Peru, vowing with paſſion never more to ſee it again; And after eight days were paſt, publication was made of the new diſtribution; which Palentino mentions in theſe words, in Chap. 4. Lib. 1. Part. 2.

The time being come which the Preſident Gaſca had allotted for publication of the ſecond Diviſion, and which was impatiently expected by the Pretenders, they they all flocked to the publick Hall of Judicature: and the Judges being ſet upon the Bench, the Seals of the Inſtrument were broken up, and the writing read in publick; The iſſue of which was this: Thoſe who had the leaſt expectation were favoured with good allotments; and thoſe who had moſt were entirely left out, and remained without any diſtribution. It was pleaſant to ſee and hear the diverſity of mens behaviour and ſayings; ſome came out with pleaſant countenances, and others frowned, and ſwore and curſed the Preſident, being now become deſperate and without any hope, &c. Thus far Palentino.

The Preſident with all ſpeed left the Countrey, not to hear and underſtand the Reproaches and Curſes which would be given him; and haſtned as faſt as was poſſible to Panama; nor would he enter into Port by the way to take refreſhment, having a perfect hatred and abhorrence to the Countrey: with him he carried Licenciado Cepeda priſoner, who formerly had been one of his Majeſty's Juſtices in thoſe Kingdoms and Provinces; and though the Preſident had a ſufficient power to hear and judge his cauſe; yet, in regard he had promulged an Act of Pardon to all people, he was unwilling to call thoſe faults into queſtion which he had formerly forgiven; and therefore remitted his caſe to the ſupreme Royal Council of the Indies. And being come to Valladolid, where the Court then reſided, his cauſe was re-aſſumed and his faults opened, with many aggravating circumſtances of the Attorney General: And though Cepeda, in defence of himſelf alledged that the other Judges and he had acted all things with intention to ſerve his Majeſty and with deſign to qualifie and abate the fury of ſeditious and mutinous men, whoſe ſpirits were heated and put into fermentation by that indiſcreet rigour which the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez uſed in execution of thoſe new Laws which were the cauſe of all thoſe Troubles which enſued: but theſe Allegations availed little in his favour, nor was it poſſible to prevent the ſentence which was paſſed upon him, to dye as a Traytor. And though his friends and relations uſed all the intereſt they were able to gain his pardon; yet, ſeeing they could not avail for his life, they then endeavoured to moderate the ſentence, that he might not dye as a Traytor, and ſo his bloud be attainted: to avoid which a contrivance was made with a doſe of poiſon, whereby he paſſed more eaſily and quietly into the next world before ſentence was pronounced formally againſt him at the Tribunal of Juſtice. All which was the common and publick diſcourſe in Peru, and which I heard afterwards confirmed in Spain by ſome Indians who happened to enter before me into diſcourſe about the death of Licenciado Cepeda. And it is farther ſaid of Cepeda, that he diſcourſing after the death of Gonçalo Piçarro of the ſucceſſes of the late Affairs, and of the ſentence of death which paſſed upon himſelf; and that he was condemned as a Traytor, to have his Houſes demoliſhed, and the ground thereof to be ſowed with Salt, and his Head to be fixed on a Spike of Iron; that he ſhould ſay, he would maintain the cauſe of Gonçalo Piçarro to have been juſt and legal, and that he was no Traytor to his Majeſty; and that he acted entirely for conſervation of the Empire; and that if he did not make this good, he would pawn his Life, and offer his Throat to the Knife; provided he might have the Parliament of Paris or the Univerſity of Bolonia for his Judges, or any other Court of Juſtice, not ſubjected to the Imperial Dominion. Dr. Gonçalo Yleſcas, in his Pontifical Hiſtory ſpeaks almoſt the ſame thing of Cepeda, as before mentioned, whoſe words are as followeth:

Amongſt the many famous and renowned perſons who were concerned in the Troubles of Peru, there was one Licenciado Cepeda, who acted a conſiderable part; he was a Native of Tordeſillas, and one of the Judges who came over with the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela: It were not juſt to conceal his Name, having been very active in his Majeſty's ſervice, whilſt he employed himſelf in that duty: and afterwards, being engaged with Gonçalo Piçarro, he ſhared a great part in his illegal practices. This Cepeda, at the concluſion of all, when both Armies were drawn up in the Field to give Battel, revolted over to the Imperial Camp, with ſome danger of his life, for Piçarro ſent to purſue him, and he was left for dead upon a wet mooriſh piece of ground. Though Gaſca received him then with great ſigns of affection and good-will; yet afterwards he brought him into Spain, and cauſed him to be clapt up in the King's priſon, and was afterwards arraigned of High-treaſon. Cepeda made ſo good a defence for himſelf, and with ſo much reaſon, (for he knew very well the manner to defend his Cauſe) that it was generally believed he would have been acquitted with much honour: but dying of a ſickneſs in the

in the Priſon at Valladolid, his Cauſe was never determined. I had once in my poſſeſſion the reaſons he produced in his own defence, which indeed are ſo ſtrong that whoſoever reads them muſt neceſſarily acquit him, and allow him to have been a true and faithfull ſervant to his Majeſty: He was more happy in the goods of mind than in thoſe of fortune; for though he had amaſſed vaſt Riches and acquired great Honours, yet I have ſeen him much afflicted, and neceſſitous in priſon.

Thus far this Doctour, who giving alſo a relation of the death of Count Pedro Navarro, one of the moſt famous Captains of his time, ſays almoſt the ſame that we have done of the death of Cepeda, viz. That the Officer in whoſe cuſtody he was, being his great Friend, did ſtrangle him in priſon to prevent an Attainder, having gained all the Kingdom of Naples, &c. Thus fortune produces caſes of the like nature over all the World, that men comparing the miſeries of others with their own, may learn to compaſſionate each others ſorrows.

The Preſident Gaſca arrived in ſafety at the City of Panama, with more than a million and a half of Gold and Silver, which he carried into Spain for account of his Majeſty; beſides as much more for private men, who were paſſengers with him. At that place a ſtrange accident happened which Hiſtorians mention: but in regard Auguſtine de Carate is more particular therein than any other Authour; we ſhall make uſe of his relation, touching the Execution of one of thoſe new Ordinances or Laws which have made ſuch a noiſe in the World, and raiſed Mutinies and Rebellions in all quarters: and therefore we ſhall in the firſt place repeat what he ſays of the beginning of this rebellion, and then as to the Proceedings thereof, we ſhall refer our ſelves to the other Authours, as alſo for the quantities of Gold and Silver which were robbed by the Contreras; who, if they had contented themſelves with the prey they had taken, and had known how to ſecure it, they had revenged the injuries they ſuſtained with great advantage: but the heat of youth tranſported them beyond the terms of moderation; and being unexperienced in the art of War, they loſt all again together with their lives: all which is ſpecified by Auguſtine Carate in the ſeventh Book of his Hiſtory of Peru, Chap. 12. the Title of which is as followeth, and which we make the eleventh of theſe our Commentaries.

CHAP. XI.

Of what happened to Hernando and Pedro de Contreras, who were at Nicaragua, and went in queſt and purſuit of the Preſident.

AT that time, when Pedro Arias Davila governed and diſcovered the Province of Nicaragua, he married one of his Daughters called Donna Maria Pennaloſa to Rodrigo de Contreras a Native of the City of Segovia, a principal perſon, and one of a great Eſtate there: By the death of Pedro Arias the Government of that Province fell to Rodrigo de Contreras; who having been nominated thereunto by his Father-in-law Pedro Arias, and having deſerved well for his Loyalty to the Crown, his Majeſty was pleaſed to confirm him therein by ſpecial Commiſſion; and accordingly he governed for ſome years, untill a new Court of Judicature was erected in the City of Gracias de Dios, which borders on the confines of Guatimala; and then the new Juſtices did not onely deprive Rodrigo de Contreras of his Government; but likewiſe putting in execution one of the new Laws before mentioned, they acquitted all his Indians, as well thoſe which belonged to himſelf as thoſe which came to him by his Wife from their duty and ſervices; as alſo thoſe Indians which he had ſetled upon his Children during the time of his Office: of which hard uſage Rodrigo complaining petitioned for a redreſs in conſideration of the many ſervices which both his Father-in-law and all his family had performed performed to his Majesty: but neither the King nor his Council thought fit to yield to his request, but to maintain the new Law, and approve what the Court had acted in that matter. The Sons of Rodrigo de Contreras called Hernando and Pedro resented this agrievance with high indignation, and being young men, rash and in the heat of their bloud, resolved to rise in Arms: and herein they found encouragement from one John Bermejo, and other Souldiers his Companions, who were come from Peru; most of which were highly displeased and incensed against the President, because for all the services they had done in the Wars against Gonçalo Piçarro, he suffered them to starve; and instead of making provision for them, he highly rewarded those who had taken part with Piçarro and banished such as had served the King out of the Confines of Peru: with these and the like Complaints they animated the two brothers to undertake some great enterprise, persuading them that in case they could once get two or three hundred Souldiers, they might adventure to invade Peru; and moreover, being already furnished with Shipping and all things requisite for Navigation, they might with much ease transport their men thither; where being landed they would soon be increased with all that party of men which the President Gasca had disobliged. Having resolved on the matter, they privately listed men, and provided Arms, and when they found themselves strong enough to resist the Officers of Justice, they began to put their designs into execution: and in the first place they fell upon the Bishop of the Province, who having opposed their Father in all his negotiations, they in revenge thereof caused certain Souldiers to enter his house, and kill him as he was playing at Chess. And then presently they set up their Standard, and declared for Liberty, calling their Army the Keepers of the Liberty. Then they fitted such Ships out to Sea as were requisite, and sailed into the South-sea, with intention to expect the coming of the President, and to take and rob him in his passage; for they had received intelligence, that he was on his voyage towards the main Land with all the treasure belonging to his Majesty. Howsoever it seemed most adviseable to go first to Panama, there to receive information of the state of Affairs; and besides, they were in a better post and station there, to sail from thence to any part of Peru, than from Nicaragua. And having shipped about three hundred men, they arrived at the Port of Panama, where before they made a descent into the Town, they informed themselves by some of the Inhabitants whom they had taken of all which had lately past; and how the President was already landed with all the King's Treasure. And now, as if their good fortune had offered this great booty to their hand, they expected untill night; and then secretly entered the Port without any noise, on confidence that the President was lodged in the City, and lay secure, apprehending no harm; and therefore they doubted not but to surprize him without loss or hurt to themselves. Thus far Augustine Carate. And Gomara having almost said the same thing, adds, Chap. 193. That the Contreras got up all the Piçarrists, who were fled from Gasca, and other Fugitives and men of desperate fortunes, and resolved to attempt some exploits to enrich themselves, declaring that the Treasure and Dominion of Peru did by a lawfull Title belong to them, as Grand-children descended from the Pedrarias de Avila, who were in Partnership with Piçarro Almagro and Laques. Though this was but a weak pretence, yet it served the turn, and brought in a great number of Villains and Miscreants to side with them; and under this colour they committed much spoil and robbery, and sufficiently enriched themselves, had they known a mean and wherewith to be contented. Thus far Gomara.

Now the whole Story is this; The Contreras entered Panama by night and made there first attempt on the house of Doctour Robles. In four Ships then in Port they took eight hundred thousand pieces of Eight, some of which were for the King's and some for account of private men: in the Treasurer's house they seized upon six hundred thousand more which were ready to have been carried to Nombre de Dios, as Gomara reports, Chap. 193. And besides this quantity of Gold and Silver, they robbed the Shops of many rich Merchants, whence they plundred such vast quantities of commodities which came from Spain, that they were troubled how to dispose of them or carry them away. Moreover, they sent one of their Companions called Salguero with a Party of Musquetiers by way of Las Cruzes to the River of Chayre, upon intelligence that they had sent great quantities of Gold and Silver by that road to Nombre de Dios: and Salguero overtook and seized seventy load of Silver, which was not as yet shipped aboard, being to the value of five hundred and ſeventy thouſand Ducats; all which they ſent to Panama; ſo that beſides Merchandize, Pearls, Jewels and other Curioſities, that they plundered, they had ſeized almoſt two millions in Gold and Silver onely, which belonged to the Preſident, and other Paſſengers; who having not the leaſt ſuſpicion of Thieves or Robbers in that way, carried part of their Gold and Silver with them, and the reſt they left at Panama, to be brought after them to Nombre de Dios at ſeven or eight turns. For as Gomara ſaith, there belonged above three millions to the Preſident and his Company. But all this immenſe Riches and Wealth was quickly conſumed by the follies and debaucheries of theſe young men; according to the Proverb, What was got upon the Devil's back, was ſpent upon his belly. And what helped forward to this Work, was the vanity of Bermejo and his Companions the Piçarriſts, who could not be contented with a leſs Prey than the perſon of the Preſident Gaſca himſelf; for ſome deſired to take a full revenge on him in lieu of the Pay and Reward he promiſed for the ſervices they had done; and others, who were Piçarriſts, were become his inveterate Enemies on the ſcore of the old quarrel; and all cried out, that they would make Dice of his Bones and Powder of his Fleſh: for, ſaid they, he is ſo fine and ſubtile in all his dealings, that certainly he cannot but make the beſt and the fineſt Gun-powder in the World: But theſe men were deceived in their vain imaginations; for though they did not ſeize the perſon of the Preſident, yet their revenge would have been more complete in ſending him away without his Gold and Silver, than if they had taken him alive, and ſacrificed him to their rage and fury.

CHAP. XII.

Of the leud Practices and Follies of the Contreras, whereby they loſt all the Treaſure they had gained, together with their Lives. The diligence and good management which their Enemies uſed to bring them to condign Puniſhment.

BUT the good fortune of Licençiado Gaſca, which had accompanied him in all the ſucceſſes before related, and in the recovery of an Empire as great as Peru, would not now leave him expoſed to the Attempts of a leud and villanous ſort of People; for Providence ſtill continuing her protection and favour to him; ſuffered theſe wicked Wretches to be enſnared with their own Pride and Ignorance; and thoſe very men who had followed Franciſco de Carvajal, and had known and learned his Diſcipline and Art in War, were ſo clouded in their underſtandings and reaſons, that they raſhly precipitated themſelves into death and deſtruction. For in the firſt place, after they had taken Panama, and ſacked and plundered the City, they ſeized upon many of the principal men thereof, amongſt which were the Biſhop and Treaſurer to his Majeſty, as alſo Martin Ruyz de Marchena, and the Sheriffs of the City, and carried them away with intent to hang them upon the common Gallows, which they had certainly done to the full ſatisfaction of John de Bermejo, had not Hernando Contreras given a ſtop to the execution, with which Bermejo, being greatly enraged, told him plainly, that ſince he was pleaſed to appear in favour of his Enemies, to the high diſcouragement of his friends; it would be no wonder if his Enemies another day took their turn and hanged up him and all his Aſſociates.

Theſe words were a clear prediction of what happened in a ſhort time afterwards. For Hernando de Contreras took no other ſecurity from the Citizens for their quiet behaviour towards him than their bare Oath, ſwearing that they would be as true and faithfull to him, as if all the actions he had committed had tended to the ſervice of God and of the King, and to the benefit and advantage of the Citizens. After which vain piece of confidence and folly, they divided their Forces, which in all conſiſted of no more than two hundred and fifty men, into four Squadrons; forty of which were remaining with Pedro de Contreras, to guard the four Veſſels which they brought with them, and the other four they had taken in Port: Salguero, as we have ſaid, was ſent with thirty men to the River of Chagre to take poſſeſſion of the Silver which was robbed there: Hernando de Contreras himſelf marched with forty Souldiers more by way of Capira to ſeiſe the Preſident and ſack Nombre de Dios; both which exploits he thought very eaſie to be done by a ſurpriſe; and John de Bermejo with an hundred and fifty men ſtaid at Panama to keep and defend that City. And beſides theſe pieces of fooliſh management and miſcarriages, they were ſo inconſiderate as to entruſt the merchandiſe which they had robbed in the hands of the Proprietors themſelves, and to other perſons of reputation and note on ſecurity onely of Bonds under their handwriting to yield them up to Hernando de Contreras, when he ſhould return from Nombre de Dios; and ſo far were they tranſported with vain confidence, that they looked upon themſelves as Maſters of all the new world. And accordingly they gave out their Warrants to take up all Horſes and Mules that could be found, and to mount their Souldiers thereon, and to go to the relief and aſſiſtence of Hernando de Contreras if occaſion ſhould be. And with this Equipage Bermejo departed the City, leaving it to it ſelf, and with as much aſſurance of faithfulneſs as if it had been his own Houſe: whereas on the contrary, had they embarked all the Gold and Silver they had robbed upon their Ships, together with the Jewels, Merchandiſe and other Booty, and had gone away themſelves therewith, they had totally deſtroyed and ruined the Preſident and all his Adherents. But they neither deſerving ſo much good, nor the Preſident ſo much evil, the wheel of fortune turned, as we ſhall ſee by the ſequel.

For ſo ſoon as it was day, thoſe who had eſcaped out by night, whilſt they were plundring the City, one of which was Arias de Azevedo, (of whom the Hiſtory makes mention) diſpatched away a Servant of his to Nombre de Dios, to give intelligence to the Preſident Gaſca of all that the Rebels had done at Panama: and though as yet the advice was imperfect, yet it ſerved to alarm the Preſident in ſuch manner as that neither he nor his People were totally unprovided. On the other ſide, the Inhabitants of the City, whom John de Bermejo left with ſo much confidence, and repoſed that Truſt in as to commit a great part of his ſpoil to their care and cuſtody; no ſooner was his back turned than they aſſembled together, rang out the Bells of the Town, and fell to fortifying the City on the ſide towards the Sea, and to ſecure the paſſage on the way of Capira, in caſe the enemy ſhould attack them on either ſide: At the ſound of the Bells all the neighbouring Inhabitants came in with their Arms, being attended with their Negroes, that in a ſhort time between White men and Tawny they made up a force of above five hundred men, all reſolute to die in defence of the City. Two of the Souldiers belonging to John de Bermejo, who for want of Horſes were left behind, hearing the noiſe and confuſion amongſt the people, fled away to give advice to their Commander how the City was in rebellion, and again returned to the obedience of his Majeſty: Of which John de Bermejo ſent immediate advice to Hernando de Contreras, giving him to underſtand that he was going to Panama, to cut thoſe Traitours in pieces who had falſly violated their Oath and Faith to them: and ſo he returned thither with confidence of becoming Maſter of it with as much eaſe as formerly; but things happened out quite contrary to his expectation, for the Citizens, to prevent the burning of their City (which was all built of Timber) came forth to encounter him in the way, and met John de Bermejo fortified on the ſide of an Hill, where they attacked him with great courage; for being angry and aſhamed of the late diſgraceſull uſage, they fought with the more bravery: at the firſt aſſault it was not known which party had gained the advantage, but at the ſecond, the Citizens fighting like deſperate men, and full of revenge, overwhelmed their enemies with their numbers of White and Black men; amongſt which Bermejo and Salguero were both killed with about eighty more; as many more were taken, and carried away to the City; where being put all together in an open yard, the chief Bailiff of the Town (whoſe name we ſhall not mention) came in amongſt them with two Negro Servants, and with Daggers ſtabbed them to death, whilſt with loud out-cries they deſired time for Confeſſion. Palentino ſaith that, dying without Confeſſion, they were buried on the Sea-ſhore. The news of this misfortune was ſoon brought to the hearing of Hernando de Contreras, who upon the advice formerly given by Bermejo, was upon his march back to Panama; and conſidering himſelf now as a loſt man and ruined,

he

he diſmiſt his Souldiers, adviſing every man to ſhift for himſelf, and told them that their beſt way would be to make towards the Sea, where his Brother Pedro de Contreras would receive them a-board a Ship, and that he himſelf intended to take that way, and ſo they diſperſed, every man ſhifting for himſelf: ſome few days after which, the King's Party going in purſuit of them over Mountains, Boggs and wet places, they found the Body of Hernando de Contreras drowned in a Moraſs; the Head they cut off and carried it to Panama, and though it was very much diſfigured, yet he was known by his Hat, being of a ſingular faſhion, and by a Chain of Gold which he uſually wore about his Neck. His Brother Pedro de Contreras, hearing this ſad fate, with the deſtruction and ruine of John de Bermejo and all his Companions, attempted to make his eſcape by Sea; but the Winds and Waters, and all the Elements conſpired againſt him to hinder his Ships from going out of Port; wherefore he endeavoured to make his eſcape in little Boats, not knowing where to go or fly, in regard all the World was become his Enemy. But the Inhabitants of the City armed out other Boats in chace of him, with which they recovered their own, and took alſo the Enemy's Ships: Another Party appointed to follow thoſe over the Mountains, who had taken their way by Land, took ſome of thoſe belonging to Hernando: but as to Pedro de Contreras, no man knew what became of him; though it was generally believed, that he was killed by the Indians, or devoured by Tygers or other wild Beaſts, of which there are great numbers in that Countrey; for they never received news of him afterwards.

This was the end and iſſue of that wicked deſign; of which no better ſucceſs could be expected, having commenced with the Murther of a Biſhop; and though ſome men would excuſe this fact by laying a blame on the Biſhop for his immoderate language, whereby they were provoked to the performance of this outrageous Act; yet certainly nothing can be alledged in excuſe of this heinous and abominable Murther. But at length they paid for all, as before related.

CHAP. XIII.

The Preſident recovers the Treaſure he had loſt. He puniſhes the Offenders. He arrives in Spain, where he happily ends his days.

WHilſt Licenciado Gaſca was at Nombre de Dios he received news of the arrival of the Contreras, and of the Robberies and Piracies they had committed in Panama, he was much afflicted to conſider, that ſuch a ſtrange turn of fortune ſhould be reſerved for him at the concluſion of all his affairs; and which a certain Authour ſays was the more ſurpriſing, in regard it was never imagined, nor poſſibly to be prevented by all the care and diligence that could have been contrived. But now to hinder the farther progreſs of this evil, he ſecured in the beſt manner he was able the Treaſure which he had with him; and then with what Forces he had, and with the Auxiliaries of the Town, he prepared to return to Panama to recover his loſt Treaſure and puniſh the Robbers: and though he conceived little hopes of ſucceſs, ſuppoſing that they had been ſo wiſe as to have carried away their prize, and provided for their own ſafety: howſoever, not to be wanting to his duty, or to looſe an opportunity, as he had never done, when offered; he marched out of Nombre de Dios with ſuch men and arms as could be provided on a ſudden: and in the firſt days journey he received intelligence of the happy ſucceſs at Panama, with the death of John de Bermejo, and Salguero, and of the flight of Hernando de Contreras over the Mountains, and of his Brother by Sea; with which the good Preſident being comforted, proceeded on his journey with great alacrity, rendring thanks to Almighty God (as Gomara ſaith) for ſuch a tide and current of happy fortune as would ever be recorded in future ages to his honour and fame, &c. The Preſident entred into Panama with greater glory and triumph than ever the Emperours and Grandees of the World had done into their Capital Cities: for that without arms or men, counsel or advice, and onely by the favour and air of his happy fortune he confounded his enemies, who had given him a cruel and fatal blow, had they not been fools, and not ruined themselves by their own miscarriages. In fine, he recovered the Treasure which was lost, requiring it from those to whose custody it was committed, and thereby received an increase both of the Gold and of the Silver: for in regard the Robbers had promiscuously seised on all the Treasure, as well that which appertained to the King as to private men; the President laid a Sequestration upon all in the name of his Majesty. After which license was given to particular persons to make their demands, and bring their proofs, by assigning the Marks and Numbers which were upon the Bars of Silver and Ingots of Gold: for it hath been an ancient custome amongst those who trade for Peru, to stamp Marks and Numbers upon the Gold and Silver shipped for their respective accounts; whereby in case of shipwreck or any other misfortune, every man may know his own, and demand it for himself: and so those who certified their Marks, and made proof that the several parcels demanded belonged to them, had their goods restored to them; but then such as could not, lost their interest, which was applied to the service of his Majesty: And by this accident the President rather gained than lost, for all things turn to the benefit of those who are favoured by fortune. The Treasure being recovered, the President entred upon examination of those who adventured to possess themselves of the Bars of Silver which Salguero brought to the City: and though this Party were not in combination with the Contreras, yet finding the City in a combustion, they made use of that opportunity to rob something for themselves: so some of them were whipped, others pilloried; and not onely Rebels but Pilferers were punished, who thought it good fishing in troubled waters.

The President ordered the Head of Hernando de Contreras to be set on the Gallows, and pitched upon a Spike of Iron, with his name written upon it; but no other punishment was passed by the President upon the Offenders; for when he returned to Panama he found that work already done to his hand, for they were all killed before he came thither. After which, with great expedition, he embarked for Spain, as Palentino mentions in the tenth Chapter of his second Part in these words:

Thus did the President Gasca consummate all the good fortunes which had befaln him both in Spain and Peru, by the late prosperous success in recovery of the Treasure which was robbed from him, which was signalized by many remarkable circumstances: with this Treasure he embarked for Spain, where being happily arrived, he travelled into Germany to attend on his Majesty, who had already bestowed on him the Bishoprick of Placencia, which was become vacant by the death of Don Lewis Cabeça de Vaca of happy memory; in which charge he continued untill the year 61, when Don Phelipe our Catholick King and Lord advanced him to the Bishoprick of Ciguença, in which he remained untill the month of November 77, when God was pleased to take him out of this present world. Thus far Palentino, which is confirmed by Lopez de Gomara, Chap. 193.

Gasca, saith he, embarked at Nombre de Dios, and arrived in Spain in the month of July, in the year 1550, with great riches belonging to others, but as to himself his chief Wealth was his Reputation. In going and coming, and in his time there, he spent above four years: the Emperour made him Bishop of Placencia, and called him to Augsburg in Germany, to certifie unto him by word of mouth all matters which had passed in the Indies, with the true state of Peru. Thus far Gomara with which he concludes that Chapter. And though this Authour says, the President Gasca fought with the Rebels, and subdued them; he means, that his good fortune had delivered them into his hands by the resolution and care of others, for he never saw them either dead or alive. Thus did this worthy person most happily conclude his days, whose memory ought for ever to be celebrated; in regard that by his good fortune, excellent conduct, prudence and wisedom the new Empire containing a thousand three hundred leagues in length was recovered, and restored to the Emperour Charles the Fifth, with a vast Treasure which he brought with him.

CHAP. XIV.

Franciſco Hernandez Giron proclaims his Commiſſion and Deſign for making a new Conqueſt, upon which many Souldiers flock to him; which cauſes great Diſturbance and Mutinies in Cozco, but is ſuppreſſed by the Prudence and Moderation of ſome Citizens.

LEaving now the Preſident Gaſca, Biſhop of Ciguença entombed with Enſigns and Scutchions of honour and fame; we muſt in the next place make a long and ſpeedy tranſition from Ciguença to Cozco, where we ſhall find many ſudden alterations; for ſo ſoon as the Preſident Gaſca was departed for Spain, all the Inhabitants of divers Cities returned to their reſpective homes and places of aboad, every one to look after his particular concernments: amongſt which General Pedro de Hinojoſa was one, and Captain Franciſco Hernandez Giron went to Cozco, publiſhing on his way thither the Commiſſion he had received to make a new Conqueſt; and in order thereunto he appointed ſeveral Captains to liſt men in Huamanca and Arequepa, and in the new Plantation: whilſt he himſelf, with great ſolemnity, by ſound of Trumpet and beat of Drum proclaimed his Deſign and Commiſſion in Cozco; upon which publication above two hundred Souldiers flocked to him from all parts, for he was a popular man, and well beloved by the Souldiery. Such a number being got together, took a liberty to ſpeak of the late Tranſactions according to their humours, and to vilifie and contemn the Preſident and the Governours he had left in the Empire; and ſo publickly ſcandalous and impudent was their diſcourſe; that the Governours of the City thought it time to find ways to ſuppreſs it: and John de Saavedra, who was then Mayor of the Town, deſired Hernandez de Giron to expedite his departure as ſoon as poſſible, that they might be freed from the inſolence of the Souldiers. For though the Captain himſelf entertained ſeveral of them in his own Family; yet the reſt were quartered on the Citizens in their private Houſes: which though it were an aggrievance to them; yet, as Palentino ſaith, they were unwilling to part with them, becauſe this expedition deprived them of their People; ſo that in caſe his Majeſty ſhould impoſe any thing on them to their farther prejudice, they ſhould be diſenabled from making oppoſition to encroachments on their Eſtates and Privileges, as they had formerly done with good ſucceſs, &c.

For my part, I know not whence this relation ſhould proceed; for it is well known that it had been much better for the Citizens to have the Souldiers employed in diſtant and remote enterpriſes, than to lye at free quarter upon them; being obliged to maintain ſome four or five, ſome ſix or ſeven, in their houſes; and to afford them meat, drink and lodging, with cloaths and other conveniences: and how then it can be as this Authour ſaith, I know not, ſince it is plain and evident, that the Inhabitants were conſumed and undone by thoſe chargeable Gueſts. But we muſt excuſe this Hiſtorian in many paſſages related by him, for he was not perſonally preſent when they were acted, but received his informations from others which are often doubtfull and contradictory, and ſo full of mutinies, that every page is filled with them, whereby all the Inhabitants, as well as Souldiers are rendred Traytors and diſloyal to the Government: All which we ſhall lay aſide, as not pertinent to this Hiſtory, and ſhall onely inſiſt on the moſt material paſſages, of which I my ſelf was a Witneſs, having been preſent in Cozco; when Franciſco Hernandez and his Souldiers made their firſt diſturbance: And I was alſo preſent at the ſecond mutiny which paſſed about three years afterwards: all which I obſerved, without any notice taken of me; for I was a very boy, and had not attained the age of a young man; howſoever, I had ſo much underſtanding as to ſee and obſerve the diſcourſes which my Father made of the ſeveral affairs which paſſed in that Empire. And therefore I can truly aver, that theſe Souldiers carried themſelves ſo proud and inſolent, that the Government was forced to take notice of it, and conſult a remedy: which when the Souldiers underſtood, they applied themſelves to their Captain, deſiring him not to ſuffer them to be trampled upon by thoſe who had no authority over them: For that the Preſident Gaſca having given him a Commiſſion to make a new Conqueſt, and that they were his Souldiers, they knew no other power nor authority but his; and that they eſteemed themſelves free and independent on the Juriſdiction of the Mayor or others.

And ſo far did this mutiny proceed, that the Souldiers aſſembled together with their Arms in the houſe of Franciſco Hernandez: and on the other ſide, the Mayor and Citizens cryed out to arm; upon which the Inhabitants and their Relations, with divers Souldiers who were not of the Faction, and rich Merchants, and others of Quality, met in the Market-place with their Arms, and drew up in a formed body: In like manner the contrary Party drew up in their Captains Street, being not far from the Market-place, in which poſture both ſides continued two days and two nights, being every moment ready to attack each other: which had moſt certainly happened, had not ſome more moderate men, who were ſenſible of the late ruinous diſtractions, interpoſed between them, and addreſſed to the Mayor and Hernandez Giron, deſiring them to enter into a Treaty, that things might be brought to a right underſtanding. The chief men employed herein were Diego de Silva, Diego de Maldonado the rich, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Vaſco de Gnevara, Antonio de Quinnones, John de Berrio, Jeronimo de Loayſa, Martin de Meneſes, and Franciſco Rodrigues de Villa fuerte, who was the firſt of the thirteen that paſſed over the Line which Franciſco Piçarro drew with the point of his Sword. With theſe ſeveral other Citizens joyned, to perſuade the Mayor to quiet this diſturbance, which would prove the deſtruction of the City and the whole Kingdom. The like was alledged to Franciſco Hernandez, deſiring him to conſider that thereby he would forfeit the merit of all his former Services, that he would deſtroy his deſign of Conqueſt, whereby he was to gain honour and make his fortune. At length it was agreed, that he and the Mayor ſhould meet in the great Church; but the Souldiers of Hernandez Giron oppoſed it, unleſs Hoſtages were firſt given for his ſafe return, which was aſſented unto, and four Citizens were delivered for ſecurity; namely, Garçilaſſo my Maſter, Diego Maldonado, Antonio de Quinnones and Diego Silva. On theſe Conditions the two Chiefs met in the great Church, where Franciſco Hernandez carried himſelf ſo inſolent and proud, that the Mayor had laid hands on him had he not been reſtrained with the conſideration of his friends who remained Hoſtages in the power of the Souldiers: ſo that ſuppreſſing his anger what he could, he ſuffered Franciſco Hernandez to return to his Houſe, from whence he came again, and towards the Evening met on the former Cautions given. By which time Hernandez having better conſidered the unhappy conſequences of that mutiny, and having conſulted with divers friends upon the caſe, he became much more gentle, and in a more flexible temper than before: and in this good humour they broke up and adjourned until the day following, by which time they ſhould be enabled more deliberately to diſcuſs their affairs. Being accordingly met; the uſual forms of Proteſts and Acts were drawn up, and the Preamble was agreed to the following Articles: Namely, That for the publick peace and quiet of the Land, Franciſco Hernandez ſhould remove his Souldiers from the Town, and ſhould deliver up eight of thoſe who had been the moſt inſolent and mutinous amongſt them into the hands of the Mayor; of which number were thoſe who had fired upon his Majeſty's Troop without any cauſe or provocation. And that he himſelf ſhould goe in perſon to the Court of Juſtice, to render an account of this late ſcandalous Mutiny and Riot.

This Agreement was ſolemnly ſworn unto by both Parties and drawn up in Writing; and the Mayor was to permit Hernandez to depart freely upon his own Paroll and Oath of Fealty to the King. After this Franciſco Hernandez returned to his own Houſe, where he acquainted his Souldiers with the Agreement he had made, but they were not pleaſed therewith, but began to mutiny; and if he had not appeaſed them with good words and promiſes, they had fallen in upon the King's party; the conſequence of which would have been very deſtructive to the whole Kingdom; for they were two hundred effective men, deſperate and of no fortunes, having nothing to loſe: and on the other ſide, there were above Eighty perſons of Quality who had Lands and Eſtates; and the reſt were Merchants of great Riches. But God was pleaſed to divert this fatal Miſchief at the Prayers and Vows of religious Friars, and ſecular Prieſts, and devout Women: for though the the disturbance was more enflamed than before, so that Watch and Centinels were set, and they were all the night up with Arms in their hands; yet in the morning, when the Mayor saw that Hernandez had not drawn off his men; he sent for him by a Warrant to appear before him: But he, supposing that his men would not suffer him to goe, in case they were acquainted therewith, slipt on his morning Gown; and, as if he intended to goe onely to the next neighbour, he went directly to the house of the Mayor, who presently took him and committed him to prison: the news hereof being brought to his Souldiers, they immediately dispersed, and every man shifted for himself: but the eight men who were impeached took Sanctuary in the Convent of St. Dominick, and fortified themselves in the Steeple of the Church; where they besieged them for several days, but could not take them, by reason that the passage was very narrow, being built for a Tower in the time of the Inca's; howsoever atlength they surrendred and were punished, but not with that severe Justice, which their rebellious practices did require; and the Tower was demolished, that it might not be made use of for the future on such like occasions.

CHAP. XV.

John Alonso Palomino and Jeronimo Costilla fly from Cozco. Francisco Hernandez Giron presents himself before the High Court of Justice; is dismissed, and returns to Cozco; and he is married in Los Reyes. The Relation of another Mutiny which happened in that City.

THE Souldiers being dispersed, and Francis Hernandez Giron imprisoned, the Mutiny was suppressed and all things quieted: and therefore it was much wondered, what should be the reason that moved Alonso Palomino and Jeronimo Costilla, who had married two Sisters to escape out of the City, the second night after all things were agreed: nor do I know what reason Palentino had to say, that this happened two years afterwards; than which nothing can be more false; which I can aver upon my own knowledge, having been an eye-witness of what passed at that time in Cozco: but true it is, that these Gentlemen departed the City at mid-night, without any cause or reason known for the same. If they had gone away three or four nights before, when the City was in extreme danger, some Conjectures might have been made upon the reasons of their departure: but going thus away without any reason assigned, the whole City talked, and made a thousand Conjectures thereupon, especially when it was known, that they had burnt the Bridges of Apurimac and Amancay, which were to be repaired at the expence and labour of the poor Indians: upon which all the Countrey was in a confusion, and rumours were spread, that Francisco Hernandez Giron was up in Arms at Cozco, and was become a Rebel. But in the second Insurrection he made, Alonso Palomino gave him his reward, by killing him at a Supper, as we shall see hereafter; but Jeronimo Costilla escaped, being not present at the Invitation. But to return again to the present Acts of Giron: we say, that his Souldiers being dispersed, and the chief Incendiaries punished, the Agreement was performed and executed; and Giron was released upon his Paroll and solemn Oath given to goe to the City of Los Reyes, and there to present himself before the Royal Court of Justice, and give them an account of the late Actions. Diego Maldonado the Rich having a particular friendship with him by reason of their neighbourhood, (for they lived the next street one to the other) accompanied him on his journey as far as Antahuylla, being fourty leagues from Cozco: and with the same occasion Maldonado visited his Indians, and Plantations he had in those parts: but Palentino saith, I know not upon what ground, that Giron was delivered into the hands of the High Sheriff Maldonado, and of Captain John Alonso Palomino, who were obliged at their own cost and charge to provide twenty Musquetiers to carry him to Lima; and for better ſecurity, the Mayor made him take the Oath of Fidelity, &c.

I cannot imagin where this Authour received this relation, ſo contrary to all truth, and which ſounds ſo like a Romance or a Poetical Fiction. But this is moſt certain, that Giron came to the City of Los Reyes, and there preſented himſelf before the Royal Court of Juſtice, where the Judges committed him to priſon: but many days had not paſſed, before he was enlarged, and the whole City aſſigned him for his confinement: and in a ſhort time afterwards they took his own obligation and diſcharged him upon the terms he offered. And here it is reported, that he married with a very Noble Lady, young, vertuous and beautifull; and unworthy of thoſe ſorrows and afflictions which her husband brought upon her by his ſecond Rebellion: as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this Hiſtory. With her he returned to Cozco, where for ſome days and months, I cannot ſay years, he remained quiet; howſoever, in the mean time, he converſed with none but Souldiers, avoiding, as much as he could, all ſociety and communication with the Citizens: atlength he brought an Action againſt one of the principal Members of the City, about an Horſe, which he challenged to be his, though in reality he had no title thereunto; for the truth was, he had loſt him in the late Wars of Quito, having been taken from him by a ſtout Souldier, and as lawfull prize ſold by him to a Citizen for a round ſum of money, which was witneſſed by another Souldier who knew how he came by him. Howſoever, in regard the Souldier who ſold him had followed Piçarro's Party, the Horſe was kept privately and unknown to any, beſides the Maſter himſelf: but at length the Horſe coming to be diſcovered, the Citizen was contented to ſell him to Giron at an under rate, rather than to bring the Souldier into queſtion, who might have been hanged or ſent to the gallies for the ſame; ſo that this ſuit about the Horſe ſerved onely to ſhew his good-will and kindneſs towards his Companions and Equals, who were Lords over Indians, and enjoyed Eſtates; for, as I obſerved, he never kept company or entertained communication with them; but onely with Souldiers, and with them he ſpent his whole time and employed his chief concernment, as will appear ſome few days afterwards. For certain Souldiers, as ſtout and as mutinous as the others, obſerving the little rigour and ſeverity which was uſed againſt the inſolence and mutinous behaviour of Franciſco Giron and his Aſſociates were encouraged to attempt the like Outrages: but being few in number and without any Head that was conſiderable, they reſolved to find out one, be he what he would; and ſo publickly was this matter diſcourſed and treated, that it became the common talk of all the City of Los Reyes: and atlength the rumour was ſo far ſpread that it came to the Ears of the Mayor of Cozco, who being thereupon requeſted to take cognizance of the Matter, to examine the Plot, and to puniſh the Offenders; he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, that he was not to create more Enemies than thoſe formerly, who were Hernandez Giron and his Adherents; and as for thoſe Troubles then acting, the incumbence lay on the Court of Juſtice to ſuppreſs and prevent them; and in caſe they held themſelves unconcerned, he for his part would not intermeddle with Affairs, which belonged to a ſuperiour power. Whilſt theſe things were in agitation in the Countrey, a certain Inhabitant of Cozco, called Don John de Mendoça, a Martial man, and one kind to the Souldiery, happened to come then to Town, with intention rather to aggravate matters, and incite others, than to concern himſelf either one way or the other. So ſoon as he came to the City, he treated with the principal Complotters, who were called Franciſco de Miranda and Alonſo de Barrionuevo, who was then High Sheriff of the City, and with Alonſo Hernandez Melgarejo. This Miranda told him, that the Souldiers had with general conſent choſen him for their Commander in Chief, and Barrionuevo for his Lieutenant: the which Mendoça diſcovered to certain Citizens who were his Friends, adviſing them to avoid ſuch danger from the Souldiery, and to abandon the City: but when he perceived that they ſlighted his Counſel, he then travelled to the City of Los Reyes, publiſhing all the way he went, how that all Cozco was in an uproar: and that the City had taken no notice of him either going or coming. Palentino mentions the flight of Palomino and Jeronimo Coſtilla, to have been at this time; which had been two years before, as we have noted it before.

CHAP. XVI.

The Justices send a new Mayor to Cozco, who doth Justice upon the Mutiniers. The Original of these Disturbances is here related.

UPON the rumour which Don John de Mendoça caused to be spread in the City of Los Reyes, the Judges appointed the Mareschal Alonso de Alvarado to be Mayor of Cozco, giving him Commission to punish the insolent and mutinous Souldiers there, and to hinder that growing Evil which for want of due correction was come to a degree unsupportable. So soon as this new Officer was come to Cozco, he apprehended some of the Souldiers, who to save themselves had impeached a certain Citizen called Don Pedro Portocarrero: And having well examined the cause of the principal Mutiniers, who were Francisco de Miranda and Alonso Hernandez Melgarejo, he hanged them up without any regard to their Nobility, though they claimed the privilege of Gentlemen. The which when Alonso Barrioneuevo knew, who was also condemned, he sent to the Mayor or Governour, desiring that he might enjoy the privilege of a Gentleman, that is, that he might have his Throat cut, and not be hanged; alledging that in case he were hanged, he should despair of his Salvation, and be condemned everlastingly to the Torments of Hell. At the instance of certain friends, the Governour granted the request, and with some unwillingness commanded his Throat to be cut; which I know to be true, because I saw them all three after they were dead; for, being a Boy at that time, I had the curiosity to see those things as they passed: six or seven others were banished out of the Kingdom, the rest made their escape away. But as to Don Pedro Portocarrero, he remitted his causes to the Lords Justices, who having examined him, set him at liberty. Palentino speaking of Francisco de Miranda names him for a Citizen of Cozco; whereas in reality he was not, unless we will give the title of Citizen to any Inhabitant, after the Castilian Style, different to the Custome used in Peru and Mexico, where none is called a Citizen, unless he hath a Plantation, and a Command over Indians in vassalage to him: and is obliged (as we noted in the first Part of these Commentaries) to maintain his Houses in the place of his residence: but Miranda could claim nothing of this matter, for I knew him very well, for a Niece of his was bred up in the same house with me, she was born of an Indian mother, and proved a woman of great probity and vertue. Some few months after this punishment executed, a small disturbance happened, of which Palentino makes a long Story; though in reality it was rather a Pretence raised to take revenge upon a poor Gentleman, who, without any malice, had undertaken to give an account of Bastardies in several great and ancient Families, and not onely on the man's side, but on the woman's side also: but what these Families were, there is no reason we should mention in particular. Moreover, there were several other discontents in those days which turned into publick mutinies; the punishment of all which fell upon a poor young Gentleman onely, not of above twenty four years of age, called Don Diego Enriquez, a Native of Seville whom they put to death; his untimely end was much lamented by all the City; for though there had been above two hundred persons, as Palentino reports, concerned in the sedition, yet the fate of this poor Gentleman was without any fault, to pay for all. The Justice also proceeded to execute farther Severities on Indians of principal note, and on the Vassals and Servants of Noble and rich Citizens; which ought rather to have been inflicted on the Masters themselves, who had been the causes thereof. These mutinies and disturbances, of which Palentino gives so long and large relations, proceeded originally from the Orders and Decrees which the Justices had made for taking off the personal Services of Indians towards their Lords, requiring that such as found themselves aggrieved in this matter, should not appear by their common Atturney in behalf of the Generality, but that every man should appear and plead in his own person. All which, as we have formerly said, were Artifices of the Devil, contrived purposely to raise discord among the Spaniards, whereby the progress of the doctrine of the Goſpel might be hindred, and the Converſion of the Indians to the Catholick Faith delayed: the which proceeding was contrary to the ſenſe and opinion of that wiſe and prudent perſon, the Preſident Gaſca, who having had experience, that the new Laws which the Vice-king Blaſco Nunnez Vela had brought and put in execution in Peru, had raiſed thoſe commotions as would certainly have been the total deſtruction of that Empire, had they not been repealed; and having obſerved, that whenſoever any thing of that kind was moved all the Countrey was put into a flame, he wiſely therefore before his departure, ſuſpended the execution of his Majeſty's command, requiring him to free the Indians from ſervices to their Lords. But the Juſtices followed not this rule, but ſent their commands over all the Kingdom, as before mentioned, which gave occaſion to the Souldiers to utter rebellious and ſeditious Speeches; and were encouraged therein by conſiderable perſons, and men of Eſtates; as Palentino writes at large in the ſecond Part, and firſt Chapter of the ſecond Book.

CHAP. XVII.

Don Antonio de Mendoça is ſent in quality of Vice-king to Peru, he employs his Son Don Franciſco to viſit and ſurvey the Countrey as far as the Charcas; and diſpatches him into Spain, with a relation thereof. A ſevere action is executed by a Judge.

ABout this time a new Governour or Captain-General of the whole Empire arrived in Peru, with title of Vice-king, called Don Antonio de Mendoça, who was Second Son of the Houſe of the Marquis de Mondexar Count of Tendilla, who (as we have mentioned in the Hiſtory of Florida) was Vice-king in the Empire of Mexico, a perſon of great Sanctity and Religion, endued with Chriſtian Vertues, and much a Gentleman. The City of Los Reyes received him with great joy and ſolemnity, and deſired to introduce him under a Canopy of State; but neither the Archbiſhop nor the Magiſtrates of the City could prevail with that Prince to accept of that honour, as if it had been a piece of Treaſon towards his Majeſty, much contrary to the cuſtome in theſe days; in which great Men eſteem more of one hour of ſuch Pageantry than all the time of their life afterwards: with him he brought his Son Don Franciſco de Mendoça, who was afterwards made General of the Galleys of Spain; I ſaw him both here and there: he always behaved himſelf like the Son of ſuch a Father, whoſe goodneſs and vertues he imitated, and followed both in his youth and in the years of his old age.

When this Vice-king arrived in Peru, he was much empaired in his health by long abſtinence and acts of penance; by which his natural heat began ſo far to fail, that to recover it he uſed violent exerciſe; and though that climate was naturally very hot, yet he would chuſe to go abroad at noon day with a certain little Hawk of that Countrey, which they had taught to kill upon the Sands a ſort of ſmall Owls, or other Birds; and with this ſport he divertiſed himſelf as often as his vacation from buſineſs would permit. And by reaſon of his want of health, he ſent his Son Don Franciſco to all the Cities from Los Reyes as far as the Charcas and Potoſi, to bring him a true relation of the ſtate thereof, for information of his Majeſty: Don Franciſco went accordingly upon this Viſitation, and as he paſſed I ſaw him at Cozco, where he was received with great ſolemnity under triumphal Arches, with Dances, and appearance of the Gentlemen; who in ſeveral Troops road before him to the great Church, and thence conducted him to the Lodgings provided for him: eight days after he had been there, they provided for him * a Feaſt of Bulls, and of darting Canes on Horſeback; which was the moſt magnificent of any that ever had been before or ſince in that City; for the Liveries were all of Velvet of divers colours, and moſt of them embroidered. I remember that the Liveries of my Father and his Companions were made of black Velvet, and upon the upper Caſſock were two borders of yellow Velvet, about a ſpan diſtance from each other, with this Motto between, Plus Ultra; and adjoining hereunto were three Pillars with Crowns upon them, made of yellow Velvet, as were the Borders, and all interwoven with a twiſt of Gold and blue Silk, which looked very handſomely. Other Liveries there were very rich and chargeable, which I cannot remember ſo well as to deſcribe them, but theſe of my Fathers, having been made in the Houſe, remain ſtill in my memory. The attendants of John Julio de Hogeda, and Thomas Vaſquez, and John de Pancorvo, and Franciſco Rodriguez de Villa-fuerte, who were all four Conquerours in the firſt Adventure, were clothed in Liveries of black Velvet, ſtriped with divers flowers and leaves made of crimſon and white Velvet. On their Heads they wore Turbants embroidered with Pearls and Eſmerods, and other pretious Stones, valued at three hundred thouſand pieces of Eight, which amount to above three hundred and ſeventy thouſand Ducats of Caſtile, and all the other Liveries were rich like theſe. Don Franciſco beheld this Gallantry, and Sports from a Balcony belonging to my Father's Houſe, where I had opportunity to take notice of his perſon: from hence he proceeded to the Cities of La Paz, and La Plata, and to Potoſi, where he received a full relation of thoſe Mines of Silver, and of all other matters which were worthy his Majeſty's information. In his return he came by the City of Arequepa, and along the Sea-coaſt as far as the City of Los Reyes, in all which progreſs, he travelled above ſix hundred and fifty leagues: and brought with him the Mountain of Potoſi delineated, and exactly drawn, and painted with the Mines of Silver, as alſo other Mountains, Valleys and immenſe Cavities which are found in that Countrey of a ſtrange form and figure.

Being returned to the City of Los Reyes, his Father diſpatched him away for Spain with theſe Draughts of the Countrey, and a true relation of the ſtate of affairs there. He departed from Los Reyes, as Palentino ſaith, in May 1552. where we will leave him, to recount a particular accident which happened at that time in Cozco, when Alonſo de Alvarado was Mayor, or chief Governour thereof, and known to be a bold man, and an impartial Juſticiary; the matter was this: About four years before this time a party of Souldiers conſiſting of two hundred men marched out of the City of Potoſi towards the Kingdom of Tucman, which the Spaniards call Tucuman, moſt of which, contrary to the poſitive Orders of the Juſtices, were ſerved by Indians to carry their burthens and baggage for them. The chief Governour of that place, called Licenciado Eſquivel, with whom I was acquainted, went out of the Town to view the ſeveral Companies of Souldiers as they marched; and having ſuffered all of them to paſs with the Indians, who carried their luggage, he ſeiſed on the laſt man, called Aguire, becauſe he had two Indians laden with his goods; and for this fault ſome few days afterwards he ſentenced him to receive two hundred ſtripes, becauſe he had neither Gold nor Silver to redeem the penalty laid on him by his Sentence. Hereupon Aguire made all the Friends he could to the Governour to have his puniſhment remitted, but being not able to prevail, he deſired that he might rather be hanged than whipped; ſaying, that though he were a Gentleman, and might ſtand upon that privilege, yet he would wave that alſo: howſoever he thought fit to let him know, that he was the Brother of a Gentleman, who in his Countrey had an Eſtate with Vaſſalage of Indians. But all this availed little with the Judge; for though being out of Office he was a man of an eaſie temper, and a tractable diſpoſition, yet oftentimes Honours and places of Power change the humour of ſome men; and ſo it did with this Judge, who became more ſevere by theſe applications, ſo that he immediately commanded the Executioner to bring the Aſs, and execute the Sentence, which accordingly was done, and Aguire mounted thereupon. The principal men of the Town, conſidering the unreaſonable ſeverity of the Judge, went and intreated him to remit or ſuſpend the Sentence, and prevailed on him rather by importunity than argument to deferr the execution for eight days. But when they came to the Priſon with this Warrant, they found Aguire already ſtript and mounted on his Aſs; who, when he underſtood that the Sentence was onely ſuſpended for eight days, he rejected the favour, and ſaid, All my endeavours have been to keep my ſelf from mounting this Beaſt, and from the ſhame of being ſeen naked; but ſince things are come thus far, let the Sentence proceed, which will be leſs than the fears and apprehenſions I ſhall have in theſe eight days enſuing, beſides I ſhall not need to give far- ther trouble to Friends to intercede in my behalf, which is likely to be as ineffectual as what hath already paſſed. And having ſaid this, the Aſs was whipped forward, and he ran the gantlet according to the Sentence, to the great diſpleaſure and regret both of Spaniards and Indians; who were troubled to ſee a Gentleman, on ſo ſlight a cauſe, diſhonoured by a puniſhment not agreeing to his Quality: howſoever he avenged himſelf afterwards, according to the Law of Honour practiſed in this World.

CHAP. XVIII.

The revenge which Aguire took for this affront. The diligence uſed by the Governour of Cozco to take Aguire; the manner how he made his eſcape.

After this Aguire could not be perſuaded to purſue his deſign of the Conqueſt, though the Inhabitants of Potoeſi offered to have aſſiſted him with all things neceſſary thereunto; but he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, That after ſuch a ſhame as this, death was his onely remedy and conſolation, which he would endeavour to obtain as ſoon as poſſible; under this melancholy he remained in Peru untill the time in which the Office of Eſquivel expired; and then he always, like a deſperate man, purſued and followed him, watching an opportunity to kill him, and wipe off the ſhame of the late affront. Eſquivel, being informed of this deſperate reſolution by his Friends, endeavoured to avoid his Enemy, and took a journey of three or four hundred leagues from him, ſuppoſing that Aguire would not purſue him at ſuch a diſtance: but the farther Eſquivel fled the more earneſt was Aguire to follow him. The firſt journey which Eſquivel took was to the City of Los Reyes, being three hundred and twenty leagues diſtant; but in leſs than fifteen days Aguire was there with him: whereupon Eſquivel took another flight, as far as to the City of Quito, being four hundred leagues diſtant from Los Reyes, but in a little more than twenty days Aguire was again with him: which being intimated to Eſquivel, he took another leap as far as Cozco, which is five hundred leagues from Quito; but in a few days after he arrived there came his old Friend Aguire, travelling all the way on foot, without Shoes or Stockins, ſaying, that it became not the condition of a whipped Raſcal to travel on Horſeback or appear amongſt men. In this manner did Aguire haunt and purſue Eſquivel for three years and four months: who being now tired and wearied with ſo many long and tedious journies, which profited him little; he reſolved to fix his abode at Cozco, where he believed that Aguire would ſcarce adventure to attempt any thing againſt him, for fear of the Judge who governed that City, who was a ſevere man, impartial and inflexible in all his proceedings: and accordingly took a Lodging in the middle of the Street of the great Church, where he lived with great care and caution, wearing a Coat of Mail under his upper Coat, and went always armed with his Sword and Dagger, which are Weapons not agreeable to his profeſſion. At this time a certain Kinſman of my Fathers, the Son of Gomez de Tordoya, and of his name, ſpoke to Eſquivel, and told him, that ſince he was his Countrey-man of Eſtremenno, and his Friend, he could not but adviſe him (as it was known over all Peru) how diligent Aguire had been to dog and follow him with purpoſe and intent to kill him; wherefore if you pleaſe I will come and lodge by night in the ſame Houſe with you, which perhaps will divert Aguire from coming thither. Eſquivel thanked him, and told him that he always went well provided; for he never put off his Coat of Mail, nor laid his offenſive Arms aſide; and to be more wary or cautious than this would be ſcandalous to the City, and ſhew too much fear of a poor fellow who was of a little and a contemptible preſence: Howſoever the fury of his mind, and the deſire of revenge had exalted him above his natural ſtature and proportion, and rendred him as conſiderable as Diego Garcia de Paredes, and John de Urbina, who were famous men in their time: in virtue and force of this

desired revenge he adventured one Monday at noon to enter into the House of Esquivel, and having walked for some time in the yard below, and in the Gallery above, and having passed through a Hall and a Chamber, and entring into an inward Chamber where he kept his Books, he found him there sleeping with one in his hand, and coming softly to him, he stabb'd him with his Dagger through the right Temple of his head, and gave him three or four stabbs more into the Body, not where the Coat of Mail covered him, but in the opening of his Clothes. After which Aguire returned by the same way that he came, and being come to the street Door, missing his Hat he had the courage to return again and fetch it, and therewith went out into the street, and walked like a mad-man without sense or judgment, never thinking to take Sanctuary in the Church, but walked openly in the streets towards St. Francisco, where was a Convent East-ward from the great Church; neither did he take refuge there, but wandring through a street on the left hand, he made a stop at the place where a Foundation was laid for the Convent of St. Clare; and in a little Alley thereabouts he met two young Gentlemen, Kinsmen to Rodrigo de Peneda, to whom he said, hide me, hide me, without being able to say one word more, but looked like a man frantick and out of his wits. The Gentlemen, who knew his discontent, and his desire of revenge; asked him, Whether he had killed Esquivel? To which Aguire answered, Yes; hide me, hide me. Then the Gentlemen carried him into the House of a Kinsman of theirs where were three back yards, in the farthermost of which there was a kind of a Stie, where they fatted their Hogs and Poultery at the time of year, and there they concealed him, ordering him by no means to go out of that place, or shew his head abroad. As to the back yards, they secured them in that manner that no Indians should go in, having no business to doe there; and they told him, that he should not need to take care for Victuals, for they would make a provision for him: which they accordingly did, for dining and supping always in the House of their Kinsman, they would privately at every meal slip Bread and Meat into their Pockets; with which, upon pretence of going to the back-side on their necessary occasions, they relieved this poor Aguire in his Hog-stie, and in this manner they fed and maintained him for the space of forty days.

So soon as the Mayor or Governour heard of the death of Esquivel he commanded the Bells to be rung out; and the Indians of Cannaris were set for Guards and Sentinels at the Gates of the City, and at the door of the Convents; and Proclamation was made, that no man should go out of the City without a Pass or License obtained from the Governour, and search was made in all Convents, and the corners of them, that nothing could be more diligently performed, unless they would have pulled them down. This Watch and Ward continued in the City for thirty days, without the least news of Aguire, as if he had been sunk under ground. At length, wearied with a fruitless search, the Sentinels and Guards were taken off from the City; but howsoever a Watch was continued on the High-ways, and maintained with a strict examination of all that passed. At the end of forty days, these Gentlemen, called Santillan and Catanno, both of noble extraction, (with whom I was acquainted, and met one of them in Seville when I arrived first in Spain) thought fit to free themselves from the danger which they incurred by concealing Aguire; for they knew that the Judge was a severe man, and would have no mercy on them in case the matter were discovered; whereupon they agreed to carry him publickly out of the City, and not by any private conveyance; the manner was this, they shaved his head and his beard, and washed his face, head, neck, hands and Arms, and from top to toe, and cleansed him with water, and then smeared him over with a sort of wild Fruit, called by the Indians Vitoc, which is not good to eat, or for any other purpose onely dies with that black hue, that being left on for three or four days, and afterwards washed over three or four times more, it leaves a black deeper than that of an Ethiopian, and which will not be washed off again with any water, untill it begins to wear away, which it will doe in ten days time, and then will wash off with the rine of that which gives the tincture: In this manner they coloured this wretch Aguire, and clothed him in poor habit, like a Countrey Negroe; and with this disguise they went out openly about noon day through the publick streets and Market-place, with the Negroe Aguire marching before them with a Gun on his Shoulders, and one of the Masters carried another before him on the Pomel of his Saddle, and the other had a Hawk on his fist, as if they had been going after their their game: and in this manner they went to the Hill called Carmenca, which is the road to Los Reyes, and is a great way thither through Streets and publick places from the houſe of Rodrigo de Pineda: and at laſt they came to the out-guards of all; where being asked for the Governour's licence or paſs-port: he that carried the Hawk, ſeeming to be troubled for this omiſſion, ſaid to his Brother, Pray ſtay for me here untill I goe and fetch a Licence; or if you pleaſe to go ſoftly before, I ſhall quickly overtake you; but he took little care for his paſs-port, ſince his Brother with his Neger was paſſed the Guards, which being done, they quickned their pace, untill they had got themſelves clear out of the Juriſdiction of Cozco, which reaches fourty leagues in length; And being come ſo far, he bought a ſmall Nag for Aguire, and gave him ſome money in his purſe; and ſaid to him; Brother, ſince I have accompanied you ſo far, and brought you into a Countrey where you are free and out of danger, you may goe now where you think fit; for my part, I can do no more for you; ſhift for your ſelf; and with that he returned to Cozco, and Aguire travelled to Huamanca, where a Kinſman of his lived, who was a Noble perſon and one of the richeſt Inhabitants of that City; and was received by him as kindly as if he had been his own Son, and was careſſed and treated by him for many days, and afterwards was ſent away with all things neceſſary and convenient for him. We ſhall conceal the name of this his Kinſman, becauſe it is not juſtifiable to receive and protect a perſon condemned, or who ſtands outlawed by the Royal Juſtice. This eſcape of Aguire was one of the ſtrangeſt things that happened in thoſe days, conſidering the diligent ſearch which was made for him by the Judge, and the follies of Aguire after he had committed the Murther, though they happened well, and by his good fortune were the cauſe of his preſervation: for if he had taken refuge in a Convent, of which there were but three in Town; namely, that of our Lady, of the Seraphical St. Francis, and of the Divine St. Dominick, he had certainly been diſcovered and delivered to Juſtice: but having thus eſcaped, the Governour was not a little angry and aſhamed to ſee his Juſtice eluded, and the Offender placed out of reach of the Law. Howſoever he was praiſed by the bold and daring Souldiers, who ſaid that, if there were many Aguires in the World who durſt boldly adventure to vindicate their diſhonours by ſuch a revenge, the Officers of Juſtice would not be ſo inſolent and arbitrary as they now ſhew themſelves.

CHAP. XIX.

Many Gentlemen of the Countrey goe to kiſs the Hand of the Vice-king. A particular Story of an impertinent Perſon. A Mutiny in Los Reyes, and how it was puniſhed. The death of the Vice-king, and what Troubles happened after it.

WE have already touched ſomething of the Entry of the good Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça into the City of Los Reyes, where he lived but for a ſhort time, and that too with much anguiſh and infirmity of body, which is rather to dye than to live; ſo that his Government affords us little ſubject for Diſcourſe. When he came firſt into the City, many Planters of the Countrey about, came from all parts of the Empire, from Quitu as far as the Charcas, to kiſs his hands and welcome him at his firſt arrival. Amongſt which there was one more kind than the reſt, and full of love and affectionate expreſſions; and at the concluſion of all, Sir, ſaid he, God take from your days, and add them unto mine. Thoſe, ſaid the Vice-king, will be but few, and ill ones. The poor man, recalling himſelf hereupon, No, Sir, I mean, that God would be pleaſed to take from my days, and add them unto your Excellencies. I underſtand your Complement, replied the Vice-king; Don't trouble your ſelf for the miſtake.

Howſoever

Howſoever the Story was quickly carried into the outward room, where it occaſioned much laughter. Some few days after this, a certain Captain whom we have formerly mentioned in this Hiſtory came to the Vice-king, pretending to give him ſome Informations for better Government of the Empire; and amongſt other things, he ſaid, there was one Abuſe neceſſary to be remedied; the thing is this, There are two Souldiers who lodge in ſuch a place, and goe always amongſt the Indians with Guns in their hands, and eat what they kill, and deſtroy the whole Game of the Countrey; they alſo make Powder and Bullets, which is of ill example to the Kingdom; for many times Troubles and Inſurrections have enſued from ſuch beginnings; and therefore ſuch men as theſe are to be puniſhed, or at leaſt baniſhed from Peru. The Vice-king asked him whether theſe men did treat the Indians ill, or whether they ſold them Powder and Bullets, or committed any other Outrages? No, ſaid the Captain, Nothing more than what I tell your Lordſhip. Then, ſaid the Vice-king, theſe are not faults, but actions rather to be encouraged; for it is no offence for Spaniards to live amongſt the Indians, and to eat what they get themſelves by hunting, and to make Powder for their own uſe, and not to ſell; but 'tis rather commendable; and ſuch actions as are fit for other men to imitate. Go your ways, Sir, in the name of God; for I deſire, that neither you nor others ſhould bring me ſuch Tales as theſe; for theſe men you complain of muſt be Saints, ſeeing they live ſuch innocent lives as you inform me. And in this manner, was the impertinency of this Captain requited.

With this gentle and eaſie manner did this Prince govern the Empire; but my Countrey was not worthy ſo much goodneſs, and therefore Heaven called him thither. During the time of his Sickneſs, the Juſtices commanded that the perſonal ſervices of the Indians ſhould be taken off, and accordingly it was proclaimed in the City of Los Reyes, in Cozco and other parts, under ſuch penalties and rigorous clauſes as gave great offence, and cauſed new ſeditions and mutinies amongſt the People: for which a chief Incendiary, one Luys de Vargas was condemned and executed: but the Examinations and Tryals proceeded no farther, becauſe it was found, that ſeveral principal men were concerned therein; and it was believed that the General Pedro de Hinojoſa would have been impeached, becauſe three Witneſſes were ready to have ſworn ſeveral words which he had ſaid, though not ſufficient to have condemned him; but the Juſtices (as Palentino ſaith) being deſirous to make an honeſt man of a thief, made choice of him to go chief Governour and Lord High Juſtice to the Charcas; for that in thoſe Countries there were many Souldiers who lived diſſolutely, and without any rule or ſubjection whatſoever: And though at firſt he refuſed to accept the Charge, yet he was perſuaded thereunto by Doctor Saravia, who was one of the moſt ancient Juſtices: but as to his Crime, there was rather a ſuſpicion of it, than any certain proof againſt him; and the Souldiers themſelves ſaid, that the hopes he gave them were rather doubtfull than certain; for all he ſaid to them was, that when he was in the Charcas, he would doe for them according to their deſire, that they ſhould goe thither before him; and that when he came thither, he would doe for them to the utmoſt of his power. Though theſe words imported no more than general terms, yet Souldiers, who were deſirous of Rebellion and Novelty, were apt to interpret them according to their own humour and inclinations: but whether the intention of the General was to rebell or not, he did not declare at that time; though his actions ſeemed rather to tend towards ill than good deſigns. On theſe hopes the Souldiers who were in the City of Los Reyes; that is, as many as could goe, went to the Charcas, and wrote to their friends in divers parts, that they alſo ſhould goe thither.

The news hereof carried many Souldiers into the Charcas, and amongſt them a Gentleman particularly called Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, Son of Count de la Gomera, Brother of Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla, of whom this Hiſtory hath made mention at large. This Gentleman, with ſix other Souldiers of eſteem and honour, went out of Cozco: for Vaſco Godines, who was the chief Promoter of this Rebellion, had wrote him a Letter in Cyphers, giving him an account of all matters then in agitation, and that Pedro de Hinojoſa had promiſed to be their General: Upon this advice Don Sebaſtian and his Companions went out of Cozco by night, without diſcovering the place to which they were deſigned: And leſt the Governour ſhould purſue after them, they went through by-ways, out of the common road, and through through desarts and unpeopled places, untill they came to Potocsi, where they were courteously received. So that though the Governour sent immediately after them an Hue and Cry to the Spaniards, to stop and seize them; yet the Souldiers with them were so skilfull in the ways, and knew the turnings and windings of the Countrey so well, that the diligence used by the Governour availed nothing: but as to Don Sebastian himself, he was more fit for a Courtier, than to be made the General of a Rebellion, as they made him at last, and which brought a speedy destruction on him; for he, poor Gentleman, being of a tender nature, and not inured to those bloudy Cruelties which his Souldiers required him to commit, and which were necessary in the state of Rebellion, became a Sacrifice to the fury of his own Souldiers; as this History will declare to us.

During these Revolutions, the Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça happened to dye, to the great unhappiness of that whole Empire. His Funeral rites were celebrated with all the sorrowfull Pomp that could be contrived; and his Corpse were interred in the Cathedral Church of Los Reyes, on the right hand of the high Altar, and inclosed in a hollow nick of the Wall; and on the right side of him lay the body of the Marquis Don Francisco de Piçarro, who was Conquerour of that Empire and Founder of that City; for which cause he had reason to claim a nearer position to the high Altar than the Vice-king. After which the Justices made choice of a Gentleman to be made Governour of the City called Gil Ramirez de Avalos, who had been a Servant to the Vice-king: And the Mareschal himself was sent to the City of Peace, otherwise called the New-city, where his Estate was, and the Indians he commanded.

CHAP. XX.

The Insurrection and Troubles which happened in the Province of the Charcas, with many single Duels, one of which is related at large.

IN those days all the brave Souldiers and martial Spirits in Peru employed themselves in the Charcas and in Potocsi and in the parts thereabouts: amongst which there daily arose quarrels and jarrings, not onely between the Souldiers and principal persons of note, but even the Merchants themselves were at enmity, and pedling Dealers, commonly called by them Pulpones, or Pudding-makers, because one of them was found to sell Puddings in his Shop: And so common and continual were the squabbles and scuffles amongst them, that they were too many for the Justice to prevent and compose: at length it was judged fit, as a remedy of these matters, to put out an Order, that whensoever any two fell out, that no Standers-by should meddle or interpose to make peace between them, on penalty of incurring the same punishment with those who were principals in the quarrel: but this remedy availed nothing, nor whatsoever the Preachers could say from their Pulpits: for dissensions daily arose, as if this Countrey had been the place where Discord made its aboad, or presaged and fore-ran those Insurrections and Wars which some few months afterwards ensued: these quarrels often produced challenges and single duels: some of which were fought in shirt and drawers, others naked from the waste upwards, some in breeches and wastcoats of crimson Taffaty, that the bloud running from their wounds might not affright them: besides several other forms of duel very ridiculous, which the Combatants directed according to their fancies, and would often quarrel with their own Seconds; and that they might not be hindred or parted, the place appointed was somewhere out of Town, in the open field. Palentino, in the fourth Chapter of his second Book, tells us the story of a remarkable duel; but in reguard his relation is something short and confused, we shall enlarge thereupon, because I knew one of the Duellists at Madrid, in the year 1563. by a good token of those Marks and Scarrs which he brought brought from that Combat, for he was ſo diſabled in both his Arms, that he could ſcarce make uſe of his hands to feed himſelf. This duel was between two famous Souldiers, one was called Pero Nunnez, who was the perſon with whom I was acquainted, called by Palentino, Diego Nunnez; and the other was Baltaſar Perez, both of them Gentlemen of good extraction, and of equal bravery and aſſurance. Their diſpute aroſe upon ſome points of honourable ſatisfaction given and received between two Duelliſts who had fought ſome few days before, to whom they had been Seconds. Baltaſar Perez made choice of a certain Gentleman for his Second, called Egas de Guzman, a Native of Seville, who was one of the greateſt Bullies and Hectors of that time; the other Second was Hernan Mexia, born alſo at Seville, who hearing of the duel which was to ſucceed between the aforeſaid Principals, prevailed with Pero Nunnez with much importunity to take him for his Second, that ſo he might fight with Egas de Guzman; who preſuming on his own ſtrength and skill at his weapon, had defamed and ſpoken ſlightly of this Hernan de Mexia. When Egas de Guzman underſtood that Hernan de Mexia was the perſon with whom he was to engage, he ſent a meſſage to Pero Nunnez, letting him know, that ſince the Principals were Gentlemen of good Families and Noble extraction, he ſhould not debaſe himſelf and them ſo far as to bring a man for his Second who was of a mean and poor birth, and the Son of a Molata or Moriſca woman, whoſe Trade it was to ſell broyled Pilchers in the Market-place of St. Salvador in Seville; and that he might chuſe what other Second he pleaſed, though not a Gentleman, provided he were not of that vile and baſe extraction, as was this Hernan. Pero Nunnez conſidering that Egas de Guzman had reaſon, endeavoured to acquit himſelf of the word and promiſe he had given to Hernan Mexia to make him his Second, but was not able to prevail upon him, nor would he upon any terms releaſe him, when amongſt other things he heard that Egas de Guzman ſhould ſay, that he knew himſelf to have that advantage over him in the uſe of his Weapon, that it was a diſparagement to him to contend with ſuch an Adverſary. When Egas de Guzman underſtood that Mexia would not releaſe Pero Nunnez of his word, he ſent to warn him to come well provided into the field, for that he ſhould find him armed with a Coat of Male, and a Head-piece, although the Principals were to fight naked from the waſte upwards.

In this manner both Principals and Seconds went out to fight in a Field at a good diſtance from Potoſi: and at the firſt encounter Pero Nunnez, who was the ſtrongeſt man known in thoſe days, ſtroak his Adverſary's Sword aſide, and preſently cloſing with him, threw him on the ground, and being upon him, caſt handfuls of duſt into his eyes, cuffed him with his fiſt on the face; but did not uſe his dagger to ſtabb him therewith. In another part of the field, at ſome diſtance from the Principals, the Seconds were engaged; Hernan Mexia was afraid to cloſe with Egas de Guzman, becauſe he knew him to be of greater ſtrength of body, and more corpulent than he, but entertained him with the nimbleneſs and agility of his Sword, in which he had the advantage, leaping and skipping from one ſide to the other, without coming ſo near as to wound him. Egas de Guzman obſerving the ill condition his Principal was in, and that he could not catch hold of his Enemy, he took his own Sword by the hilt, and darted it with the point forwards at the face of Mexia; who looking on the Sword to avoid it, Guzman in that moment leaped in, and cloſed with him, and with the dagger in his hand, wounded him in the fore-head two fingers deep, and there it broke in his skull. Mexia frantick with his wound, ran about the field like a Mad-man, and came to the place where the two Principals were ſtruggling; and not minding where he ſtruck or dealt his blows, he gave his own Principal a ſlaſh with his Sword, and ran wildly away, not knowing whither. Egas de Guzman going haſtily to the relief of his Companion, heard Pero Nunnez ſay, that the wound he had received was from his own Second, and therewith he redoubled his blows on the face of his Adverſary, and caſt more duſt into his eyes. Then Guzman, coming to them, ſaid, A curſe be upon ſuch a Gentleman as Pero Nunnez: Did not I deſire you, and warn you, not to bring ſuch a Raſcal into the field, for your Second, as this; and therewith lent him a cut with his Sword, which he fended off with his Arm, as he did ſeveral others, till he was ſo hacked and hewed, that he lay all raw, and full of wounds in the field: but Egas de Guzman helped up his Companion from the ground, and having gathered up all the four Swords, he clapt them under his left arm, and took his Companion on his back, for he was not able to ſtand upon his leggs, and ſo he carried him to an Hoſpital, where they received ſick and wounded people; where he left him, and told them that there was a man killed in a field hard by, whom they would do well to bury; and in the mean time Guzman fled to the Church. Pero Nunnez was carried alſo to the Hoſpital, where he was cured, though mortified, as before deſcribed: but Hernan de Mexia dyed of the wound he had received in his forehead, for the piece of the dagger could not be drawn out of his ſcull. Many other Challenges and Duels happened at that time in that Countrey, not onely between the Inhabitants, but alſo between Travellers, as they encountred on the High-way: I knew ſome of them, and could relate the Particulars thereof; but what we have ſaid already ſhall ſerve for all others of this nature.

CHAP. XXI.

A Challenge which paſſed between Martin de Robles and Paulo de Meneſes; how that quarrel was taken up. Pedro de Hinojoſa goes to the Charcas, where he finds many Souldiers ready to riſe up in Arms. Informations were given to the Governour Hinojoſa concerning this Mutiny: with what vain hopes he entertained the Souldiery.

SEveral other private quarrels and challenges paſſed at that time, which are related by Palentino, and particularly between Martin de Robles and Paulo de Meneſes, and many other ſober and grave perſons, of whom I could tell many Stories, which I heard in thoſe times, but that they ſeemed rather ridiculous, and to make ſport, than any thing of moment. The Souldiers, to cauſe quarrels and diſturbances to compaſs their own ends, raiſed falſe reports and lyes upon ſeveral rich and honourable Perſons, by which the ſpirits of men being inflamed, ſome uſe might be made of their aſſiſtence: And ſo they raiſed a report, that Paulo de Meneſes, who was then Governour of the Charcas, had been diſhoneſt with the Wife of Martin de Robles: Of which Palentino writes a long Chapter, which being too tedious to inſert here, we ſhall onely repeat the ſubſtance of it.

This Diſgrace being publiſhed, and the Fault aggravated by the Souldiers who came to take part with one ſide and the other; and that things were proceeded ſo far that both Parties were ready to engage, an expedient was found to reconcile all: which was, that Paulo de Meneſes ſhould abſolutely deny the fact; and to convince the World that the teſtimony was a falſe and a notorious Lye, he was to marry the Daughter of Martin de Robles, a Child of ſeven years of age, and he himſelf of above ſeventy: by which means both Parties were reconciled, and the Souldiers on both ſides diſappointed and jeared by Martin de Robles, who was a witty, pleaſant man, and would neither ſpare his friend nor his foe, to loſe his jeſt; and would laugh to think what fools he had made of his friends, and foes the Souldiers, who were gaping to be employed in theſe quarrels. Palentino, ſpeaking of this reconciliation, in the Second Part of his Second Book, hath theſe words; In fine, ſaith he, after many Allegations, and Replies, and Anſwers made thereunto; it was concluded as an expedient for all, that Paulo de Meneſes ſhould marry with Donna Maria, the Daughter of Martin de Robles, though at that time of ſeven years of age onely; and that her Father ſhould oblige him, that when ſhe came to accompliſh the years of twelve, that then he ſhould give to Paulo de Meneſes thirty four thouſand pieces of Eight for her Portion. And with this Agreement Paulo de Meneſes and Martin de Robles were reconciled and made perfect good friends, which much troubled and diſappointed the Souldiers, who deſired to fiſh in theſe muddy waters, and to convert theſe private diſcords into publick Rebellion; whereby every one figured to himſelf ſome great advantage, and to be made

be made ſome great Lord or Prince, and to enjoy the ſweetneſs of other mens Eſtates: with the ſubſtance of what we have ſaid this Authour fills five Chapters; wherein is nothing but quarrel and diſpute. But this marriage laſted not long by reaſon of the inequality of age, for Paulo de Meneſes died ſome few years afterwards, before he had conſummated the marriage; but the young Lady, though not as yet twelve years old, inherited the Eſtate and Indians of her Husband; and (as the Ladies of Don Pedro de Alvarado did uſe to ſay) ſhe changed her old Kettle for a new one; for ſhe married with a young Gentleman of about twenty years of age, who was a Kinſman of the ſame Paulo de Meneſes, and thereby a kind of reſtauration or compoſition was made for that Eſtate. This paſſage we have inſerted a little out of its due place, in regard it fell in with other ſtories of the ſame nature. For not long before this agreement was made, the General Pedro de Hinojoſa arrived in the Charcas with the Office and charge of Governour, and chief Juſtice of the City of Plate, and the Provinces thereunto belonging, where he found many of thoſe Souldiers which he expected there; who from the hopes they had received from the Promiſes he had made them in confuſed and general terms, had made their rendezvous there, and invited others to the ſame place, and proved very troubleſome to him, becauſe the Countrey afforded neither convenient quarters, nor proviſions neceſſary for them: for which reaſon Hinojoſa took occaſion to reflect upon Martin de Robles and Paulo de Meneſes, as if their quarrels had drawn thoſe numbers of Souldiers thither; and ſo told them plainly, that ſince their private diſputes had invited ſuch Gueſts they ought to provide neceſſaries for them, and not ſuffer them to die with famine: to which Martin de Robles made anſwer, that many others were concerned in the encouragement which was given them to come thither, and therefore that a general fault ought not to be attributed to them in particular; meaning by General, himſelf, and that he was the cauſe of their coming: for Martin de Robles was uſed to ſpeak ſmartly, and often with reflexion, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

Thus did every man make it his buſineſs to complain of others, and to lay the miſcarriages of Government to other mens charge, nothing was quiet in the City of Plate, or free from malevolent Tongues, ſo that the moſt ſober Inhabitants retired from the precincts of the City, and betook themſelves to the Countrey, or to parts where their Eſtates lay, to free themſelves from the inſolence and bold practices of the Souldiery; who were come at length to that paſs, as to hold publick Meetings, and to own their Cabals, and to challenge the General with the word and promiſe he had given them to be their chief Leader and Commander, ſo ſoon as he was come to the Charcas, and that now they offered themſelves being in a readineſs to make an Inſurrection, and would no longer be delayed. The General, to entertain them with new hopes, told them, that he ſhortly expected a Commiſſion from the High Court of Juſtice to enlarge their Conqueſts by a War, which would afford them a good occaſion to riſe in Arms under colour of Authority.

With theſe and the like vain excuſes and pretences he entertained the Souldiery, being far from any reſolution of compliance with them. And though 'tis true that, being at Los Reyes, he ſometimes let fall ſome dubious expreſſions in general terms, which the Souldiers interpreted for promiſes; yet being now come into his Government, and become Maſter of two hundred thouſand pieces of Eight a year, he was willing to ſit quiet in the enjoyment of that fortune which he had already acquired, and not to adventure again by a ſecond Rebellion the loſs of thoſe riches, which, at the coſt and ruine of another, he had gained by the firſt.

The Souldiers obſerving this indifferency and coldneſs of the General, conſulted in what manner to carry on their Rebellion by another hand; and accordingly it was agreed to kill Hinojoſa, and to ſet up Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla for their Commander in Chief, being at that time the moſt popular man of any: the which deſign was treated ſo publickly that it was the common diſcourſe of the whole Town, and every one talked of it as a Plot ready to be put in execution: wherefore ſeveral men of Eſtates, and perſons who were concerned for the peace and quierneſs of the Countrey, informed the Governour Pedro de Hinojoſa thereof, and adviſed him to ſecure his own perſon, and to drive theſe people out of the limits of his Juriſdiction before they took away his life and deſtroyed the Kingdom: and particularly one Polo Ondegardo a Lawyer was very urgent with him upon this point, and amongſt other things told him, that in caſe he would make him his Deputy but for one month, he would ſecure his life to him, which was in great danger, and free the City from the fears of an Inſurrection, which theſe Gentlemen Souldiers were contriving to raiſe: but the Governour repoſed that confidence in his Wealth and in the power of his Office, and in the Reputation which he had formerly gained, that he made no account of what they ſaid, nor of what he ſaw with his own eyes.

CHAP. XXII.

The General receives informations of the Plot by divers other ways and means. His bravery and courage, and neglect to prevent it. The Souldiers conſpire to kill him.

THE Souldiers, proceeding in their rebellious deſigns, diſperſed many Libels abroad; ſome whereof were intimations to Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, and other Souldiers of note, to be careſull of their own perſons, and to be wary of the Governour, who deſigned to kill them: other Libels on the other ſide were caſt out againſt the Governour himſelf threatning his life: all which were ſpread abroad by the arts of malitious men, whoſe buſineſs it was to raiſe jealouſies, and inflame the minds of men with anger againſt each other; as Palentino frequently expreſſes upon this occaſion, in divers places of his Hiſtory, Chapter eleven, Book the ſecond, as followeth.

At this time Polo the Lawyer did often acquaint Pedro de Hinojoſa with theſe matters, perſuading him very much to take the examinations and puniſh the Offenders: but all he could ſay availing little, one Saturday after Maſs, being the fourth of March, he took occaſion to declare his mind to the Guardian of the Convent of St. Francis, perſuading him to ſignifie the matter to the Governour, and to tell him, that it was intimated to him in Confeſſion: which the Guardian accordingly did, though it made little impreſſion on Pedro de Hinojoſa. In like manner on the ſame day after dinner Martin de Robles ſpoke it publickly before much company, and told him plainly that the Souldiers deſigned to kill him: but Pedro de Hinojoſa, who had rejected the reaſons which were formerly given him for driving out the Souldiers from within the limits of his Juriſdiction, did not well reliſh this diſcourſe, and therefore told de Robles, that he ſpake theſe words deſignedly to have witneſs of what he had alledged before him; to which Polo the Lawyer, who was there preſent, made anſwer with ſome heat and anger, that he ſhould look well to himſelf, and that in caſe Martin de Robles did offer to give his Information he could not refuſe to take it; and if he made not good his Teſtimony, and proved what he alledged, he was liable to puniſhment and forfeitures for default thereof; but the Information is ſo plain, ſaid he, that it needs no other evidence, being not carried on in the dark, but ſo openly in the ſtreets that the very ſtones were ready to cry out and bear teſtimony thereof; and therefore it is your duty immediately to take the Examinations, and uſe the diligence required in a caſe ſo important and difficult as this; and that he would be contented to loſe his life if he made not good every ſyllable of the allegations. In ſhort, Pedro de Hinojoſa, who was of an humour never to recede from his own fancy, replied, in a haughty, proud manner, that the Souldiers ſtood in ſuch awe of him, that if once he but lifted up his hand they would all tremble, and have no power to hurt or offend him; and with that he broke off the diſcourſe, charging every one not to urge it farther. The next day, being Sunday, after Dinner, Pedro de Hinojoſa, being in company with Martin de Robles, and Pedro Hernandez de Paniagua, and other perſons, diſcourſing pleaſantly of indifferent matters, John de Huarte and other Souldiers came towards the Evening to make him a Viſit, ſuppoſing that by his countenance and manner of receiving them they might make a judgment of what thoughts he conceived in his mind; for he had the character of a plain man, and without diſſimulation: theſe Viſitants obſerved every word he ſaid, and all his motions and behaviour, which were courteous and obliging towards them, without the leaſt ſymptome of jealouſie or ſuſpicion of evil practices; and coming to ſpeak of the Souldiers, he told them, that he was glad to ſee ſuch brave fellows in the Town, and that he eſteemed them to be the flower of Peru: with which ſaying they parted with great ſatisfaction from him, and carried the news to Don Sebaſtian and the other Conſpiratours, who thereupon gave immediate order to put off the Sports which were appointed, and that they ſhould aſſemble together that night, and in the morning begin the Rebellion, that the Plot which had been ſo long conceived, and of which they had been long in labour, might not prove abortive at the laſt. And here Palentino ends this Chapter.

The Souldiers, not being able to ſuffer any longer delay of a matter which they ſo earneſtly deſired, agreed by common conſent to kill the General and make an Inſurrection through the whole Countrey. The principal perſons in this Conſpiracy were Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, Egas de Guſman, Baſco Godines, Baltaſar Velazquez, Gomez Hernandez the Lawyer, beſides ſeveral other Souldiers of note, moſt of which were then preſent in the City of Plate; for, as hath been ſaid, they invited and encouraged one the other. Egas Guzman came thither purpoſely to enter into the Conſult, though he pretended to the General that his deſign was to obtain his pardon from the Crown for having killed Hernan de Mexia, which the good General believed to be true; and, ſuſpecting no deſign in him againſt his own life and ſafety, he readily gave Letters in his favour both to the Secular and Eccleſiaſtical Judges of Potocſi, in both which Courts, as he ſaid, he was to be acquitted. Theſe Letters of recommendation were ſent by the Souldiers (now reſolved to rebell) to Egas de Guzman then at his Lodging in Potocſi, with orders, that ſo ſoon as he ſhould hear that the General was killed, that then he and his companions ſhould preſently be in Arms. And now every thing being prepared, the Aſſaſſinates met in the Chamber of one Hernando Guillado, where they reſolved to act their bloudy intent the next morning by break of day: for execution of which Don Sebaſtian appointed ſeven perſons onely together with himſelf to kill the General; for if many were employed, it would give a jealouſie, and occaſion the Gates to be ſhut, and cauſe an alarm over the whole City. Garci Tello de Guzman had got with him into his Chamber about fourteen or fifteen other ſtout Companions, who were to divide themſelves in ſeveral parties about the Streets near the General's Houſe to aſſiſt and relieve Don Sebaſtian, if occaſion ſhould be. Another party of about nine or ten perſons, having one Gomez Mogollon for their Chief, were placed in an empty Houſe where none inhabited, belonging to Hernando Piçarro, and there attended for the ſame deſign. In this poſture they continued all night, and next morning by break of day they ſent Spies to the corner of every Street, to hearken if any noiſe were in the City, or the Houſe of the General; and finding the Gate open, they preſently gave notice thereof to the Conſpiratours, who reſolved to kill the General in his Bed.

CHAP. XXIII.

Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla and his Aſſociates kill the Governour Pedro de Hinojoſa, and his Lieutenant Alonſo de Caſtro. Some of the Inhabitants eſcape out of the City, and others of them are impriſoned. What courſe the Rebels take in their affairs after this.

SO ſoon as the Spies brought word that the General's Gate was opened, Don Sebaſtian and his Aſſociates ſallied out from their Chamber where they had lodged that night: and though they were all ſelect and choice men, yet they were ſo affrighted and diſtracted with the Villany they were going to act, as if they had been to charge a formidable enemy, whereas indeed they were going to kill a Gentleman, who fearing and apprehending no evil, gave eaſie acceſs to all people. In ſhort, they entring the Houſe, the firſt perſon they met was Alonſo de Caſtro, who was Deputy-Governour, who, ſeeing men come up in that tumultuous manner, thought to qualifie them with good words, and ſaid, Gentlemen, what is the occaſion of this commotion? God ſave the King. Preſently Don Sebaſtian, drawing his Sword, 'tis not now ſeaſonable, ſaid he, for ſuch treaties. The Deputy ſeeing his Sword drawn, turned his back and fled, but a certain Souldier, called Anſelmo d'Ervias, purſued him, and ran him through with his Rapier, and tucked him to the Wall, with which the point of his Sword being bent, when he would have given him a thruſt or two more, the Rapier would not enter, which made the Souldier ſay, what a tough hide this Dog Traitour hath, but others coming in to his aid they ſoon diſpatched him. Then ruſhing into the Chamber of Pedro de Hinojoſa, they found him not there, nor in any of the other Rooms of the Houſe, at which they were much troubled, fearing leſt he had made his eſcape: whereupon two of them putting out their heads at the Window of the Street, cried out, the Tyrant is dead, the Tyrant is dead; which they ſaid, intending to call their own complotters to their aſſiſtence, before the people of the City could come to the reſcue of the General: thoſe who remained below in the yard ſearched for him in all private paſſages and entries of the Houſe; and at length a Souldier chanced to find him in a ſecret corner, near the neceſſary Office, and ſaid, in a jeering manner, Sir, I beſeech your Worſhip to come forth, for here is Don John de Caſtilla and other Cavaliers come to ſpeak with you and kiſs your hands. The General hereupon coming forth in his morning Gown, a Souldier called Gonçalo de Mata went boldly up to him, and ſaid, Sir, theſe Gentlemen are deſirous to have you for their Lord, their General, and their Father, as Palentino reports Chapter the twelfth, in theſe words. The General ſmiling as it were, ſpake out aloud, What me! alas, Gentlemen, command me as you pleaſe: to which Garci Tello de Vega made anſwer, A curſe light on you, 'tis now too late, we have a good General already of Don Sebaſtian, and with that run him thorough the Body to the very Hilt of his Sword, with which he immediately fell to the ground; and endeavouring to ariſe, Antonio de Sepulveda and Anſelmo de Hervias, came in upon him, and gave him two wounds more, with which he cried out for a Confeſſour, but he ſpeedily expired: by this time Don Garci Tello was come down, and being told that the General was dead, he bid them make ſure work, for the whole affair depended thereupon: ſo Anſelmo de Hervias returned to him, who lay extended on the ground, and gave him a good ſlaſh over the face, with which he yielded up his laſt breath. Then all the Aſſaſſinates gathering in a body came to the Market-place, and cried out, God ſave the King, the Tyrant is dead, which is the common language of Rebels in Peru; and then they plundred the Houſe, and in a moment all was carried away, &c. Thus far Diego Hernandez. But as to that great cut which they ſay Hervias gave him over the face, it was not with a Sword, but a daſh with a ſlab of Silver which they had taken out of his Cloſet, where he had heaped up ſo many as if they had been Tiles to cover a Houſe; with with which giving him a blow, here, ſaid he, take thy fill of Riches, for the ſake of which thou didſt break thy word and faith to us, and wouldſt not be our Commander according to thy promiſe.

The General being ſlain, the Conſpiratours ran out crying aloud, Long live the King, long live the King, the covetous Tyrant is dead, the breaker of his Faith. At the ſame inſtant Garci Tello de Guzman appeared with his fifteen Aſſociates, who, dividing themſelves into two parties, ran to kill Paulo de Meneſes and Martin de Robles with whom the Souldiery was highly diſpleaſed, becauſe, having called them to their reſpective aids to joyn with them in their private quarrels one againſt the other, as is before related, was afterwards contented to make peace, and be reconciled to the diſappointment of the Souldiery, who called it an Affront and a contrivance to fool them.

But Martin de Robles, having timely notice brought him by an Indian Servant of all that had paſſed, leaped out of his Bed in his Shirt, and eſcaped. Paulo de Meneſes, conſidering the inſolency of the Souldiers, and that it could not be long before it broke forth into open Outrages, departed from the City that very night, and went to a Countrey Seat not far from thence; where having received information of all that had paſſed, he immediately fled to more remote parts beyond the reach of their power.

The Souldiers, not finding them, plundered and robbed their houſes of every thing that was in them, and then went to the Market-place, to join with Don Sebaſtian: and becauſe they had a quarrel with every man that had any Eſtate, they ſeiſed upon Pedro Hernandez de Paniagua, who was the perſon employed by the Preſident Gaſca to carry the Letters to Gonçalo Piçarro, and for that Service had an Eſtate given him in the City of Plate: they alſo apprehended John Ortez de Carate and Antonio Alvarez, and all the Citizens that they could catch; for ſo ſenſeleſs were they and inapprehenſive of the licencious Souldiers, that they ſuſpected nothing untill they were ſeiſed by them.

Polo the Lawyer, having timely notice by an Indian Servant called Yacuna, made his eſcape on horſe-back. The other Souldiers who were diſperſed over the City flocked to the Market-place in a Body. Then Tello de Vega, ſurnamed the Block-head, took an Enſign or Colours from the Indians, and ſet it up in the Market-place, as Palentino ſaith; and iſſued out Orders by beat of Drum, that all Inhabitants and others, upon pain of death, ſhould immediately repair thither, and liſt themſelves under that Standard: and hereupon Rodrigo de Orellana, leaving the Staff of his Authority at home, though then Sheriff, came and ſurrendred himſelf: in like manner John Ramon, and Gomez Hernandez, the Lawyer, did the ſame; and as every one was liſted they came in at one door of the Church, and went out at the other; ſo that the number taken amounted to a hundred and fifty two perſons. Then was Don Sebaſtian nominated for Captain General and Chief Juſtice and two days afterwards he cauſed the Citizens then in his cuſtody to chuſe him for their Mayor, and Gomez Hernandez, the Lawyer, to be Recorder, and John de Huarte was made Serjeant Major; Hernando de Guillado and Garci Tello de Vega were made Captains, and Pedro de Caſtillo, Captain of the Artilery; and Alvar Perez Payan, Proveditor General; Diego Perez was made High Sheriff, and Bartholomew de Santa Ana his under Sheriff. Thus far Palentino.

Rodrigo de Orellana took part with the Rebels rather out of fear than love, the like did other Citizens and Souldiers of good reputation, who were truly Loyal to his Majeſty; being forced thereunto by the greater power of the Rebels, who had the Arms in their hands, and reſolved to kill all thoſe who complied not with them.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Orders and Methods which Don Sebastian took in his Affairs. Egas de Guzman is directed to make an Insurrection in Potocsi; the several strange Revolutions which happened in that Town.

DON Sebastian himself made choice of one of his Souldiers, in whom he had the greatest confidence, called Diego Mendez, to be Captain of his Guard; and for better security of his person, thirteen Souldiers were chosen to be listed therein, being all esteemed stout Men, and true and faithfull to him; and yet when this poor Gentleman had occasion for them, not one man would appear in his defence.

Another Souldier, called Garçia de Baçan, was sent with a small party to the Estate and Lands of Pedro de Hinojosa, to seise his Slaves, Horses and all other his Goods and Faculties; with Orders to bring back with him those Souldiers who were dispersed abroad and lived amongst the Indians, for want of clothing, after the Spanish Fashion, which was very dear; for with the Indians, any thing served: and also Orders were given by Don Sebastian, to bring Diego de Almendras a prisoner. Other Souldiers were dispeeded away in pursuit of Polo the Lawyer, but neither party had succes; for Polo passing by the place where Diego de Almendras lived, gave him advice of the death of General Hinojosa; whereupon Almendras getting as many of the Slaves belonging to Hinojosa together as he was able, with seven of his Horses, he fled away in company with Polo, which soon carried him far enough away out of the reach of the rebellious Souldiers, likewise Don Sebastian dispeeded away two Souldiers to the quarters of Potocsi, to inform Egas de Guzman of all that had passed, that he also might take up Arms, as others had done.

These and all the Actions mentioned in the preceding Chapter, with what else we shall touch upon hereafter were performed the very day that Pedro de Hinojosa was killed; of which he endeavoured to send the first intelligence to all parts: the Messengers whereof carried it with such speed to Potocsi, that though it was seventeen leagues thither, and a bad rocky way, and a River to pass, yet they arrived there the next morning by break of day: so soon as Egas de Guzman received this news he assembled his Souldiers, which he had formerly listed upon this occasion, and with them and the two messengers which brought the news, and without other Arms or Provisions than their Swords and Daggers and Cloaks to cover them, they went immediately to the Houses of Gomez de Solis and Martin de Almendras, Brother of Diego de Almendras, and took them with great ease, and carried them Prisoners to the Town-house, where they laid them in Chains, and lodged them in a Chamber, with a secure Guard upon them. Upon the report of this pleasing Action, many Souldiers came in and joined with Egas de Guzman, and presently went to the King's house, where they seised his Treasurer Francisco de Ysasiga, with his Accomptant Hernando de Alvarado, and broke open the Royal Treasury, from whence they robbed above a Million and a half of Silver; and made immediate Proclamation, that every man, upon pain of Death should repair to the Market-place to join with the Squadron: Then did Guzman make choice of a Souldier called Antonio de Luxan to be Chief Justice or Recorder of the Town, who, so soon as he was in Office, put the Accomptant Hernando de Alvarado to death upon an Accusation, as Palentino saith, that he had been in the Conspiracy with the General Pedro de Hinojosa, to make a Rebellion in the Countrey. Likewise Egas de Guzman dispatched away six or seven Souldiers to a Village called Porcu, to get what Men, Arms and Horses they could find in those parts. At this time a certain Knight of the Order of St. John, being amongst his Indian Vassals, where he had a good Estate assigned him, and hearing of the Murther of Pedro de Hinojosa, wrote a congratulatory Letter to Don Sebastian upon that subject, wishing him much joy of his high promotion; and desired him presently to send him twenty Musquetiers, that he might go and take Gomez de Alvarado and Lorenço de Aldana, who were his neighbours; and to take away all jealousie and suspicion of the design; he advised that the Souldiers should not be sent by the ordinary road, but by private ways and untrodden paths, for which good contrivance, this good Gentleman paid afterwards to his cost.

The day following after the death of Hinojosa, Baltasar de Velazquez and Basco Godinez came to the City, who had been chief Instruments in that Mutiny, and such as had contrived and fomented the Plot, as will appear hereafter; and which is confirmed by Palentino in these words. Whilst Don Sebastian was preparing to receive them, they both entred the Town; Sebastian was over-joyed to see them, and alighting from his Horse, he met Godinez a-foot, and they both embraced with all the Ceremony of good correspondence. Then said Basco Godinez to Sebastian, Sir, about five leagues from hence, I first received the joyfull news of this glorious Action so much desired by me. To which Don Sebastian taking off his hat, made answer; These Gentlemen here were pleased to make choice of me for their General, which Charge I accepted untill such time as you arrived here to ease me thereof; which therefore now I renounce, and willingly resign it into your hands. But Basco Godinez refused to accept it; saying, that that Office could not be better supplied by any, than by himself; and that his endeavours tended wholly to see him advanced to that Dignity and Charge. After which Complements they retired from the Company, and discoursed together privately and apart. After which Don Sebastian made Proclamation, whereby Basco Godinez was declared Lieutenant General, and that he should be obeyed accordingly by the Souldiery upon pein of death; and Baltasar de Velazquez was made Captain of Horse. Moreover, Sebastian said to Godinez; Sir, it was impossible to have deferred this action untill your coming, for if we had, we had lost our opportunity, but for the future we shall regulate our selves by your direction. To which Godinez replied, that neither then, nor at any other time could he erre in such wise proceedings, and that he hoped in God, that those steps he had made with so much difficulty and hazard, would tend to the happiness and settlement of all things. And so turning to the Company then present, he said, that since they had not killed the Mareschal Alonso de Alvarado, 'twas well he was not present at the late action; and that if he had been acquainted therewith before he had been so far advanced on his way, he would have returned and have killed the said Alonso de Alvarado. And that a matter of this importance might not be omitted, Don Sebastian called a Council: at which were present Basco Godinez, Baltasar Velazquez, Hernando Guillada, John Ramon, Gomez Hernandez, the Lawyer, Diego de Avalos, Pedro del Castillo, and Don Garci Tello, besides divers others. Basco Godinez undertook the design, and to command the party employed thereupon: but Don Sebastian said, that he had promised it already to John Ramon. And it was agreed, that twenty five Souldiers be drawn out for that exploit, and that they should be commanded by John Ramon, and Don Garcia, with Orders to take and possess themselves of the City of la Paz; Basco Godinez said, that the enterprise would be easie, and that he would write to John de Vargas and Martin de Olmos to be assistent therein. Thus far Diego Hernandez.

CHAP. XXV.

Don Sebaſtian and his Officers ſend Captains and Souldiers to kill the Mareſchal; John Ramon commands the Party, and diſarms Don Garcia and thoſe who ſided with him: upon which News the very Souldiers who had advanced Don Sebaſtian, did then murther him.

THE ſame Authour Hernandez proceeding in the Hiſtory, Chapter the fifteenth, ſaith as follows. They then took the Names, and made a Liſt of all thoſe who were to goe, and fitted and prepared them againſt the next day, being Wedneſday, furniſhing them with Arms and mounting them on Beaſts to carry them. On Wedneſday before noon, they accordingly began their march, namely, John Ramon, Don Garci Tello, Gomez Mogollon, Gonçalo de Mata, Franciſco de Annanaſco, Almanſa (Hernando de Soria) Pedro de Caſtro, Mateo de Caſtanneda, Campo Frio de Carvajal, John Nieto, Pedro Franciſco de Solis, Baltaſar de Eſcobedo, Diego Maldonado, Pedro de Marguia, Rodrigo de Arevalo, Antonio Altamirano, Lucena and Hermoſilla; who were no ſooner out of Town, but Baſco Godinez gave immediate advice to Egas de Guzman of their departure; deſiring him to ſend ſome recruits from the place of his aboad to John Ramon and Don Garcia. The Letter which he wrote was to this effect.

Brother of mine, and of my heart, Our General hath diſpeeded our Brother Don Garcia and John Ramon to the new Colony or Plantation, to ſeiſe on the perſon of the good Mareſchal; who being taken or killed, there will be an end of our Troubles, for we ſhall then neither meet with Enemies nor Oppoſition; but the way will be open and eaſie to our Victories. On this deſign twenty five brave Cavaliers are employed of ſuch Valour, that I durſt engage them againſt all mankind: Wherefore, Brother of mine, fit and prepare your ſelf with ſuch Arms as you can get, and ſend ſome Forces from your quarters to join with thoſe which are ſent from our General, who told me, and ſo 'tis my Opinion, that it will he a very acceptable ſervice. It is the general ſenſe of all men here, that you demonſtrated great tenderneſs of ſpirit when you ſpared the life of Gomez de Solis: the Clemency you ſhewed was ſomething extraordinary, but not ſo great as common fame would make it to be.

So ſoon as Egas de Guzman had received this Letter, Orders were taken to diſpatch away fifty five men for the aſſiſtence of Ramon; of which Gabriel de Pernia was Captain, and Alonſo de Ariaça was Enſign, their Inſtructions were to march as far as the new Plantation, there to join with John Ramon: accordingly theſe Men were put into a readineſs, and marched away with flying Colours: in the number of theſe were Ordonno de Valencia, Diego de Tapia the Squint-eyed, Franciſco de Chaves the Moor, John de Cepeda, Franciſco Pacheco, Pero Hernandez, one of the Conſpirators, Alonſo Marquina, Pedro de Venavides, John Marquez, Luys de Eſtrada, Melchor Pacho, Antonio de Avila, with others who completed the number of fifty five Souldiers. Thus far are the words of Diego Hernandez.

The Rebellion being now made publick and openly declared, thoſe very Souldiers who plotted the Deſign, and had made Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla the Head and General thereof, did now conſpire againſt him and caballed and contrived together how they might kill and deſtroy him whom but the other day they had engaged in their Treaſon, and as it were compelled him to be their General and Commander in Chief: but ſo the Fate was, and it was commonly practiſed by the Souldiers in that Empire ever ſince the Wars of Gonçalo Piçarro, to raiſe ſome Tyrant or other to be their Leader, and then preſently to renounce him and kill him, and pretend all for his Majeſty's ſervice, and in recompence thereof to demand ſome great Eſtate and Lands to be given and ſettled upon them. John de Ramon, who with Don Garcia was appointed chief Captain of the Forces which were to march to the City of la Paz, there to kill (as hath been ſaid) the Mareſchal Alonſo de Alvarado; was no ſooner departed from the City of Plate, than he be-he began to enter into Treaty with ſome Friends, that it would be good policy to renounce the Cauſe of Don Garcia and Don Sebaſtian, and to declare themſelves for his Majeſty, againſt all Rebels: And whereas the humour of the Souldiers was generally inclined hereunto, the Propoſal took very well amongſt them, ſo that they marched away with this good intention. And as Don Garcia was upon the way, he received intelligence of the Deſign and Plot of Ramon, which was not ſtrange, becauſe it was uſual for them to ſell one the other; but he took little care of his perſon, and ſlighted the information: for, being a young man, and of little experience, and unskilfull in military affairs, he formed vain conſiderations within himſelf, which failed him in the end: and, not ſo much as acquainting his Friends with the Advices he had received, he proceeded on his way, till he fell into thoſe Snares which with due circumſpection might have been avoided.

John Ramon, in his ſecond day's march, received intelligence, that Don Garcia was acquainted with his Deſign; for thoſe People plaid a double Game, and carried News and Informations to all Sides and Parties. Wherefore John Ramon, thought it time to make ſhort work, and ſo preſently diſarmed five of the principal Souldiers which belonged to Don Garcia, and took away their Horſes from them: and haſtning with what ſpeed they could after Don Garcia, who was advanced before them, they ſoon overtook him and his Companions, who were four perſons, and diſarmed them of their Lances and Muſquets, and diſmounted them from their Horſes; but not to put a farther affront on them, they deveſted them not of the privilege of Souldiers to wear their Swords girt about them. Don Garcia, being ſorry that he had not ſerved Ramon the ſame Trick that Ramon had plaid upon him, offered to join with him, and declare for his Majeſty; but his propoſal was rejected, becauſe Ramon was reſolved to appropriate all the merit to himſelf.

Don Garcia and his Comrades, finding themſelves in this deſtitute and forlorn condition, reſolved to return to Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla: and on the road they diſpatched away a Souldier called Rodrigo de Arevalo with the News; who made ſuch expedition, as Palentino ſaith, that he arrived in the City that night about nine a clock, being the eleventh of March; which being the hour when the Souldiers were drawn up in the Market-place, and diſcourſed and converſed together, they ſaw Arevalo coming a-foot, with a melancholy and dejected countenance, at which ſight they all flocked about him to hear the News; as did alſo Don Sebaſtian, who was not the leaſt concerned therein.

Don Sebaſtian, having underſtood the News, called a Council of thoſe whom he eſteemed his moſt aſſured and intimate Friends, namely, Vaſco Godinez, Baltaſar Velazquez and Tello de Vega, and demanded their advice and ſenſe upon the preſent Emergency; but they, being all divided in their opinions, Vaſco Godinez, who had been the moſt active Man in this Rebellion, (as he himſelf had confeſſed) took Don Sebaſtian aſide and apart from the reſt, and told him plainly, that if he would ſecure his Party and make good his Cauſe; he muſt immediately kill eighteen or twenty Men who were then actually in the Market-place, being notoriouſly known to be affected to the King's party; who being taken off, there would be none remaining beſides Friends and ſuch as he might confide and truſt himſelf with; and that nothing then could ſtand in his way to oppoſe the attainment of his ultimate deſires. Don Sebaſtian of whom we have formerly given the character of a Noble and generous nature; anſwered him, what have theſe Gentlemen done to me, that I ſhould kill them? and commit an outrage ſo bloudy and unparalleled as this? If it be neceſſary for the ſucceſs of my deſigns, to kill theſe men, I would rather be unfortunate, and ſuffer them to kill me, than draw ſuch guilt upon my ſelf. No ſooner had Godinez heard this ſaying, and underſtood the ſenſe of Don Sebaſtian, than he reſolved at the ſame moment to kill him, ſince he would not aſſent to the death of thoſe whom he proſcribed for enemies; and then he ſaid to him, Sir, Pray expect me awhile here, and I will return to you again preſently; having ſaid this, he went into the Market-place, where the Souldiers were ſtill remaining; and ſeeking amongſt the croud for thoſe whom he had named, and proſcribed to be killed, he found them divided in ſeveral parties, and becauſe he could not ſpeak privately to them, by reaſon of the company then preſent, he took them one by one ſingly by the hand, and ſqueezed them hard three or four times, which was the token given them to prepare, and aſſiſt him in the Treaſon which he was going to act. Having done this, he returned to the houſe, and in his way thither he met with Gomez Hernandez, to whom in a few words he communicated his Deſign, which he ſaid, tended to the publick good, and which would undoubtedly be well accepted by his Majeſty as a piece of great and glorious ſervice; and that therefore he ſhould call ſuch to his aſſiſtence as he knew would favour this enterpriſe: Gomez Hernandez went accordingly into the Market-place, and called ſome of them by their names, but men were timorous and fearfull to engage in the Deſign.

Whereupon Gomez Hernandez returned alone and entered with Baſco Godinez into the room where Don Sebaſtian remained, and both immediately cloſed in with him, and gave him many Stabbs with their Daggers; and though he wore a Coat of Mail, yet they made a ſhift to wound him through it. Baltaſar Velazquez, who was preſent at the beginning of the Scuffle, gave a Screek, and retired back upon the ſudden ſurprize; but perceiving that their intent was to kill him, he came alſo to their aſſiſtence, and gave him ſeveral Stabbs, that he might gain a ſhare with them in the merit of that action: another alſo ſtroke him with a Halbert, which he wielded about, without reſpect to any, by which ſome of his Friends ſtanding by were wounded; as Palentino affirms, Chap. 16. but notwithſtanding all this, Don Sebaſtian got from amongſt them with many Wounds, and crept into a dark room, and endeavoured to eſcape out at the back door into the Market-place, which if he had done, it had cauſed great ſlaughter and effuſion of bloud. Baltaſar Velazquez and four or five others followed him into the dark room, but durſt not ſearch after him with their Weapons, for fear of wounding one another: and in the mean time Velazquez adviſed them to carry the News into the Market-place, and to declare his Death, that ſo his Friends might not attempt to ſuccour him; and told them, that he would ſtay behind to diſpatch and make a final end of him: thus whilſt every one did his part Velazquez had found Don Sebaſtian, and gave him many more Wounds both in his Head and Neck; and then the poor Gentleman cried out for a Confeſſour, untill his voice failed him: then Velazquez left him, and went to ſeek for help to drag him out to the Souldiers, and to that purpoſe he called Diego de Analos and Gomez Hernandez; but when they came to the place where he was, they found he had crept to the door of his Chamber, where he lay extended and panting; and then they redoubled their ſtroaks untill he expired his laſt breath, which was about ten a Clock at night: in this buſtle Vaſco Godinez received a ſlight wound in his right hand. Then they drew out the dead Body of Don Sebaſtian amongſt the Souldiers, crying out before it, God ſave the King, the Tyrant is dead; Vaſco Godinez was the moſt forward of any to proclaim this action, God ſave the King, ſaid he, the Tyrant is dead, and I killed him: though it is moſt certain that there was not one of theſe Aſſaſſinates who was not a greater Rebel, Tyrant and Traitour than this Gentleman; which they ſhewed and evidenced to the world when they became Miniſters of Juſtice, and under that name perpetrated the moſt bloudy and horrid Villanies in the world. Thus far Diego Hernandez in the Chapter aforeſaid.

CHAP. XXVI.

The choice of Officers both civil and military. Vaſco Godinez is declared General. The death of Don Garcia and others, without admitting them time to confeſs.

THUS this poor Gentleman, Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, being aſſaſſinated by thoſe who had perſuaded him, and as it were forced him to kill the General Pedro de Hinojoſa then Governour; theſe good and godly men now made themſelves Judges, and erected a Court of Juſtice to try thoſe who had been the Murtherers of the Governour, ſuppoſing thereby to gain favour and credit, and render themſelves faithfull and loyal Subjects to his Majeſty. And though theſe fellows lows had been Traitours more than twice or thrice to the King, and falſe to their Friends, as will appear by the Sentence which, ſome few months afterwards, was paſſed upon Godinez; yet they cry up nothing now but duty and loyalty to the King. And here it is remarkable, that from the Murther of the General Pedro Hinojoſa to the death of Don Sebaſtian, there was not above the ſpace of five days between (as Palentino writes) for Hinojoſa was killed on the ſixth of March, and Don Sebaſtian on the eleventh following, in the year 1553.

And now Baſco Godinez and his Comrades having killed Sebaſtian, they delivered John Ortiz de Carate and Pedro Hernandez Paniagua out of Priſon and Chains, and ſet them at liberty, and told them, that what they had acted was with intent to give them their freedom, and to deliver the City from that total ruine and deſtruction which thoſe Rebels and Traitours had plotted againſt it, and alſo out of a principle of Loyalty to ſerve his Majeſty. And Vaſco Godinez particularly ſaid theſe words (as are repeated by Palentino, Chap. 17.) Gentlemen, for the love of God, ſince you ſee that I have received a wound in my Hand, be pleaſed to apply your ſelves to the Souldiery, and encourage and exhort them to ſtand firm in their loyalty and ſervice to his Majeſty. But when John Ortiz de Carate ſaw that all the Aſſaſſinates and Murtherers of the General were actually amongſt the Souldiers, and that the principal Ruffian and Villain called Hernando Guillada was a Captain, he began to fear leſt they ſhould kill him, to prevent which, he cried out aloud, that they ſhould make Guillada their Captain, and perhaps he thought it might be convenient ſo to be. Thus far Palentino. Thoſe words of John Ortiz de Carate were wiſely and ſeaſonably ſpoken, for 'tis believed that they ſaved their lives thereby: in the mean time Vaſco Godinez went to have the wound of his Hand dreſſed, of which he was more tender than of the life of Don Sebaſtian: the ſame night he diſpatched away ſix Muſquetiers to guard the ways leading to Potocſi, to intercept all Advices which might be ſent hereof to Egas de Guzman, and preſently ſeiſed three of his Souldiers, and before it was day he hanged them up, for he knew that they were Villains, who were acquainted with all his Plots, Treacheries and Intrigues: ſo ſoon as it was day, he ſent to call John Ortiz de Carate, Pedro Hernandez Paniagua, Antonio Alvarez and Martin Monge, who were all Citizens and Free-men of the City, beſides which there were no others at that time; and he told them, with high commendations of his own merit, the great danger he had incurred in killing the late Tyrant, the ſervice he had done his Majeſty thereby, and the particular benefit and happineſs he had procured to them in particular, and to the whole City in general: And that now in return and recompence of ſo great and meritorious Services, he deſired nothing more of them than to be choſen Chief Juſtice of that City and the parts adjacent; and to be nominated Captain General of the Forces, ſince that Egas de Guzman was very ſtrong, and had many Souldiers with him in Potocſi; and to maintain this degree and quality, he deſired to have the Manors of the General, and thoſe Vaſſalages of the Indians conferred upon him, being now vacant by his death. To which the Citizens made anſwer, that they were not a number ſufficient to agree upon ſuch Elections, and feared to run themſelves into danger in caſe they did. But John Ortiz, apprehending leſt Godinez ſhould take this refuſal in ill part, anſwered, more out of fear than affection, that in caſe Gomez Hernandez, who was a man learned in the Law, would give his opinion that they might legally doe it, that then they would readily comply with his deſires: to which the Lawyer gave his opinion readily, and that they might doe it and much more, in reſpect to the great merit and ſervices of Godinez. Hereupon a publick Notary was called, and before him Godinez was nominated to be Lord Chief Juſtice, and Captain-General of the Souldiery; and for ſupport of theſe great Dignities, the Eſtate of the late General Pedro de Hinojoſa was ſettled upon him, which (as we have ſaid) with the Mines of Silver, yielded him two hundred thouſand pieces of Eight of yearly rent: an excellent and worthy reward for two ſuch famous pieces of Treaſon and Murther which this Villain had contrived and woven, purpoſely to wind himſelf into this great Eſtate, which he was reſolved to poſſeſs by any means or ways whatſoever. And in like manner this honeſt Lawyer got himſelf into another allotment called Puna, and to hold it in Cuſtodiam, untill it ſhould be otherwiſe diſpoſed. Upon this paſſage Diego Hernandez ſaith as follows. It is manifeſt that they intended to pay themſelves, and to ſell at a good rate the power they had over the Souldiers, and make advantage of the dread and terrour which the Citizens conceived of them, who feared leſt they ſhould be more cruel towards them than Don Sebaſtian had been. Thus far Diego Hernandez.

Then they nominated the Lawyer Gomez Hernandez to be Lieutenant-General of the Army, and John Ortiz de Carate and Pedro del Caſtillo to be Captains of Foot: this Election was made, to ſignifie, that they would not diſpoſe of the military Offices arbitrarily, but in ſuch a manner as that the Citizens ſhould have a ſhare with them in the Government, which they accepted more out of fear than good will towards the Cauſe or Perſons with whom they were embarked. Hereupon Proclamation was made that all people ſhould obey Baſco Godinez as General, and Baltaſar Velazquez as Major-General; and ſix Souldiers were preſently diſpatched away to ſeiſe upon Don Garcia and the reſt who were returned from the good employment they were ſent about for killing the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado.

Baltaſar Velazquez, to ſhew the power of his Office, cauſed two Souldiers of note to be drawn and quartered, who brought Letters and Advices from Egas de Guzman at Potocſi to Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla. He ſentenced another Souldier to be hanged, called Franciſco de Villalobos, and two other Souldiers, who were Friends to him, to have their hands cut off, but by the mediation of the other Souldiers, a remiſſion was granted to have onely one hand diſmembred: all which this good Major-general acted within the ſpace of four hours after he was promoted to this honour. The day following Martin de Robles, Paulo de Meneſes, Diego de Almendras and Diego de Velazquez entred into the City, having fled from the Souldiers who ſought to take them, together with ſeveral others of leſs note and eſteem. The which being known to Baſco Godinez, who kept his Bed in tenderneſs to his wound, he ſent to call John de Ortiz to him, and deſired him to perſuade Paulo de Meneſes, Martin de Robles and the reſt, who were newly arrived, to aſſemble together in Council, and join with the reſt in confirming the Election of him to be Chief Juſtice and Captain-General, and alſo the Settlement made upon him of the Eſtate of Pedro de Hinojoſa. To which demand they made anſwer, that they had no power nor authority ſo to doe, nor was an act of theirs either legal or valid; and if he would take their counſel as Friends, they would adviſe him to deſiſt from ſuch like pretenſions; for that it would look as if the killing of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla had been acted by him for the ſake of his own intereſt, and not for the ſervice of his Majeſty: with this anſwer Godinez grew highly incenſed, and with a loud voice vowed, that whoſoever pretended to abate the leaſt tittle of his honour, he would pretend to take away their lives. Wherefore he commanded them all to enter into Conſultation, and having ſet ſixty or eighty Souldiers at the Door of the Room where they were aſſembled, he gave orders to kill him or them who ſhould refuſe to ſign or ſet his hand to any thing which he required to be done: which when Paulo de Meneſes and his Companions underſtood, they approved the Election, though much againſt their will, and would have done much more if it had been demanded; for Gomez Hernandez, the Lawyer, aſſured them that in caſe they complied not with him he was reſolved to put every one of them to death. Godinez, finding himſelf now confirmed by the authority of two Aſſemblies, was very much pleaſed, though both Sentences ſerved onely for his greater condemnation. Riba Martin, who was the chief of five Muſquetiers, ſent to take Don Garcia Tello de Guzman, had the fortune to apprehend him about five leagues diſtant from the City, being on his way thither, in hopes of the favour and protection of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla and his party: but when he underſtood that Baſco Godinez and Baltaſar Velazquez, and Gomez Hernandez, who had been the chief Conſpiratours and contrivers of the Murther of Pedro de Hinojoſa, and had been deepeſt in the Rebellion, and who had been the moſt intimate Friends of Don Sebaſtian, were the perſons who had aſſaſſinated him, he could not but greatly admire and remain aſtoniſhed, thinking it impoſſible that thoſe who were more deeply concerned in that black Murther and Rebellion than Don Sebaſtian, ſhould object that crime to him onely, and kill him for that which was their own Plot and Conſpiracy. And whereas he was a Man who had been principally concerned in all the Plots and Intrigues of the Rebels, he told Riba Martin that he did not queſtion but that they would kill him to prevent the diſcoveries he might make of all the Plots and Villanies they had contrived and acted: And ſo it happened, for ſo ſoon as he was brought to the City, Baſco Godinez gave order to Velazquez, as Palentino ſaith, to kill him; which he accordingly performed, to prevent the Teſtimonies and Evidence which he might produce againſt them. Theſe are the words of that Authour Authour, who afterwards proceeds as follows. When Don Garcia perceived, ſaith he, that he had but a ſhort time to live, he deſired to be admitted to confeſſion; and when John Ortiz de Carate came in to ſee him, he beſeeched him, that ſince he was ſhortly to die, he would intercede for him to have one days time to recollect himſelf, and conſider of his ſins, for that he was a young man, and had been a great ſinner. At that inſtant Baltaſar Velazquez entred the Chamber, and without ſuffering John Ortiz ſo much as to ſpeak, he commanded him to void the Room, and told Don Garcia that he had but an hours time given him to live, which he was to make uſe of for preparation of his Soul: and being in confeſſion, he often admoniſhed him to diſpatch; and before he had done, he threw the Cord about his Neck, which he drew ſo hard that it brake; and then applying another Rope, which he ſuppoſed too ſlow in doing execution, he drew out his Sword and cut his Throat and Head off therewith; which being done, John de Ortiz clothed him in his Burial Shrouds, and cauſed him to be interred. The like ſort of Juſtice they paſſed upon others, not admitting any of them to confeſſion, nor to any legal proceedings, leſt at the Tribunal of Juſtice, they ſhould have impeached them to have been the chief and original Plotters and Contrivers of this Rebellion. Thus far Diego Hernandez, Chap. 19. who a little before diſcourſing of this matter ſaith as follows: It was the great Maſter-piece of all their policy, to put men to death without giving them time to confeſs, leſt they ſhould accuſe them, and diſcover their Plots and Treacheries; and as to thoſe in whom they had any confidence of being ſecret and faithfull to the deſigns, they would keep in hand and encourage, allowing them time to be gone and make their eſcape; which they acted by traverſing Juſtice to that ſide and party whereunto their own intereſt moſt chiefly directed.

Herewith Diego Hernandez concludes his eighteenth Chapter; and with much reaſon deteſts the abominable practices, cruelties and treacheries which theſe men acted upon their beſt and moſt intimate Friends: for they were the wretches who had deſigned and contrived the death of Pedro de Hinojoſa, and had above three years before reſolved to kill him, in caſe he ſhould refuſe to become their Head and chief Commander in their intended Rebellion. And then afterwards the villany and barbarous cruelty of theſe men is not to be expreſſed; who killed thoſe who knew their wickedneſs, and cauſed themſelves to be elected Judges and chief Magiſtrates, to condemn thoſe whom they had cauſed to ſin and rendred guilty of all thoſe murthers and bloudy cruelties which they had plotted and contrived. But Heaven found them out at laſt and puniſhed them according to their demerit, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of what happened in Potocſi. Egas de Guzman is drawn and quartered. Other outrages are committed by the Souldiers. Many brave men are put to death. Cozco arms againſt the Rebels.

THeſe and many others were the horrible and execrable Villanies which paſſed in the City of Plate: and now we ſhall proceed to what was committed in Potocſi, where they robbed all the Treaſure belonging to his Majeſty, which was ſo great and vaſt a ſum that it amounted to a million and a half of pieces of Eight, which all vaniſhed to nothing, and never was there one farthing of it recovered; for it was taken away after the death of Hernando de Alvarado, his Majeſty's Accomptant-General, whom Antonio de Luxan, having made himſelf Chief Juſtice of that Town and parts thereunto belonging, had ſentenced to die, and as he went to Execution he publiſhed his Crime to have been, that he had ſided with the General Pedro de Hinojoſa, with intention to raiſe all the Kingdom in arms againſt againſt his Majeſty. And now we muſt underſtand, that a certain Friend of Antonio de Luxan, called John Gonçales, wrote a Letter to him giving him advice of the death of Don Sebaſtian, of the impriſonment of Don Garcia and of the departure of John Ramon and others, with intent to join with the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado. This Letter was ſent by a Janacuna (which ſignifies an Indian Domeſtick Servant educated in a Family) who are commonly the beſt Spies in the world; and the Letter was made up in the ſoal of his Shoe, to keep it from being intercepted by the Guards, which were placed on the way where he was to paſs; herein he was counſelled immediately to kill Egas de Guzman, for that therewith all the Plots of thoſe who were concerned in the death of Don Sebaſtian would be entirely overthrown: ſo ſoon as Antonio de Luxan (who had made himſelf chief Juſtice) had received this Letter, he immediately cauſed the Drum to beat, for aſſembling the Souldiery in the Market-place, where Egas de Guzman coming amongſt the reſt, demanded the reaſon of that convention. Antonio de Luxan, to make trial whether this Letter were true or feigned, and alſo to create a confidence of Egas de Guzman in him as his Friend, he publickly produced the Letter in view of all thoſe then preſent; and asked, whether that were the hand and firm of John Gonçales, and when it was ſaid, that it was very like Gonçales's hand, and that probably it was his and no others, Egas de Guzman changed his countenance, which ſhewed the inward trouble and apprehenſion of his mind. Upon this certification and aſſurance of the death of Don Sebaſtian thoſe who had before an intention to join with Egas de Guzman changed their minds, and declared themſelves Servants to his Majeſty, which was the deſign of Antonio de Luxan in publiſhing the Letter; and alſo to make the Souldiers his inſtruments in killing Egas de Guzman, as that paper adviſed: upon reading whereof, thoſe preſent looked one upon the other, and without ſpeaking one word they underſtood each others meaning: ſo that Antonio de Luxan and his party adventured to lay hands upon Egas de Guzman notwithſtanding he had many that ſided with him, and ſet Gomez de Solis, and Martin de Almendras at liberty, and thoſe very Chains and Irons with which they had been manacled, they put upon Egas de Guzman, and ſtripped off his Coat of Mail, and gave it to Gomez de Solis: and within the ſpace of ſix hours Egas de Guzman (notwithſtanding all his courage and bravery) was drawn and quartered, together with another Companion of his called Diego de Vergara.

This effect had John Gonçales's Letter in Potoſi: and at the ſame time the Inhabitants of the City of Plate, of which the principal perſons were Baſco Godinez, Baltaſar Velazquez and Gomez Hernandez the Lawyer, having conſulted with others of the ſame City, they agreed all to march to Potoſi in a poſture of War againſt Egas de Guzman, not knowing as yet what had been the fate of that poor Gentleman. Baſco Godinez went General and Judge-Advocate of the Army, which they ſo called, though it ſcarce conſiſted of an hundred men, and looked more like a training of Boys, and a mock-ſhow rather than an Army; for to ſo few men they had two Captains of Foot, and one of Horſe, with a Lieutenant-General: and having marched about two leagues they received intelligence that Egas de Guzman was killed, and the Town reduced to the ſervice of the King: upon which it was agreed, that Baſco Godinez ſhould return again to the City of Plate, and that Baltaſar Velazquez and Gomez Hernandez, with fifty ſelect Souldiers, ſhould proceed forward to Potoſi, and farther in purſuit of Gabriel de Pernia, whom (as we have ſaid) Egas de Guzman had ſent with fifty five Souldiers to the City of Peace, there to kill the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado. But Gabriel de Pernia, having with his people travelled ſeveral leagues, received the news that John Ramon had diſarmed Don Garcia: upon which he declared for the Marſhal, and ſent him word by Ordonno de Valencia that he was coming to ſerve him; but he had not marched many leagues farther before his own Souldiers ſeiſed upon him, and declared for Don Sebaſtian, and with their Colours flying returned back again, leaving Pernia with three other Companions to follow their own imaginations, who accordingly joined themſelves with the Marſhal's party: but the Souldiers returned back without Captain or Leader, or Counſel either of themſelves or others, and travelled untill they received news of the death of Don Sebaſtian; and then they proceeded as Palentino writes Chapter 21, in theſe words: They pretended that the Enſign or Colours they carried were diſplayed in the name and for the ſervice of his Majeſty, ſo that their Banner changed like the Weather-cock, which turns to the part where the wind blows ſtrongeſt; and ſuch was the loyalty of this people who who always cried aloud, may he live who overcomes: ſo when they came to meet with Baltaſar Velazquez; the Enſign who carried the Colours, with Pedro Xuares, and two other Souldiers, put themſelves in the Front of all the reſt, and loaring their Colours three times, reſigned them up into the hands of Velazquez; who immediately from thence diſpatched Riba Martin and Martin Moneja to the City of Peace to ſignifie unto the Marſhal, that in regard the City of Plate was in quietneſs and peace, and reduced to the obedience of his Majeſty, he was returning thither, and carried with him Priſoners, Alonſo de Ariaça, Franciſco Arnao, Pero Xuarez, Alonſo de Marquina, Franciſco Chaves the Moor, and John Perez: and when he came within a league and a half of the place, he cauſed Franciſco de Arnao to be executed, and cut into four quarters; and as he entred into the Town, Alonſo de Marquina was by his order drawn and quartered. And the ſame night he entred into the Monaſtery of the Merceds, and from thence drew out Pedro del Cotro, and cauſed him to be hanged, though upon his repentance, for having had a hand in the death of the General, he had admitted himſelf in the Convent and turned Friar. Thus far Diego Hernandez.

But to abbreviate that which he diſcourſes much more at large, we ſay, that Baltaſar Velazquez delivered up the other Priſoners to Baſco Godinez, that ſo he, who had made himſelf Chief Juſtice, might bring them to their Trial, or diſpoſe of them as he ſhould think fit; that is, that he might kill and deſtroy all ſuch as had been privy to his plots and deſigns; which he accordingly did, and baniſhed many into parts far remote from the City of Plate, namely four, five and ſix hundred leagues from thence: he cauſed alſo Garci Tello de Vega to be quartered, who was one of Don Sebaſtian's Captains, and had been commiſſionated thereunto by Baſco Godinez himſelf: he alſo condemned another Souldier called Diego Perez to be diſabled in both his Feet, and afterwards to ſerve in the Galleys; for a Galley-ſlave hath not much uſe of his Feet: thus did they contrive and meditate new ways of cruelty. Then he diſpatched Baltaſar Velazquez, with another Souldier of note called Pedro del Caſtillo, to go to Lima, there to publiſh and extoll the great ſervices which Baſco Godinez and they had done: which are the words of Palentino, who therewith concludes that Chapter.

Though Baltaſar Velazquez, by being abſent in the Charcas, eſcaped the puniſhment which Alonſo de Alvarado had deſigned for him, yet he could not avoid a more ſevere judgment which Heaven had prepared to bring him to his end. The news of the Inſurrection of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtillia ran like lightning through the whole Kingdom, to the great trouble and conſternation of thoſe who had Eſtates in the Countrey, for theſe were they who were likely to ſuffer by all wars and confuſions which ariſe: for not onely being Lords of Manors holding many Indians in vaſſalage they were upon all occaſions of this nature put to a vaſt expence; but likewiſe they held their lives by a hair or thread, being ever in danger of being killed in thoſe rebellious tumults by the Souldiers, who gaped and longed after the enjoyment of their poſſeſſions. So ſoon as this news came to the City of Cozco, they put themſelves into a poſture of defence againſt the enemy; and by conſent of the Corporation, they elected Diego Maldonado, ſurnamed the Rich, to be their General, having formerly been the moſt ancient Governour of any in that City. Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and John de Saavedra were made Captains of Horſe; and John Julio de Hojeda, Thomas Vazquez, and Antonio de Quinnones, and another Citizen, whoſe name I have forgot, were made Captains of Foot: who preſently applied themſelves with all diligence to raiſe Souldiers, and herein John Julio de Hojeda was ſo active that in five days time he marched into the Market-place with three hundred Souldiers after him all very well armed and accoutred, which ſeemed ſtrange in ſo ſhort a time: Three days after this (making eight days in all with the former five) news came of the death of Don Sebaſtian, which put an end to the War for the preſent. The like happened in the City of Los Reyes, as Diego Hernandez mentions, Chap. 22. in theſe words: The Court of Juſtice received intelligence of all the revolutions and tempeſts which were ariſen: for at the end of March news came of the death of the General, and of the rebellion of Don Sebaſtian: ſix days after which came news that Egas Guzman was up in Arms in the quarters of Potoſi: and in four days more advices were brought of the death and deſtruction of thoſe rebellious Tyrants, for which great rejoycing was made in the City of Lima. Thus far Diego Hernandez. We ſhall now in the following Chapter relate, what courſe and methods were uſed to bring theſe men to condign puniſhment.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Royal Court of Juſtice conſtitutes the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado to ſit Judge on the Trial of the Rebels. Decrees and Orders were iſſued out by the Judge, and others by the Souldiers. The Impriſonment of Baſco Godinez, and of other Souldiers, and Men of Eſtates.

THE days of joy and feſtival being paſt in the City of Los Reyes for the death of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtillia, and the defeat and deſtruction of the Rebels, in which Ordonno de Valencia (whom Diego Hernandez often mentions in his Hiſtory) had proved a principal Inſtrument, though he had acted a double part, and been concerned on both ſides. Howſoever his good fortune guiding him to bring the firſt news of the death of Don Sebaſtian; the Judges in reward thereof beſtowed upon him a diviſion of ſome Lands with vaſſalage of Indians in the City of Cozco, to the value of five or ſix thouſand pieces of Eight of yearly Revenue, where I left him in the enjoyment of the ſame when I came for Spain.

But others failed in that deſign, and gained a contrary reward, being accuſed and endicted before a High Court of Juſtice, of which the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado was conſtituted Lord Chancellour by Commiſſion from the Lords Juſtices; for that he being known to be an upright and a ſevere perſon, was eſteemed a proper Inſtrument to puniſh thoſe many outrages, murthers and violences which had been committed againſt God, and contrary to the peace and quietneſs of our Sovereign Lord Charles the Fifth Emperour and King of Spain. In like manner for Trial of Offenders in the Charcas, John Fernandez the King's Attorney General was ordained, and appointed to proceed againſt and judge thoſe Delinquents. Moreover another Commiſſion was privately ſealed, whereby Alonſo de Alvarado was ordained chief Governour and Juſticiary of all thoſe Provinces, and Captain General of all the Forces, with full power to raiſe Souldiers, and to pay them, and all neceſſary Expences of the War out of the Royal Treaſury. Theſe Commiſſions were ſent to Alvarado in the City of Peace, by virtue of which he immediately applied himſelf to the trial and puniſhment of the Rebels: and in order thereunto he diſpatched ſeveral perſons of entire confidence and integrity, into divers parts to ſeiſe and apprehend ſuch as had been guilty, and were fled to avoid the courſe of Juſtice into private corners, and concealments amongſt the Indians. One of thoſe employed upon this meſſage was called John de Henao, who purſued them ſo hard, as to ſearch for them with Canoes, or Indian Boats, in certain little Iſlands within the Lake of Titicaca, and to hunt them amongſt the Oſiers and Ruſhes which grew by the Banks of thoſe Iſlands, and having taken above twenty of the moſt malignant and culpable amongſt them, he delivered them into the hands of Pedro Enciſo then Governour in Chucuytu: who having firſt examined them, and taken their Confeſſions, he ſent them with a ſafe Guard to the Marſhal. It being by this time made known over all the Charcas and Potoſi, that the Marſhal was by Commiſſion conſtituted Judge of thoſe Provinces, divers Souldiers, who were conſcious of their own guilt, adviſed Baſco Godinez (whoſe crimes they believed were too black to admit of Pardon) to be wary and cautious of his own perſon, and to raiſe Souldiers to reſiſt the Marſhal; the which (as Diego Hernandez ſays, Chapter the twenty ſecond) they repreſented to him, as a matter very eaſie to be effected; and that he ſhould cauſe it to be publiſhed abroad, that the Marſhal, and Lorenço de Aldana, and Gomez de Alvarado intended to raiſe Arms, and in an arbitrary manner to tyrannize over the Countrey: which being once fixed in the minds of the people, he might have a very laudable pretence to kill them all; which being done, there could be none to oppoſe or confront him. Howſoever Baſco Godinez was of another opinion; for, depending much on the ſervice he had done his Majeſty in killing Don Sebaſtian de Caſtillia, and upon the enmity which was between him and John Ramon, who accuſed and complained of him, him for not ſtanding firm to his principles, he reſolved to come and claim a reward for his Services: of which the Marſhal having intimation, he gave it out, that he had a power in his Commiſſion to gratifie all thoſe who had had a hand in the death of Don Sebaſtian, and had been inſtrumental in ſuppreſſing Rebels: and that there was a particular Clauſe impowring him to confer the Eſtate and Indians formerly belonging to Alonſo de Mendoça upon Baſco de Godinez, and John Ramon. This rumour being publiſhed abroad, Alonſo Velazquez was diſpatched away with ſome Orders and Inſtructions for Potocſi, and with a particular Warrant to take and apprehend Baſco Godinez; though it was commonly given out, that he carried a power to inveſt Godinez in an Eſtate and Lordſhip over Indians. Thus far Diego Hernandez in the Chapter before mentioned.

Baſco Godinez, being then at the City of Plate, received a Letter from a Kinſman of his that Alonſo Velazquez was bringing the Order of the Juſtices to confer on him the Eſtate of Alonſo de Mendoça; at which Godinez ſeemed much offended and angry, that it was not the Eſtate of the General Pedro de Hinojoſa, which he had before allotted and appropriated to himſelf by his own power and arbitrary pleaſure: of which, when he read the Letter, he greatly complained to thoſe who were then preſent, but they moderated his paſſion a little, by telling him, that theſe were good beginnings, and that he was in a fair way to better his fortunes: but he ſtormed and raged like a mad man, as did other Souldiers then with him, who, entertaining an overweening opinion of their own merits, pretended to the beſt, and the moſt opulent Eſtates in all Peru. Soon after Godinez had received this feigned news in a Letter (which was never intended for him) Alonſo Velazquez arrived at the City of Plate, and being accompanied with ſome Friends of his, he went directly to the Lodging of Baſco Godinez and ſaluted him with the uſual forms of ceremony and complement; to which he returned a ſurly kind of an anſwer, and looked very ſullen and melancholy, becauſe all Peru was not conferred upon him for a reward of his deſerts. But not to ſuffer him to proceed farther in ſuch vain imaginations as theſe; Alonſo Velazquez delivered him a Letter from the Marſhal, with others, which were feigned to amuſe him a while with vain hopes; but whilſt he was attent in reading them, Alonſo Velazquez laid hold on his Arme, and ſaid, Senior Godinez, you are my Priſoner: with which he being much ſurpriſed, he asked him by what Warrant? Velazquez (as Diego Hernandez ſays) made anſwer, that he charged him to go with him to a certain place, where he would ſhew him by what authority: No, ſaid Godinez, let theſe perſons preſent ſee your Orders and Warrant, and afterwards we ſhall reſolve to doe what is requiſite in the caſe. Then Velazquez, with more choler and heat than before, told him plainly, that he would not capitulate with him, but charged him without farther diſpute to go with him, and uſing ſome violence drew him into the Priſon; and as he was going, Godinez deſperately tore his Beard with his hand, and lifted his eyes to Heaven: which ſome ſeeing comforted him, and adviſed him to patience, in regard, that by this impriſonment, the Juſtice of his Cauſe, and the ſignal Services he had done his Majeſty would more eminently appear. But Godinez replied onely with Oaths and Curſes, and that the Devils would now fetch him, who had reſerved him to that unhappy time. In ſhort, Velazquez clapt him up into cloſe Priſon with Chains and Manacles, and committed him to the cuſtody of a ſtrong Guard; and immediately wrote away to the Marſhal giving advice of what had paſſed; who ſpeedily coming to Potocſi, ſeiſed on many Souldiers and Inhabitants, intending to bring them to condign puniſhment: And in the firſt place he made Proceſs againſt Martin de Robles, Gomez de Solis and Martin de Almendras, and others, allowing them to make their legal defence, and bring their witneſſes, and ſuch proofs as were conducing to their diſcharge, and herein eſpecially he indulged the Citizens, and thoſe who had Plantations in the Countrey, affording them a large time to make their defence, moſt of which were ſaved by prolongations and delays, rather than acquitted by the Sentence of Juſtice; as will hereafter appear. Thus far Diego Hernandez, who therewith ends this Chapter. In the concluſion of which, he ſeems to have received his information from ſome perſon prepoſſeſſed with a prejudice againſt the Gentlemen who had Eſtates, and were Lords of Vaſſals in Peru; or perhaps he himſelf was ſo: for he lays no crime to the charge of thoſe againſt whom the Marſhal proceeded; but rather excuſes them, and ſays, that the Rebels ſeiſed on Gomez de Solis, and Martin de Almendras; and that Martin de Robles eſcaped from them in his Shirt. And yet after this, he ſays, that their lives were rather ſaved by prolongations and delays, than acquitted by the courſe of Juſtice; which ſhews him guilty of an apparent partiality, as we ſhall obſerve in many paſſages for the future.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Judge puts many of the Rebels to death in the City of Peace, and in the Village of Potocſi; others were whipped and ſent to the Gallies: the like Juſtice he doth in the City of Plate. The Sentence and Execution of Baſco de Godinez.

THE Marſhal began now to exerciſe his power in puniſhment of the Rebels in the City of Peace, where he had erected a Court of Juſtice: all the Priſoners ſent him by Pedro de Enciſo taken in the great Lake, and other parts, he condemned; ſome of them were hanged, others beheaded, ſome were whipped, and others ſent to the Gallies, ſo that all of them received their juſt reward. From the City of Peace, the Marſhal travelled to Potocſi, where he found many Priſoners of thoſe Bravoes and Hectors that belonged to Egas de Guzman and Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla; on whom he executed the ſame juſtice as on the former; as namely, ſome were hanged, and others beheaded, whipped and ſent to the Gallies. He apprehended the perſon of Hernan Perez de Peragua, who was Commiſſary-General, and accuſed for holding a correſpondence (as we have ſaid before) with Don Sebaſtian, to whom he wrote a Letter to ſend twenty Muſquetiers to take him, that he might not ſeem to ſurrender himſelf; but in regard he was a Knight of the Habit of St. John or a Knight of Malta; they confiſcated the Plantation and Indians which he poſſeſſed in the City of Plate, and ſent his Perſon under a ſecure Guard to the Maſter of Malta. Theſe Seſſions being ended at Potocſi, the Marſhal went to the City of Plate, where Baſco Godinez remained a Priſoner, with ſeveral as brave Souldiers and men of note as any were within thoſe Provinces: on all which they executed the Sentence of the Law, as before on thoſe in Potocſi and in the City of Plate; but very few were condemned to the Gallies, by reaſon that it was troubleſome and delatory to ſend them into Spain; and beſides in their way thither they might find means to make their eſcape; as thoſe had done who were committed to the charge of Rodrigo Ninno; for of all his number, which were eighty ſix, there was but one that arrived in Seville. We do not undertake here particularly to ſet down the preciſe number of thoſe who were put to death and whipped; being ſo many that an exact number could not be kept of them, onely a calculate may be made of them; from the latter end of June, Anno 1553, to the end of November of the ſame year, when a new Inſurrection was begun by Franciſco Hernandez Giron, every day was a day of Aſſiſe, whereon four, five, or ſix a day were condemned, and the next day they were executed. The which expedition of juſtice could not be avoided, conſidering how full the Priſons were, and how neceſſary a Gaol-delivery was for ſecurity of the Countrey; which was put into that amazement and confuſion by the boldneſs and inſolence of the Rebels, that no man remained ſecure either of his Life or Eſtate. Howſoever the malitious and unthinking people ſtyled the Judge with the terms of cruel and implacable, and of another Nero, who could with ſo little remorſe and compaſſion condemn four or five a day unto death, and thoſe of the moſt principal Souldiers, and ſuch as perhaps had been either deceived or enforced to a compliance; and yet when he aroſe from the Bench, and was returning to his own Houſe, he could entertain light and indifferent diſcourſes laughing and jeſting with the Attorney-General, as if thoſe who were condemned to die were Capons or Turkies entred in a Bill of Fare to be ſerved up at his Table. And ſuch other Libels and

ſcandalous Speeches were vented againſt the Government, that it had been well if Laws had been made to reſtrain the exceſſes and liberty of malitious and virulent Tongues.

In the month of October of the ſame year (as Diego Hernandez ſaith) Baſco Godinez was charged and arraigned of many heinous and crying offences, which are ſpecified in the Sentence paſſed on him, for which he was condemned to be drawn and quartered. And it is certain that the Marſhal was troubled that he could not meet with Baltaſar Velazquez (who was gone to Lima) for had he been found he would have incurred the ſame puniſhment that Godinez had done, &c. The declaration of the Crimes of Baſco Godinez were contained in a few words; proclaimed by the Executioner; which were theſe; This man having been a Traitour to God, to his King, and his Friends, is ſentenced to be drawn and quartered. The which ſaying is ſo full and pithy, that it contains as much as can be ſaid or wrote in many Chapters. And thus did the ſeverity of Juſtice paſs on the Offenders, untill towards the end of November (as we have ſaid;) when news coming of a new Rebellion raiſed by Franciſco Hernandez Giron, a ſtop was given to farther proceedings againſt the reſt of the impriſoned Souldiers: which ſeemed to happen opportunely, that the fear of a ſecond Rebellion might moderate and allay the ſeverity exerciſed againſt the firſt.

The Indians of Cozco prognoſticated this Rebellion openly and loudly in the Streets, as I heard and ſaw my ſelf: For the Eve before the Feſtival of the moſt Holy Sacrament, I being then a youth, went out to ſee how the two Market-places of the City were adorned; for at that time the Proceſſion paſſed through no other Streets but thoſe; though ſince that time, as I am told, the perambulation is double as far as before. And being then at the corner of the great Chapel of our Lady of the Merceds, about an hour or two before day, I ſaw a Comet dart from the Eaſt ſide of the City towards the Mountains of the Antis, ſo great and clear that it enlightned all places round with more ſplendour than a full Moon at midnight. Its motion was directly downwards, its form was globular, and its dimenſion as big as a large Tower; and coming near the ground, it divided into ſeveral ſparks and ſtreams of fire; and was accompanied with a Thunder ſo low and near as ſtruck many deaf with the clap, and ran from Eaſt to Weſt: which when the Indians heard and ſaw, they all cried out with one voice, Auca, Auca, Auca, which ſignifies in their Language, as much as to ſay, Tyrant, Traitour, Rebel, and every thing that may be attributed to a violent and bloudy Traitour, as we have before mentioned. This happened on the nineteenth of June in the year 1553. when the Feaſt of our Lord was celebrated; and this prognoſtication which the Indians made, was accompliſhed on the thirteenth of November in the ſame year, when Franciſco Hernandez Giron began a Rebellion, which we ſhall relate in the following Book.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. I.

News being ſpread of the ſevere Proceedings of Juſtice in the Charcas, Franciſco Hernandez Giron conſpires with the Planters and Souldiers to raiſe a Rebellion.

COmmon Fame publiſhed in all parts of the Empire, with what Severity they proceeded in the Charcas againſt thoſe who had been concerned in the Rebellion of Vaſco Godinez and Don Sebaſtian de Caſtillia, and their Adherents: in like manner it was reported, (whether true or falſe it matters not much) that the Marſhal was preparing farther proceſs againſt ſuch Offenders as lived without the Precincts of his Juriſdiction. And that by a Letter which was written from Cozco, it was adviſed (as Palentino relates, Chap. 24. in theſe words.) That in Potoſi they had lopt off the branches, but that in Cozco, they would extirpate them from the very roots: the which Letter, though written, as is ſaid, by John de la Arreynaga without malice or deſign, yet it ſerved to awaken Franciſco Hernandez Giron, and cauſed him with more vigilance to place a watch on the road, to bring him information of all people that paſſed, leſt the Marſhal ſhould ſurprize him unawares: and moreover, he adviſed his Friends to diſcover, if poſſible, the correſpondence which paſſed between Guil. Ramirez, (who was at that time Governour) and the Marſhal: theſe are the very words of that Authour who farther ſays, that all the Inhabitants were in an uproar upon Proclamation made, that every one was to acquit and diſcharge the Indians of their perſonal ſervices, and that the Governour had rejected and torn a Petition which was tendered to him in the name of all the Inhabitants, repreſenting this aggrievance.

The truth is, I cannot but much admire how it is poſſible for men to report things ſo different from all reaſon and probability, as to ſay, that none of the Inhabitants of that City were diſcontented and ſcandalized at the ſevere proceedings againſt the Rebels, but onely Franciſco Hernandez Giron, who had been engaged in the two late Rebellions, as this Hiſtory makes mention. Nor is it to be believed, that the Governour, who was a Gentleman of Quality, and one educated under ſo religious and good a Prince as the Vice-king Don Antonio de Mendoça, ſhould perform an action ſo odious and unpolitick, as to tear a Petition ſubſcribed by above eighty Lords of Vaſſals and Inhabitants of a City which was the Metropolis of all that Empire. For if ſuch a thing had been done, it had not been ſtrange (be it ſaid with all reſpect to his Royal Majeſty) if they had given him

fifty ſtabbs with their Daggers, as this Authour averrs; ſaying, that Franciſco Hernandez Giron and his Aſſociates had conſpired ſo to doe either in the Townhouſe or in the Shop of a Publick Notary, where the Governour uſed to hold his Court of Juſtice. Thus far Palentino.

And becauſe it is not reaſon, that we ſhould ſo poſitively contradict the Writings of this Authour, which in many places may be taken up from vulgar Reports; we ſhall therefore omit all farther computation, and proceed according to the method of our Hiſtory in the relation of what really paſſed in the City of Cozco, where I was perſonally preſent, and was an eye-witneſs of what was there tranſacted; which was this; The Offence taken at the Severity of Juſtice executed in the Charcas, did ſeem to concern no other Citizen of Cozco, than onely Franciſco Hernandez Giron, who kept no converſation or correſpondence with the Inhabitants, but with the Souldiers onely, which was a ſufficient indication of his evil Intentions. And receiving informations, that the Marſhal made Enquiries after him, and being conſcious to himſelf of his own guilt, he became wary of his own perſon, and reſolved ſpeedily to break forth into open Rebellion. To which end he entered into communication with ſome Souldiers who were his Friends, being not above twelve or thirteen in number; namely, John Cobo, Antonio Carrillo, of whom we have made mention in the Hiſtory of Florida, Diego Gaviland and John Gaviland his brother, Nunno Mendiola, and Diego de Alvarado the Lawyer, who availed himſelf more of his skill in War, than in Law; and indeed he had reaſon not to boaſt himſelf much of his Learning, for he had never ſhewn any, either in War or Peace; theſe Souldiers, though poor, were yet honourable, and of noble extraction. Beſides theſe, he imparted his deſign to Franciſco Hernandez and Thomas Vaſquez, who was a rich Citizen, and a principal perſon of the Corporation, and one of the firſt Conquerours, when Atahualpa was a priſoner: and with him he entred into a Diſcourſe of theſe matters, upon occaſion of a quarrel which ſome few months before had ariſen between this Thomas Vaſquez and the Governour Gil. Ramirez de Avalos; who out of paſſion rather than reaſon apprehended Vaſquez, and clapt him into the publick priſon, proceeding againſt him rather like a party than a Judge; of which ill uſage Vaſquez had reaſon to complain, ſince that to perſons of his quality and ancient family it was uſual to ſhew all honour and reſpect. Franciſco Hernandez taking hold of this diſpoſition in Vaſquez to revenge the injuries he had received, eaſily prevailed upon him to accept the propoſal and to engage himſelf to be of his party: in like manner he drew another to join with him, called John de Piedrahita, a man of a mean fortune, and one who for the moſt part of the year lived in the Countrey with his Indians; he was alſo of an unquiet temper, and ſo needed no great perſuaſion to be prevailed upon by Franciſco Hernandez.

Theſe two Citizens, and another called Alonſo Diaz engaged with Hernandez in the inſurrection he made (though Palentino names another called Rodrigo de Pineda) but neither he, nor others who went with him to the City of Los Reyes, did join with Hernandez in his rebellion, though they followed his party afterwards, (as will appear in this Hiſtory) rather out of fear than love, or any intereſt whatſoever; for they abandoned his party with the firſt opportunity that preſented, and revolted over to his Majeſty's ſervice; which was the ruine and deſtruction of Hernandez.

Palentino having nominated without any diſtinction Citizens and Souldiers that were engaged in this conſpiracy; he ſays, that they plotted to kill the Governour, and raiſe a tumult in the City, and over all the Kingdom: but I am confident, that this report was framed by a perſon who was ill affected to the Inhabitants of Peru, for he never ſpeaks of them, but with a prejudice, calling them Traytours and rebellious perſons.

The truth is, I am a native of that City and conſequently a Son of that Empire; and therefore it troubles me to hear my Contreymen ſo cauſleſly reproached with the terms of diſloyalty; who never offended his Royal Majeſty; nay, they condemn them of rebellion, or at beſt ſuſpect them of treaſon, who did the ſervice to acquire to his Majeſty a vaſt Empire, and ſo wealthy as hath filled all the world with its riches. For my part, I proteſt in the faith of a Chriſtian, that I will ſpeak the truth, without any partiality or favour; and will declare and plainly confeſs the truth of all the proceedings of Hernandez, and where they are obſcure, confuſed or doubtfull, I ſhall render them as plain and manifeſt as I am able. Know then, that Franciſco Hernandez conſpired with thoſe whom we have before mentioned, and with another Souldier called Bernardino de Robles, and another called Alonſo Gonçalez a man as vile and baſe in his extraction and manners as he was ugly in his perſon, form and ſhape: for he proved the bloudieſt Villain in the World, killing every one who ſtood in his way, even thoſe whom Hernandez had pardoned; pretending that Execution was done before the pardon arrived: His trade was, before this rebellion broke out, to keep Hogs in the valley of Sacſahuana, which was in the Eſtate and Allotment of Hernandez, from whence began that great friendſhip and dearneſs which was between them.

The rebellion being reſolved, it was agreed that it ſhould break forth on the thirteenth of November, in the year 1553. being the day when a marriage was to be celebrated between Alonſo de Loayſa, one of the richeſt and moſt principal Inhabitants of that City, and Nephew to the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes and Donna Maria de Caſtrillia, Niece to Baltaſar de Caſtrillia, Daughter to his Siſter Donna Leonor de Bobadilla and of Nunno Tovar a Cavalier of Badajoz; of whom we have made mention at large in our Hiſtory of Florida. And now, in this following Chapter, we will relate the beginning of this Rebellion which was ſo vexatious, expenſive and ruinous to this whole Empire.

CHAP. II.

Franciſco Hernandez raiſes a Rebellion in Cozco. What happened in the night of this Rebellion. Many Inhabitants fly from the City.

THE day of the Nuptials being come, all the Citizens and their Wives dreſſed themſelves in their beſt Apparel to honour the Wedding: for on all ſuch ſolemn occaſions as this, either of Feſtivals, or days of mourning, it was the cuſtome amongſt theſe Citizens to rejoice or condole together, as if they had been all Brethren of a Family, between whom were no private grudges, animoſities or factions. Many of the Citizens and their Wives dined and ſupped at the Wedding, at which was prepared a ſolemn Banquet. After dinner an entertainment was made in the Street of throwing balls made with Earth by Horſemen at each other (which is a ſport uſed in Spain.) I remember that I ſaw it from the top of a ſtone Wall, over againſt the houſe of Alonſo de Loayſa: and I ſaw Franciſco Hernandez ſitting on a Chair in the Hall, with his Armes folded on his Breaſt, and his Eyes looking downwards; in which poſture he ſeemed more penſive and thoughtfull than melancholy it ſelf. It is probable, that he was then contriving what he was to act and execute that night; though that Authour ſaith, that Franciſco Hernandez had ſhewed himſelf very merry and pleaſant that day at the Wedding, and perhaps it was becauſe he was there preſent, rather than ſhewed any good or pleaſant humour.

The Sports of the City being over, and the Evening come, they ſate themſelves to Supper in a lower Hall, where at leaſt ſixty were at the Table, for the Room was both long and wide; the Ladies ſate together in an inward Room, and from a little Yard, which was between theſe Apartments, they ſerved the Meat unto both Tables. Don Baltaſar de Caſtillia, who was Uncle to the Bride, and a very gentile man, performed the Office of Uſher of the Hall. I my ſelf came to the Wedding-houſe towards the end of Supper, to attend my Father and my Step-mother home at night: And coming into the Hall, I went towards the upper end of the Table, where the Governour was ſet, who being a very obliging Gentleman, was pleaſed to caſt his eyes upon me, and call me to him; though I was but a Boy of fourteen years of age; and bid me ſit down by him, ſince there was no other Chair for me, and reached me ſome of the Comfects and ſweet drink which Boys are beſt pleaſed with. At this Inſtant ſome body knocked at the door and ſaid, that Franciſco Hernandez Giron was there; Don Baltaſar de Caſtillia being near the Entry; Oh, Sir, ſaid he, how comes it to paſs that you are ſo late to honour us with your Company; and immediately ordered the door to be opened, whereupon Franciſco Hernandez ruſhed in with his Sword drawn in his right-hand and a Buckler in his left, and a Companion on each ſide with Partiſans in their hands.

The Gueſts ſitting at Supper affrighted with this appearance aroſe from the Table in great Confuſion: then ſaid Hernandez, Gentlemen, be not afraid nor ſtir, for we are all engaged in this Plot. The Governour, without hearing farther entered in at a door on the left-hand, and went in at the apartment, where the women remained: in another corner of the Hall there was another door leading to the Kitchin and to the other Offices of the Houſe: by theſe two doors all the People paſſed who were in the Entries: but thoſe who were near the great door of the Hall were in moſt danger, not knowing which way to eſcape. John Alonſo Palomino was ſeated juſt over againſt the door of the Hall, with his back towards it; and being known to Diego de Alvarado the Lawyer, and thoſe who were with him, they gave him five wounds; for he, and his kinſman Geronimo Coſtillia were ſet down and deſtined to be murthered; for having oppoſed Franciſco Hernandez in a late mutiny, which he had cauſed, as before related. John Alonſo Palomino dyed the next day of his wounds in the Houſe of Loayſa, not being able to goe forth to be cured elſewhere.

They alſo killed John de Morales, a rich Merchant, and a very honeſt man, as he was at the Wedding-ſupper, and happened to be amongſt the other Citizens; for he, without conſidering what he did, intended to put out the Candles which were on the Table, that in the dark their eſcape might be the more eaſie; and therewith drawing away the Table-cloth, ten of the eleven Candles fell down, and were all extinguiſhed; but one remaining ſtill lighted; one of the Companions of Hernandez thruſt his Partiſan in at his mouth, and cut him therewith from one Ear unto the other; ſaying, Traytor, Wouldſt thou have us all to be killed here? Then another Souldier gave him a Thruſt through the left Pap, with which he immediately fell down dead, ſo that the unhappy man had no time to tye his golden cup to his Girdle, as ſome have malitiouſly written concerning him. The next day I ſaw his Body in the condition here related, for which, and the reſt of the Tragedy, thoſe who were Actours therein did much applaud themſelves.

My Father, and Diego de Los Rios, and Vaſco de Guevara, and two other Gentlemen, who were Brothers and Kinſmen of his, called Eſculantes and Rodrigo de Leon, Brother of Pero Lopez de Caçalla, and other Citizens and Souldiers, in all to the number of thirty ſix, paſſed out at the ſame door with the Governour, and I alſo amongſt the reſt, not by the apartment of the Women, but took to the right-hand, to find a paſſage out by the yards of the Houſe, and here meeting a Ladder, they climbed up to the roof of the Houſe; intending to paſs over into the Houſe of John de Figueroa, which was the next houſe to them, and onely a ſingle Wall between; from whence there was a door opening to another Street; my Father finding that there was a Paſſage that way, called to the Company to ſtay untill he could goe and call the Governour, by whoſe means he hoped to remedy the farther progreſs of this Evil: And going to the place, where the Governour was, he called to him, and told him, that there was a paſſage that way to eſcape, and that there were people to ſuccour and defend him: and that, if he pleaſed to goe with them into the Market-place, and cauſe the Bells to be rung out, and an Alarm ſounded, he did not doubt, but that the Aſſaſſinates and Rebels would immediately fly away, and ſhift for themſelves: but the Governour not receiving this counſel, returned no other Anſwer, than that he deſired him to ſuffer him to remain there. My Father returning to his Companions found them all climbed up to the top of the roof, leading to the Houſe of John de Figueroa: wherefore he deſired them once more to ſtay, and expect him, untill he could goe, and perſuade the Governour out of his place of concealment, where going a ſecond time, he uſed all the Arguments and Reaſons in the World to induce him thereunto, but was not able to prevail, becauſe the Governour fanſied, that they were all in the Plot, as Franciſco Hernandez declared at his firſt entrance into the Hall.

Garçilaſſo, my Father, being out of all hopes to prevail, went his way, and at the Foot of the Ladder loſt one of his ſlippers which he had put on over his

Pumps

Pumps, after they had ended the Game at Balls: but it was not time now to look after it, but to mount the Ladder as fast as we could, and I after him; when we were at the top, we drew it up, and passed it over into the House of John Figueroa, and therewith they all descended, and I among the rest. And having opened the door of the Street, they sent me out before, as a Spy, to discover if the way were clear, supposing that I, being a Boy, the less notice would be taken of me; and in case I found nothing in the way, I was to whistle at the corner of every Street, which was the token for them to follow me. In this manner we went from Street to Street untill we came to the House of Antonio de Quinnones, who was Brother-in-law to my Father Garçilasso, they having married two Sisters. It was our good fortune to find him, and he was much joyed to see my Father, for he was in great Fear for him, and trouble of mind to know, what was become of him: But Antonio de Quinnones himself had a narrow escape, and had certainly been killed, had he not been favoured by one of the Conspiratours called John de Gavilan, who in remembrance of some good Offices he had done him in times past, opened the principal door of the Hall, at which he let him out, together with John de Saavedra, who was in his company; and whispering to him, said, Sir, Haste you away home, with Seignior John de Saavedra, and stay there untill I see you in the morning; by which accident it was my Father's fortune to meet him within doors; but notwithstanding this advice, being met together in the House of Antonio de Quinnones, they all agreed to leave the Town that night, and goe to the City of Los Reyes.

John de Saavedra was unwilling to goe, on pretence that he wanted all things necessary for so long a journey, but when they took off that excuse by providing a Horse, a Hat and Boots and a Scarlet Cloak for him; he then said, that the truth was, he was ill, and wanted health for so long a journey; so that, not to importune him farther, they left him at home; we shall shortly declare the true reason and cause why he did not accompany them; which cost him his Life and Estate. All the other Citizens and Souldiers, who escaped to their own Houses, did there immediately fit and prepare themselves for a journey to Los Reyes. Garçilasso, my Master, sent me home, which was not far from his House, to bring him the best of his Horses which remained saddled ever since the afternoon when he returned from the sport of Balls. As I went to fetch the Horse, passing by the House of Thomas Vazquez, I saw in the Street two Horses saddled, with three or four Negroes with them, in discourse together, and when I returned, I found them in the Streets, where I left them: of which when I acquainted my Father and the rest, they were much troubled, imagining that those Horses and Slaves belonged to the Conspirators. At that very instant Rodrigo de Leon, Brother of Pero Lopez de Caçalla called to me, and desired me to goe to his Brother's House, which was in the same Street, but far from the place where we were; and to tell the Porter, who was an Indian, that he desired him to hide the Coat of Male and Head-piece which he left in his Chamber; because it was believed, that the Conspirators would that night sack and plunder the whole City. I made all the haste I could, but before I returned, my Father, and his two Kinsmen, who were Diego de Los Rios and Antonio Quinnones, were departed, having taken a large compass through Back-ways and By-streets, to avoid the door of Thomas Vasquez: but I returned to my Father's house, which is just opposite to the two Squares, which were not then so curiously adorned, as the Houses are now, which are situate by the Stream side, and in the Squares of Market-places. And there I remained full of expectation to see the issue of that sad and dismall night.

CHAP. III.

Franciſco Hernandez diſcovers the Governour, and takes him and goes into the Market-place; he opens the Priſon doors and ſets the Priſoners at Liberty: he cauſes Don Baltaſar de Caſtillia, and the Accountant John de Carceres to be killed.

ALL this time Franciſco Hernandez Giron and his Aſſociates remained in the Houſe of Alonſo de Loayſa purpoſely to take the Governour, ſuppoſing that if they had him in their hands, all the City would yield and ſurrender to them. And being informed that he was concealed in the room with the Women, they ran a Bench againſt the firſt door, and broke it open, and coming to the ſecond, thoſe within parlied with them, deſiring them to paſs their words, not to kill the Governour, nor do him other hurt; which Hernandez having given accordingly, the doors were opened; and the Governour being taken, Hernandez carried him to his own Houſe, where he left him under a ſecure Guard; and then he went into the Market-place, with all his Companions, who were not above twelve or thirteen in number.

But this Impriſonment of the Governour, that is, the taking of him and carrying him to his Houſe, and committing him into ſafe cuſtody, was not performed in leſs than three hours and a half's time: by which it plainly appears, that in caſe the Governour had gone forth, as my Father and other friends adviſed him, and had made good the Market-place, and ſounded an Alarm, ſummoning all his Majeſty's loyal Subjects to his Aſſiſtence, no doubt but the Rebels would have been affrighted, and ſoon abſconded themſelves in places where they could have found the beſt refuge: the which every one confeſſed after the matter was over. And now having the curioſity to ſee what was acting, I went out into the Market place, where I found a few of thoſe poor raſcally fellows, who were ready to run away in caſe they had ſeen any to oppoſe them: but the darkneſs of the night, and the boldneſs of thoſe Conſpiratours to enter into a Houſe ſo full of people, affrighted the Governour and all the Company with a ſurprizing fear, and chaſed all the Citizens and Souldiers out of the Town; who joyning together might eaſily and without the leaſt difficulty have confounded the Rebels. About half an hour after midnight, when I was in the Market-place, came Thomas Vaſquez prancing on Horſe-back, and another following him with their Lances in their hands, and asked Hernandez what ſervice he had to command them? to which he anſwered, that all he had to deſire at preſent was, that they would goe the rounds, and adviſe all people that they met, not to be afraid; and in caſe of trouble, or danger, that they ſhould apply themſelves to him, who was in the Market-place, ready to ſuccour and ſerve all his Friends and Maſters. In like manner ſoon after this, came another Citizen called Alonſo Diaz, mounted on Horſe-back with his Lance in his hand; to whom Hernandez ordered the ſame thing as he had done to Vazquez: ſo that all the Citizens who were engaged in this Conſpiracy were onely three, namely, Thomas Vazquez, John de Pearahita, and Alonſo Diaz, for he that was with Vazquez was a ſtranger, and no Citizen; though ſoon afterwards ſeveral others came and joyned with them, more out of fear than affection, as plainly appears: for they all left and deſerted them with the firſt occaſion which preſented. Theſe poor Rebels, finding themſelves few in number, and that none came in to their aſſiſtence; went directly to the Priſons, and opened the doors, to recruit their numbers; and marched directly with them to the Market-place, where they remained untill break of day, and then they found that all the Forces they could make, did not amount to above forty men. And though Palentino makes a long and formal ſtory of this buſineſs, and tells us, that they ran about the Streets crying out Liberty, Liberty, and that they produced great ſtores of Pikes and Muſquets, and ſet up a Standard; and that Hernandez made Proclamation tion, that all people, upon pain of death, ſhould come in to their party; and that Lights were ſet up in the Streets, and Guards placed, to prevent the eſcape of any perſon whatſoever. I ſay notwithſtanding, that nothing paſſed more that night than what is before related; for, I being then a boy, had the Liberty to run about, and was an eye-witneſs of all that paſſed; for theſe people being ſo few in number, could neither ſet up Lights, nor appoint Watches and Guards in all parts of the City, which was above a League in Compaſs. The next day they went to the Governour's Lodgings, where they examined his Cloſet and Papers; amongſt which (as they report) were found above eighteen ſeveral Orders of the Juſtices, all tending to the damage and prejudice of the Citizens; namely, that they ſhould free and acquit the Indians of all perſonal Services, that none of them ſhould be compelled to labour in the Mines, nor to receive or quarter Souldiers, nor to maintain them either ſecretly or in publick, all which were Inventions to raiſe Mutinies, and incite the Souldiery to join with them.

The third day after this Rebellion Hernandez was employed in making Viſits to the principal Citizens at their own homes: and amongſt the reſt, coming to my Father's Houſe, where I, and my Mother-in-law were onely preſent, he told us, amongſt other things; that what he had done, was for the publick good and well-fare of all the Souldiers, Citizens and Planters, of the whole Empire. That the ſupreme Charge and Super-intendency of all theſe matters he reſerved not for himſelf, but to beſtow it on ſome other who beſt deſerved it: And he deſired my Mother to prevail with my Father not longer to conceal himſelf, but to meet him and the reſt of his Aſſociates in the Market-place, to conſult and order matters at a time when the difficulty of affairs required his aſſiſtence.

The like Diſcourſes he uſed in other Houſes where he made his Viſits, believing that thoſe who did not appear had abſconded themſelves, not imagining that they were fled to Los Reyes: but when my Mother-in-law aſſured him, that ſince the Wedding-night, ſhe had not ſeen my Father, nor had he entred into his Houſe; which my Mother affirming with all the Oaths and Aſſeverations ſhe could make, ſhe deſired him in caſe he believed her not, to make ſearch in all the parts and corners of the Houſe; he then was convinced, and ſaid, that he wondered at it; and ſo cutting off all farther diſcourſe, he took his leave, and went to viſit other Houſes, where he found the ſame verified, as in this place. For the truth is, they did not all fly away the ſame night, but four or five nights after, as they found convenient; for having no Guards in the Streets, nor at the Gates, every one eſcaped without much difficulty.

About eight days after this Rebellion was begun, one Bernardino de Robles, a bold and lude fellow informed Hernandez Giron, that Baltaſar de Caſtillia and John de Carceres the Accountant were preparing to make their Eſcape and carry with them divers others, and that all their wrought Plate and other moveables they had ſecured in a Monaſtery: which ſo ſoon as Hernandez underſtood, he preſently called for his Lawyer Diego de Alvarado, and ordered him to examine the matter, and puniſh the Offenders according to their demerit. The Lawyer required no great Formality in the Proceſs or of Witneſſes to give their Teſtimonies; for he owed an old grudge to Baltaſar de Caſtillia, on the ſcore of a quarrel which about two months before happened between them in the chief Market-place of the City, in which it was the fortune of both of them to be wounded; which the Lawyer not eſteeming a ſufficient ſatisfaction, was angry that he had not killed him; for, as we have ſaid, he preſumed more on his Weapon than on his Learning: and now, having an opportunity to vent his Anger with Colour of Authority, he exerciſed his Commiſſion with all Severity upon innocent men, who, as report goes, were not guilty of the leaſt offence: for the ſame night that he received his Warrant, he went directly to the Houſes of thoſe who were accuſed; and allotted them a ſhort time, not ſufficient to make their Confeſſion, and then delivered them into the hands of the Hang-man John Enriquez to be ſtrangled; who was the ſame Executioner who had beheaded Gonçalo Piçarro and hanged and quartered his Captains and Lieutenant General. The next day after this Rebellion of Hernandez had broken out, this Bloudy Rogue ſhewed himſelf openly in the Market-place, with bundles of Halters about him, and all the Inſtruments of death and torment; preſuming that there would now be work for him and employment for a man of his Office: he alſo drew out his brought Sword to cut off Heads; but he payed afterwards for this preſumption, as we ſhall find by the ſequel: Howſoever, in the mean time he laid hands on theſe two poor Gentlemen, and ſtrangled them in a moment: after which he ſtripped Don Baltaſar, and left him as naked as he was born; but he ſuffered John Carceres to remain in his Shirt, perhaps becauſe his Linen was not ſo fine as was Baltaſar's; then he drew their Bodies into the Market-place, and laid them at the foot of the Gallows, where I ſaw them about nine a Clock that night. It is reported that Franciſco Hernandez did the next day reprove his Lawyer, for being ſo haſty in his execution of Juſtice, before he had communicated the matter firſt to him; but this was onely a feigned pretence to gain eſteem and credit with the People; but ſecretly he was pleaſed with it, obſerving the terrour and conſternation this action had operated in the minds of the People, for ſince they had not ſpared his Majeſty's Accountant, nor one of his Captains in the late Wars, who had a revenue of fifty thouſand Ducats a year, with a great command over Indians; what could others expect of leſs condition; whereupon all the Citizens ſubmitted to them, eſteeming their condition ſecureſt, who were already fled, and had made their eſcapes; but the Aſſaſſinates grew more inſolent and tyrannical than before.

CHAP. IV.

Franciſco Hernandez names and appoints a Lieutenant General and Captains for his Army. Two Cities ſend Ambaſſadours to him. The number of Citizens that were fled to Rimac.

Hernandez having by this time aſſembled about an hundred and fifty Souldiers belonging to the City and the parts adjacent; he began to appoint Officers and Commanders; and named Diego de Alvarado his Lawyer to be his Lieutenant General, and Thomas Vazquez, Franciſco Nunnez, and Rodrigo de Pineda, to be Captains of Horſe. Theſe two laſt, being Citizens, were much in favour, and kindly treated by Hernandez, ever ſince the beginning of the Rebellion; and to oblige and engage them the more, he conferred on them the Commands of Captains of Horſe; which they accepted rather out of Fear than out of affection to his cauſe, or intereſt, or expectation of benefit, or honour from this preferment. His Captains of Foot were John de Pedrahita, Nunno Mendiola and Diego Gavilan, Albertos de Ordunna was made Standard-bearer, and Antonio Carillo Serjeant Major. So every one reſpectively repaired to his Charge and Command, to raiſe Souldiers for completing their Troops and Companies.

Their Enſigns and Colours were made very fine, with Inſcriptions and Mottoes on them all relating to Liberty, ſo that their Army named themſelves, the Army of Liberty. The report of this Inſurrection being noiſed and bruted abroad in general, without any particulars; it was believed, that all the City of Cozco had joined unanimouſly in the rebellion; on which ſuppoſition, the Cities of Huamanca and Arequepa, ſent their Ambaſſadours to Cozco, deſiring to be admitted into the League and Society with them, and to be received into the protection of the Metropolis and Head-city of the Empire, that ſo they might join together to repreſent their caſe to his Majeſty, which was very burthenſome and oppreſſive by reaſon of thoſe many grievous Ordinances which were daily ſent them by the Judges. The Ambaſſadour from Arequepa was called——Valdecabras, with whom I was acquainted; though Palentino ſays he was a Frier called Andres de Talavera, perhaps they might both be ſent. He that was ſent from Huamanca was called Hernando del Tiemblo; and both theſe Ambaſſadours were received by Hernandez Giron with much kindneſs and reſpect, who began now to become proud of his cauſe and enterpriſe, which appeared ſo popular, that the whole Kingdom in a ſhort time was ready to eſpouſe and embrace it: and farther, to magnifie his Actions, he publiſhed abroad, that upon the News of what was acted at Cozco, the people people of the Charcas following the example thereof, had killed the Marſhal de Alvarado. But ſo ſoon as the Cities of Huamanca and Arequepa were rightly informed, that this Inſurrection at Cozco was not raiſed by the Corporation, or by and with the conſent and counſel of the whole City, but by the contrivance of a ſingle perſon, who being conſcious of his paſt Crimes, had raiſed this mutiny to ſecure himſelf from the puniſhment; and how few, and of what mean condition the Conſpiratours were; they altered their reſolutions and opinions, and with joynt conſent prepared themſelves to ſerve his Majeſty as others had done in Cozco, namely Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Antonio de Quinnones, Diego de los Rios, Geronimo Coſtilla and Garci Sanchez de Figueroa, my Father's elder Brother, who, though he had no Eſtate given him, was yet an old Souldier, and one who well deſerved of the Countrey: theſe five Gentlemen eſcaped out of Cozco on the ſame night of the Rebellion, the others which we ſhall name, fled, three, four, or five nights afterwards, as opportunity preſented: ſo Baſco de Guevara a Citizen, and the two Eſchalantes, his Kinſmen, eſcaped the ſecond night. Alonſo de Hinojoſa, and John de Pancorvo, fled the fourth night; and Alonſo de Meſa the fifth night, having ſtayed to conceal and ſecure his Silver, which the Rebels afterwards diſcovered and converted to their own uſe, as we ſhall relate hereafter. My Maſter Garçilaſſo and his Companions, proceeding on their journey, met with Pero Lopez de Caçalla about nine leagues diſtant from the City, where he lived upon his own Eſtate, of whom we have made mention in the Ninth Book of the Firſt Part of this Hiſtory Chap. 26. and with him was his Brother Sebaſtian de Caſtilla; who being informed how matters had paſſed at Cozco, they reſolved to accompany theſe other Gentlemen for the ſervice of his Majeſty: The Wife of Pero de Lopez, called Donna Franciſca de Cunniga, was of noble deſcent, very handſome, vertuous and diſcreet, was unwilling to be left behind, but deſirous to accompany her Husband in that journey: And though ſhe was a tender Woman, and of a weak conſtitution of Body, yet ſhe adventured to ride alone with a Side-ſaddle on a Mule; and paſſed all the bad ways, endured all the fatigues, and held out as well as any one in the company. And every night, when they came to their Lodging, ſhe took care to provide Supper and Break-faſt next morning, with help of the Indians, and directed the Indian Women in what manner to dreſs the Victuals: all which I have heard thoſe who kept her company, diſcourſe concerning this famous Lady.

Theſe Gentlemen proceeding on their journey, and being come to Curapampa about twenty leagues from the City, they met Hernan Bravo de Laguna, and Gaſpar de Sotelo Citizens thereof, who had ſome Lands and Indians in vaſſalage in thoſe parts; to whom having given a report of what had paſſed at Cozco, they reſolved to accompany with them, as did many other Planters and Souldiers, whom they met on the way, untill they came to Huamanca; the Inhabitants of which City did wonder much to ſee ſo many principal perſons and men of quality there; whoſe preſence confirmed them in their firſt reſolution to ſerve his Majeſty in union with perſonages of ſo much honour as theſe; ſo as many as could go at that time went, and were followed by others, as their conveniences ſerved.

But to look a little backwards, we forgot to ſay, that when my Maſter Garçilaſſo and his Companions paſſed the Bridge at Apurimac, they conſidered that many people out of Cozco and other parts, were likely to follow them in ſervice of his Majeſty, and therefore it would not be fit to hinder their paſſage by burning the Bridge, for that were to deliver them into the hands of the Rebels: wherefore they agreed to order two men to remain for Guards at the Bridge, and to ſuffer all perſons to paſs who ſhould come thither within the ſpace of five or ſix days, and then to ſet fire to it; whereby they ſhould travel more ſecurely and free of fear from purſuits of the enemy: which was accordingly performed, ſo that thoſe who came within the ſpace of thoſe days found a paſſage contrary to expectation, for they feared much that they ſhould find the Bridge burnt by the firſt who paſſed. Other Citizens of Cozco went to Los Reyes by other Roads; for it happened that many of them at that ſeaſon of the year were at their Houſes and Plantations with their Indians, namely, John Julio de Hojeda, Pedro de Orue, Martin de Arbieto, Rodrigo de Eſquivel; all which paſſing by the Plantation of Don Pedro de Cabrera took him with them, and travelled all together to Los Reyes.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Letters are written to the chief Rebel, and the Governour is baniſhed out of Cozco.

Palentino, in the twenty fifth Chapter of his Book, coming to touch upon this paſſage, ſaith, as follows:

About this time Michael de Villafuerte arrived at Cozco, with credential Letters directed to Franciſco Hernandez, from Pedro Lewis de Cabrera, who was then at Cotabamba with ſome Souldiers and intimate Friends when the Inſurrection was firſt made; and with them alſo were Hernando Guillada, and Diego Mendez, who were engaged in the Rebellion of Sebaſtian de Caſtilla: the Letters were to this effect: That ſince it was not the fortune of Don Pedro to have been the firſt in this Inſurrection, but that Franciſco Hernandez had got the ſtart of him, and preceded him by four days time, he deſired him to proſecute his deſign, and endeavour to obtain a general addreſs from the people, ſupplicating him to take upon him the ſole adminiſtrate of the whole Kingdom: That he for his part, had already ſet up his Standard in his name, and was marching towards Los Reyes, with intention to force the Court of Juſtice to nominate him for Captain-General; and that ſo ſoon as he was inveſted in that charge, he would then adviſe him to ſeiſe on the Judges and ſend them into Spain. This Letter was ſeconded by another from Don Pedro to Hernandez, ſent by the Son of Gomez de Tordoya, giving him to underſtand, that he was certainly informed, that Garçilaſſo de la Vega, Antonio Quinnones, and others who were gone to Los Reyes, had no intent to favour their Cauſe; for though they deſigned to joyn with Don Pedro in the Rebellion, yet when they found that he (that is Hernandez) had anticipated the matter, and was the firſt in the Plot, they then fell off from farther proſecution thereof; And that this was his deſign plainly appears; for when he firſt went from his Plantation, he cauſed Maſs to be ſaid, which being ended, he made Oath upon the Altar, in hearing of the people, that he was going to Lima with no other intent or purpoſe than to ſeiſe on the Judges and to Ship them away for Spain. But Franciſco Hernandez, knowing Don Pedro to be a ſubtile and a double-hearted man, conſidered all theſe ſtories to be fictions of his own, whereby the better to ſecure himſelf, and without any oppoſition to paſs over together with his Souldiers to the other party: wherefore, having taken away the ſtaff of Juſtice from the Governour Gil Ramirez, he committed him to the cuſtody of John de Piedrahita, with orders to convey him with a Guard of Muſquetiers out of the City of Cozco, and conduct him twenty leagues on his way towards Los Reyes, which was accordingly done, without taking any thing from him: Moreover Inſtructions were given to Piedrahita to find out Don Pedro and tell him, that he ſhould not need to go to Lima, but rather to doe him the favour to come to Cozco: which if Don Pedro ſhould refuſe to doe, he then required him to ſeiſe on him and bring him thither in ſafe cuſtody: but Don Pedro being too far advanced before, Piedrahita could not overtake him, and therefore returned back to Cozco without effect, &c. Thus far that Authour.

But becauſe thoſe matters are not ſet down methodically as they paſſed, we ſhall deſcribe them more orderly, and ſhew every paſſage, as it ſucceeded, and by what way Piedrahita guided the Governour: now as to Don Pedro de Cabrera, his circumſtances were ſuch as not to ſtand in need of any correſpondence with Franciſco Hernandez, nor did he ever intend or deſign any ſuch thing, being a perſon who both in Mind and Body was unfit for War; for he was the moſt corpulent man that ever I ſaw; and with ſuch a Belly, that, as I remember two years after the Battel of Sacſahuana, a Tailour, who was a Negroe, and a Slave to my Father, but a very good Workman, made a Doublet for him of Cordovan with a Gold Fringe, which being almoſt finiſhed, three other knaviſh Boys like my ſelf about ten or eleven years old, came into the Chamber where the Tailour was at work, and finding this Doublet on the Shop-board, bordered with a Silk Galoon, we looked on it, and ſeeing it ſo wide, we all covered our ſelves within it, and ſtill there was room for another of our ſize and bigneſs. And having ſo great a Belly he could not ride on a Gennet's Saddle, which hath a high Pommel before, but as his occaſion ſerved he rode on a Mule, with a Saddle low before, uſed for racing; though his bulk was ſo burthenſome that he never engaged himſelf in exerciſes of Activity. And though in the Wars againſt Gonçalo Piçarro he had the command of a Troop of Horſe, it was given him as a reward for being inſtrumental in ſurrender of the Fleet unto the Preſident, and with it, after the War was ended, he was farther gratified with a good allotment of Lands with vaſſalage of Indians thereunto belonging, as we have before mentioned: then as to his humour and manners, he was the moſt luxurious man in his diet, and the greateſt glutton that ever was known; he was very pleaſant and facetious in his converſation; he would tell ſuch comical ſtories, all of his own making, as were very delightfull; and, for want of better company, he would put jeſts and tricks upon his Pages, Lackeys and Slaves, and entertain himſelf with laughing at them: I could here recount many of his Jeſts, but let that of his Doublet paſs for all, it not being fit to intermix too many of theſe trivial matters with others of more ſerious and weighty importance. His Houſe was near to my Father's, and there was ſome kindred and alliance between them; for the Mother of my Lady Donna Elena de Figueroa, was of the Houſe of Feria, ſo that there was great intercourſe between the two Houſes, and they always called me Nephew: and afterwards in the year 1562. when we were at Madrid, and there occaſionally diſcourſing of the death of this Don Pedro, we repeated and called to mind many of theſe particulars: which will ſerve to ſhew how improbable it was that this Don Pedro, who lived in all the plenty, eaſe and proſperity that his heart could deſire, ſhould turn Rebel, and engage in the deſperate Cauſe of Hernandez Giron; for he for the moſt of the year lived in the Countrey with his Indians, and half a dozen good fellows with him, being merry without thoughts of State matter, or black deſigns of Rebellion: ſo that his whole deſign of ſending theſe meſſengers was onely to be truly informed of all particulars relating to this Rebellion of Hernandez, how many, and who were the Citizens that were fled, and who were thoſe who remained, and ſided with the factious party. For he and his Companions being reſolved to go to Los Reyes, they thought it neceſſary to inform themſelves of all things at Cozco, ſo as to give a diſtinct account and not in a confuſed blind manner, both on the way and at Los Reyes when they arrived there: and to take off all ſuſpicion from the meſſengers which he ſent to Hernandez, he gave them Letters of credence, that he might permit them to return with the anſwer. Then as to the Road towards Los Reyes, Don Pedro had well ſecured it; for Don Pedro's place of reſidence, was ſeated fifteen leagues on the way from Cozco to Los Reyes, the River Apurimac being between; of which when the Bridge was burnt, it cut off all paſſage from the enemy: and thus Don Pedro and his Companions, having received information of all they deſired, travelled ſecurely to Los Reyes, and laughed at the Rebels.

The Orders given by Hernandez to John Piedrahita, were to conduct the Governour Gil Ramirez de Avalos with ſix Muſquetiers, not by the way of Lima, which is Northward, but by the way of Arequepa, which is to the South; with farther Inſtructions that when he had brought him at the diſtance of forty leagues from the City, that he ſhould then leave him at liberty, and ſuffer him to take his own courſe and way as he pleaſed: but this journey of Piedrahita was not made within the time of the firſt eight or ten days after the Inſurrection, but forty days afterwards. And the cauſe why the Governour was ſent by the way of Arequepa, and not by the direct way, was to prolong his journey to Los Reyes, and make him to miſs the company of thoſe Citizens who were going to Rimac. By all which it appears, that the relations given to Diego Hernandez of theſe matters, were as the vulgar ſort report them to be, who always ſpeak with variety, and as they fanſie and deſire things to be; but what I have here ſaid, I know to be true, both having ſeen them, and heard them from undoubted witneſſes.

CHAP. VI.

Franciſco Hernandez cauſes himſelf to be choſen Captain, and Procurator-General of the whole Empire. The Judges appoint Officers for their Army, and the Marſhal doth the like.

FIfteen days were now paſt ſince the Rebellion firſt began, when Hernandez finding himſelf ſtrengthened with a number of Souldiers, and dreaded by all, for the cruelty he had executed on Don Baltaſar de Caſtilla, he thought it now time to fortifie his authority (as he fooliſhly imagined) with ſome ſpecious name and title, which might ſound great in the ears of the people; who ſeeing him owned by the City which was the Metropolis of the Empire, might be more eaſily induced to follow his cauſe and deſigns, which he knew not himſelf what they were, or what they were likely to prove. To this end he ſummoned a general Aſſembly of the whole City, at which were preſent twenty five Citizens and Lords of Indians, as Diego Hernandez counted them, and I was acquainted with them all; amongſt which there was but one head Conſtable, and two Juſtices, and none of the others had any Office or right to ſit in that Aſſembly. The Court being ſet, he acquainted them, that the reaſon he had to call them together, was to lay before them the frequent Orders and Commands ſent from the Juſtices to the great damage and prejudice of the people, to free them from which, he propoſed to them, as the beſt expedient, to elect him for Procurator-General of the whole Empire, and to authoriſe him in their names humbly to petition and ſupplicate his Majeſty to take off ſuch aggrievances as they ſhould judge moſt oppreſſive; and to enable him farther in this Office, that they would elect him for Captain-General, and chief Juſticiary of that City and of the whole Kingdom, to protect and govern them in War and Peace. All which was granted to him without any ſcruple or demurr; more out of fear (as Children ſay) than ſhame or love, being over-awed by a Band of about an hundred and fifty Souldiers commanded by two Captains, called Diego Gavilan and Nunno Mediola, who were drawn up in the Market-place at the door of the Tholſey, where the Council was aſſembled. So ſoon as the Court was riſen, Proclamation was made of the Power and Authority which was given to Franciſco Hernandez; with which not being fully ſatisfied, he forced the Citizens and Inhabitants to declare themſelves well contented with all his actions, and that what they acted was by their own free will and conſent without any force or compulſion upon them. Whilſt things were thus acting in Cozco, the news and intelligence thereof was carried to Los Reyes, which the Judges would not believe at firſt; conceiving it to be a ſtrategeme of the Meſſenger, who was a great Friend, and as they ſay, Foſter Brother with Franciſco Hernandez Giron, to try how the people would take it, and to ſee how they ſtood affected to his cauſe and intereſt: and upon this belief they apprehended Hernando Chacon, being the perſon who brought the news, which when they found verified and confirmed from other hands and places, they then ſet him again at liberty; and thought it time to provide for War, and to make choice of Officers and Commanders of their Army: We cannot here ſpecifie the names of them particularly, becauſe many of them refuſed the Commands which were offered to them, eſteeming them inferiour to their worth and dignities, who deſerved to be Generals and to command in Chief: wherefore we will paſs over theſe Elections for the preſent, and onely ſay, that all was carried on with heat and faction, as is uſual in tumultuous meetings, where every one commands and rules: by this time alſo news of the Rebellion raiſed by Hernandez was come to Potoſi, where the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado was actually employed in doing juſtice upon Offenders guilty of the Murther of Pedro de Hinojoſa, and Conſpiratours with Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla: but ſo ſoon as this news came, a ſtop was given to farther proſecution of thoſe who deſerved death as well as thoſe againſt whom Sentence was already given: and inſtead of puniſhment, it was thought fit to convert all into clemency and pardon, which tended much to the quiet of the people, people, who were greatly troubled and ſcandalized to ſee ſuch daily effuſions of bloud and ſlaughters amongſt their friends and acquaintance: Hereupon ſuch as were condemned had their reprieves granted, and by way of puniſhment were to ſerve his Majeſty at their own coſt and charges: amongſt theſe was a certain Souldier called ——de Bilbao, whom a friend of his ſeeing at liberty, congratulated with him for the ſafety of his life and freedom, telling him that he was obliged to return thanks to Almighty God for this great deliverance: to which the Souldier made anſwer, and ſaid, that he rendred thanks to his Divine Majeſty, and to St. Peter, and to St. Paul, and to St. Franciſco Hernandez Giron, by whoſe merits and means he had been ſaved, and that he could not doe leſs in acknowledgment thereof than to go and ſerve him, the which he accordingly did, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

Beſides this Souldier above forty more were delivered out of priſon moſt of which would have been ſentenced to dye, and others at leaſt condemned to row in the Gallies, which was the beſt they could expect; but thoſe Citizens and Souldiers who were not ſo deeply concerned as others, the Marſhal was pleaſed to ſet at Liberty without any farther proceſs, but theſe priſoners refuſed to accept thereof, but to be brought to their Tryal, as Palentino ſaith, Chapter the fortieth, in theſe words.

Some of the Priſoners underſtanding that they were to be ſet at liberty without tryal, refuſed to accept thereof without a ſentence in their cauſe, becauſe they became liable thereby to be taken up again and puniſhed when the Judges or their Enemies were deſirous to accuſe them: wherefore, to make diſpatch in this matter, he fined Gomez de Solis in five hundred pieces of Eight, to be paid as Fees to his Keeper and Guards: Martin de Almendras had the like Fine, as alſo Martin de Robles; others were condemned in two hundred, a hundred, fifty and twenty pieces of Eight, proportioning the Fine according to the ability of the perſon, rather than to the degree and quality of his Crime. Thus far Diego Hernandez.

Moreover the Marſhal gave order to provide Arms; and to make Pikes in thoſe Provinces, where wood was plenty, and to make Powder in caſe neceſſity ſhould require. Some few days afterwards came two Commands from the Juſtices, the one ſuſpending the execution of the Decrees formerly made for freeing the Indians from their perſonal ſervices, which was to laſt for the ſpace of two years, and to take off many other things which cauſed great Commotions and Diſturbances amongſt the Inhabitants and Souldiers of that Empire, and had been (as the Governours well knew) the ſpring and original of thoſe rebellions, mutinies and factions which raged in the minds of the people, the other Command was a Commiſſion conſtituting the Marſhal Captain General of the Forces raiſed againſt Franciſco Hernandez, and with an unlimited power to expend his Majeſty's Treaſure in this War, as far as occaſion ſhould require, and to borrow or take up money, in caſe the Exchequer ſhould fail. By virtue hereof the Marſhal appointed Captains both of Horſe and Foot, beſides other Officers whom we ſhall name hereafter. He deſigned to make Gomez de Alvarado his Lieutenant General, but he refuſed it, becauſe another Gentleman who was brother to the Marſhal's Wife, pretended thereunto, called Don Martin de Avendanno, for whom the Wife made great inſtance; and as it were compelled her Husband, much againſt his own inclinations, to confer it upon him; and though he was a young man, and of little or no experience, he condeſcended thereunto rather than to raiſe War in his own Family. He alſo diſpatched Warrants and Orders to the Curacas to gather what proviſions they were able, and to appoint eight or nine thouſand Indians to carry the baggage of the Army. He ſent alſo into ſeveral parts to raiſe Men, Horſe and Arms, and to take up all the Slaves they could find. And here we will leave them in theſe Preparations to ſee what becomes of Franciſco Hernandez, and what he is acting, and carry on the buſineſs of both Parties, as the method of Hiſtory requires. Whilſt theſe things were in agitation in the City of Los Reyes and Potocſi, Hernandez was not negligent of what concerned his intereſt, but ordered Thomas Vazquez with a ſquadron of about fifty Souldiers well armed to march to the City of Arequepa, and in his name to take the poſſeſſion thereof, and to treat peaceably with the Citizens, letting them know, that the Corporation of Cozco had made choice of him to be Captain General and chief Juſticiary of all the Kingdom. In like manner he ſent Franciſco Nunnez, a Citizen of Cozco, to Huamanca, whom he had enticed by fair and flattering promiſes and with the Command of a Troop of Horſe, to be of his Party; though in truth fear, rather than all his favours, induced him thereunto; and with him John Gavilan was ſent with fourty other Souldiers, whoſe Orders and Inſtructions were the ſame with thoſe of Thomas Vazquez; and that moreover, they ſhould tell the City, that though they had aſſured him already by their Ambaſſadours, that they would join and correſpond with him in all his deſigns, yet for farther confirmation thereof, he required them to call a Court, to ratify their former engagement, and to own and acknowledge him in that Sphere and Station wherein he acted. The truth is, Hernandez ſent and employed theſe two Captains out of a deſign to give reputation to his cauſe by the ſpecious colour of union between him and two Cities, rather than from any expectation he had of bringing them over to his ſide and party; for he was not ignorant that they had already retracted their former aſſurances, and repented of the Offers they formerly made him. Beſides the Commiſſions and Inſtructions given to theſe Captains, he delivered letters to them for particular perſons, who were men of power and intereſt in their Countrey, alſo Letters from himſelf, and from the City of Cozco to the Corporations of thoſe Cities, deſiring them to join with them in this cauſe, which was for the common good and welfare of the whole Empire: He alſo cauſed the City of Cozco to write unto the City of Plate in the ſame manner, and to the ſame effect, as to the other Cities: and Hernandez himſelf wrote Letters to many Planters in the Charcas, and to the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado and to his Wife Donna Anna de Velaſco, the ſubſtance and Contents of which was ſo ridiculous, as ſerved onely for ſport, and laughter; and were not thought worthy of an Anſwer. He that hath the Curioſity to reade them, may find them in the Hiſtory of Diego de Hernandez, Chap. 27.

CHAP. VII.

The Juſtices nominate Officers for the War. The ſeveral Pretenders to the Command of Captain General. Franciſco Hernandez leaves Cozco, and marches againſt the Juſtices.

NEWS coming to Los Reyes, that Franciſco Hernandez increaſed daily in men, reputation and authority, the Juſtices thought it time to appoint their Captains and Officers for the War. Paulo de Meneſes was named for Lieutenant General, and Don Antonio de Ribera, Diego de Mora, Melchior Verdugo, a Knight of the habit of St. James, and Don Pedro de Cabrera were made Captains of Horſe; but the two laſt refuſed this Preferment, as too mean for men who had ſo good an opinion of themſelves, as to believe they deſerved to be made Generals of Armies greater than this. The Captains of Foot were Rodrigo Ninno, once condemned to the Gallies; Lewis de Avalos, Diego Lopez de Cenniga, Lope Martin Luſitano, Antonio de Luxan, and Baltazar Velaſquez, who in the laſt rebellion of Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, eſcaped from the Juſtice of the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado; as hath been already mentioned. Lope de Guaço was made Standard-bearer General; and the Command of Horſe refuſed by Melchior Verdugo was beſtowed upon Pedro de Carate; And Alonſo de Carate, a Citizen of Arequepa, was alſo made Captain of Horſe. Franciſco de Pinna was made Serjeant Major, and Nicholas de Ribera Junior, was made Captain of the Guards to the Juſtices, with Title of Captain of the Guard to the Royal Seal, which was, as Palentino ſaith, to diſguiſe the Preſumption of raiſing a Guard for themſelves. But when they came to make choice of a Captain General, a great Tumult and Sedition aroſe by three Pretenders, who were all men of Eſtates and Intereſt, and each abetted by a conſiderable Party. The Perſons in nomination were, Santillan, one of his Majeſty's Juſtices, who had the beſt reputation of them all, and was allyed to many of the Nobility who had gained the Empire, and who appeared in favour of

of his Election. The ſecond who pretended thereunto was the Arch-biſhop of Los Reyes called Don Geronimo de Loayſa: but what reaſon ſhould incite this religious Perſon, who was of the Order of Preachers and Archbiſhop in the Church of God, to be General of an Army againſt Chriſtians is not known; though Souldiers took the Boldneſs to aſſign the cauſe thereof to Ambition and Vanity of a Prelate, whoſe duty it was to remain in his Church, praying for the Peace of thoſe Chriſtians, and for the Converſion of Infidels, by preaching the Goſpel, rather than to appear a Fomenter of the civil War. The third Pretender was Dr. Saravia, one of his Majeſty's Juſtices of the ſame Tribunal; who, though he was ſufficiently aſſured, that he was never likely to carry his pretenſion, yet out of oppoſition to Santillan, and from a ſpirit of Emulation, he was reſolved to appear againſt him, and finding his Party too weak then to join them with that of the Archbiſhop's. In this ſuſpenſe matters remained for ſeveral days, without any determination: untill atlength the Electors finding that time was loſt in theſe quarrels, to the hindrance of affairs and to the weakning of the authority of the Army, they agreed as the beſt expedient to gratifie both parties, to make choice of two Generals; namely, Santillan, and the Archbiſhop of Los Reyes, ſuppoſing thereby to have ſatisfied the deſires of Doctour Saravia and his Party. Whilſt theſe things were in agitation News was brought to the Juſtices and Letters from the Citizens of Cozco, giving an account of the numbers and qualities of the perſons who were gone from thence to ſerve his Majeſty. But ſuch was the jealouſie and ſuſpicion which the Juſtices entertained of every perſon and action in that rebellion, that they even miſtruſted each other and much more the advices and Intelligence which came from the quarters of the rebellious party: wherefore they ſent them word not to advance nearer to Los Reyes untill farther order. But no ſooner had they diſpatched away the Meſſenger with this Command, than they diſcovered their own Errour, and began to conſider how prejudicial it might prove to the ſervice of his Majeſty to reject and refuſe admiſſion to ſuch principal perſons who were coming to their Party, and had choſen to abandon their Houſes, Wives and Children, rather than to remain in the power and at the diſpoſal of the Rebels: wherefore they inſtantly diſpeeded away another Meſſenger, with a kind invitation to them, ſignifying in the moſt obliging terms how acceptable their coming would be to the City; and encharged the meſſenger to make ſuch ſpeed, as to overtake the former, and require of him his diſpatches which he was to ſtifle, that nothing of the Contents thereof might be known; which being performed accordingly, the Citizens of Cozco arrived at Los Reyes where they were received with all the kindneſs and reſpect imaginable.

The Election of Captains and Generals being at length made and agreed, Orders were ſent by the Judges to all the Cities of the Empire, giving them to underſtand that Hernandez Giron was in actual rebellion, to ſuppreſs which it was their duty to arme themſelves, and appear for ſervice of his Majeſty: And a Liſt was ſent of the Names of all the Captains who were to command Horſe and Foot in the ſeveral Plantations. Moreover Proclamation was every where made of General Pardon to all thoſe who had been engaged in the late Wars with Gonçalo Piçarro or Don Sebaſtian de Caſtilla, provided that within ſuch a time, they came in for Service of his Majeſty. For it was well known, that many of thoſe people had concealed themſelves amongſt the Indians, not daring to ſhew themſelves in the Spaniſh Plantations. It was farther thought neceſſary to ſecure the Seas, for which Service Lope Martin was appointed to embark on a Galeon, then in Port with fourty Souldiers, and to fit and equippe what other Ships he could provide; Lope Martin accordingly acted, but his Command laſted not above eight days, for he was too paſſionate and cholerick for ſuch a charge, which required a perſon of a more phlegmatick conſtitution and better temper. Wherefore Geronimo de Silva was put into his place, which he executed like a Gentleman and a Souldier well experienced in affairs both by Sea and Land; and Lope Martin returned to his command of a Foot-company, where we will leave him, to declare the things were acting by Hernandez Giron.

Who now perceiving himſelf ſtrong in men, and in the increaſe of his forces to the number of four hundred, who were come to him, from divers parts, beſides thoſe he had ſent to Huamaca and Arequepa he reſolved to march towards the City of Los Reyes, to fight the Army of the Juſtices, as he called it: meaning that his Army was the Royal Army, and raiſed for ſervice of his Majeſty.

And

And though he had above four hundred men with him, well clothed, armed and mounted; yet it troubled him to obſerve, that he was not backed and ſeconded by the concurrence and authority of the ſeveral Cities, Towns and Villages, for whoſe intereſt, ſafety and honour, he pretended to have raiſed that War: But before he reſolved on his march to Los Reyes, he was conſidering with himſelf, whether it were not better to proceed firſt againſt the Marſhal, whoſe party he looked upon to be weakeſt and ill affected to him, by reaſon of the great rigour, cruelty and ſeverity he had lately exerciſed; to the great ſcandal and diſpleaſure of all ſides and parties, whom he had in ſome way or other diſobliged by the death of their friends, kindred or relations. Upon which ground many perſons, skilfull both in the affairs of War, and the circumſtances of thoſe times, were of opinion, that in caſe Hernandez had in the firſt place attached the Marſhal, it had ſucceeded better for him, in regard the beſt Governour in the World cannot rely on a diſcontented people the which Palentino confirms, Chap. 60. in theſe words.

It was the misfortune of Hernandez, that he did not proceed firſt to Potoſi rather than to Lima; for certainly, had he bent his courſe againſt the Marſhal, he had in all probability ſubjected thoſe Provinces, and conſerved his men, who would never have gon over to one ſo generally hated and abhorred by them, as was the Marſhal; though they did revolt afterwards when they came to Lima. Nor was it believed, that the Marſhal's men would have reſiſted or fought, nor indeed were they provided for it, becauſe the Marſhal had ſo many Enemies about him, that all preparations for War moved ſlowly. Thus far this Authour.

But God, who governs all things, would not permit Hernandez to take that courſe, which was beſt for him, for then the evils and miſeries he would have brought upon the people had been irreparable: but being infatuated he reſolved on a March to Lima, as Hiſtory relates, leaving Alvarado the Lawyer his Lieutenant General in the City, and to bring up the remainder of the forces, becauſe they could not all go out together: but before Hernandez left Cozco, he very generouſly declared, that he was willing to diſmiſs or diſcharge any perſon who was deſirous to remain behind, and rather ſtay at home, than adventure on that enterpriſe: the which offer he made upon conſideration that preſſed or forced men could never be good and faſt friends, or ſuch as he could rely upon in times of neceſſity; eſpecially if ſuch were Citizens and men of Eſtates, who would draw many after them in caſe of revolt. Onely he importuned and almoſt forced Diego de Silva to accompany the Army, preſuming that his preſence carried authority, and would much animate and confirm the Souldiery. Diego de Sylva complied accordingly, rather out of fear than Love, as appears in that the firſt opportunity he forſook his Party, and fled to the enemy, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. So that now Hernandez had procured ſix friends, who accompanied him out of Cozco, three of which were Thomas Vazquez, John de Piedrahita and Alonſo Diaz, who were all engaged with him in the night of the rebellion; but the other three, who were Franciſco Nunnez, Rodrigo de Pineda, and Diego de Silva he obliged, and engaged to him afterwards by fair words and promiſes, and by preferments and offices, the firſt to be Captain of Horſe, and the ſecond of Foot. Eight days after Hernandez was marched out of Cozco, he was followed by his Lieutenant General with 200 Souldiers more; amongſt which were 20 conducted thither ſome few days before, by Franciſco de Hinojoſa, who brought them from Contiſuyo: for the truth is, all thoſe who went under the name of Souldiers, followed the Party of Hernandez Giron, whom they eſteemed their Protectour againſt the rigorous Decrees and Edicts of the Juſtices, which were daily promulged, and publiſhed to the damage and prejudice of the Souldiery. Beſides this Hinojoſa, came another Souldier from the parts of Arequepa, called John de Vera de Mendoça, who had been formerly of the King's party; he was young, and a Gentleman, and very ambitious of the honour to be a Captain; which being refuſed to him by the King's Miniſters becauſe of his youth; he came over to Hernandez Giron with a companion of his called Mateo Sanchez, whom he named his Enſign, and both arrived at Cozco ſome few days before the departure of Hernandez from thence; and to obtain this preferment for himſelf and his Comrade by the grace and favour of the General, they came together into the Town, Mateo Sanchez carrying a Towel on a Staff, in reſemblance of his Colours, which he as Enſign was to carry. But what was the Event of theſe matters we ſhall ſee in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

John de Vera de Mendoça revolts from Franciſco Hernandez. The People of Cozco go to ſeek out for the Marſhal. Sancho Duarte raiſes Men, and calls himſelf General of them. He is reproved by the Marſhal. Franciſco Hernandez comes to Huamanca. The Scouts of the two Camps meet.

Alvarado the Lieutenant overtook his General about eight leagues from the City of Cozco, where he ſtayed untill he came up to him; and then they all in a Body paſſed the River Apurimac, and before night marched two leagues beyond it: but were four days in paſſing the Bridge with their Men, Horſes, Ammunition and Proviſions. During which time John de Vera de Mendoça conſidering that he had been already fifteen days in the Army, and no preferment given him, nor confirmation of the title of Captain, which he ſo paſſionately deſired, he reſolved to leave Hernandez and return to the King's party, which appeared more like a Farſe in a Comedy than the action of a Souldiery, and for ſuch we have inſerted it in this place. John de Vera agreed upon this deſign with four other young Souldiers like himſelf, who with his Enſign made ſix in all; and they that night paſſed the Bridge and afterwards burnt it, to prevent any purſuit which might be made after them. And entring into Cozco the night following, they ſounded an alarm, which put all the City into a conſternation and tumult, fearing leſt the Rebels were returned with intention to doe them farther miſchief, ſo that none durſt ſtir abroad, or put his head out of doors that night. But ſo ſoon as it was day, being better informed, that it was onely Captain John de Vera and his Followers, who ſtill carried his Colours flying, the Citizens went out to him, and agreed to go with him to find out the Marſhal, who they knew, and were well aſſured, was fortified with a ſtrong Army: John de Saavedra a principal Citizen was made their Chief; and John de Vera de Mendoça would not be put by his Captain-ſhip, nor march under any Banner but his own, and though he came to the place where the Marſhal was, he had neither the fortune to better his Colours nor advance his Title, but paſſed for a Boy more forward and confident than diſcreet. Thoſe at Cozco, who met and agreed upon this deſign, were about forty in number, fifteen of which were Citizens who had command over Indians, the reſt were Merchants and Officers whom the Rebels had left behind as uſeleſs perſons: and theſe, ſuch as they were, travelled towards Collao, where the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado kept his head Quarters: who having underſtood that many of the Citizens of Cozco were coming in ſearch of him, he ſent them Advice and Orders by no means to paſs out of the limits of his Juriſdiction, but rather to expect him there, for that he was moving on the way to meet them.

Sancho Duarte, who was then Governour of the City of Peace, raiſed Souldiers for the Service of his Majeſty, and ſetting up his Standard, marched towards Cozco with above two hundred men divided into two Companies, one of Foot commanded by Captain Martin de Olmos, and the other of Horſe of which he called himſelf Commander with title of General. Being come to the Bridge where the River empties it ſelf, he ſtaid there ſome few days, and having there received intelligence that Franciſco Hernandez was departed from Cozco, and was on his march towards Los Reyes, he continued his way towards Cozco in purſuit of Franciſco Hernandez; for he, as the humour was at that time, deſiring to command and not to be commanded, avoided joyning with the Marſhal, that he might not be his Souldier, or fall under his Banner: which when the Marſhal underſtood, he ſent him two Commands: the firſt was a Letter requiring him to return within the limits of his Juriſdiction, and to expect his coming thither: for that it was not to the ſervice of his Majeſty to have ſo many ſmall Armies disjoined from each other: with this Letter he gave another more poſitive Command to the Meſſenger in a different ſtyle, ſubſcribed Captain-General, directing more magiſterially, that in caſe Sancho Duarte ſhould not comply with every point commanded in the Letter, that he ſhould certifie the ſame back to him: but Sancho Duarte upon theſe ſummons became very tractable, and returned again within the limits preſcribed him, though before ſuch ſummons he ſeemed to ſet up for himſelf, and in an arbitrary manner to follow his own humour and pretenſions.

And here we ſhall leave him and ſee what Hernandez Giron is doing whom we lately left in Apurimac: Giron, proceeding on his way, underſtood in Athaurylla that all the Souldiers and Citizens of Huamanca had declared themſelves for the King's party, and that John Alonſo de Badajoz, who had called himſelf Lieutenant-General of thoſe Companies, was joyned with thoſe few Souldiers which Franciſco Nunnez had raiſed in Cozco, and were gone together unto Huamanca: which Hernandez much reſented, and complained thereof to his Friends, wondring that the Cities who at firſt had owned his cauſe and approved his proceedings, ſhould with ſo much facility abandon him and diſown his actions. Howſoever he proceeded on his march to the River Villca, where his Scouts diſcovered ſeveral of his Majeſty's Army: for that the Juſtices being informed that Hernandez was marching againſt them, gave orders to Captain Lope Martin to advance with a party of thirty Souldiers to inform them of the enemy, and of the place where they were quartered, and with all ſpeed to return with the advice; accordingly Lope Martin proceeded, and having diſcovered the enemy, gave an account of their condition and place where they lodged. But Franciſco Hernandez proceeded on his march to the City of Huamanca, where he ſtaid in expectation of Thomas Vazquez; for when he ſent him to Arequepa, he told him, that he would not paſs that City untill his return. Vazquez, having made but one days ſtay at Arequepa, marched thence by way of the coaſt, untill he overtook Franciſco Hernandez; for he found that he had little to doe there; for though that City, upon falſe reports and miſrepreſentation of things, had underſtood, that the City of Cozco had unanimouſly concurred to chuſe Hernandez for their Procurator-General, to repreſent the caſe and ſtate of their aggrievances to his Majeſty, and to lay them before the Lords Juſtices, they then ſent their Ambaſſadour to Cozco (as we have ſaid) to ſignifie their concurrence with them: but when they rightly underſtood, that all this Inſurrection was nothing but the Rebellion of a few deſperate men, they then were aſhamed of their meſſage; and the whole City declared themſelves reſolved to ſpend their lives and fortunes in the ſervice of his Majeſty, ſo that Thomas Vazquez, finding none with whom to treat, returned without effecting any buſineſs; but that it might not be ſaid but he had done ſomething, he killed Martin de Lezcano upon the way, who had been his great Friend and old Comrade, to be before-hand with him, and to prevent his killing him; for he ſuſpected that he had a deſign to declare for his Majeſty. He alſo hanged up another Souldier of good eſteem and note, called Alonſo de Mur, becauſe he fanſied that he had a mind to eſcape, having received both Horſe, and Arms, and Money from Hernandez: when Hernandez heard that Vazquez was near the City, he went forth to meet him with his own Equipage and Retinue, and they entred both together without much order or ceremony; which was ſo contrived not to ſhew the ſmall numbers which Vazquez brought with him. Captain Franciſco Nunnez, who came out of Cozco with forty Souldiers, with deſign to take poſſeſſion of Huamanca, and to perform all other things which he was commanded to doe, found matters there in the ſame poſture that Vazquez had done at Arequepa; that is, that all the Inhabitants were fled and gone to the ſervice of his Majeſty; onely John Alonſo de Badajoz, and Sancho de Tudela, an old fellow of eighty ſix years of age remained behind, who followed the fortune of Hernandez untill the end of his Tyranny and Rebellion, and then he was killed amongſt the reſt.

With theſe two and ſome few Souldiers more Franciſco Nunnez went forth to receive their General, whom they found much out of humour to find thoſe who at the firſt ſeemed to abett his cauſe and his intereſt, now to deny and revolt from him: but to comfort and cheer him up a little, two Souldiers of good eſteem and note, belonging to Lope Martin, revolted to him, one of which was afterwards made Enſign-bearer to his Lieutenant-General the Lawyer Alvarado; by whom he was fully informed of the ſtate of the Camp which appeared for his Majeſty. After which he marched out of Huamanca with above ſeven hundred Souldiers, towards the Valley of Sauſa, from whence he ſent two Captains with their Squadrons drons into divers parts; one of which was John de Piedrahita with ſixty Souldiers; and the other was Salvador de Loçana with forty others. From his Majeſty's Camp Geronimo de Coſtilla, a Citizen of Cozco, was ordered with twenty five Souldiers to ſcour the Countrey, and diſcover the enemies quarters; It was his fortune to take that way by which John de Piedrahita was coming; but having intelligence that he was not above four leagues diſtant, and that he was ſixty men ſtrong, he made his retreat, not being able to engage with ſo great a number. But on the other ſide Piedrahita having advice from the Indians (who as we have ſaid are Spies for both parties) that Geronimo Coſtilla was not far from him, he marched in the night towards him, and by break of day beat up his Quarters, where, ſurpriſing him unawares, he routed him, and took three priſoners, and therewith returned to the Army.

CHAP. IX.

Three of the King's Captains take a Captain and forty Souldiers belonging to the Rebels: they deliver them up to one of the Juſtices. Franciſco Hernandez finding many of his Souldiers to revolt from him, reſolves to engage the Royal Army.

ACcording to the ſucceſſes of War, which are always various and doubtfull, it was the fortune of Geronimo de Coſtilla in his retreat to meet with Geronimo de Silva, whom the Juſtices had ſent after him with ſome recruits; and being fearfull that Hernandez was drawing towards them with his whole Army, they both judged fit to retreat, and in the way it was their chance to take an Indian who was a domeſtick Servant to Captain Salvador de Loçana; to whom they put divers queſtions, and forced him to confeſs in what place his Maſter was, and what number of people he had with him: of which they ſent advice to the Judges, and deſired a ſufficient recruit of Men to ſurpriſe and take them. The Juſtices immediately upon this notice diſpatched away Lope Martin with ſixty men more for their aſſiſtence, who joyning with Geronimo de Coſtilla, and Geronimo de Silva, ſo well managed their buſineſs, that though the enemy were good Souldiers, and well armed with Fire-locks, and had poſted themſelves in a faſt place, yet upon promiſe of pardon for all their paſt offences to his Majeſty they ſubmitted and ſurrendred themſelves, and came quietly out of their Fort, ſuffering themſelves all to be taken, except one man, who made his eſcape to carry the news thereof to Franciſco Hernandez, who was greatly troubled thereat, becauſe he confided much in Loçana and his Souldiers, who were the beſt and choiceſt men that he had in all his Army. The priſoners being carried to the King's Camp, the Juſtices would have hanged them all, but that the Souldiers began to mutiny, proteſting that they would never more make excurſions into the Countrey, nor act farther againſt the enemy, in caſe theſe men were executed; for that might provoke the contrary party to return them the like, and oblige the Souldiery to act on both ſides in a deſperate manner: the Captains alſo took up the matter in favour of their Souldiers, and petitioned the Court of Juſtice to moderate the Sentence: who thereupon to put them out of ſight and view of the Army, ſent Loçana and his Souldiers to Altamirano his Majeſty's Judge Advocate at Sea, to diſpoſe of them as he thought fit; who by virtue of that Warrant hanged up Loçana and other two of the moſt culpable amongſt them, and baniſhed all the reſt out of the Kingdom.

Though this loſs of Captain Loçana and his Souldiers very much troubled and afflicted Hernandez, yet, not to ſhew himſelf diſmayed, he proceeded forward with his Army, depending much upon the plots and ſtrategems of War which he had contrived: and being come to the Valley of Pachacamac four leagues diſtant from the City of Los Reyes, he called a Council of War to reſolve on matters which were to be acted: and there it was reſolved, that by night they ſhould ſurprife that part of the Army which was encamped without the City; and that they ſhould drive before them the Cows which were in that Valley with lighted Matches faſtned to their Horns, and guided by many Indians, and Negroes, and Muſquetiers, who were to turn and force them directly upon the enemy: the which action was agreed to be put in execution four nights afterwards.

Diego de Silva, a Citizen of Cozco, was preſent at this Conſultation, with whom (as is ſaid before) Hernandez had prevailed to countenance and encourage his Souldiers with his preſence; and to ſhew the eſteem he had of him, he always called him to be aſſiſtent at every Conſultation: during which time the Scouts from each party viewed and ſurveyed each others Forces, and carried the intelligence. The Juſtices and their two Generals prepared and put themſelves into a poſture of defence, to obviate any ill accident which might poſſibly happen: the Captains alſo did the like, exerciſing their Souldiers every day with Skirmiſhes between themſelves, and ſhooting at marks, and for better encouragement gave Jewels and Rewards to the moſt dexterous Marks-men. In this Camp were numbred above 1300 Souldiers, 300 of which were Horſe, 600 Muſquetiers, and about 450 Pikemen.

And here it is to be obſerved, that ſo ſoon as the Juſtices had received news of the removal of Franciſco Hernandez from Huamanca, and that he was on his march to meet and fight them; That the better to ſecure themſelves of the good will and affections of the people, and loyalty of the Souldiers of the Countrey, they reſolved to ſuſpend the execution of the late Decrees which were publiſhed, and by Proclamation to declare, that thoſe Edicts which exempted the Indians from their perſonal ſervices to the Spaniards, and which enjoined and forbad Spaniards to make uſe of Indian Women or Men in their Travels were all aboliſhed and made void for certain years: and in the mean time they generally agreed to make choice of two Procurators, who were to be ſent into Spain, and there, in the name of the whole Empire, to lay before his Majeſty the hardſhips and aggrievances which were impoſed on them, and with all humility to ſupplicate a redreſs, in ſuch manner as his Majeſty ſhould in his wiſedom judge moſt fit and requiſite to be granted. The perſons nominated and elected for this ſervice, were Don Lewis de Cabrera a Citizen of Cozco, who by reaſon of his great Belly (as we have intimated before) was unwieldy and unable for action in the War; and the other was Antonio de Ribera a Citizen of Rimac, both which prepared for their Voyage into Spain, where Don Antonio de Ribera arrived in ſafety, but Pedro de Cabrera made a ſtop by the way and came not thither.

Two days after Hernandez was entred into the Valley of Pachacamac, a party of his Souldiers ſallied out to skirmiſh with the enemy; who being engaged together, were aſſiſted by others who came in to their aid, and the numbers of each ſide increaſed, both of them being deſirous to make trial of their skill and valour: amongſt the reſt Diego de Silva, to ſhew his forwardneſs and zeal for Hernandez, was one who appeared in the firſt Rank, but finding his opportunity, he revolted over to his Majeſty's Camp, carrying with him four other Souldiers of good reputation, one of which was called —— Gamboa, and was Enſign to Captain Nunno Mendiola, to whom by this flight he cauſed great miſchief, as we ſhall ſee hereafter; and theſe were followed that day by divers others, which put an end to that skirmiſh. The like was acted by others the day following, and all the time he ſtaid in Pachacamac his men deſerted him in twenty and thirty in a company who revolted over to the King's party: which when Hernandez obſerved, and that no remedy could be contrived to prevent it, he reſolved to retreat back to Cozco before he was abandoned by all his Souldiers; ſo now the ſtrategeme of the Cows was laid aſide, in regard that Diego de Silva had diſcovered it, and that the Juſtices, as might be preſumed, had provided to countermine and prevent that deſign. In purſuance of this reſolution, Hernandez, to prove and try the inclinations of his Souldiers, told them plainly, that he gave free liberty and licenſe to any perſon whatſoever, who was not ſatisfied with his cauſe, to paſs over to the contrary party: but none took advantage of this permiſſion, unleſs ſome few mean and unſerviceable ſort of people, whom the Lieutenant-General Alvarado ſtript of their Clothes, and deveſted of their Arms and Horſes before they departed. And ſo Hernandez retreated out of Pachacamac in the beſt order he was able, being moved thereunto more out of an apprehenſion he had that his people would deſert him, than any fear he conceived of danger from the enemy: for it was evident that ſuch was the confuſion of Counſels in the Camp of the Juſtices by reaſon of many Rulers that nothing was determined and concluded in its due time and ſeaſon. As will appear by what follows.

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

Franciſco Hernandez retires with his Army. In his Majeſty's Camp is great Confuſion by diverſity of opinions. A mutiny is raiſed in the City of Piura; and how it was pacified.

Franciſco Hernandez according to his former reſolution withdrew his Forces from Pachacamac in ſuch haſte that the Souldiers left behind them all things which were uſeleſs and cumberſome to them, which were all taken away by the King's Party, who upon retreat of the Enemy, without order from their Commanders, plundered every thing that remained: Upon this alteration of affairs, the Juſtices entered into conſultation with the Field Officers; and ſummoned unto the Council of War, beſides the Captains, ſeveral Planters, who were men of Eſtates in the Kingdom, and were well experienced in the Affairs of that Countrey: but in ſuch variety of opinions, there was great confuſion, every one perſiſting in his own perſuaſion, preſſed eagerly that his Counſel might be taken. Atlength after long debates, it was concluded that Paulo de Meneſes, with ſix hundred ſelect men, ſhould purſue after Hernandez: the next day the detachment being made, the two Generals contradicted the reſolution concluded at the Council of War, and ordered that no more than a hundred men ſhould be drawn out, for that it would be too great a weakning to the Camp to be deveſted of the greateſt number of the choiceſt men. Howſoever the Juſtices remained conſtant to their firſt Reſolves, and again commanded that the detachment ſhould be made of the ſix hundred men; which was again contradicted by the two Generals, who were of opinion that a hundred men were ſufficient to keep the Enemy in Alarms, and to receive ſuch as were deſirous to revolt. Between theſe contradictory Orders Paulo de Meneſes was greatly confuſed, and much more troubled, becauſe he was not permitted to take with him thoſe Comrades and Friends of his in whom he moſt confided to ſtand by him, and who were deſirous to keep him company. And here we will leave them to declare thoſe matters, which paſſed at the ſame time in the City of St. Michael de Piura.

The Juſtices, as we mentioned before, had ſent advices to all the Governours of the Kingdom concerning the rebellion of Hernandez, and iſſued out their Orders and Warrants to raiſe and arm Souldiers to reſiſt and deſtroy the Rebels. The Governour of Piura, called John Delgadillo, gave his Commiſſion to Franciſco de Silva, a Souldier of good fame and reputation, who lived in that City, with Inſtructions to leavy Souldiers in Tumpiz, and along the coaſt, and to bring with him as many as he could raiſe. Franciſco de Silva went accordingly and returned to Piura with a party of about twenty ſix or twenty ſeven Souldiers, who having remained there about twelve or thirteen days without any care taken to provide them with Victuals, or Lodging, and being poor men, and not able to maintain themſelves, they came to the Governour with their Captain Franciſco de Silva and deſired his Licence to goe to the City of Los Reyes to ſerve his Majeſty. The Governour being preſſed by the Intreaties and Importunities of all the Citizens aſſented thereunto; but the next day, the Souldiers being drawn out, and ready to march, the Governour, without any reaſon for it, revoked his Licence, and gave a poſitive Command, that every one ſhould repair to his quarters, and neither go out from thence, nor out of the City without farther order. Franciſco Hernandez and his companions, finding that no entreaties could prevail on the Governour, they reſolved to kill him, and plunder the City, and then depart and offer their ſervice to Hernandez Giron, ſince they were denyed leave to ſerve his Majeſty. The matter was ſoon agreed, and about twelve or thirteen of them well armed went into the Governour's houſe, and took him, and killed a Juſtice of Peace of the lower rank, and made ſeizure of Guns, Head-pieces, Swords, Bucklers, Lances, Halbards, with a great proviſion of Powder; and then carrying forth the Royal Standard they proclaimed upon pain of death, that every man ſhould repair thereunto; then they broke open the royal Treaſury, and carried all the money from thence; the like they did to particular mens houſes, which they ſacked and plundered, not leaving any thing of value therein. And it happening, that a certain Souldier came at that time from Rimac, being baniſhed thence, they cauſed him to report, that Hernandez was marching with a very ſtrong Army to Los Reyes, and that all the Kingdom had declared for him, and that the Juſtice Santillan himſelf, with many of his Friends and Relations were paſſed over to that party; beſides a multitude of other Lyes which they cauſed him to report, which ſerved theſe poor Raſcals for the preſent, and puffed them up as full of vanity as if they had been truths, and made them to conſider themſelves no leſs than as Lords and Maſters of all Peru, and when this Souldier declared his intention to follow Hernandez, they all became of the ſame mind, and preſently proceeded to join with him.

The Governour they carried with them in Chains, and eight or nine Citizens and men of Eſtates beſides, with Collars of Iron about their Necks, after the manner of Gally-ſlaves. In this manner they travelled above fifty Leagues with all the boldneſs and inſolence imaginable, untill they came to Caſſamarca; where they met with two Spaniards who lived by their labour and honeſt dealings, and from them they received true information of the ſtate and condition of Hernandez Giron, and how he fled, and was purſued by the Juſtices; and that it was credibly believed that at that very time he was defeated and killed. With this News Franciſco de Silva and his Companions were extremely daſhed and confounded, and began to bewail their follies; and, to ſave themſelves, they deſigned to ſurprize ſome Ship, if it were poſſible, to make their eſcape. The Governour and his Companions were now freed of their Chains and ſet at Liberty, but extremely incommoded. And the Rebels, being about fifty in number, divided themſelves into little parties of about three or four in company to paſs more freely without any notice taken of them.

The Governour finding himſelf at Liberty, ſummoned people in the King's name and took ſome of them, whom he hanged and quartered. And the Juſtices being informed of the Outrages committed by theſe Villains, ſent a Judge called Bernardino Romani with Commiſſion to puniſh the Offenders; who in purſuance thereof took and hanged almoſt all of them, and the remainder he ſent to the Gallies, but Franciſco de Silva and his Companions, eſcaped to Truxillo, where they entred into the Convent of St. Francis, and there diſguiſing themſelves in that habit, they travailed to the Sea-coaſt, where they embarked on a Ship which tranſported them out of the Empire, and ſo ſaved their lives.

In thoſe days came ſad and lamentable News from the Kingdom of Chile brought by a Citizen of St. Jago called Gaſpar Otenſe, giving an account, how that the Araucan Indians of that Kingdom had made an Inſurrection, and had killed the Governour Pedro de Valdivia and his People, of which we have rendred a large relation in the ſeventh Book of the firſt part of theſe Commentaries. This diſturbance amongſt the Indians was of great conſequence to all Peru: for it began towards the end of the year 1553, and hath continued to the end of this, being 1611, in which we are now writing theſe matters, and yet the War is not at an end; but the Indians are more proud, and ſtand more on their terms, than at firſt, being encouraged by the many Victories they obtained, and the Cities they deſtroyed; God in his Mercy put a good end hereunto, as is moſt for his Glory. Perhaps in the following Book, we may touch upon ſome later actions of the Araucans.

CHAP. XI.

Of ſome unhappy Misfortunes which befell both Armies. The death of Nunno Mendiola, a Captain belonging to Franciſco Hernandez, and alſo of Lope Martin, a Captain in his Majeſty's Army.

BUT to return to the Affairs of Peru; We ſay, that Hernandez Giron being departed from Pachacamac, marched with great care and vigilance, keeping his baggage cloſe to him, and always ready, and in a poſture to repulſe the Enemy, in caſe caſe they ſhould purſue, and fall on him in the rere: but after he had marched 3 or 4 days, and found that no purſuit was made after him; and had underſtood by his Spyes; that the Councils held in the Enemies Camp were various, and commonly contradictory, and that what the Juſtices ordered, was again countermanded by the Generals; he took courage and marched more leiſurely and with more eaſe and ſecurity than before. Howſoever things paſſed not ſo ſmooth and fair neither between him and his moſt intimate friends, but that many quarrels and diſputes aroſe amongſt them, for being come to the valley called Huarcu, he hanged up two of his principal Souldiers, upon a bare ſuſpicion, that they intended to revolt; for amongſt them a jealouſie onely was ſufficient to take away the life of any man whatſoever; though he were the greateſt Confident, and the moſt zealous for their cauſe. Hernandez proceeding forward came to the valley of Chincha, which was a Countrey abounding and plentifull of all proviſions; for which reaſon Captain Nunno Mendiola adviſed Hernandez to remain there for three or four days for refreſhment of his Souldiers and making Proviſions which were neceſſary for their farther march; but Hernandez would not admit of this Counſel; and looking at the ſame time on Mendiola he fanſied, that his countenance changed at the refuſal, and that he ſeemed diſcontented; which opinion others nouriſhing in him, endeavoured to increaſe and improve, and told him plainly that Mendiola was reſolved to paſs over to the King's party, which belief Hernandez eaſily admitted, when he called to mind that Gamboa who was his Enſign was already revolted with Diego de Silva, and thence he certainly concluded that it was with deſign to make way for his Captain, and to treat and ſecure conditions for him againſt the time that he ſhould find opportunity to eſcape; upon which ſuſpicion onely he ordered his Lieutenant General to take away his Horſe and Arms, and to diſcharge him the Army; which was accordingly executed; and not onely ſo, but with them alſo he was deprived of his life. And thus poor Captain Nunno Mendiola ended his days, which was a due reward of his demerit, having been one of the Conſpiratours engaged in this rebellion. Notwithſtanding which ſeveral Souldiers ſtill continued to revolt, and came in to Paulo de Meneſes, giving him advice, that Franciſco Hernandez was in great diſorder by reaſon that he was deſerted by many of his Souldiers, ſo that he had ſcarce 300 men with him, though in reality they were above 500. Paulo de Meneſes being encouraged with this News, entered into conſultation with his friends of the manner how he might beat up the Enemies quarters in the night; which being agreed, and the Souldiers on the march, they called to mind, that they had made no proviſion of Corn for their Horſes, which was a matter which ſhould have been thought upon before: but whilſt they were conſidering hereof, a certain Souldier, who was one of thoſe which had lately revolted from Hernandez, called Franciſco de Cuevas, ſtept out, and told them, that he knew from whence to fetch a ſufficient quantity of Mayz: whereupon Paulo de Meneſes ſent him away with a dozen of Indians to carry the proviſion. The Souldier accordingly went and diſpatched away the Indians with their full burthens, ordering them to go before, and that he would preſently follow, ſo ſoon as his Horſe had eaten his Corn: when the Souldier found himſelf alone, inſtead of returning to Paulo de Meneſes, he paſſed over to Franciſco Hernandez; to whom he gavè an account of the number of his Enemies, that they were marching againſt him, and of their deſign to beat up his quarters, the night following: He then asked his pardon for having deſerted him, ſaying, that it was the Providence of God which had directed him for good, and ſent him to bring this Intelligence, that the Enemy might not take him upon ſurprize. Now it is ſaid, that the reaſon of this revolt of the Souldier again to Hernandez was occaſioned by a word which fell from a certain Souldier belonging to Paulo de Meneſes, who, diſcourſing with another concerning the Rebels, ſaid, that ſo ſoon as the War was ended, the beſt of theſe Runagates would be called to an account and whipped, and ſent to the Gallies: which being over-heard by this Souldier, he reſolved to return to his former Captain, and to merit his Pardon, by the intelligence he brought him. Franciſco Hernandez allarum'd with this information, remained all that Evening and the night following in a poſture of defence and ready to receive the Enemy: but when Paulo de Meneſes and Lope de Martin and the other Captains found that Franciſco de Cueva came not back, they preſently ſuſpected, that he was returned to Hernandez, and had given him advice of their deſign to ſurprize him in the night; wherefore they changed their reſolution, and ordered their Souldiers to march unto a place called Villacori, about five Leagues diſtant from their former quarters quarters, leaving thirty of their beſt Horſe behind for a rere Guard, and to give intelligence of what paſſed in thoſe parts. Lope Martin, with three other Companions, offered himſelf for this ſervice, and poſted himſelf on a high Hill which ſurveyed the River Yca, from whence he might diſcover and obſerve the motion of the Enemy. But as Lope Martin with his three Companions were on the Hill, they were diſcovered by a certain Indian of Cannari belonging to Hernandez, from the lower parts which are full of thickets and trees; of which he immediately carried the Intelligence to his Captain; upon which advice Hernandez with his Souldiers encompaſſed the Hill on all ſides, ſo that it was impoſſible for any of them to eſcape; for though Lope Martin could ſee at a diſtance, yet by reaſon of the thickets and buſhes, he could diſcover nothing that was near at hand; nor could he ſee, when any paſſed the River Yca, which runs juſt under the mountain. I remember that having had occaſion once to paſs that way with ſome Companions of mine, we had the curioſity to go up to the top of the Hill, to ſee the place where Lope de Martin was ſurprized, which indeed is ſuch a ſituation, that an enemy cannot be diſcryed untill he juſt appears cloſe at hand: and ſo it happened to Lope de Martin and his three Companions, who fell unexpectedly into the hands of a Party ſent from Hernandez without poſſibility to eſcape, being all four taken. And whereas it was not known, which was Lope de Martin, a certain Moor of Barbary who had been a ſervant to Alonſo de Alvarado, who was Brother-in-law to Thomas Vazquez, they having married two Siſters, chanced to know him, and told thoſe that carried him, that they ought to look well to their Priſoner, who was Lope de Martin. The Souldiers triumphing with ſo great a prize, carried him with much joy to Hernandez Giron; who refuſed to ſee him; but calling to remembrance how that Loçana, one of his Captains, was hanged by Altamirano, the Judge Advocate, he inſtantly paſſed ſentence on Lope de Martin, and upon one of his Companions that had formerly deſerted him, and cauſed them both to be executed without farther delay. Lope Martin was beheaded, and his Head pitched upon the point of a Lance was carried for a Trophy to Villacori, as we ſhall preſently relate: And thus Lope Martin ended his days, who was one of the firſt Conquerours of that Empire, and concerned in the impriſonment of Atahualpa, and one of the Chief Citizens of Cozco.

CHAP. XII.

The Juſtices ſend recruits to Paulo de Meneſes: Franciſco Hernandez returns upon him, and defeats him. The death of Michael Cornejo. The faithfulneſs of a Horſe to his Maſter.

Paulo de Meneſes going, (as we have ſaid before) in purſuit of Hernandez, wrote to the Juſtice Santillan, and to Don Geronimo de Loayſa, Archbiſhop of Los Reyes, who were the Generals of the Army, adviſing them that the Enemy was very ſtrong, and that his Forces were weak; and therefore he deſired them to ſend him recruits without delay, not doubting but to defeat the Rebels in that expedition. The Generals with all readineſs complyed with his deſires, and ſent him a hundred men well armed and provided, amongſt which were divers Citizens of Cozco, Huamanca and Arequepa; who made ſuch haſte in their march, that they arrived at Villacori, ſome time before Paulo de Meneſes himſelf came thither; to the encouragement and ſatisfaction of both Parties at their meeting. They were well informed, that the Enemies quarters were not above five Leagues diſtant, and that Lope de Martin and his three Companions were upon the watch, and remained for Centinels, attending the motion of the Enemy. With which News they confidently repoſed and remained in ſecurity without fear or ſuſpicion of danger: which was an errour in the Captains, who in War ought ever ever to apprehend the worſt, and provide againſt the ſurpriſe of an enemy, though diſtant and far removed; for example of which we ſhall lay before them the preſent misfortune. For Franciſco Hernandez, having been informed from Lope Martin and his Companions of the quarters and condition of Paulo de Meneſes, he preſently put his Forces in order to march againſt him with all poſſible diligence: and herein fortune favoured him very much; for though one of Martin Lope's Companions had made his eſcape, yet he was ſo affrighted with the apprehenſions of death, that he hid himſelf in a Cave, and had not power to go forward with this information to Paulo Meneſes, which was of the higheſt importance to him; for want of which, on confidence of ſuch vigilant Sentinels as Lope Martin and his Companions, both he and his Souldiers repoſed ſecurely without fear or ſuſpicion of any ſurpriſe. About break of day in the morning a certain Souldier, who went out of the Camp to gather a little Mayz in thoſe Fields, heard on a ſudden the noiſe of people coming towards him; and looking about him, eſpied a party of about thirty Horſe, which Hernandez had ſent for the Van-guard to amuſe the enemy, and entertain them with skirmiſhing untill the reſt of his Forces were come up to their aſſiſtence. The Souldier immediately ran in with the advice, and gave the alarm; but Paulo de Meneſes ſuppoſing that the enemy was not more numerous than what the Souldier reported them to be, he kept his ground and would not retreat, untill ſeeing the enemy very near, and appearing on the Sands, and himſelf almoſt ſurrounded with Forces far greater than his own, he then gave orders to make a retreat with all ſpeed, whilſt he in perſon defended the Rere againſt the enemies attempt, in which many were killed and wounded on one ſide and the other; and in this manner they continued fighting and skirmiſhing the greateſt part of the day, untill the whole Force of Hernandez was come up; and then the confuſion was great as well amongſt thoſe who purſued as thoſe that fled, not being able by reaſon of the noiſe and duſt to diſtinguiſh one from the other: this purſuit continued for the ſpace of three leagues, in which Captain d'Avalos with five or ſix more were wounded, and about fourteen or fifteen were killed, and amongſt them Michael de Cornejo a very honeſt man, and a Citizen of Arequepa, and one of the firſt Conquerours, to whom Franciſco de Carvajal, Lieutenant-General to Gonçalo Piçarro, made many acknowledgments of friendſhip for the kindneſs and generoſity he had ſhewn him, as we have formerly mentioned. His death was occaſioned by the Borgonion he wore, having the Viſard cloſe ſhut down, whereby, and with the duſt raiſed by thoſe who purſued, and thoſe who fled, and by the violent heat which is always in thoſe Valleys, he was ſtifled and ſuffocated. He was much lamented by all that knew him, being a perſon of great goodneſs and honour, as appears by the entertainment and reception he gave to Franciſco de Carvajal, his Wife and Family, when he found them in the Market-place of Arequepa deſtitute of Lodging, or Money, or Friends to entertain them. Notwithſtanding this ſucceſs which the Rebels had in purſuit of their enemies, who fled before them, yet their loſs was greater by the revolt of many of their own Souldiers to the King's party; which cauſed them to give over the purſuit, and ſound a retreat, leſt the example of thoſe who fled ſhould be the cauſe of a general mutiny and defection amongſt their Forces. John Rodriguez de Villalobos a Citizen of Cozco, was one of thoſe who revolted that day from Hernandez, whom though he had endeavoured to engage to him by the marriage of his Wife's Siſter, yet the loyalty he owed to his Prince was of greater prevalency with him than the bond and tie of alliance: but Hernandez ſeemed to make light of his deſertion, ſwearing, in contempt and diſdain of him, that he was more troubled for a Sword he carried with him than he was for his perſon or any other concernment relating to him: And farther to ſhew his confidence, and the aſſurance he had to prevail, he again publickly declared, that he gave free liberty to any man who was weary of his ſervice to paſs over to the ſide of the Juſtices, for he pretended not to entertain forced and preſſed Souldiers, but willing and faithfull Friends. As to Paulo de Meneſes himſelf, he left his Souldiers and fled to Chincha, which Palentino teſtifies in theſe words:

When Paulo de Meneſes, ſays he, ſaw that his Souldiers fled, and that his Body of Horſe ran away in full carriere, he turned out of the way, and paſſed through a ſandy Countrey towards the River Piſco, and with three other Companions, who followed him, came to Chincha, &c. Thus far this Authour.

As the Rebels returned from the purſuit, they gathered up all the Arms, Coats, Cloaks and other things of burthen, which the King's party had ſcattered in the way way and thrown from their Horſes and Mules to eaſe them in their flight; like thoſe who are in a ſtorm at Sea, throw their Goods and Lading over Board to ſave their Veſſel and their Lives. And ſuch was the fortune of theſe Royaliſts, who but even now being in a condition to threaten their enemies with a total deſtruction, were in the next moment forced to flight and entirely defeated.

In this place it will be no great digreſſion from our purpoſe, to relate a ſtory concerning the faithfulneſs of an Horſe (which I knew) towards his Maſter, becauſe it is rare and curious, and becauſe ſuch accidents as this ſeldom happen in the world. In this Battel of Spurs (as we may call it) there was a certain Gentleman engaged of his Majeſty's party called John Julio de Hogeda, a Citizen of Cozco, and one of the firſt Conquerours of that Empire, who, amongſt other Horſes which he kept, was mounted that day at Villacori upon one with black ſpots, and running full ſpeed, as Palentino ſaith, Hogeda fell from his Horſe, which ſeeing his Maſter on the ground, gave a ſtop amidſt three hundred other Horſes and Beaſts of burthen, and would not ſtir untill his Maſter got up again and was mounted on his back; which faithfulneſs of an irrational Beaſt ſaved the life of his Maſter, and may be recounted for a ſtory without example; unleſs it were another of the like nature performed by the ſame Horſe, of which I my ſelf was a witneſs, at Cozco; where, after the War was ended, certain Gentlemen exerciſing their Horſes after the Genet faſhion, as they uſually did in the common courſe every Sunday, it happened that a School-fellow of mine, of mongrel race, whoſe Father was a Spaniard and his Mother an Indian, called Pedro de Altamirano, Son of Antonio de Altamirano, one of the firſt Conquerours, being mounted on this Horſe, and running full ſpeed by a Window on his left hand, he eſpied a fair young Lady looking out from the Houſe belonging to Alonſo de Meſa, the ſight of whom cauſed him to forget his race, and at the next courſe, having the Window on his right hand, he turned his head two or three times to ſee the beauty of the Lady. The third time paſſing the ſame place, the Horſe being ſenſible that his Rider checked him in his carriere, he ſtrained harder than before to gain the Race; but the young Gallant being more intent on the beauty of his Miſtreſs than the Government of his Horſe, he leaned too much on one ſide and fell to the ground: which when the Horſe perceived, he gave a ſtop in his full ſpeed, and ſtaid without moving untill the Gallant aroſe, and again mounted upon him, and then he continued his courſe, to the great admiration of thoſe who were preſent. All which I my ſelf ſaw from a Gallery of my Father's Houſe; the which action may ſerve to confirm the truth of the former unto thoſe who had not the faith to believe it at the firſt. And ſo we ſhall return to the Army of the Juſtices, where we ſhall find nothing but animoſities, and troubles, and changes of Officers, and places of Truſt.

CHAP. XIII.

The Juſtices deprive the two Generals of their Office. Franciſco Hernandez comes to Nanaſca. A Spie carries the news of the many changes. The Rebels compoſe an Army of Negroes.

SUch were the quarrels and diſſenſions in his Majeſty's Camp between the two Generals, that the Captains and Souldiers were ſcandalized thereat, and troubled to ſee on all occaſions things diverſly and contrarily diſpoſed. The Generals being informed of theſe complaints and murmurings of the Souldiery, were perſuaded at the inſtance of ſeveral principal perſons to dine one day together, in order whereunto with much intreaty they brought the Juſtice Santillan from his quarters two leagues off, where he was retired to a meeting with the Archbiſhop, and after Dinner they were made Friends, to the great ſatisfaction, as Palentino ſaith, of the whole Army. The ſame day towards Evening news was brought to the Camp of the defeat and rout given at Villacori, at which they much admired, having having according to their beſt intelligence received daily advice, that Paulo de Meneſes was much ſtronger than the enemy. The Juſtices, Captains and other Officers were highly ſenſible of the loſs they ſuſtained by this defeat, and found by experience that the original of that and other misfortunes proceeded from the diſcord and miſunderſtanding of the two Generals, to the great diſgrace and diſcouragement of the Imperial Army. And though they endeavoured as much as was poſſible to palliate this loſs, ſaying, that thoſe who came over from the enemy made reparation for the numbers of thoſe who were killed, yet they could not digeſt the loſs of reputation which the Royal Army ſuſtained by the contrariety of their opinions and oppoſite commands; and therefore calling a Counſel, the Officers by a Royal Mandate diſcharged the two Generals of their Commands, and conferred the Office of Commander in Chief upon Paulo de Meneſes, and conſtituted Pedro Portocarrero his Lieutenant-General: which likewiſe cauſed murmurings and diſcontent in the whole Camp; and men talked loudly, that it was a ſhame and reproach to them to make choice of an unlucky fellow who but the other day had loſt a Battel, and had rather deſerved ignominy and puniſhment for his ill conduct, and to be debaſed to the meaneſt Souldier in the Field, than to be raiſed to the higheſt dignity and place of command. Howſoever the election was confirmed and the reſolution notified to the two Generals, who made ſome demur thereupon, but they were over-ruled and forced to ſubmit; and farther it was agreed to purſue the Rebels with eight hundred men, and for better expedition to march without Baggage or other incumbrance: but this determination met with delays like the reſt, ſo that it was not put in execution till three days afterwards. For the Juſtice Santillan being upon his return to Los Reyes, was attended on his way with a numerous train of Friends and Relations to the number of about an hundred and fifty perſons, to the great diminution of their Forces, and diſcompoſure of their affairs: of which Santillan being made ſenſible by one of his Friends, who told him, that the taking many men from the Army would look like a Rebellion, and give his Adverſaries occaſion to pretend that he was jealous of his ſafety, and ſuſpicious of Plots and deſigns againſt him: he preſently apprehended the inconveniences, and diſmiſt his Friends and Kindred, deſiring them to return to the ſervice of his Majeſty in the Army, which was much more neceſſary than their attendance upon him: which they accordingly performed, ſo that Santillan entred into Los Reyes with no greater attendance than of his own Servants.

By this time Hernandez was come to Nanaſca, being about ſixty leagues diſtant from Los Reyes, to which place he had marched without let or hindrance whatſoever: for ſuch had been the confuſion and difference in his Majeſty's Camp, that nothing could proceed to his hurt or interruption: and for his better advantage and information of every thing, the Juſtices gave ear to the propoſal of one who was a Serjeant in the King's Army, and had been a Souldier in the Plot and Conſpiracy of Diego de Rojas, who offered to adventure into the enemy's Camp in the habit of an Indian, and to bring them from thence a true information of the ſtate of their affairs. The Juſtices aſſenting hereunto gave him free licenſe; ſo that he as a falſe and treacherous Spie went over to Hernandez, and told him, that he had clothed himſelf in that habit to paſs more eaſily to his Army; for that in the King's Camp there were ſuch quarrels and diſcords amongſt the Officers, and diſcontents amongſt the Souldiers, who had no will or courage to fight, that nothing but deſtruction could be the end and iſſue thereof; and for that reaſon, out of a principle of ſelf preſervation, he reſolved to ſave himſelf in his ſervice. Moreover he reported, that the Juſtices were much troubled and confuſed upon the news they had received, that the City of St. Michael de Piura was in Rebellion againſt his Majeſty, and had declared themſelves for Hernandez Giron; and that a certain Captain named Pedro de Orſna was coming from the New Kingdom with many men in favour alſo of Hernandez; all which being of great encouragement to his people, he cauſed them, for better credit thereof, to be declared by publick outcry. But to qualifie this news a little, he told them, that the Marſhal was coming from the Charcas with a powerfull force of twelve hundred men, but they charged the Spie to make this report, or at leaſt to moderate it, and ſay, that he came with no more than ſix hundred men, leſt it ſhould prove too great a diſcouragement to the Souldiers. At the ſame time letters were intercepted from the Camp of the Juſtices, conveyed by an Indian, directed to a Souldier; for which both of them were hanged, though the Souldier after he had endured the torment twice, would make no confeſſion; and that after his death, in the Collar of his doublet a Parchment was found with a Pardon from the Juſtices for Thomas Vazquez. The which Pardon was preſently publiſhed by Hernandez, with Aſſurances in the name of the Juſtices of great Rewards and of Lands with Services of Indians to whomſoever ſhould kill Hernandez and other principal perſons who were about him.

But before the Defeat given at Villacori, Franciſco Hernandez had raiſed a Company of Negroes conſiſting of about an hundred and fifty black fellows, which they had taken out of the ſeveral Plantations, Villages and Colonies which they had plundered, to which he afterwards added above three hundred Ethiopian Souldiers; and to encourage them the better, he formed them into Companies diſtinct from the others. Of theſe he ordained a Captain General called Mr. John, who was an excellent Carpenter, (for I was well acquainted with him) and had been a Slave to Antonio Altamirano, as I have formerly mentioned. Their Lieutenant was Maſter Antonio, to whom a principal Souldier of the King's Camp had ſurrendered his Arms; it is not fit to name him, though I was well acquainted with him: the report whereof coming into Spain, cauſed a Gentleman who had lived in the Indies, and was acquainted with this Souldier, to ſend him a Sword and a Dagger handſomely gilt, more in ſcorn to upbraid his Cowardiſe, than on the ſcore or in token of friendſhip, which occaſioned much diſcourſe after the Wars were at an end: Beſides theſe chief Officers, he appointed their Captains, and gave them leave to make choice of their Enſigns, Serjeants, Corporals, Drummers and Pipers, and make their own Colours. All which the Negroes performed very handſomely, which was a means to allure and invite many of that ſort from the King's Camp; who ſeeing their Relations and Kindred ſo highly honoured and advanced in the Camp of Hernandez, were induced to follow their example, and ſo were engaged againſt their Maſters during all the time of this War. The Rebels made great uſe of theſe Souldiers, whom they ſent abroad with a ſmall party of Spaniards to forage and gather proviſions; which the poor Indians in fear and dread of them, and to reſcue themſelves, their Wives and Children from their Cruelties, did readily adminiſter and ſupply them with; which afterwards was the cauſe of great famine and diſtreſs in the Countrey.

CHAP. XIV.

The Marſhal makes choice of Captains for his Army. He comes to Cozco, and marches againſt Franciſco Hernandez. The unfortunate death of Captain Diego de Almendras.

IN the mean time, whilſt matters were thus tranſacted in Cozco, Rimac and Villacori, the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado, who was in the Kingdom and Provinces of the Charcas, remained not idle or unactive: for as we have ſaid before, he employed himſelf in raiſing men for his Majeſty's ſervice, and providing Arms, Ammunition, Victuals, Horſes and Mules, and what elſe was neceſſary for the uſe of the Souldiers. He made Don Martin de Almendras, a Gentleman, who had married his Siſter, his Lieutenant, and Diego de Porras, a ſtout and valiant Souldier his Standard-bearer general; Diego de Villavicennio was made Serjeant Major, in which Office he had been in the War which Preſident Gaſca waged againſt Gonçalo Piçarro. He nominated Pero Hernandez Paniagua and John Ortiz de Carate, who had Eſtates in the Charcas for Captains of Horſe, with another Gentleman of Noble extraction called Don Gabriel de Guzman. Gomez Hernandez, the Lawyer, was made Judge Advocate of the Camp, and John Riba Martin Chief Apparitor. Of the Infantry he conſtituted ſix Captains, three of which had Eſtates and Plantations, namely, the Lawyer Polo, Diego de Almendras and Martin de Alarçon. The others, who who had no Eſtates, were Hernando Alvarez de Toledo, John Ramon and John de Arreynaga; all which Commanders ſo diligently applyed themſelves to their charge and employment, that in a few days the Marſhal had an Army compoſed of about eight hundred men, of which Palentino, Chap. 41. ſpeaks as followeth.

His Forces were in number ſeven hundred ſeventy five men, all good Souldiers well armed and richly clothed, and with great attendance, the like of which hath never been ſeen in Peru. And indeed it was no wonder they ſhould be ſo, coming from the Mountain or Hill, which is the richeſt of any diſcovered as yet in this World. Theſe are the words of Palentino, of which I am ſure he ſpeaks very true, for I ſaw them my ſelf ſome few days afterwards in Cozco, and then they appeared unto me to be as brave and as well accoutred as this Authour expreſſes: ſo that being thus powerfull in Men and Arms, and provided of all things neceſſary the Marſhal marched towards Cozco; in his way to which, ſeveral Parties of ten and twenty in a Company came to join with him for the ſervice of his Majeſty. And after he had paſſed Arequepa with the difficulties before related, there came to him about forty Souldiers: And Sancho Duarte and Captain Martin de Olmos, who reſided in the City of la Paz, came forth to the Marſhal, with above two hundred good Souldiers, at which meeting they teſtified great joy with vollies of ſhot and other Martial ſalutations. The Army marching forwards came within the juriſdiction of the great City of Cozco, where they were met by a ſmall ſquadron under the Command of John de Saavedra; which though few in number, and not exceeding eighty five men, were yet conſiderable for their Eſtates and Intereſt in the Countrey amongſt which were thirteen or fourteen Citizens of Cozco, being all Conquerours of that Empire of the firſt or ſecond Adventure: Of theſe men there were ſixty Horſe and the reſt were Foot, moſt men of Eſtates, and ſuch as had fled from the Rebels to Los Reyes, with intention to ſerve his Majeſty. With the appearance of ſo many good and brave Souldiers, whom the Rebels once believed would have joined with them, the Marſhal was animated and encouraged; and marched to the entrance of the City of Cozco, being then above twelve hundred ſtrong; of which three hundred were Horſe, three hundred and fifty Muſquetiers, and about five hundred and fifty Piques and Halberts: Every Troop and Company marched by it ſelf with five in a File or Rank; and afterwards drew up in the Market-place; where the Horſe and Foot made a feigned skirmiſh for ſport and diverſion, and afterwards were all quartered within the Precincts of the City. The Biſhop of Cozco, called Frier John Solano, attended with his Dean and Chapter came forth to meet and welcome the Marſhal and his Army, and to give them his benediction. Howſoever, remembring the hardſhips he had endured when he accompanied Diego Centeno in his long marches, he was unwilling to follow the Camp, but rather choſe to remain in his Church, and pray for their ſucceſs, and the peace of the Countrey. From Cozco the Marſhal iſſued out his Warrants and Orders to repair the Bridges of the Rivers of Apurimac and Amancay, intending to paſs that way in queſt of Franciſco Hernandez of whom he had heard nothing of late, nor was it known what was become of him. At this time Advices were ſent from the Juſtices of the ill ſucceſs of Paul de Meneſes at Villacori, and that the Rebels were encamped in the Valley of Nanaſca: upon which intelligence, the Marſhal altered his deſign, and returned back the ſame way he came, to avoid paſſing by Arequepa and the Charcas, which would have been a great hurt and damage to the Countrey, and a means to prolong the War. Wherefore the Marſhal changed his Orders concerning the Bridges, which he commanded now to be burnt, to hinder the paſſage of the Enemy, in caſe they ſhould deſign to return that way again. The Marſhal departing from Cozco marched fourteen or fifteen leagues along the Road to the Collao, and then took the right-hand way which leads to Nanaſca, where he expected to meet Hernandez: but hearing no News of him, he marched towards Parihuanacocha, though in the way thither he was to paſs a rocky deſart of above thirty leagues over: In this paſſage four Souldiers having robbed two Mules, one belonging to Gabriel de Pernia and the other to Pedro Franco (who were Souldiers of good reputation) and therewith fled over to Hernandez, the Marſhal upon notice thereof preſently commanded the two Souldiers to be ſtrangled, ſuſpecting, that they themſelves had been conſenting thereunto; which being eſteemed by all to be a piece of great injuſtice and cruelty, cauſed murmurings and diſcontent in the Army, and a thouſand Curſes againſt the Marſhal. As Palentino mentions, Chapter 41. Theſe four Souldiers which revolted met with the Scouts of Hernandez Giron, and went with them to Nanaſca, where in private they gave a true account of the force which the Marſhal brought with him, and that he was coming to ſeek them by the way of Parihuanacocha: though in publick, not to diſcourage the People, they reported, that his force was weak and inconſiderable: but Franciſco Hernandez diſabuſed his people, and told them the truth: for, as Palentino ſaith, he ſpake to them in theſe words.

Gentlemen, do not flatter or deceive your ſelves, but clinch your Fiſts cloſe, for I aſſure you, that you have a thouſand men coming againſt you from below on one ſide, and 1200 from above, which by the help of God, I eſteem as nothing, for let me have but a hundred ſtout and valiant friends, who will ſtick to me, and I ſhall not doubt, but to defeat them all. And hereupon having prepared for his departure; upon the eighth of May he left Naſca and marched to Lucanes by way of the mountain, with intent to poſſeſs himſelf of Parinacocha, before the Marſhal came thither, &c. Thus far this Authour, Chapter 41.

Howſoever the Marſhal Alonſo de Alvarado continuing his March, entered upon the Deſarts of Parihuanacocha, where by reaſon of the bad and craggy ways and tempeſtuous weather, or the unhealthfulneſs of the Climate, above ſixty of their beſt Horſe dyed, though they were led by hand, and well covered with Clothing, without any reaſon given for the ſame; the Grooms ſaid, that they were taken with a ſhortneſs of breath like Horſes that are broken winded, at which all people wondered, but none knew the reaſon; onely the Indians eſteemed it ominous, and to be a forerunner of ill ſucceſs. Diego Hernandez, Chap. 42. ſpeaking of this paſſage, ſaith, as follows. When the Marſhal was come unto Chumbibilcas, and had there provided himſelf with all things neceſſary for his Camp; he adventured to paſs the deſart of Parinacocha, which is about 32 leagues over, which was ſo full of boggs and moriſh places, ſnow and rocky aſperous paſſages, and ſo many broken cliffs and water-galls, that many Horſes periſhed in that deſolate Land, which ſeemed at that time to be a corner of Hell, where was nothing but miſery and famine, &c. Thus far this Authour, whoſe Authority we have brought to confirm the truth of what we have before alledged.

The Marſhal left Captain Sancho Dugarte in Parihuanacocha ſick of a Flux or Diſſentery, of which in a few days afterwards he dyed: the Army ſtill proceeding in their march the Scouts happened to take one of the Scouts belonging to Hernandez; and to ſave his life, they reported, that he voluntarily was coming to ſerve his Majeſty, and from him the Marſhal was informed, that Franciſco Hernandez was not above twenty leagues diſtant from that place; for which reaſon he kept his people on the Watch, not to be ſurprized or to have their quarters beaten up in the night. When the Army was about two days march from Parihuanacocha, a bold action was performed by a certain Negro which alarum'd the Army, and was this:

Captain Diego de Almendras, according to his uſual Cuſtome, did often ſeparate from the Army to ſhoot wild Beaſts, of which there were very many in thoſe Deſarts; and being in this manner one day upon the ramble, it was his fortune to meet amidſt thoſe rocks with a Negro belonging to Serjeant Major Villavicencio, who had run away; and whom Almendras would have bound, and brought back to his Maſter. The Neger ſtood ſtill, as if he would have ſubmitted; but ſo ſoon as Almendras came near him, thinking to bind his hands with match, the Negro ſtooped down, and catched hold of the Ankles of his Leggs, and running his Head againſt his Breaſt, threw him backwards; and then with his own Dagger and Sword, he gave him ſo many Wounds, that he left him dead. After which the Negro fled to the reſt of his Kindred and Relations who were with Hernandez; and having recounted to them this brave exploit, by which he made his eſcape, they all rejoyced, and gloried in the action, every one boaſting of it, as if it had been done by himſelf. A young man of mongrel race half Spaniard and half Indian being with Almendras, and ſeeing his Maſter on the ground, and ill treated in that manner, took the Negro by the Shoulders to free his Maſter from him; but Almendras being ſenſible that he was mortally wounded, called to the youth to fly before he was killed by the Negro: and ſuch was the Cry and Groans he made, as gave an allarum to all the Army: he was afterwards carried to Parihuana to be there cured, but he dyed in his way thither, ſuch was the end of this poor Gentleman, who loſt his Life in hunting after another man's Negro; the which unhappy accident both Indians and Spaniards interpreted as an ill omen of their future Succeſſes.

CHAP. XVI.

The Marſhal receives intelligence of the Enemy: He ſends ſome Forces againſt them: A Skirmiſh happens between the two Parties. The general opinion of the Officers to decline fighting with the Rebels.

THE day following after this unhappy misfortune befallen Captain Almendras; the Marſhal receiving advice that the Enemy was not far diſtant he marched eight leagues farther with his Army; and then made a ſtrong detachment, which was required to haſten with all expedition, and to carry no other baggage or incumbrance, than onely Proviſions for three days: and in this manner, as Palentino ſaith, they paſſed a deſart Countrey full of marſhes and boggs, and deep with Snows; and that night they lodged in the open Air, without Tents, or other covering: and having travelled eight leagues farther; the next day they came very weary to a People called Guallaripa, where they received News, that Franciſco Hernandez had departed thence three days before, and was then at Chuquinga about four leagues diſtant from them, where he ſtaid to refreſh his Army, which was greatly tyred and diſcompoſed by the Fatigues of a long march over mountainous and deſolate Countries. At this time the Commiſſary Romero and Garica de Melo came to the Marſhal with a thouſand Indians that were Souldiers bringing Proviſions and Ammunition to him from the Province of Andaguaylas; from them he received a relation of all matters concerning Hernandez, and how he had ſtrangled Diego Orihuel, a Native of Salamanca, having taken him as he was coming to the Marſhal's Camp to ſerve his Majeſty. Thus far Palentino.

The Marſhal having certain intelligence that the Enemy was near, he greatly deſired to engage with them, and therefore reſolved to detach two Captains with a hundred and fifty choice Muſquetiers, who early in the Morning were to give the Enemy an Allarum, and receive ſuch as would paſs over to his Majeſty's ſervice. But the Captains and other perſons of quality and intereſt, who were well informed of the ſtrength of the place wherein Hernandez was encamped, would have diſſuaded the Marſhal from the deſign, giving him very good reaſons, why it was not fit or ſafe to attempt the Enemy within their Fortifications, or to hazard the loſs of an hundred and fifty of the choiceſt Muſquetiers in the whole Army, on whoſe ſucceſs the fortune of the day depended: but the Marſhal replyed, that he himſelf would follow them in the rere, and ſuccour them with the whole Army, and ſecond them ſo warmly with his Troops, that the Enemy ſhould be able to prevail little on them: and ſo he inſtantly deſired licence of the Captains to draw out from their Companies a hundred and fifty choice Muſquetiers, which he committed to the command and charge of his Lieutenant General, and of Captain John Ramon, with Directions to approach as near to the Enemy as was poſſible. The Captains accordingly about midnight marched out with this detachment, and about three hours afterwards the Marſhal followed them with the whole Army. Hernandez who was well adviſed of the near approach of a ſevere and incenſed Enemy, was vigilant not to be ſurprized unawares; and having his forces always in a poſture of defence, he kept Guards on the Avenues, which were but two, where it was poſſible to be attacked by an Enemy.

Before break of day in the morning the King's Forces came to the place where the Enemy was fortified; and without any noiſe endeavoured to ſurprize them before they who were on the other ſide of the River Amancay could hear any thing of their approach: but whilſt they moved thus ſoftly, they were diſcovered by an Indian belonging to Hernandez, who preſently ran to his Maſter, and told him, that the Enemy was near at hand.

Franciſco Hernandez immediately cauſed an Allarum to be ſounded; and diſpoſed his people in ſuch places as were moſt for their ſecurity; and on both ſides Vollies of Muſquets were interchanged without damage unto either, for they fired at a great diſtance. About nine a clock the Marſhal brought his whole Army in ſight of Hernandez; and then the skirmiſh was renewed with more heat and courage rage than good diſcipline: for the Rebels having conſidered the ſituation of the place, ordered and diſpoſed their Souldiers to the moſt advantage; It was no plain or open Countrey where they were to fight, but amongſt Buſhes and Trees, and great Rocks and Caves, by which the River Amancay paſſes. Hernandez his Souldiers divided themſelves into ſeveral parties and places covered and ſheltered with Trees and Buſhes. The Marſhal's men boldly and openly deſcended from a Hill, and being come within Muſquet-ſhot, every one to ſignalize himſelf the better, told his Condition, and his Name, who and what he was.

The Enſign of John Ramon named Gonçalo de Mata came ſo near the Enemy, as to call to them, and cryed out aloud, I am Mata, I am Mata; one of thoſe who lay cloſe in the Buſhes perceiving him within Muſquet-ſhot, anſwered him, I am a Matador, a Matador, or a Killer of him; and with that let fly at him, and ſhot him full in the Breaſt, with which he fell dead to the ground: the like happened to others, of which many were killed and wounded, without ſeeing who hurt them: And though the Marſhal re-inforced the detachment with freſh Forces, ſo that the Skirmiſh continued untill three a clock in the afternoon, in which above forty principal perſons were killed and wounded, yet no advantage was gained by this Engagement: amongſt theſe a young Gentleman of about eighteen years of age, called Don Felipe Enriquez had the misfortune to be ſlain, and was much lamented by both Armies; and Captain Ayrenaga was wounded. The King's party having ſuſtained this loſs in the Skirmiſh, were not a little cooled in their courage and abated in their mettle. During the Fight two Souldiers belonging to Hernandez revolted to the Marſhal, one of which was called Sancho de Vayona: and one Souldier of the Marſhal's paſſed over to Hernandez, named —— de Bilbao, of whom we have formerly made mention, and how he declared, that whereſoever he firſt ſaw Hernandez, he would fly to his Party.

The Skirmiſh being ended, and the Souldiers retired: Palentino, Chapter the forty fourth, ſaith; That the Marſhal entered into conſultation with Lorenço de Aldana, Gomez de Alvarado, Diego Maldonado, Gomez de Solis, and other principal perſons in the Camp; to whom he ſignifyed the great deſire he had to engage the Rebels, upon aſſurance that Bayona the Souldier (who was juſt then come over from the Enemy) had given him, that for certain they would never ſtand a ſhock, but turn their backs at the firſt charge: but Lorenço de Aldana and Diego Maldonado being of another opinion, took him aſide, and perſuaded him to decline an Engagement, and to have patience for a while: ſince he had ſuch manifeſt advantages over the Rebels, both in men, and in the ground where they were encamped: and moreover, all the Indians and all that Countrey were diſpoſed to favour and ſerve him. As to the Rebels, they had no other refuge or fortification than thoſe Rocks and Woods; in which being kept in by the Indians, and as it were beſieged on all ſides, they muſt in a ſhort time be compelled by famine to one of theſe two things, either to abandon their faſt places, and then they will either disband, or ſeparate of themſelves, or be eaſily routed by us; or the greateſt part of them, will paſs over to us, without hazarding the life of any of thoſe Loyal Gentlemen who are engaged in this quarrel: all which will eaſily be effected, by ſtanding ſtill without action, and onely keeping a good watch and ward in caſe the Enemy ſhould make an attempt, and eſpecially upon that high point of Land which runs out upon the River, and which overſees both Camps; which paſs if he could make good, he would be better fortified and ſecured than the Enemy. In this advice and opinion moſt of the principal Officers concurred: onely Martin de Robles (to whom the Marſhal had given the Company which belonged to Diego de Almendras) and ſome few others were of a contrary opinion, and inſiſted much to give them battel: howſoever Lorenço de Aldana was ſo earneſt in the matter, that the Marſhal promiſed and gave him his word, that he would not fight. And upon this reſolution he diſpatched a Meſſenger away preſently to the Camp of the Juſtices, to ſend him ſome ſmall Field-pieces with a recruit of Muſquetiers, to play upon that point of the broken part of the Mountain which the Enemy had poſſeſſed; for that driving them out from thence, they would either be forced to yield, or elſe to fight their way in open field. Thus far Palentino, by which appears the great deſire of the Marſhal to engage the Rebels, contrary to the opinion of all his Officers, and to the great and weighty reaſons alleged by them; which Council not being followed, occaſioned the ruine and deſtruction which inſued; as will ſpeedily appear in what follows.

CHAP. XVI.

John de Piedrahita alarms the Camp of the Marſhal. Rodrigo de Pineda comes over to the King's Party; and perſuades them to give the Enemy Battel. The debates thereupon. The Marſhal reſolves to engage.

SO ſoon as it was night John de Piedrahita with a party of thirty ſix Muſquetiers divided into three Companies alarm'd the Marſhal's Camp in three ſeveral quarters; which was not much regarded by them, and onely a few ſhot returned to ſhew that they were not aſleep: ſo ſoon as the day began to break Piedrahita retired without effecting any thing, onely he thereby gave occaſion to Rodrigo de Pineda, a Citizen of Cozco and Captain of Horſe, upon pretence and colour of giving aſſiſtence to Piedrahita, to make his eſcape to the Marſhal; of which Palentino gives this account:

So ſoon, ſays he, as Rodrigo de Pineda was come to the Marſhal, he aſſured him, that many, if not the greateſt part of Hernandez his Souldiers would have made their eſcape had it not been for the ſtrict watch which is always kept, and that in the night when he came over, he found the River ſhallow and eaſie to be forded: upon this advice, the Marſhal preſently called a Council of all the Captains and men of Intereſt and Eſtates then abiding in the Camp, and, having repeated to them all that Pineda had acquainted him with, he told them plainly, that he was reſolved to fight the enemy, delivering his reaſons for the ſame: but ſtill many of the Council oppoſed this opinion, perſiſting, that it was not ſafe to make an attempt on a Fortification with ſo much diſadvantage: when the Marſhal ſaw that he was oppoſed by ſo many principal perſons, he deſired Pineda to repeat himſelf before them all what he had before declared, and what was his opinion concerning the ſtate of Hernandez his Camp, and how and in what manner he believed they would act. Then Pineda told them, that the Forces which Hernandez had, might amount unto three hundred and eighty men, of which two hundred and twenty were Muſquetiers, but all ill provided, and moſt of them inclined to deſert him, and revolt to the Marſhal; and that he might have about a thouſand Horſes and Beaſts of Burthen. And as to what he believed of the ſtate of Hernandez, he was of opinion, that they would march away that night if not prevented, being affrighted, and forced thereunto for want of proviſions: That in caſe they did march away, the purſuit after them, through craggy and mountainous Countries, would be very difficult and ruinous to the Army, as well as deſtructive to the Kingdom: and that the paſſage over the River was eaſie, and the way open to make an aſſault. Hereupon the Marſhal declared poſitively his reſolution that day to engage the enemy; and that he would not ſuffer them to eſcape out of his hands as they had formerly done from the Juſtices; and prevent them from doing any farther miſchief than what they had already committed; and that to follow and purſue after them could not be done without hardſhip, damage and ſuffering of the whole Army: but ſome made anſwer and replied hereunto, that whilſt Hernandez remained in that faſt ground, it were more ſecure to let him eſcape from thence than to attempt him in that Fortification; for that it was probable, that having abandoned that place, his Forces would disband of themſelves, without hazarding the life of one Souldier: but the Marſhal was not ſatisfied with this anſwer, and ſaid, that it was not correſpondent to his duty, nor ſutable to the honour of ſo many brave Cavaliers and good Souldiers as were there preſent, to ſuffer thoſe Rebels to range and wander up and down robbing and ſpoiling the Countrey without controll, and therefore he declared himſelf reſolved in deſpight of all oppoſition to give the enemy Battel. Herewith many of the principal Captains who were preſent at this Conſultation in the Marſhal's Tent, went out from thence much diſpleaſed and diſſatisfied: and particularly Gomez de Alvarado ſaid, Come, ſince we muſt die, let us go, for I am ſure it will be my fortune to be killed. Thus far are the words of Palentino.

When

When the Council was riſen, ſeveral of the Inhabitants of Cozco and of the Charcas, being men of Eſtates, to the number of about thirty, returned again to the Marſhal, amongſt which were Lorenço de Aldana, John de Saavedra, Diego Maldonado, Gomez Alvarado, Pero Hernandez Paniagua, Polo the Lawyer, John Ortis de Carate, Alonſo de Loayſa, John de Salas the Agitant, Martin de Meneſes, Garcia de Melo, John de Berrio, Anton Ruyz de Guevara, Gonçalo de Soto, Diego de Truxillo all of them Adventurers in the conqueſt of Peru; who taking the Marſhal aſide, did earneſtly entreat him to retract his determination concerning the Battel; that he would conſider of the ſituation of the place wherein the enemy was poſted, which was very ſtrong; and that his own was equal to it, and as advantageouſly ſeated as theirs: that he ſhould obſerve and remember what Rodrigo de Pineda aſſured him of the ſcarcity and want of all Proviſions in the Camp of Hernandez, by reaſon of which they would be forced to quit their quarters there in the ſpace of three days; that he ſhould expect untill the end of that time and ſee the iſſue, after which he might conſider farther, and take ſuch meaſures as ſhould then ſeem moſt advantageous and convenient: and in the mean time the enemy remained there before them, and could not take a flight through the air, but on the land onely; on which they might be intercepted and obſtructed in their paſſage by orders and inſtructions ſent to the Indians, whenas on the contrary, it could not but prove deſtructive to attack the Enemy in ſo difficult a ſtation; it was well known that the event of War hath been always doubtfull; and that to play ſuch a deſperate game was to deliver up their Souldiers to ſlaughter, and to ſtand ſtill untill they were all killed by the ſhot of the Enemy; That he ſhould conſider the ſtate of his own Forces, which were in a much more happy condition than the Enemy; for they neither wanted Proviſions, nor the attendance of Indians, nor other neceſſaries to conſerve them in the Camp. That the onely game they had now to play was to ſtand ſtill, and that then a Victory would follow of courſe, without loſs or hazard of his men; and that it was not good to adventure, without ſome cogent reaſons, the loſs of what they had already gained. The Marſhal, not reflecting, or calling to mind, that on the ſame River a Battel of the nature of this was loſt (as before related) anſwered with ſome choler, that he had well conſidered all theſe particulars; but that it correſponded not with his duty, nor was it reaſonable or ſutable to their reputation, to ſuffer ſuch a company of pitifull Rebels to march away with ſuch boldneſs and inſolence, and every night to alarm him in his Camp; which not being able to ſupport any longer, he was reſolved to fight them that very day, not doubting but that before Sun-ſetting, he ſhould kill and cut in pieces three hundred of their men: wherefore he conjured them to talk no more of declining the Battel, but that every one ſhould repair to his charge and command, and acquit himſelf of his duty, upon penalty of being proceeded againſt as Traitours and diſobedient to the command of their General.

There was now no farther place for Anſwers and Replies, the Die was caſt and the reſolution fixed, which cauſed many of the principal men to depart with a heavy heart, and to diſcourſe amongſt themſelves, that the Marſhal was prodigal of the lives of his Souldiers; for if he looked upon them as his Friends, his Kindred, or Sons, he would not expoſe them in that manner to be deſtroyed and ſlaughtered by the Enemy. But what could be ſaid more, it was their misfortune and unhappineſs to be ſubjected to the command of a paſſionate and an inflexible General, who would not be perſuaded to accept of a Victory which was offered to him, but rather yield it to his Enemy at the expence of their lives and fortunes: this and much more was expreſſed, lamenting their condition, and preſaging as it were that ruine which enſued within the ſpace of ſix hours afterwards. Thus in deſpair, the Captains, and moſt conſiderate of the Souldiers, prepared themſelves: though there were ſome, who taking their meaſures from the numbers, and looking upon themſelves as twelve hundred to four hundred or three hundred and fifty, were ſo certain of ſucceſs as if the Enemy had been already in their hands: but theſe did not conſider the difficulties of the way; or that they had a deep and rapid River to paſs, nor the turnings and windings, and narrow paſſages before they could come at the Enemy, whereby their Horſe would become uſeleſs; and that nothing but their Fire-arms could ſerve, of which the Rebels were well provided, and their Souldiers ſuch excellent Marks-men that they could kill a ſmall Bird with a ſingle Bullet; amongſt which there were ſome of mongrel race, between Spaniards and Indians, and particularly one called Granado of the Countrey

Countrey of Mexico (who had taught the reſt) that could ſhoot either upon Reſts, or at Arms length, as they pleaſed. Moreover, it was certainly believed, that Hernandez compounded his Powder with a certain ſort of Poiſon: for the Chirurgeons reported, that the wounds made by the Rebels Gun-ſhot, though never ſo ſlight, were incurable, and which was contrary to the nature of ſuch wounds, which are always more eaſily cured than thoſe which are made by Lance, or Sword, or Halbert, or ſuch like Weapons: but notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties engage they muſt, which coſt many a man his life, to the defeat and ruine of the whole Army.

CHAP. XVII.

The Marſhal draws up his Men in order of Battel. Franciſco Hernandez does the like in defence of himſelf. The ſeveral Aſſaults that were made. The death of many principal perſons.

IT was preſently after mid-day when the Marſhal gave the ſignal for the Battel, and having drawn up the Souldiers in their ſeveral Companies, he gave orders to Captain Martin de Robles with his Company of Muſquetiers, to march to the left, and attack the Enemy on that ſide; the Captains Martin de Olmos and John Ramon were commanded with their Forces to march to the right, and to make the on-ſet together at the ſame time, when they heard the Trumpet ſound, which was to be the ſignal for the Aſſault: the reſt of the Infantry, with all the Horſe were commanded to deſcend by a very narrow paſſage, there being no other way than that to go down unto the River, which, having paſſed, they were to draw up in a little Plain, and then in a Body to attack the Enemy with all the fury poſſible. Franciſco Hernandez, who from his ſtation obſerved all this motion of the Enemy, and that they were diſpoſed to aſſault them in three ſeveral places; called to his Souldiers, and ſaid, Now, Gentlemen, we muſt either conquer or die, for the Enemy is coming upon us with all their fury: Hereupon a certain Souldier of good experience in the War, whom Hernandez and his men called Colonel Villalva, perceiving that the General and his Souldiers ſeemed ſomewhat cold and deſponding; bid them, as Palentino reports, to be of good courage, for that the Marſhal could never maintain his Order, nor was it poſſible for him to paſs the River without being overthrown; and that the place where they were poſted was ſo ſtrong as could not be taken by ten thouſand men; and that all of them muſt be cut off and periſh in the aſſault, with which ſaying of Villalva Hernandez and his men were greatly encouraged, &c. And indeed it proved according to the words of the Colonel: For Hernandez having drawn up ſome of his Muſquetiers and all his Pikemen in a narrow way, commanded by Piedrahita, and Sotelo, with orders to fight jointly in a Body or ſeparately, and to relieve each other, as occaſion ſhould require. Another great Body of above an hundred Muſquetiers he divided into ſeveral parties, of four and ſix together, and lodged them in the cloſe paſſages, and behind Rocks, Buſhes and Thickets which grew by the River ſide; where was no place to draw up men into a Body, but every one muſt fight by himſelf ſingly; And thence the Rebels could ſhoot with a ſteddy hand, reſting their Muſquets on Buſhes, or Stumps and Branches of Trees. Martin de Robles and his Company of Muſquetiers having paſſed the River, eſteemed themſelves ſo ſecure of Victory, conſidering the ſmall number of the Enemy, that they preſſed haſtily to attack them, intending to gain the honour of the Victory unto themſelves; which they did with ſo much precipitation, that they would not ſtay untill all their men were paſſed over, but attempted the Enemy with the Van or Front onely, whilſt the reſt were wading through the River with water to their middles, or to their Breaſts, and ſome, intent on other matters, ſuffered their Flasks of Powder to be wetted with hanging in the water; but others, more wary, carried their Powder and Muſquets on their heads. Captain Piedrahita, ſeeing Martin de Robles in ſuch haſte and diſorder coming to attack him, ſallied out with great courage, and gave him ſuch a volley of ſhot as killed him ſeveral men; which drove him and his men back again over the River; with which Piedrahita returned very gravely to his former poſt. By this time the Captains Martin de Olmos and John Ramon were come up near to the Fort of Piedrahita, who ſeeing how ill it had paſſed with Martin de Robles, were deſirous to repair the diſgrace and recover the honour which the other had loſt: but the Enemy, being fleſhed and encouraged with the late ſucceſs, received the Aſſailants with the like Volley as they had done the others; and though the fight continued ſome time, yet at length the Victory inclined to Piedrahita, and the contrary party forced to retreat to the River, many of them being killed and wounded, and many of them repaſſed it again. Captain Piedrahita, being greatly animated with the ſucceſs of theſe two encounters, returned to his former ſtation, to be in a readineſs to apply himſelf to thoſe parts where neceſſity moſt required. Now whilſt theſe two misfortunes had befaln the Marſhal, cauſed by the haſty precipitation of Martin de Robles, who would not attend the ſignal of the On-ſet, nor the Orders given him; the Captains and the other parties of Souldiers deſcended down to the River, and paſſed it with extraordinary difficulty; for in that part the water was ſo deep that the Infantry wetted both their Powder and their Muſquets, and the Pikemen loſt their Pikes in the ſtream. Now the Muſquetiers of Hernandez, who, as we ſaid before, were lodged in Ambuſhes, covered with Rocks, Thickets and Caves bordering on the Banks, ſeeing with what difficulty their Enemies were labouring to paſs the ſtream, they aſſailed them within the water, and killed many of them in the River before they were able to paſs over; for, ſhooting with their Muſquets on Reſts, they ſeldom failed to hit the mark at which they aimed; and ſo many were killed and wounded both in that Paſs and in the Plain where they deſigned to draw up, that they could not diſpoſe their Squadrons in the order intended.

The principal perſons killed were John de Saavedra, the Serjeant-Major, Villavicencio, Gomez de Alvarado, Captain Hernando, Alvarez de Toledo, Don Gauriel de Guzman, Diego de Ulloa, Franciſco de Barrientos a Citizen of Cozco, and Simon Pinto an Enſign. The perſons wounded were Martin de Robles, Captain Martin de Alarçon, and Gonçalo Silveſtre, of whom we have formerly made mention at large; and who loſt a Horſe that day killed under him, for which, two days before, Martin de Robles, (to whom the Preſident had given a Revenue of forty thouſand pieces of Eight a year) had offered the ſum of twelve thouſand Ducats, and he refuſed to accept it, having occaſion of a good Horſe at that time for this Battel. We have mentioned this paſſage before in the ſixteenth Chapter of the ninth Book of the firſt Part of theſe Commentaries; but not having ſpecified their names in that place, it comes opportunely and to the purpoſe to inſert them here, and to declare that Gonçalo Silveſtre had his Leg broken with the fall of his Horſe, but by the help of his Indian, who brought him another, though not ſo good as the former, was carried off, and conducted by him to Huamanca, where he ſerved him untill the end of the War with as much fidelity and affection as if he had been his own Son. Beſides theſe perſons of note before named, ſixty common Souldiers of good eſteem were killed likewiſe, who never came to dint of Sword, or puſh of Pike, but were ſhot and birded off at a diſtance.

Theſe were the moſt remarkable paſſages which happened in this Battel, for what ſucceeded afterwards was nothing but confuſion and diſorder; for the greateſt part of the Marſhal's Souldiers refuſed to paſs the River, for they had had enough of the firſt day's Skirmiſh, having tried the ſmartneſs of the Enemy's fire; the fear and dread whereof remained on their ſpirits untill the total defeat.

A certain Souldier, named Perales, revolted over to the Marſhal's ſide, and deſired to have a Gun charged to ſhoot at Hernandez, for he ſaid he knew him well, and had obſerved the colour of his Clothes: a Gun was accordingly given him, with which he made a ſhot, and killed John Alonſo de Badajoz, whom he miſtook for Hernandez, who had the ſame coloured Clothes, and was much of the ſame ſhape and proportion with him. Howſoever he publickly praiſed himſelf for the ſervice he had done; but when the Victory appeared for Hernandez, he returned to him again, and told him, that he had been taken priſoner by the Enemy, but upon upon the rout they had releaſed him; but this piece of Treachery did not paſs unpuniſhed: for ſome few days afterwards, when Perales was at Cozco with the Lieutenant General Diego de Alvarado, Hernandez was informed that Perales made his braggs and boaſted that he had killed him; whereupon Hernandez wrote to his Lieutenant to hang him, which he accordingly performed, for I my ſelf ſaw him hanging on the Gallows in that City. But to return again to the Battel; Piedrahita obſerving the fear and confuſion which was in the Marſhal's Camp, ſallied out of his Fort with about fifty men, crying out and ſinging, Victory, Victory, and firing as they went whereſoever they ſaw twenty or thirty in a company together; all which yielded themſelves with their Arms and Powder, being that which they moſt needed; and in this manner they made Priſoners of above three hundred men whom they carried with them, and who durſt not depart from them or leave them, leſt they ſhould fall into another Parties hand, who would treat them worſe than thoſe of Piedrahita's men to whom they had yielded themſelves Priſoners.

CHAP. XVIII.

Franciſco Hernandez gains the Victory. The Marſhal and his Souldiers are put to flight. The Indians kill many of them on the way.

WHEN the Marſhal Alvarado ſaw that many of his Souldiers declined the Fight, and would not paſs the River; he in perſon led the way, in hopes to animate them to follow his Example: but all his Cries and Calls and Perſuaſions could avail nothing; for they all fled before Piedrahita, who was now in hot purſuit of them. Wherefore ſome of the Marſhal's Friends told him, that it was in vain to endeavour to ſtop the flight of his Souldiers, being purſued by the Enemy; for that it was never known that ever any Army rallied again or ſtopped their courſe who had once turned their backs to the Enemy, unleſs ſome new ſuccour appeared, or ſome ſtrange accident offered it ſelf for their encouragement.

This being ſaid, the Marſhal ſhifted for himſelf and as many as could followed him, and the reſt were ſcattered in divers parts where they thought they could beſt have refuge: ſome whereof went to Arequepa, ſome to the Charcas, others to the new Plantation, and Huamanca, and others travelled along the Coaſt to join with his Majeſty's Army under command of the Juſtices: ſome few, not exceeding ſeven Souldiers, returned to Cozco, of whom we will give ſome relation hereafter.

On the way, which was far and long, which thoſe who fled from the Enemy were to paſs, the Indians killed many of the Spaniards, for they having no offenſive Arms with them, were expoſed to the mercy of all they met. Amongſt thoſe who were thus killed, was the Son of Don Pedro de Alvarado, who was a perſon of great quality, of whom we have given a relation formerly, and that he brought eight hundred men with him into Peru: this Gentleman was named Don Diego de Alvarado, a Son worthy of ſuch a Father; and his untimely and unfortunate death was much lamented by all thoſe who had any acquaintance with his Father: That which induced the Indians to adventure upon this inſolence and cruelty, was a Command given by the Officers of the Marſhal's Forces, (I ſhall mention no man's name particularly) who fanſying to themſelves an aſſurance of victory, in confidence thereof gave Orders to the Indians to kill all thoſe whom they ſhould meet wandering and flying out of the battel; not expecting that this Command ſhould fall on themſelves, but on the Rebels onely whom they intended totally to deſtroy: but it had a contrary effect, and eighty of them were maſſacred by the Indians. The number of thoſe killed in the Battel and in the firſt day's Skirmiſh was above an hundred and twenty, and (as Palentino ſaith)

two hundred and eighty were wounded, of which above fourty dyed for want of care and good attendance, and for want of Chirurgeons, Medicines and good Diet; In fine, every thing was unlucky in that dismal and fatal day. So that the men killed on the Marshal's side, by one way or other, were near two hundred and fifty in all, and of the Rebels not above seventeen. The plunder of the Field (as this Authour saith) was very considerable, being the richest that ever had been in Peru: for the Marshal had engaged in this Battel an hundred of the richest and principal persons of that Countrey, and many who had spent six and seven thousand pieces of Eight, and other two, three, and four thousand pieces.

At the beginning of the Fight Hernandez gave order to his Serjeant Major Antonio Carillo to guard a narrow passage with eight or nine Horse, to intercept such as should steal away out of cowardise, and fly from the danger. In the heat of all the Battel, Albertos de Ordunna, Standard-bearer General to Hernandez came running to them trailing his Colours on the ground, and told them that they must shift for them selves, for that their General was killed, and their Forces defeated; whereupon they all fled and travelled eight or nine leagues that night: but the next day receiving intelligence from the Indians, that the Marshal was routed, and that Hernandez remained Conquerour, they returned to their Camp with sufficient shame and reproach for their Cowardise; though they pretended to have gone in pursuit of the Marshal's men, of which many were fled by those ways: and to countenance them herein, and not to shame them, Hernandez was pleased to own, that he had given them Orders to pursue those who had taken their flight by those ways. The Victory being thus gained by Francisco Hernandez, his Lieutenant-General was desirous at the end of the Fight to shew himself brave, and a Man of action, though during the Battel, he neither acquitted himself like an Officer, nor as the meanest or lowest of the Souldiers: but now to doe something, when the Souldiers brought a Gentleman of Camora prisoner, named Romero the Commissary, who but four days before had conducted a thousand Indians laden with provisions to the Marshal's Camp, as we have formerly mentioned, of which when the Lieutenant was informed, he sent an Emissary of his (whom he used to employ upon such like Messages, called Alonso Gonzales) with Orders to put him to death, before he was brought into the General's presence, well knowing that he would grant him his Pardon, in case any intercession was made for him, which the bloudy Hangman accordingly executed. Then they brought another Prisoner before Hernandez, called Pero Hernandez the Loyal, having deserved that Surname of distinction for the service, duty and fidelity to his Majesty, having always been engaged on his side, but in the War against Gonçalo Piçarro, and also served in quality of a Captain under John Vazquez Coronado, a Citizen of Mexico, when the seven Cities were discovered, as we have given a relation in our History of Florida; And now also he was engaged in the Army of the Marshal against Francisco Hernandez; he had also the Title of Loyal, to distinguish him from other seditious and rebellious Subjects of the same name, such as Pero Hernandez, who was concerned in the Conspiracy of Musu with Diego de Rojas, as we have already related. This Pero Hernandez the Loyal, as Palentino saith, was a Taylor, with which Francisco Hernandez reproached him after he had given him his Pardon at the instance and request of Christopher de Funes, calling him pitifull rascally Taylor, that should dare to rise from his Shopboard, to erect a Standard in the name of his Majesty. But this report of him was false; for I knew him all the time that he was in Peru, for he lodged and dieted in my Father's house; for before he came into the Indies, he had been a domestick Servant in the Illustrious and most Excellent Family of Feria, from which by the blessing of God my Father is descended by a younger Son. Wherefore in regard this Pero Hernandez had been a Servant to that Family, and a Vassal to those Lords, and a Native of Oliva in the Kingdom of Valencia; my Father was kind to him, and treated him with as much respect as if he had been his own Brother: and on the other side this Pero Hernandez behaved himself like an honest worthy person, and kept his two Horses, one of which he called Paxarillo, or Sparrow, for the swiftness of his running; I knew this Horse very well, and I had reason so to doe; for with his Horse after the Wars with Hernandez were ended, a strange accident full of danger befell me, but by the mercifull providence of God, I was preserved from death. This very man, Palentino says, was a Taylor; but it was a mistake of his, and must have been some other man, who was a Taylor, and that set up a Stan-a Standard in Cozco againſt Hernandez: and not this Pero; for during all the time of this War, I remained at Cozco, and then in caſe this Pero Hernandez who lodged in my Father's houſe had ſet up any Standard or Colours, it could not have paſſed without my knowledge; and therefore in this matter I may rather be credited than this Authour. The Youth whom I mentioned in the twenty fifth Chapter of the ſecond Book to have had an Infirmity in his Eyes, and that by applying a certain medicinal Herb thereunto I recovered his Sight which was in danger to be loſt, was the Son of this honeſt Souldier, and was born in my Father's houſe: and now in this year, 1611. he lives at Oliva in Valencia, his Father's Countrey, and is called Martin Loyal, whom his Excellency the Duke of Feria, and the Right Honourable the Marquis of Villanueva de Barca Rota, do employ in their ſervice whenſoever they have occaſion to buy Horſes, or breed them up to the Manage; for he became an Excellent Horſeman in dreſſing the Genet, which was the Horſe that gained and conquered our Countrey, &c.

When Pero Hernandez the Loyal received the firſt Intelligence of the Rebellion of Hernandez Giron, he was then in the Antis, trading for the Herb called Cuca, which, with an Herb called Tunu, yields a great Revenue to his Majeſty: And then leaving his employment, like a loyal Subject to his King, he went to the Marſhal's Camp, where he remained untill he was taken Priſoner at the Battel of Chuquynca, and preſented to Franciſco Hernandez for a Perſon of Quality, and one eminent for the many Services he had formerly acted in ſervice of his Imperial Majeſty, for which reaſon Hernandez gave preſent order to have him executed; and accordingly the Hangman ordering him to kneel down, that he might put the Halter more conveniently about his Neck; and it happening at the ſame time, that a certain Souldier asking the Executioner ſome queſtions, which whilſt he turned about his Head to anſwer, and was in diſcourſe with the Souldier, up roſe this Pero, and ran with ſuch ſwiftneſs, that a Horſe could not have overtaken him; and directly coming to the preſence of Hernandez, he caſt himſelf at his Feet, and embracing both his Legs, he moſt earneſtly prayed and begged his mercy: this Petition of his was ſeconded by all then preſent, and particularly Chriſtopher de Funes, a Citizen of Huamanca, interceded for him, ſaying, that the poor Wretch had already taſted of death by the apprehenſions he had conceived of it when the Halter was about his Neck; Franciſco Hernandez at the importunity of ſo many friends, rather than his own inclinations, gave him his Pardon. This particular paſſed in the manner before related; for afterwards in the time of peace, I have heard the Story repeated in my Father's houſe, both in the preſence and in the abſence of this Pero Hernandez the Loyal; whoſe eſcape out of the hands of the Rebels unto his Majeſty's Camp we ſhall relate in its due place.

CHAP. XIX.

The great Trouble and Diſturbance which the News of the loſs of the Marſhal cauſed in his Majeſty's Camp. The means which the Juſtices took to repair this Loſs. The Diſputes and Differences amongſt the Officers, whether the Army ought to march, or not to march againſt the Rebels. One of the Captains of the Rebels revolts to the King's Forces.

THE ſame rumour which at the Battel of Chuquinca affrighted Antonio de Carrillo, Serjeant Major to Franciſco Hernandez and Albertos de Ordunna, and cauſed them to fly upon a groundleſs report that Hernandez was ſlain; and which afterwards was contradicted, and the truth divulged of the Victory he had gained: the ſame rumour being ſpread amongſt the Indians was related to the Spaniards who lived in the Countries thereabouts; who taking the News upon Hear-ſay, wrote it to the Juſtices, with demands of a reward for their good tydings; but it was not long before winged fame brought the true relation of the fatal overthrow of the Marſhal and his Forces, which raiſed great conſternation and trouble in his Majeſty's Army; and came to that height, that, as Palentino ſaith, Chap. 46. a Council was held amongſt the three Juſtices, without any reaſon or cauſe for it, either to put the Juſtice Santillan to death, or to ſend him Priſoner into Spain, upon pretence that this Santillan had cauſed the loſs of the Battel; but Doctour Saravia differing from the reſt in his opinion, nothing was determined againſt him. And indeed we are not to think it ſtrange, that men ſhould imagine ſome foul play in this matter; for this Victory of Hernandez was ſo contrary to the expectation of all men who had any knowledge in the Affairs of Peru, that no man would believe but that the Marſhal was betrayed, and ſold by his own people, and conſequently they pitched upon the perſons whom they ſuſpected and imagined to be the Contrivers of it: And herein they ſo confidently ſtood, and believed, that if an Angel from Heaven had come and revealed the truth, they would not have been perſuaded into another belief; untill they ſaw many of thoſe whom they ſuſpected of this Treachery, and who were fled from the Battel, to come to his Majeſty's Camp for refuge, ſhowing the Wounds they received, and the Marks of their ill treatment; and then they were convinced of the Errour they had received, and begun to entertain a good opinion of their faithfulneſs and loyalty: ſo ſoon as the people were recovered from their amazement, the Juſtices ordered Antonio de Quinnones, a Citizen of Cozco, with a party of ſixty Muſquetiers, to march to the City of Huamanca for the defence thereof, and to receive ſuch as were fled thither from the Battel, and to hinder the Enemy from taking any refreſhments or ſuccours from thence, of which they might ſtand in need; and ſo it happened accordingly; for Hernandez ſent Captain Cobo to the City for Proviſions and Medicines to cure his wounded men; but Cobo having intelligence that Antonio Quinnones was coming thither, he retired from Huamanca without doing what he deſigned.

At this time two Letters were brought to the Juſtices from divers parts almoſt at the ſame inſtant, one was from the Marſhal de Alvarado, complaining of his ill fortune and the refractarineſs of the People who would not obey his Orders, nor follow his Directions: the other was from Lorenço de Aldana, which in very few words gave an account of the ill ſucceſs of the Battel, ſaying that it was done againſt the ſenſe and opinion of all the principal Officers of the Army: as Palentino writes, Chap. 47. in theſe words:

Upon Monday laſt I wrote to your Lordſhip, ſignifying what I then ſuſpected and feared; for I had no ſooner concluded my Letter, than Lucifer entered into the Marſhal and moved him to reſolve inſtantly to aſſault Hernandez in the Poſt where he had fortified himſelf againſt the ſenſe and opinion of all his Officers, and particularly particularly againſt mine: the which was performed with that diſadvantage to us, that Hernandez ſhot and killed our people, and defeated us, without moving out of the covert of his Fortification, many of our principal men and perſons of Quality are killed; the preciſe number I cannot tell, becauſe the Marſhal retired before Hernandez ſallied out of his Fortification: they ſay the Marſhal is wounded, but I am ſure it was neither with fighting nor giving encouragement to his Souldiers, &c. Thus far Palentino.

The News of the loſs which the Marſhal ſuſtained being now confirmed by all hands; the Juſtices commanded that the Army ſhould march, and follow Hernandez; and reſolved, that the Court of Juſtice ſhould accompany the Army, to give greater authority and reputation, as Palentino ſaith, to their Cauſe and Proceedings, and to take off the murmurings of the Souldiery, who perhaps might complain of the hardſhips they underwent, whilſt the Juſtices were ſolacing and enjoying themſelves at home: but Judge Altamirano oppoſed this reſolution, alledging that his Majeſty having confined the Court of Judicature to Lima, the Bench had no power or authority without the Precincts of that Juriſdiction; nor ought they to remove from thence without expreſs command from his Majeſty. But Doctour Saravia earneſtly inſiſting that the Court was in this emergency obliged to move with the Army; Altamirano poſitively declared, that he was reſolved not to ſtir, for that the King had not given him a Commiſſion to fight, but to ſit upon his Bench, and there to judge ſuch Cauſes as ſhould be brought before him. To which Doctour Saravia replyed, that he would ſuſpend him of his Office in caſe he followed not the Army, and that he would ſend Orders to the Officers of the King's Treaſury to ſtop the payment of his Salary; and accordingly the ſame was notified, though afterwards it was made good by a particular Warrant from his Majeſty. Thus far Palentino.

After long Diſputes of this kind, it was at length determined, that the three Juſtices, viz. Doctour Saravia, Judge Santillan, and Mercado, ſhould attend the Royal Army; and that Altamirano, who had profeſſed himſelf ignorant and unskilfull of Arms, and would wage no other War than civil Pleadings at the Bar, ſhould remain in the City of Los Reyes in quality of Lord Chief Juſtice; and that Diego de Mora, a Citizen of Truxillo, (who, as we have ſaid, brought a good company of Muſquetiers to the Army,) was appointed Governour of the City, and his Company given to another Captain called Pedro de Carate. Things being ordered and diſpoſed in this manner, and a ſufficient Guard being appointed for the Sea-coaſt, the Royal Army marched to Huamanca, on the way whereunto, a Souldier of great reputation, named John Chacon, came to them, having been formerly taken by the Rebels in the Rout at Villacori; but having the credit and eſteem of a good Officer, Hernandez was very deſirous to oblige him to be his friend; and for that reaſon had given him the command of a Company of Muſquetiers: but John Chacon, being a perſon of Loyal Principles to his Majeſty, ſecretly plotted with other friends to kill the Tyrant; but as at that time there was no faith or honeſty amongſt that ſort of People; but that they ſold and betrayed one the other, as they could beſt make their Market; ſo they diſcovered to Hernandez the Plot intended againſt him, of which John Chacon having intimation, he eſcaped before they could ſeize him, and ran away in the ſight of Hernandez and all his Souldiers: howſoever in the way his Life was in great hazard; for (as we have ſaid before) the Indians having received Commands to kill all thoſe who fled from the Battel, they had certainly alſo killed Chacon, had it not been for a Carbine he carried with him, which he often preſented at the Indians, and thereby ſaved his Life: howſoever he came wounded to the Royal Camp, where he gave a large account of the State of Hernandez and his Forces, and of what they intended and deſigned to act; which information the Juſtices made uſe of for their better government, and with much ſatisfaction they marched to Huamanca; where we will leave them to relate what Franciſco Hernandez was doing at the ſame time.

CHAP. XX.

What Franciſco Hernandez acted after the Battel. He ſends Officers to ſeveral parts of the Kingdom to plunder the Cities. The quantity of Silver which they robbed from two Citizens at Cozco.

After the Battel Franciſco Hernandez remained forty days within his Fortification; both to pleaſe himſelf with the thoughts of Victory, and to cure thoſe of the King's Party who had received wounds in the Fight, whom he careſſed and treated as kindly as was poſſible, to oblige them to remain his Friends, of which many followed him untill the day of his overthrow: during which time, he diſpatched his Lieutenant-General Alvarado to Cozco in purſuit of thoſe who had eſcaped out of the Battel: and likewiſe ordered his Serjeant-Major Antonio Carrillo, to go to the City of Peace, to Cucuito, Potocſi and the City of Plate, and to travel over all the Provinces to gather what Men, Arms and Horſes he could find; that by ſuch an employment he might divert and recover himſelf from the melancholy he had conceived for his late ſhamefull flight out of the Battel of Chuquinca: and particularly he charged him to get what Gold and Silver he could find, and alſo the Wine which was hidden; for a certain Souldier, lately of the Marſhal's Army, named Franciſco Bolonna, told him, that he knew where a great quantity was concealed: to bring which, Antonio Carrillo, with a party of twenty Souldiers, taking Franciſco Bolonna together with them, was ordered abroad; of which twenty Souldiers two onely were belonging to Hernandez, and the reſt had been the Marſhal's men: for which reaſon it was generally ſuſpected, and ſecretly whiſpered, that Hernandez had ſent his Serjeant-Major with theſe men to confound and deſtroy them, and not to the end declared; which accordingly happened, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Likewiſe John de Piedrahita was ſent to the City of Arequepa, to provide what Men, Horſes and Arms he could find: and upon this occaſion he gave him the Title of his Major-General of the Army of Liberty; for ſo Hernandez ſtyled his Forces, calling them Reſtorers of the People's Liberty: And then to Alvarado he named him his Lord Lieutenant, that with theſe ſwelling Titles theſe two great Officers might be encouraged with more pride and vain-glory to act the part they had undertaken.

According to Orders Alvarado went to Cozco in purſuit of thoſe who had fled from the Battel at Chuquinca; and the day before he entred into the City ſeven Souldiers of thoſe formerly belonging to the Marſhal came thither (the chief of which was called John de Cardona) and brought the ſad news of the Marſhal's defeat, to the great grief and amazement of the whole City, who could not believe it poſſible for ſuch a ruinous fellow as Hernandez to gain ſuch a Victory: and being now affrighted with the cruelty of this Tyrant, they reſolved all to fly, and abandon the City rather than to fall into his mercileſs hands. Franciſco Rodriguez de Villafuerte, who was then High Conſtable, gathered what people of the City he could together, which, with the ſeven Souldiers that were fled, could ſcarce make up the number of forty men, and with theſe he marched by the way of Collao: ſome of theſe took up their lodging for the firſt night about a league and a half from the City of which the High Conſtable was one, but others proceeded three or four leagues farther, by which means they preſerved themſelves: for this honeſt John de Cardona ſeeing the Conſtable take up his Quarters ſo near the Town, he ſtole privately away from them, and came to Cozco about midnight, where he gave information to Alvarado where Villafuerte and about twenty others with him remained about a league and a half from the Town: whereupon he commanded Alonſo Gonçalez the Hangman General with a party of twenty men immediately to march forth and take Villafuerte and his Companions; which was performed with that diligence, that the next morning before eight a Clock Villafuerte and his Companions were all brought back to Cozco, and delivered into the hands of the Lord Lieutenant Alvarado; who intended to have put Villafuerte and ſeveral of thoſe with him to death; but in regard no crime could be laid to their charge, the interinterceſſion of the Friends and Relations of Hernandez Giron in their behalf, prevailed for them, and obtained their Pardon. Amongſt the many Evils and Impieties which this Alvarado committed by order and direction of his General in this City of Cozco; it was none of the leaſt, that in a Sacrilegious manner he robbed the Cathedral Church, and the Monaſteries of the Bells belonging to them. For from the Convent of our Lady of the Merceds, they took one of their two Bells, from the Dominicans they did the like; but from the Convent of St. Francis they took none, becauſe they had but one, which at the earneſt intreaty of the Friers, they were perſwaded to leave. From the Cathedral, out of five Bells they took only two, and would have taken them all, had not the Biſhop with his Clergy appeared in their defence, and thundered out his Curſes and Excommunications againſt them; for the Bells of the Cathedral were very great, and had been bleſſed and conſecrated by the Hands of the Biſhop with Chriſm and holy Oyl. Of theſe four Bells they founded ſix pieces of Cannon, one of which burſt upon the tryal; and upon the biggeſt of their Guns they impreſt the word LIBERTIE, which was the plauſible name they gave for a pretence of their Rebellion. Theſe Guns which were made of hallowed and ſanctified Metal, did never do any ſervice, nor was any Man killed thereby, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Beſides this piece of Sacriledge, this Lord Lieutenant committed ſeveral Robberies and Spoils upon the Eſtates of thoſe who were fled, and of thoſe who were killed at the Battel of Chuquinca, and had the reputation of being rich, becauſe they were better Husbands, and not ſo prodigal as others who lived in that City; and who, as it was believed, had many Bars of Silver in their poſſeſſion: Alvarado by his Induſtry, and by threats and menaces affrighted the Indians into a diſcovery of two Pits which Alonſo de Meſa had made in the Garden of his Houſe; from each of which they drew out ſixty Bars of Silver, every Bar being of the value of Three hundred Ducats. I my ſelf had the fortune to ſee them taken out, for the Houſe of Alonſo de Meſa being in the middle of the Street where my Father's Houſe is, I went thither at the ſhout they made upon the diſcovery of ſo great a prize. Some few days after they took away from the Indians, belonging to John de Saavedra, an hundred and fifty Sheep of that Countrey, laden with three hundred Bars of Silver, all of the ſame ſize and value with the others. And now it was believed, that the reaſon why this John de Saavedra would not fly out of the City the night on which Hernandez began his Rebellion, as my Father and others would have perſwaded him, was to conceal and ſecure his great quantity of Silver, which was the cauſe he loſt both that and his Life with it. Theſe two parcels of Silver, according to the uſual valuation, amounted unto a hundred twenty ſix thouſand Caſtilian Ducats, of three hundred ſeventy five Maravedis to each Ducat. And though Palentino ſaith, That Diego Ortiz de Guzman had ſome ſhare in the loſs thereof; for my part, I muſt ſay, That I knew nothing of it, nor did I ever hear, that any other was concerned beſides the two before mentioned.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Robbery committed by Antonio Carrillo, and of the manner of his Death. The ſucceſſes of Piedrahita at Arequepa; the Victory which was obtained by means of the differences which aroſe there.

NOr had the Sargeant Major Carrillo been leſs notorious for his Robberies (had his Life continued) than were thoſe before named; for he ſacked and plundered the new Plantation, and the other Cities of the Diſtrict of Collaſuyu; and in a very few days he plundered the Caciques of that Juriſdiction of the Tribute which they owed to their Maſters, and of other things, which amounted to an incredible ſum, as Palentino Chap. 49. declares, in theſe words,

Antonio Carrillo took the Collectors of the Monies belonging to Men who had Eſtates in that Country, with all the Caciques, and kept them Priſoners, threatning them with Puniſhment and Death, unleſs they delivered up the Moneys and Tributes belonging to their Maſters; from whom, and from many Pits where Silver was buried in the Monaſtery of St. Francis, and other parts within the City and without, they robbed in the ſpace of five days above the value of five hundred thouſand pieces of Eight in Gold and Silver, beſides Wine and other things, &c. Thus far this Author.

All which was effected by the Directions and Contrivance of Franciſco Bolonam, who was well acquainted with all the ſecret concealments of thoſe things; and this Plunder and Robbery had proceeded farther, had not the diſcoverer thereof, by the checks of his own Conſcience, and by the perſwaſion of John Bazquez Governour of Chucuitu, been inſtrumental to reſtore all the Plunder back again to the true Proprietors: for he and other Comrades of his killed poor Antonio Carrillo with their Swords and Daggers in his own Chamber, and reduced the City to the ſervice of his Majeſty, as formerly it had been: And in this manner the unfortunate Carrillo ended his days. But the Major General John Piedrahita ſucceeded better in Arequepa than the Sargeant Major Carrillo had done, by reaſon of the diſpute and difference between the Governour of Arequepa, and Captain Gomez de Solis, whom the Juſtices had ſent thither with Commiſſion to Command in Chief all the Forces which were raiſed there againſt Hernandez: At which the Governour took great offence, eſteeming himſelf a better Souldier, and more experienced in the War than Gomez de Solis. As Diego Hernandez relates, Chap. 51. in theſe words,

When Gomez de Solis was departed from his Majeſties Camp with his own Commiſſion, and another for his Enſign Vicencio de Monte, the news of his coming was brought to the City before his arrival, which cauſed many to prepare themſelves to go forth and meet him; but the Governour Gonçalo de Torre, highly reſenting to have another ſet over him, declared, That the Juſtices had no power in his Juriſdiction; and conſequently, that Gomez de Solis was not authorized by ſufficient warrant; nor was any perſon capable of ſuch Command whilſt he was Governour in that City; and thus publickly profeſſing his diſlike of this matter, would not conſent that any perſon ſhould go forth to meet, and receive him, &c. Thus far Diego de Hernandez.

Whilſt theſe matters were in debate, news was brought, That John de Piedrahita was marching thither with a hundred and fifty Men, of which a hundred were the moſt expert Muſquetiers of any amongſt all the Forces of Hernandez; with affrightment of which, all the Inhabitants ran into the Great Church, carrying their Wives and Children, and Houſholdſtuff along with them, and fenced it about with a high Wall, to hinder the entrance of the Enemy thereinto: and at the corner of every Street they placed thoſe few Muſquetiers which they had in the Town, to fire on the Enemy from the Windows and Loop-holes, without being ſeen by them. But in a Country where Civil-wars are, there are always Factions, and Parties, and falſe Brethren, by whoſe means Piedrahita received information of the Ambuſh which was laid for him; wherefore altering his courſe, he entered by another Street, by way of the Biſhop's Houſe, where he met with a ſmall reſiſtance, but nothing conſiderable. In the mean time came a Dominican Frier ſent from Piedrahita, who aſſured them, That Piedrahita would not break with them, but deſired to maintain a Friendſhip, and good Correſpondence with them, leaving the Souldiers of one ſide and the other free, and at their own choice, either to ſerve the King, or to joyn with Hernandez, as they were guided by their Inclinations, only the ſurpluſage of the Arms, of which they had no uſe, he deſired might be ſurrendred up into his Hands. Gomez de Solis would not accept of theſe Conditions, it ſeeming an infamous action for him to reſign Arms to an Enemy, though ſuch as were ſuperfluous; howſoever the next day he condeſcended to the Articles, and even begged for them, becauſe that night they had burnt ſome Houſes of his, (though his Eſtate was chiefly in the Charcas) with other principal Houſes of that City. And though they made a Truce for three days, yet the the Rebels broke it ſo ſoon as they heard that many of Gomez de Solis his Men were fled, and the reſt refuſed to fight, upon which they were ſo encouraged, that they attempted the Wall and Barracadoe which was made. When Gomez de Solis, and other Men of Eſtates, who were with him, perceived that their Men would not fight, they fled, and made their eſcape in the beſt manner they could, leaving Piedrahita in poſſeſſion of all the Riches and Wealth they had gathered, with which the Enemy returned fully laden and ſucceſsful to their Captain General Franciſco Hernandez: And though in the return, above twenty of thoſe Souldiers formerly belonging to the Marſhal, which Piedrahita carried with him, fled away and left him, yet he conſidered them as nothing, being forced Men, nor valuable in reſpect of that immenſe booty and ſpoils which they had taken, in Gold, Silver, Jewels, Arms, and Horſes.

Hernandez (whom we left in the Fortreſs, where he fought the Battel of Chuquinca) having remained there a Moneth and a half, for the ſake of the wounded Men; marched afterwards in the beſt manner he could to the Valley of Antahuailla, being highly incenſed againſt the Indians of the Charcas for daring to fight againſt him at the Battel of Chuquinca, where they killed ſeveral of his Souldiers with Stones and Slings; wherefore being come into thoſe Provinces, he gave orders to his Souldiers, as well Negers as White-men, to plunder the People, and burn their Houſes, and to do them all the ruine and miſchief they were able. From Antahuailla Hernandez ſent for his Wife, and for the Wife of Thomas Vazquez, for whom the Souldiers made a Solemn Reception, and were ſo fooliſh and impudent as to ſtile Hernandez his Wife Queen of Peru. Having remained a few days in the Province of Antahuailla, and there vented their Anger and Spleen againſt the Indians, they marched towards Cozco, and having intelligence that the Kings Forces were coming after them, they paſſed the two Rivers of Amancay and Apurimac; which Hernandez ſurveying, and obſerving the many difficult paſſages which were there, and places ſo naturally ſtrong, as might eaſily be defended againſt any Army which ſhould aſſault him therein; he would often ſay, That in caſe he had not ſent away his Major General Piedrahita with his choice Men, he would have ſtay'd and given the Juſtices Battel in ſome of thoſe ſtrong and difficult paſſes: Whileſt Hernandez marched in this manner, ſix Souldiers of note, which formerly belonged to the Marſhal, adventured to run away in ſight of the whole Army, with their Horſes, Arms, and other Conveniences. Nor would Hernandez ſuffer them to be purſued; for ſince they were no more than ſix in all, he was contented to let them go, rather than to adventure others to fetch them back, leſt they alſo ſhould follow their example. Thoſe ſix Souldiers being come to his Majeſties Camp informed them, How that Hernandez was marching to Cozco, with intention to proceed to the Collao. Upon which intelligence the Juſtices gave order to the Army to march with all expedition, and yet with ſuch due caution and circumſpection as was requiſite, though by reaſon of the many animoſities and differences which aroſe amongſt the principal Officers, the progreſs of matters was much obſtructed, and his Majeſties Service prejudiced and delay'd.

CHAP. XXII.

Franciſco Hernandez dares not to adventure into Cozco; he carries his Wife with him from thence.

Franciſco Hernandez paſſed all his Army over the River Apurimac by way of the Bridge, to guard which, he left one Valderravano with a Party of twenty Souldiers; but not confiding in the Honeſty or Conduct of the Man, he ſent two days afterwards John Gavilan to take that Charge, and ordered Valderravano to follow him to his Head-quarters. John Gavilan having the Guard of the Bridge committed to him, he had ſcarce been there two days, before the Van of his Majeſties Army appeared; upon ſight of which, not ſtaying any longer, or obſerving who they were, or in what number, he ſet fire to the Bridge, and burnt it, and afterwards returned to his Captain General with all expedition; which Action, as Palentino ſaith, ſo much diſpleaſed Hernandez, that he gave Gavilan very ſevere words for having ſo done: Though I cannot imagine, what reaſon he ſhould have for it; for ſince he had no intention, as may be believed, to return again by that way, I know not what dammage his Party could receive thereby; and it is very evident on the contrary, that the enemy was damnified and forced to great trouble, and difficulties in their paſſage over. Hernandez marched by the Valley of Yucay, to enjoy (tho' but for 2 days) the pleaſures of that delightful Country: and being come with his Army within a League of Cozco, he turned off by the left hand; being perſwaded by the Aſtrologers, Diviners, or Prognoſticators, not to go thither; ſaying, that his entrance there, would be unfortunate, and prove his overthrow: to evidence which, they produced many Examples, as well of Indian Captains, as of Spaniards, who had been defeated after their entrance into Cozco; but they did not ſpecifie thoſe who had been ſucceſsful, of which we could give many particulars, in caſe it were pertinent to our purpoſe. In confirmation hereof, Diego Hernandez, (chapters 32. and 45.) names 4 Spaniards, and a Moriſcan Woman, who were eſteemed skilful in the Art of Necromancy, and who gave out, that they held a correſpendence with a familiar Spirit, which diſcovered to them all the ſecret counſels, and actions which were reſolved, and which paſſed in his Majeſties Camp; which report ſerved to keep many people ſo in awe, that they durſt neither adventure to fly, nor act any thing to the prejudice of the Rebels, leſt the Devil ſhould make a diſcovery of their intentions. I my ſelf ſaw a Letter which Hernandez wrote to Piedrahita at Cozco, when orders were ſent him to go to Arequepa, as we ſaid before: And in that he tells him, that he ſhould not remove out of the City on ſuch a day of the Week, but on ſuch a day; and that his name of Juan was not to be written henceforward with an V. but with an O. of which nature were many other things in the Letter, which I cannot ſo particularly remember, as to deliver them in Writing, only I can ſay, that he was generally eſteemed for a Cheat, and an Impoſter: And by this ſort of Conjuring and Tricks, (as is uſual) he haſtned his own ruine and deſtruction, as we ſhall ſee by the ſequel.

The Well-wiſhers of Hernandez, who were acquainted with the Correſpondencies and Compacts which he had with Wizzards; made it a queſtion amongſt themſelves, why he made no uſe of the Indians of the Country who were famous for Conjurations, and Diabolical Arts: To which anſwer was made, that their General had no Opinion of the Magick and Witchcraft of the Indians, which were fooleries, rather than any real contract, or dealing with the Devil. And herein they had ſome reaſon, as we have proved and evinced by ſeveral Inſtances, in the firſt part of theſe Commentaries, Book the 4. Chap. 16. One of which, was their Prognoſtication of good or bad Fortune, by the palpitation or twinkling of the Eye; and another ſort of Divination they took from the buzzing, or ſinging of the Ears, which, as we mentioned in the foregoing Chapter, ſo we ſhall hear repeat it again; having the Authority of a Synod held in that Empire, whereby this vain Superſtition is condemned by a Catholick Cannon; and Advertiſements are given to Confeſſors, to let them know, that the Indians take their Superſtitious Divinations from ſeeing and hearing: That of the hearing, I have obſerved many of them to uſe in this manner, when they found at any time a humming or buzzing in their right Ear; they ſaid, that ſome Friend or Kinſman was ſpeaking well of them; and to know who this Friend was, they would clap the Palm of their right hand to their Mouth, and breathing hard upon it, they would think of ſome Friend, and then carry it cloſe to the Ear; and if the humming did not preſently ceaſe, they would think of another Friend, and do as before; and then of another; and he, with thoughts of whom the humming went away, it was concluded, that he was the perſon who ſpake well of the Party.

In like manner, when they found a humming in their left Ear, they would ſay, that an Enemy ſpake ill of them; and to find out who it was, they uſed the like application of their left hand, and he, with whom in their thoughts the the humming ceaſed, they concluded, ſuch perſon to be the evil ſpeaker, and from that time, they would conceive malice againſt him, and for ever prove his Enemy. And upon ſuch fooleries as theſe, the Friends of Hernandez declared, that the Indians had no Art in Necromancy, nor was any Faith to be given to their Prognoſtications.

The Rebel Hernandez overtook his Army in a plain, which is behind the Fortreſs of Cozco, where, as Palentino ſaith, he made a viſit to Franciſco Rodriguez de Villa fuerte, who was Juſtice in ordinary of that City; complaining highly of the Citizens of Cozco, and ſwearing that he would kill and deſtroy them, becauſe they had done him all the miſchief that they were able: but he had a mind to quarrel with them becauſe they eſpouſed not his Cauſe, nor followed him as he deſired. From thence he marched his Army over thoſe Hills which are Eaſtward from the City, as his Aſtrologers had directed, and carried his Wife with him to the great grief of all her Friends and Relations, ſaying, That he would not leave her in the power of his Enemy, to revenge themſelves on her for the Crimes of which he himſelf was only guilty; and ſo he proceeded to the Valley of Orcos, about five Leagues from the City: And here I will leave him for a while, to ſpeak of the Preſent which the Son of this Franciſco Rodriguez de Villa fuerte made me in Spain, though I had formerly never ſeen him, nor had any other acquaintance with him than by intercourſe of Letters. The ſecond Son, I ſay, of this Gentleman, was ſent into Spain to ſtudy, and lived in Salamanca ſeveral years, where he improved greatly in all Sciences; he was called Don Feliciano Rodriguez de Villa fuerte, which name agreed properly with the Gallantry and Ingenuity of his Spirit. At the beginning of this Year 1611, this Gentleman did me the favour to ſend me a little Box about the length and breadth of half a Sheet of Paper, all filled with Holy Reliques, wrapt up in ſeveral parcels with Inſcriptions thereon, what, and of whom they were; and amongſt the reſt, there was a little piece of the Holy Croſs, put into a Frame of Wood curiouſly Carved, and covered with a Glaſs, and gilded about the Croſs, which was eaſie to be ſeen. With this Box of Reliques he ſent me two Dials made by his own Hand, one of the Sun, with a Needle turning to the North, the Shadow on which perfectly ſhews the Hour of the Day. Another Dial was of the Moon curiouſly wrought according to the exact Rules of Aſtrology, with all the Circular Motions divided into twenty nine parts, which make up the Days of the Lunary Moneth: It hath alſo the true Figure of the Moon with its Increaſe and Decreaſe, its Conjunction and Full: It alſo by the ſhadow caſt on it (the Gnomen thereof being altered according to the age of the Moon) ſhews the Hour of the Night; it hath alſo many other Curioſities which I ſhall omit in this place, all which was made by his own Hand, without any other aid or directions whatſoever, both as to the Material Part, as alſo to the Mathematical, to the great admiration of many curious Men, as well Virtuoſi as others: And for my part, I cannot but glory and boaſt very much to ſee a Man born in my Country and my City, to have been the Maſter of ſo excellent a piece of Ingenuity and Learning, ſo much admired by the Artiſts of this part of the World; the which may ſerve for a demonſtration of the Natural Genius of the People of Peru, and their capacity to receive all Arts and Sciences, as well thoſe who are of Mongrel Race between Spaniards and Indians, as all others born there, the which we touched upon before, and ſignified how much ſome have been improved therein by the Induſtry and Authority of our Schoolmaſter John de Cuellar, who was a Canon of the Holy Church of Cozco, who taught Grammar in that City, though but for a ſhort time. Praiſed be our Lord God for the ſame. Amen. Which having ſaid, we ſhall return to Peru, to relate the ſucceſs of his Majeſties Army in their March, having left them formerly in the City of Huamanca.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Royal Army passes the Rivers of Amancay, and Apurimac, with more facility and ease than was expected. The Scouts and Van of the Army come to Cozco.

WHen the Kings Army marched out of Huamanca in pursuit of Francisco Hernandez, of whom they had received intelligence, that he had taken the way towards Cozco; they proceeded with all care and due circumspection, having their Scouts and Spies before them: When they came to the River Amancay, they forded it over where it was most shallow; but for their Footmen, who were laden, and such as carried the Artillery, they made a Bridge at a place (with much ease) where the River is very narrow: At this place an unlucky accident fell out, which was this, Captain Antonio Luxan having passed the River, stooped down on the side of the Bank to drink, and taking up the Water with his Hands, as he was rising up, both his Feet slid from under him on the Rock whereon he stood, and so he fell backwards into the Water, and sunk down, and never appeared more, though all possible care and diligence was used to recover him; only about two years afterwards the Indians brought his Coat of Mail unto Cozco, at the time when my Father was Chief Justice of the City. The Command of his Foot Company was afterwards conferred on John Ramon, though he had lately lost his former Company in Chuquinca.

The Army being come to the River of Apurimac received the news of this unhappy accident; and also was informed, That one of the Scouts named Francisco Menacho with about forty more of his Companions had passed the River, and that he like a brave and resolute Souldier had shewed and led them the way which never any had attempted before; and that he had boldly cast himself in at the place which is now called the Ford, and that he had passed and repassed it several times whilest the Camp was marching thither, the which rash and precipitate action in him gave boldness to the whole Army to follow his Example, and to pass over without loss of time, which would have caused great delay, had they attended there until a Bridge could have been erected: And for the better security of their Footmen with their Burdens, and for the Indians, who carried the Artillery; the Horse were ordered to flank them on the side to break the force of the Currant, by which means all the Footmen and Indians who were laden, came safely to the other side without any loss or danger; as Palentino confirms, Chap. 50. And herein the Providence of God is much to be admired, for though an Army passed then without danger, yet since that time no single person hath adventured upon it, nor durst any Man attempt to wade or ford it over. And now being got to the other side, they entered on a Mountainous and Rocky Way, full of labour, and difficulty, and the second Day afterwards they came to Arimacrampu, seven Leagues distant from the City: And from thence they proceeded farther the very Night they came thither, though the Officers were much disquieted and troubled to see the Orders given by one Party, to be again presently Countermanded by others of a different Faction; which was the cause that the Scouts and Van of the Kings Army, and of Hernandez his Forces, marched always in view each of the other; for the Rebels seemed not to fly, but to proceed on their way in an orderly manner, as if they apprehended no danger from their Enemy in the Rear: Thus at length they came to Sacsahuana four Leagues from the City, from whence those who were Citizens of Cozco, were desirous to be ordered abroad upon the Scout, with which occasion they made a visit to their Wives and Children at home, where they came about Noon, and the same Day in the Morning Alvarado the Lieutenant General of the Rebels had departed thence. That Night the Citizens would not lie in their own Houses, lest the Enemy should ſhould return, and ſurprize them, but they contrived to lodge altogether with ſome few Souldiers, which they had brought with them, and fortified themſelves in the Houſe of John Pancoroo, to which there was no entrance, or acceſs, by any back paſſage, but only by the Fore-gate of the principal Street; and at the diſtance of ſeven or eight paces from the Gate, they raiſed up a Breaſt-work, with Loop-holes to ſhoot out at with their Muſquets, by which they could fire into three Streets, one on the right hand, and the other two on the ſide, where they remained all night in ſecurity, having placed their Centinels in all Avenues leading towards the Houſe: I was with them all the night, and was ſent three or four times with Meſſages to the Neighbours Houſes.

The next day, being in my Father's Court-yard, about 3 a clock in the Afternoon, I ſaw Pero Hernandez the Loyal, come galloping in at our Gate, on his Horſe Paxarillo; at which I was ſo over-joyed, that, without ſpeaking to him, I ran in to my Father to carry him the good news; on notice of which, my Father inſtantly ran to meet him, and they both embraced with great kindneſs: And Pero told him, that the day before the Rebels marching, ſomething more than a League from the City; he took an occaſion, on pretence of ſome neceſſities of Nature, to go aſide from them, and taking towards the left hand of the way amongſt ſome high Rocks, he hid himſelf there for a while, and then climbed up the Mountain, whence ſeeing the Rebels at a diſtance, he made his eſcape, and was come thither. After which he went with my Father to the King's Army, and there ſerved until the end of the War, and then returned back again with my Lord Garçilaſſo into Cozco. Of all which I was an Eye Witneſs, and as ſuch have given this faithful Relation.

CHAP. XXIV.

His Majeſties Camp enters into Cozco, and from thence marches forwards: An account is given how the Indians carried the Train of Artillery on their Shoulders. Part of the Amunition arrives at the Royal Army.

THE third day after the Citizens had made a viſit to their Relations and Concernments in the City, the Royal Camp made their Entry with the Troops and Companies in good order. The Infantry drew up in the Chief Place or Square, and the Horſe skirmiſhed with the Foot, according to the Rules of Military Diſcipline, and both charged each other with handſome Vollies, and quick Fire; for the Souldiers were become very ready and expert at their Arms. And though Palentino ſaith, that Don Phelipe de Mendoça, who was General of the Ordnance, brought his great Guns into the Parade, and fired them ſeveral times, and that the Muſquetiers, marching the Round, made ſeveral handſome Vollies; but herein this Writer was much miſtaken, as he hath been in many other Paſſages; for the Artillery could not be eaſily fixed, and put in order, ſo as to be uſed at every turn, and unneceſſary occaſion; for they were not drawn on their Carriages, but carried on the Indians Shoulders, and that with ſo much difficulty, that to manage eleven pieces of Cannon only with their Carriages, was the work of ten thouſand Indians: I my ſelf ſaw them brought into Cozco, and was then in the place when they were again carried out; and the manner how they mannaged them was this.

Every piece of Ordnance was faſtned to a large Beam of about forty foot in length; under this were fixed ſeveral croſs Bars, about the bigneſs of a Mans Arm, at two foot aſunder, and of about half a yard long on each ſide the Beam; under which two Indians were placed, one on one ſide, and one on the other, after the manner that the Palanquines are carried in Spain. The burthen they carried was laid on their Shoulders cloſe to their Necks, where they wore wore a Pad or Pannel to keep them from galling with the weight, and at every 200 paces they were relieved by a freſh Company. And here we may leave the Reader to conſider, with how much trouble and labour theſe poor Indians carried theſe weighty Burdens over thoſe Rocky and Mountainous ways which are in my Country; and over aſcents, and deſcents of three and four Leagues long, and ſo ſteep, that many Spaniards, whom I have ſeen travelling, have for eaſe of their Horſes and Mules, alighted off from their backs, eſpecially at a deſcent, which are many times ſo ſteep that a man cannot ſit in his Saddle, but it will be on the horſe-neck, notwithſtanding the Crupper, which often breaks: and ſuch kind of way as this we have from Quitu to Cozco, which are 500 Leagues diſtant; but from Cozco to the Charcas the way is more pleaſant, being for the moſt part a plain Countrey. And hereby we may underſtand, that, what Palentino ſaith concerning the Artillery which Felipe de Mendoça brought into the Parade, and fired ſeveral times, was rather to ſpeak fine things, as in a Romance, and to embelliſh his Hiſtory, than that any ſuch thing was really acted, or put into practice; as we have ſaid before.

His Majeſties Army marched out, and encamped about a League from the City, where they continued about five days to put all things in a readineſs, and make Proviſions of every thing they ſtood in need; and until the Indians of the neighbouring Places could bring in the Victuals and Stores they had gathered; there was need of Horſe-Shoes and other Iron-works; and before the one could be forged, and the other got together, time was required: And this certainly was the reaſon that detained the Army ſo many days; and not what our Author alledges, Chapter the 50*th.* in theſe words, The Camp, ſaith he, remained in the Salinas five or ſix days, in expectation of Indians to carry the Baggage; but they came not, but rather ſeveral of them fled to their own Homes; and becauſe they belonged to Planters, who had their Eſtates and Lands near to Cozco, it was ſuſpected that they were ſent away by order of their Maſters. I am troubled to find this, and ſuch like Paſſages in the Hiſtory of this Author, which argues ſome kind of Paſſion or Pique he had againſt the Inhabitants of Cozco, whom he frequently blames on all occaſions, in matters whereof they never were guilty: And indeed it were more reaſonable to believe, that theſe Citizens, and Men of Eſtates, ſhould contribute all they were able to put an end to this War, rather than to do any act which might be a means to protract and hinder the final determination of it; nor could it be to the advantage of the Citizens, to be acceſſory to any Act (ſuch as ſending away the Indians) which might occaſion the ſtay of the Army in parts ſo near the City, from which they could not expect other than troubles, perpetual moleſtations, and damages to their Eſtates, during all the time of their quarters in that place. And moreover this Author ſeems to contradict himſelf, in ſaying, that the Army was detained in expectation of Indians to carry their Baggage, and for want of them they could not proceeed; and then afterwards, he ſaith, that many of them fled away, and yet the Army raiſed their Camp, and departed without them: But the truth of what paſſed in this particular, was this; That, by order of the General, many of the Indians who were appointed to carry Burdens were diſmiſt, by reaſon that the way afterwards being plain and without Rocks, or Mountains, or hollow Cavities, they ſtood not in need of the Service of ſo many Indians as formerly, and therefore diſcharged ſeveral of them as uſeleſs and cumberſom to the Camp. In fine, the Army, after five days ſtay, departed from their Quarters near the City, and marched in good Order, and always in a readineſs to engage the Enemy, in caſe they ſhould be attacked by them in any of thoſe narrow paſſages which are between the City and Quequeſana: But the Rebels had another Game to play, ſuffering them to paſs quietly and undiſturbed, until they came to the People called Pucara, about forty Leagues diſtant from Cozco, only they found themſelves ſomething diſtreſſed for want of Proviſions, becauſe the Negers, who were Souldiers to the Rebels, having divided themſelves into two bands on both ſides of the Road, had droven all the Cattel away, and taken all the Proviſions with them that they could find, leaving nothing behind for ſubſiſtance of his Majeſties Army. And now the Scouts of both the parties met each with the other, and yet no Skirmiſhes, or Encounters paſſed between them; only the Juſtices received Intelligence, that the Rebels

Rebel's Army expected them in Pucara, with intention to give them Battel; for at that time there were Fugitives from both Parties; some of the King's Army flying to the Rebels, and some of the Rebels to the Royalists, so that by such an intercourse no Counsels or Designs could be concealed. The Justices being on the march to Pucara, sent away with all haste to have the Powder, Ammuniton, Match and Bullet to be brought to them, which had been left behind in Antahuailla, by the negligence of some Officers: Howsoever by the care and diligence of Pedro de Cianca, who was appointed for that Service, such expedition was made, that the Ammunition arrived at the Army in good time, and the day before the Battel, to the great satisfaction and encouragement of the Army.

CHAP. XXV.

The King's Army comes to the place where the Rebels had fortified themselves. They encamp in a Plain, and intrench; several Skirmishes happen, to the disadvantage of the King's Party.

THE Justices, as they were on their march, received the ill news of the unfortunate loss of Gomez de Solis in Arequepa; at which though they were much troubled, yet being that which could not be remedied, they dissembled the resentment of it, and proceeded on their way to Pucara, where the Enemy had fortified themselves to great advantage, in a place so situated, and strong by Nature, that they could not be attacked on any side: it being encompassed about with a Mountain so steep and cragged, that it was not passable without much difficulty, and seemed to be a wall made by Hand and Art; the entrance thereunto was very narrow, with windings and turnings to the right, and left, but the lodgment therein was wide and capacious, sufficient to receive their men, and beasts, with all the appurtenances belonging to their Camp. They had store of all Provisions and Ammunition, for after so signal a Victory as that obtained at Chuquinca, they could want nothing; and moreover their bands of Negers, or black Guard, brought daily in such Provisions as they found in the neighbouring Parts. On the other side, his Majesties Camp was pitched in an open plain, without any natural Fortification or defence, and ill-provided either with Victuals or Ammunition, (as we have said); howsoever not to lye open, and exposed to the Enemy, they intrenched in the best manner they were able; casting up earth breast high round the Camp; which was not difficult to be done, by the help of so many Indians, who having been formerly employed in carrying the Artillery, did now serve for Pioneers, and other Offices belonging to the Camp; and by their labour in a very short time a Trench was cast up quite round the Army. Francisco Hernandez observing in what manner his Majesties Forces were encamped, mounted a battery of Cannon on the top of a Hill, from whence he could shoot into the Enemies Camp; and oftentimes in bravery would shoot over into the plains; and thus continued firing day and night, to the great disturbance of the Justices and all their Army: and howsoever (which is strange) the Bullets, as if they had been pellets of wind, did no hurt either to Man or Beast: The which we must attribute to the Mystery of Divine Providence, which would not permit those Guns made, and founded out of the consecrated Metal of Bells dedicated to God's Service, to be useful in such bloody Tragedies, as was observed by considering men, both in one Camp and in the other. Both Armies being thus encamped in sight of each other; the Officers and Souldiers desired to signalize their valour by some feats of Arms; in the first Skirmishes two Souldiers of good Reputation on the King's side were killed, and five or six others ran away to Hernandez, and gave an account of the State and Condition of the Royal Army; and how that ſome few days before their coming to Pucara, the General Paulo de Meneſes, in diſcontent, would have laid down his Commiſſion, by reaſon of the Factions and Differences which were continually amongſt the Officers, who would not obey his Orders, but rather contradicted, and oppoſed them; ſo that he deſired rather to have no Charge, or Office at all, than one ſo incumbred, by the refractory humour of Souldiers, who would not obey, but pretend to Command: And accordingly Meneſes would have acquitted himſelf of his Charge, had he not been perſwaded to the contrary by Doctor Saravia, who told him, that in the preſent Conjuncture he ſhould rather loſe his Honour by ſuch an Action, than gain Reputation. This was joyful news to Hernandez and his Souldiers, who hoped by ſuch Diſſentions as theſe, to make their Benefit, and ſuch advantage as ſhould with time facilitate their Victory.

On occaſion of theſe Skirmiſhes, ſome pleaſant ſayings were uttered by both ſides; which being (as Diego Hernandez ſaith) the Jeſts of Souldiers, they may come pertinently to be inſerted in this place; and which we ſhall explain more clearly than this Author, who, in the 51*ſt*. of his Book, ſpeaks confuſedly, and darkly, as followeth.

As ſome Souldiers came forth to skirmiſh, it was the Fortune oft-times for Friends and Acquaintance to meet, and they inſtead of fighting would enter into diſcourſe, and expoſtulate the matter: Scipio Ferrara who was of the King's Party, met with Pavia, who had been fellow Servant with him in the Family of the good Vice-King, Don Antonio de Mendoça: and he began to uſe perſuaſive Arguments unto him, to bring him over to the King's Party; to which Pavia made anſwer, that the Party with whom he was engaged, had honeſtly won him by War; and ſo if they were deſirous to regain him, it muſt be in like manner by War, &c.

This Pavia ſaid in reference to the Battel of Chuquinca, where he was taken by the Rebels, and kindly uſed and treated by them, which made him to ſay, that he could not deny them, but if the King's Party were deſirous of him, they muſt win him, as the others had done. In like manner, Captain Rodrigo Ninno entertained Diſcourſe with John de Piedrahita, perſwading him to come over to the Service of the King, with Promiſes of great Rewards and Promotions from the favour of the Juſtices: to which Piedrahita made anſwer, that he knew very well how the Juſtices did uſe to reward thoſe who deſerved their favours, which might incline him at another time to a different reſolution, but for the preſent he had a proſpect of the Game he intended to play. This was the reply of Piedrahita, depending with others of Hernandez his Confidents, on the vain Deluſions and Predictions, which Witches, and Men pretending to Necromancy, had infatuated them with, aſſuring them of Victory over the King's Forces: tho' a few days afterwards he was undeceived, and changed his mind, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. And this Author proceeds, and farther ſays, That the like Conferences paſſed between Diego Mendez and Hernando Guillada, and alſo between Captain Ruybarba, and Bernardino de Robles his Son-in-Law: But no Benefit, or effect, reſulting from theſe Diſcourſes, the Juſtices commanded for the future, that no Man, upon pain of Death, ſhould entertain any Communication with the Enemies Party. However it was agreed between Captain Ruybarba, and Bernardino de Robles, to meet again the next day, and to finiſh their Diſcourſe; and the better to know each other, they appointed to wear their Scarlet Cloaks. Bernardino de Robles came attended with 10 or 12 Officers, and Souldiers, and treacherouſly ſeized upon Ruybarba, and carried him before Hernandez, giving out amongſt the Souldiers, that he came in voluntarily, and of his own accord; which when Ruybarba heard, he denied it, and ſaid, That whoſoever reported, that he came in with his own Conſent, did not ſay true; which, with Licenſe of Hernandez, he was ready to make good, either a Foot, or Horſe-back, againſt any Man whatſoever, unleſs againſt his Son-in-Law, by whoſe Treachery he was betrayed into the hands of his Enemies. Franciſco Hernandez was over-joyed to ſee him brought in, and went with him to his Wife Donna Mencia: See, Madam, ſaid he, what a Priſoner I bring you, look to him well, for I commit him to your Charge. I accept, ſaid Donna Mencia, of the Truſt, and ſhall take care of him, as you require. After this Randona made a Salty abroad, and had ſome Diſcourſe with John de Yllanes, Sarjeant Major to Hernandez: Randona thinking to take him by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, let looſe his Rein, and ſpurred after him in full ſpeed; but his Horſe being faint, and low, he was too far engaged to get off, and ſo was himſelf taken. As they were carrying him away Priſoner, he told them, that he had promiſed the Juſtices not to return without a Priſoner of the beſt quality amongſt the Enemy, and for that reaſon he had given chaſe to the Sarjeant Major. At which ſaying ſome of the proudeſt of them were ſo offended, that they proteſted not to fight, unleſs Randona was firſt put to Death, for that ſuch inſolent and daring Perſons as theſe, ought not to be ſuffered to live. Hereupon they immediately committed him to the Tent of Alvarado the Lawyer, and adviſed him to make his Confeſſion; and in the mean time Alonſo Gonçalez kept the door, to adviſe them in caſe Hernandez ſhould paſs by, that they might kill him before he could come to interpoſe his Authority: Toledo the Lawyer, Advocate General to Hernandez, and Captain Ruybarba prevailed with Hernandez to ſpare Randona, and grant him his Life. To which he aſſented, and in token thereof ſent his Gloves by the Meſſenger, who carried the Pardon. Alonſo Gonçalez having intimation, that the Act of Grace was coming, he enter'd into the Tent, and charged the Prieſt to make an end of his Work, for he would not ſtay longer; whereupon the Father haſtning the Abſolution, ſo ſoon as it was ended, Gonçalez cut off his Head with a great Knife; which having done, he went out of the Tent, ſaying, That he had made good the word of this little Marqueſs, who had promiſed the Juſtices, to bring the Head of an Enemy, or to leave his own with them; and cauſing his Body to be drawn out, it was expoſed to publick view, to the great trouble of many of the Spectators, but more eſpecially to the ſorrow of his Friends in the King's Camp, when the news thereof was made known to them.

This Randona, as we have ſaid, was a raſh Souldier, more Couragious than Wiſe: his Horſe was very good, but he uſed him ill, being always on his back, ſhewing how well he could prance, and carvet; which was the reaſon, as Palentino ſaith, that he fail'd him, when he had moſt uſe of his Service. We may ſee alſo how wiſe he was to tell the Enemy what he had promiſed to the Juſtices; upon which the Executioner General Alonſo Gonçalez took occaſion to exerciſe his Cruelty. Palentino on theſe paſſages proceeds and ſays, That the Juſtices ſent ſeveral Pardons to particular Perſons, by the hands of Negers, and Indian Domeſtick Servants, who continually paſſed between both Camps, carrying intelligence from one to the other, all which were brought to Hernandez, who cauſed them to be publickly cryed, and with Scorn and Contempt declared as inſignificant and of no value: Moreover they cut off the Hands and Noſes of thoſe who brought them, and tyed them about their Necks, and in that manner returned them to the King's Camp again. Thus far this Author, and therewith he concludes this Chapter.

CHAP. XXVI.

The treacherous practices of ſome falſe Souldiers. Piedrahita gives an Allarm to the King's Army. Hernandez reſolves to give Battel to the Juſtices, and in what manner it was prevented by them.

SUch Affronts as theſe were daily offered to his Majeſties Camp, during all the time that Franciſco Hernandez was lodged in Pucara: For ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome remarkable diſadvantage to the King's Forces, who continually loſt Men, Horſes, and Arms: For many of the Souldiers being of a Mutinous and Seditious temper, and falſe and perfidious in their dealings, did did oftentimes appear to go forth and skirmiſh, and with that occaſion yielded themſelves Priſoners, and called for Quarter to the Enemy, ſaying, I ſubmit and ſurrender my ſelf, together with my Arms: And this was the ſubtle deſign of theſe Souldiers to ſave themſelves; for in caſe the King overcame, they had to alledge, That they were taken Priſoners by the Rebels; and if the Rebels were victorious, they could plead, and ſay, That they had revolted to them, and had contributed to the fortune of the Day. The Juſtices ſuſpecting this piece of policy amongſt the crafty Souldiers, they gave Orders, forbidding all Skirmiſhes for the future, and all Communications and Conferences with the Enemy, though on pretence of Kindred, Friendſhip or Alliance, for that no good effects did ever reſult from ſuch Interviews. Franciſco Hernandez obſerving, that an end was put to the Skirmiſhes and Conferences between the Souldiers; he gave Orders to his Major General, Captain John de Piedrahita, to allarm the Kings Camp, thinking thereby to provoke them to fight; and with eighty Muſqueteers to aſſail them by Night; and gave them particularly in charge to obſerve with what readineſs and vigilance they were received by the Enemy; and with ſuch Allarms they intended conſtantly to moleſt and diſturb them, until in this manner harraſſing the Souldiers, they ſhould with watchfulneſs and continual Duty tire them out, and defeat them. Piedrahita accordingly allarmed the Enemy with his Souldiers as far as he durſt adventure; but to little effect; nor did the Kings Forces return any anſwer, ſeeing that all was but a Bravade, without any real Deſign to engage: howſoever Piedrahita returned to Hernandez boaſting much of the great Actions he had done, and how he found the Enemies Camp without Guards or Centinels, and ſleeping with ſuch ſecurity, that in caſe he had had but two hundred and fifty Muſqueteers with him, he ſhould not have doubted but to have defeated the Enemy, and have taken the Juſtices and all their Captains Priſoners. Beſides which he vapoured, and told many other Stories of the like nature, as is the cuſtom of Bravadoes, who talk more than they do; and though Piedrahita was an eminent Captain in this Rebellion, and had been ſucceſsful in many Encounters; yet in this laſt he did nothing more than what we have mentioned, and talked more than what he had acted.

Franciſco Hernandez founding himſelf much upon the Reports he had received from his Major General, conceiving them all to be true, and alſo upon the Informations which were given him by certain Souldiers, who were revolted from the Kings party unto his, did really believe that the Kings Camp was in great want of Powder, Match, and all ſorts of Ammunitions: in confidence of which, he reſolved one of thoſe Nights to attack the Enemy, ſeeing that they deſigned not to aſſault him within his Fortifications; which he interpreted to be ſuch a piece of Cowardiſe and lowneſs of Spirit in the Enemy, that he eſteemed them already his own, and conquered by him. Hereupon he called his Captains to a Council of War, laying before them the ſtate of the Enemies Camp, with the Circumſtances of it, and his Opinion to attack them, deſiring their Concurrence with him; aſſuring them of Victory, not only becauſe the Enemy was weak and diſcouraged, but alſo from certain Predictions which Wiſe-Men had foretold of theſe matters, which he termed Prophecies, though they deſerved no better name, than of Witchcrafts and Sorceries. The Captains however were of a different Opinion, and ſaid, That there was no neceſſity of engaging the Enemy, and that their buſineſs was only to remain quiet, and on the defenſive part, which they could eaſily do, being well fortified in a place inacceſſible to an Enemy, and provided with all things neceſſary for their ſubſiſtance: when on the contrary, the Enemy laboured under great wants of Victuals and Ammunition: And in caſe they deſired to reduce them to greater extremities, they had nothing to do but to march away to the Charcas; where having ſeized all the Silver of the Country, and therewith paid the Souldiery, they might afterwards march along the Coaſt by the Sea ſide, to the City of Los Reyes, which they would find open to them, and without Souldiers or Garriſon to defend it. Moreover the Enemy wanting Horſes, and Beaſts of Burden, and Iron to Shoe them with, were not in a condition to make a purſuit after them; and in caſe they did, they might eaſily worſt them, whenſoever they made Head to oppoſe them. And ſince that, by this this method, things had ſucceeded well, it were not good to change the courſe of their proceedings, leſt therewith they ſhould change and alter the Current of their Fortune: An Example whereof they had ſeen and proved by the Enemies ſucceſs at Chuquinca. How confident, ſaid they, were they of Victory, and with what heat and courage did they aſſail us, and how on a ſudden were they overthrown and defeated? Notwithſtanding all this Diſcourſe, Hernandez declared his Reſolution to beat up the Enemies Quarters that Night with the force of all his Army; and that he would never turn his Back to the Juſtices; for ſome Wiſe Old Woman had foretold good ſucceſs to him in that place: wherefore he intreated them all, not to contradict or oppoſe him in this matter, but to prepare themſelves for that night's Enterpriſe.

Thus ending the Conſultation, the Captains aroſe very much diſcontented, and out of humour, ſeeing ſuch a Reſolution taken as was contrary to the common Opinion of all the Officers of the Army, and which was ſo full of hazard and danger, that they ſeemed rather to be led forth to Slaughter, than to the doubtful chance of War: And though the General obſerved ſadneſs and a cloud on the Brow of all his Captains, yet depending on his Sorceries and Enchantments, nothing could alter the Reſolution he had taken; but Orders were given to prepare for an Aſſault after Midnight, about ſetting of the Moon, and becauſe it would be then dark, every one was to be cloathed in White, to diſtinguiſh themſelves from the Enemy. After Sun-ſet a Muſter was taken of all the Souldiers, whereby two Souldiers appeared to be wanting, who formerly belonged to the Marſhal, and were ſuſpected to be revolted over to the King's Party; but ſome, who were willing to pleaſe Hernandez, did aver, that they were informed by Indians, That one of thoſe miſſing, who was the moſt conſiderable of the two, was ſeen and met on his way towards the Charcas; and the other of leſs account, was a Man ſo ſilly, and without Senſe, that the Juſtices would never give credit to any Report he ſhould make them. Theſe Stories were ſufficient to ſatisfie Hernandez, who with an unparallelled temerity gave orders for all things to be in a readineſs againſt the hour appointed. The two Souldiers, who were fled, came though late to his Majeſties Camp, where they gave intelligence of the intention of the Enemy to attack them that Night in two Bodies, for perceiving that they did not attempt them within their Fortification, they reſolved themſelves to be the firſt Aſſailants. The Juſtices, Officers, and Counſellors, who were of the moſt Ancient Conquerours of Peru, and who by long experience in War, were become great Souldiers, were of Opinion, that it was better to ſalley out of their Intrenchment, and to draw up their Forces in the open Field, rather than to fight within their Trenches, which were ſtrait, and filled with Tents, Mules, and Indians, which would be incumbrances, and obſtructions in the time of Battel. And though many things were urged againſt this deſign, ſaying, That Cowards, and Men of little Courage, would fight better under the ſhelter of a Mud-wall, than in open Field; yet by Gods Mercy and Providence, the firſt Reſolution prevailed, and both Horſe and Foot were drawn forth into the Plain, which formed a very handſome Squadron, well furniſhed and provided with Muſqueteers, and lined with Pikes and Halberds, and eleven pieces of great and heavy Cannon.

CHAP. XXVII.

Franciſco Hernandez proceeds forth to Battel: He miſſes of his deſign, and retreats back again to his Camp. Thomas Vazquez revolts over to the King's Party. Hernandez the Rebel declares a Prediction which was made concerning himſelf.

THE time being come, that the Rebel calculated to be the auſpicious hour, he ſallied out of his Fortreſs, with 800 Foot, of which (as Palentino ſays) 600 were Muſqueteers, and the reſt Pike-men; his Horſe were few, and not exceeding thirty in all: His Neger Souldiers, or black Guard, to the number of 250, he ſent by another way, joining about ſeventy Spaniards with them, to lead them on, and to govern and direct them in what they had to do: But in theſe they repoſed no great Confidence, intending them only to divert, and amuſe the Enemy, who in the Night could not diſtinguiſh the difference of one from the other. The Orders were, that theſe Negers ſhould aſſail the Juſtices in the Front, and Hernandez in the Rear; and in this manner they ſilently marched towards his Majeſties Camp, with their Matches and Lights covered. In like manner the King's Squadrons were all drawn up in poſture of battel, and remained quietly, and without noiſe with their Fires covered. The black Guard came firſt to the Intrenchment before Hernandez, where finding no reſiſtance, they entred in, and killed all the Indians, Horſes, and Mules, which they found there, together with five or ſix Spaniſh Souldiers, who out of Cowardiſe had left the Army, and hid themſelves within the Intrenchment. Hernandez coming afterwards, fired a whole Volly of ſhot into the Fortification, without receiving any return from thence; but finding that the King's Party fired all their Muſquets upon them, with their whole Train of Artillery, from another place; they were much amazed, in regard that contrary to their expectation, the Enemy had quitted their Intrenchments, and drawn up in open Field: Howſoever no great hurt was done on either ſide, for the Night being very dark, every one ſhot at random, and without any aim: Had theſe Vollies of above 1300 ſhot paſſed by day, and ſo near each to other, it had been impoſſible, but that the Fields ſhould have been covered with the Bodies of the ſlain. The Rebel perceiving that he was diſappointed of his deſign, gave himſelf over for loſt, and ſo retreated back to his Fortification in the beſt order that he could. Howſoever he could not retire in ſuch manner, but that 200 of his men forſook him, who formely belonged to the Marſhal, and who now making uſe of this occaſion to eſcape, threw down their Arms, and revolted to the Juſtices. In the mean time, the King's Forces would have purſued the Enemy in their flight, but were countermanded by their General, and other Officers; who ordered that no man ſhould ſtir out of his Rank, but ſhould keep his ground; the which Rule was happily obſerved; for a Party of Horſe perceiving that the Enemy intended not to fight, ſallied out upon them to obſtruct their retreat; in which Action a Cornet of Horſe was killed, and three Citizens of Cozco were wounded, namely Diego de Silva, Antonio Ruyz de Guevara, and Diego Maldonado the Rich; the Wound of this laſt was never cured to the day of his death, which happened to be eleven or twelve years afterwards; for it was always kept open by the advice of Chyrurgeons, and Phyſicians, who were of opinion that the nature of the Wound was ſuch, that it would prove mortal, in caſe it were cloſed up and healed. By this reſiſtance which the Rebels made, they made good their retreat, and returned to their ſtrong Hold; and greater had the ſlaughter been, had they been intercepted in their paſſage thither. And now Hernandez having not much reaſon to boaſt of his ſucceſs, abated greatly of his pride and haughtineſs, when he found that his his Magick Spells failed, and that he was deluded by the vanity of Propheſies, in which he moſt confided: Howſoever not to diſcourage his Souldiers, he put a good face upon the matter, but could not ſo well diſſemble, but that his melancholly was diſcovered through all his diſguiſes.

This was the whole Action of this Battel, and all that paſſed; for Palentino ſaith, that of the Juſtices ſide five or ſix were killed, and about thirty wounded. Of the Rebels about ten were killed, and as many wounded: The Priſoners, which this Author ſays were 200, were ſuch as had been Souldiers to the Marſhal, and who with this occaſion returned again to their Duty; but of Hernandez his Souldiers, not above fifteen were made Priſoners. Thoſe who were killed and wounded in the King's Camp, were for the moſt part killed and wounded by their own men; for the night being dark, as we ſaid, the Rear-guard, commanded by Captain John Ramon, firing at random to affright the Enemy, happened to kill and wound their own People; the which is evidenced by the Wounds they received, which were all in their backs and hinder parts: amongſt which a Gentleman was ſlain, called Suero de Quinnones, Brother to Antonio de Quinnones a Citizen of Cozco; and a Couſin German of his, called Pedro de Quinnones, was likewiſe wounded. The day after the Battel nothing happened conſiderable on either ſide, only towards night the King's Forces, upon a report that the Rebels deſigned again to beat up their Camp, drew out, and put their Squadrons in poſture of defence, as they had done the Night before; but the intelligence was falſe, nor was there any ground for it, for the unfortunate Hernandez was rather contriving within himſelf, how he might fly, and eſcape Death, than of a manner how he might make another aſſault on the Enemy. The third day after the Battel, Hernandez to ſhew his Spirit and Courage, gave orders to his Captains and Souldiers to draw out into the Field, and skirmiſh with the Enemy, and provoke them to an engagement; but this bravade produced nothing of moment; only it gave occaſion to Thomas Vazquez with ten or twelve more of his Friends, to revolt over to his Majeſties Forces, bringing with them a ſilver Helmet belonging to their Major General Piedrahita, which he ſent as a Token and Aſſurance of his intention alſo to leave the Rebels, which he deferr'd for a while, until he could decoy and bring more Companions with him. The coming in of Thomas Vazquez and his Friends, and the news they brought with them, was extreamly welcome to the Juſtices and the whole Army, who now began to look on the Rebels as totally overcome, and an end put to all their Violences and Cruelties: For this Thomas Vazquez was eſteemed the principal and main ſupport of all their Actions, and one of greateſt intereſt, by whoſe failure it was expected that all their deſigns would come to ruine: Hereupon thoſe who ſallied forth to skirmiſh, made their retreat back to their Quarters: And leſt the Souldiers ſhould be diſcouraged, and become over ſenſible of the loſs of Vazquez, he made them this ſhort Oration, which we find in Palentino, Chap. 55. in theſe words.

My Maſters, and Gentlemen, I formerly acquainted you with the cauſe, and reaſons which induced me to commence this Enterpriſe, which was grounded on the agrievances, and oppreſſions under which this whole Kingdom groaned; for both Citizens, Planters, and Souldiers had their Eſtates taken away, and were deprived of the ſervices and vaſſallage of their Indians, without any remedy or courſe of Juſtice. Thoſe who were principally engaged in this Enterprize with me, and complotted with me herein, have abandoned me at the moſt critical time of any, amongſt which is this Thomas Vazquez: But I beſeech you not to be troubled for this his treacherous deſertion of us, for he is but a Man, and no more. I would not adviſe any perſon to truſt to the Pardon they ſhall give him, for the next day they may hang him with that about his neck. Conſider well therefore, Gentlemen, your preſent caſe, for we have a better game to play, than Thomas Vazquez, and all thoſe who revolted with him, whom notwithſtanding all their kindneſſes and careſſes to them at preſent, they ſhall ſentence to death and execute, ſo ſoon as I come to fail, and am ſubdued. I am not troubled for my ſelf, being but a ſingle man, and if by my life I could reſcue and ſave yours, I would ſacrifice it immediately for your preſervation: But I am well aſſured, that whoſoever eſcapes the Gallows, will at leaſt be condemned to perpetual ſlavery in the Gallies.

Conſider

Conſider therefore your condition, and encourage one the other, to conſult your ſafeties by a valiant purſuance of our firſt Engagement: Our caſe is not deſperate, but hopeful; for having 500 men on our ſide, 2000 againſt us can never hurt us, unleſs we prove falſe to our ſelves: See then to the main point, and conſider what will become of you if I miſcarry. Theſe and many other things to this purpoſe, were ſpoken by Hernandez to his Souldiers, who, notwithſtanding all that was ſaid, could not but be ſenſible of the loſs they ſuſtained by the revolt of Vazquez, &c. Thus far Palentino.

That which Hernandez ſaid concerning the Pardons, That they would be hanged with them about their Necks, was fulfilled with more certainty than all the Predictions and Propheſies in which he truſted: for tho' neither Vazquez, nor Piedrahita were hanged, yet they were both ſtrangled in the Priſon, notwithſtanding their Pardons, which they ſued out of Chancery under the Great Seal, and notwithſtanding the Pleas they made, that a Man having obtained his Pardon, and not committed any offence afterwards, ought not to ſuffer Death or any other Puniſhment. Thus what Hernandez foretold of this matter was accompliſhed, which we having anticipated out of its due place, we ſhall not need to repeat, or enlarge upon it hereafter.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Franciſco Hernandez flyes away alone. His Lieutenant General with a hundred men take another way. They are purſued by Paulo de Meneſes, and are taken, and brought to Juſtice.

NOtwithſtanding all that Hernandez had ſaid to his Souldiers, he was yet ſo troubled and confuſed within himſelf for the loſs of Vazquez, that he reſolved that very Night to run away, and leave his Souldiers; for ſuſpition and jealouſie had ſo ſeized on all the faculties of his Soul, as to afflict him with all thoſe torments, which the Divine Arioſto deſcribes in five Cantos of his Poem; which cauſed him to believe, that his own Souldiers would kill him, in hopes by ſuch a piece of Service, to eſcape the puniſhment they had deſerved, by joyning with him in all his bloudy Murders and Treaſons againſt his Majeſty. As Palentino ſaith, Chapter 55. in theſe words.

In Fine, Hernandez reſolved to leave his Men, and run away that night, upon a ſecret intimation given him, That his Captains were conſpiring his Death, &c. And tho' in reality there was no ſuch Plot or Deſign, but that every man would certainly have died with him, had he truſted to their Fidelity, as will appear hereafter: Yet ſo violent was the Jealouſie he conceived of this matter, that he would not entruſt this ſecret to his Wife, though a Woman both Noble and Vertuous, nor to any of the moſt faithful and intimate of all his Confidents: But ſo ſoon as it was Night, telling his Wife, and thoſe then preſent with him, that he was going about ſome buſineſs relating to the Army, he called for his Horſe Almaraz, which he ſo named from Almaraz his Kinſman, from whom he had bought him; and mounted on him, ſaying to thoſe ſtanding by, that he would preſently return; and ſo parted from them, not knowing or deſigning any place whereunto to repair; for ſo prevalent was the fear which poſſeſſed him, that he could not be at reſt or repoſein his own mind, until he had quitted his Friends and Souldiers: Nor did any thing appear comfortable or pleaſant to him, but only ſolitude. Thus did this miſerable Hernandez wander without any Companion; only two or three Friends followed him by the track, whom when he heard coming, he ſtole away from them, and hid himſelf in a hollow Cave:

and in ſuch a blind manner did he wander all night, not knowing where he went, that upon break of day in the Morning, he found himſelf near to his own Fortification; which when he perceived, he preſently drew from thence, and deſperately enterd into the Wilderneſs of a Snowy Mountain, not knowing which way to come out from thence; though at laſt by the goodneſs of his Horſe, he made a ſhift to get thorough, tho' not without much danger of being drowned or ſwallowed up in the Snow. This was all the noiſe, or Ceremony that was made at the departure of Hernandez from his Army; tho' Palentino tells us a long ſtory of the Diſcourſe which paſſed between him and his Wife, with the Tears and Sorrows with which they parted; which in reality never was, for ſuch was the Violence of his Jealouſie, that he would entruſt none with the Secret. The Lieutenant General who remained in the Camp, reſolved with ſuch as would follow him, to go in queſt of Hernandez, of which a hundred of thoſe the moſt Guilty, and deepeſt engaged in the Rebellion followed him; howſoever ſeveral of the Chief Leaders, and who had been as Criminal, as any in the Rebellion, namely Piedrahita, Alonſo Diaz, Captain Diego Gavilan, with his Brother John Gavilan, Captain Diego Mendez, and Enſign Marco del Sauz, with ſeveral others of the ſame Quality, who were as black in their wickedneſs as any whatſoever, knowing that Hernandez had deſerted his Camp, came all over to the Juſtices, and claimed his Majeſties gracious Pardon; the which was accordingly given to them, and paſſed under the Great Seal; and all of them were received with great ſatisfaction, and a kind welcome by the Juſtices, who notwithſtanding remained all the night drawn out in poſture of Battel, expecting the event of theſe matters, for they ſeemed not to truſt to the reports of thoſe Fugitives. The day following the Juſtices being well aſſured of the flight of Franciſco Hernandez and his Souldiers, gave orders to the General Paulo de Meneſes with a detachment of about a hundred and fifty men, to make purſuit after them, and to take, and puniſh them according to their demerit. The General was in ſo much haſte, that he could not ſtay to get together above a hundred and thirty Souldiers, with which he followed the Path and Track of Diego de Alvarado Lieutenant General to Hernandez, who having about a hundred Spaniards, and twenty Negers in his company, could paſs no way, but Tidings were given of the places where they quartered and lodged: So that after having been in purſuit of them for the ſpace of eight or nine days, he overtook them; and tho' they were fewer in number than the Enemy, by reaſon that many Souldiers, who were ill mounnted, and whoſe Beaſts could not endure ſuch long marches, were left behind, yet the Rebels yielded themſelves without making any reſiſtance or defence. The General preſently did juſtice on the Chief Leaders, namely Diego de Alvarado, John Cobo, Diego de Villalva, de Lugones, Albertos de Ordumna, Bernardino de Robles, Pedro de Sotelo, Franciſco Rodriguez, and John Henriquez de Orellana; the laſt of which, whoſe name was honourable, yet he availed himſelf much on the Office he had to be the Executioner and Common Cryer; this man was he, who, as we have ſaid, hanged Franciſco de Carvajal, and was now made the Executioner of Alvarado and others, by order of the General Paulo de Meneſes; who ſaid to him, ſince thou art ſo skilful in this Office, I would have thee hang theſe Gentlemen thy Friends, and the Juſtices will give thee a reward for thy pains. This Hangman hereupon whiſpered in the Ear of a certain Souldier, whom he knew, and told him with a low voice, I believe that my reward will be to be hanged my ſelf, after I have executed the Sentence of Juſtice upon theſe. And indeed the matter happened juſt as he ſaid, for after he had done his Office in hanging his Companions, and had cut off their Heads, who were about eleven or twelve Souldiers, he was himſelf ſtrangled by two Negers. Paulo de Meneſes ſent the Priſoners he had taken to Cozco, under a ſecure Guard, with nine Heads of thoſe whom he had killed. I ſaw them all in the Houſe of Alonſo de Hinojoſa, where Diego de Alvarado lodged when he acted the part of Lieutenant General to Hernandez; and to imitate Franciſco de Carvajal, he always rode upon a Mule, for I never ſaw him on Horſe back. And now ſince we are almoſt at an end of the Violences and bloody Tragedies acted by the Rebels: I cannot omit one Story, which ſhews the impudence of thoſe Souldiers, which was this, The very next day after the flight of Franciſco Hernandez, my Maſter Garçillaſſo de la Vega being at dinner with eighteen or twenty Souldiers, for he commonly kept an open Table for ſuch a number; it being the cuſtom in the time of War, for all Men of Eſtates, to be hoſpitable in like manner according to their ability; he obſerved amongſt his gueſts a certain Souldier belonging to Hernandez, and who had been with him from the beginning of the Rebellion, to croud in at the Table with all the boldneſs and freedom that an honeſt Gentleman might preſume to uſe; he was by his profeſſion and trade a Black-ſmith, but in the War he was as richly cloathed as the greateſt Gallant of them all. My Father, ſeeing him ſit down with much Confidence, ſaid to him, Diego de Madrid, ſince thou art ſeated at the Table with theſe Gentlemen, eat thy Dinner, and welcome: But come no more hither, I charge you; for he who yeſterday would have cut off my head, if he had been able, and therewith have gained a Reward from his General, is not company for me to day, nor for theſe Gentlemen, who are well-wiſhers to my Life and ſafety, and devoted to his Majeſties Service. To which Mardid made anſwer; Sir, if you pleaſe to command me, I will ariſe at this inſtant: No, ſaid my Father, I do not bid you riſe now; but if you have a mind ſo to do, you may uſe your pleaſure. Hereupon the Smith aroſe, and quickly departed, leaving ſufficient Subject of Diſcourſe to the Gueſts, and to admire and quarrel at his impudence. Thus were the Souldiers of Hernandez hated, and deteſted by all mankind; for their Rebellion and Treaſon againſt his Majeſty was not to be parellell'd in any Age, whereby a company of pitiful Raſcals pretended to deprive him of his Empire, and to aſſaſſinate and murder all the Gentlemen of Eſtates, that they might poſſeſs and inherit their Lands, and Indians. The Wife of Franciſco Hernandez remained in the Power of Captain Ruybarba; and his Siſter in Law was committed to the care of John Rodriguez de Villa Lobos, to carry her to Cozco, and there to deliver her into the hands of her Kindred and Relations, which was accordingly performed.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Major General Don Pedro de Portocarrero is ſent in ſearch of Franciſco Hernandez. Other two Captains are ſent by another way, whoſe Fortune it was to take the Rebel, whom they carried to Los Reyes, and entered with him into the City in manner of Triumph.

THE General Paulo de Meneſes having ſent the Priſoners he had taken to Cozco, with the heads of thoſe he had cut off; and hearing no news of Hernandez himſelf, he reſolved to return, and render an account to the Juſtices of what he had acted in this Expedition. The Juſtices having routed, and diſperſed the Rebels, marched to the Imperial City, where they received intelligence, that Hernandez was gone towards Los Reyes; upon this advice, they diſpeeded Don Pedro Portocarrero the Lieutenant General in purſuit of him, with 800 men, by way of the Plains: And two Captains, who were come from the City of Huanacu with two Companies to ſerve his Majeſty in this War, were ordered to make ſearch after the Rebels by way of the Mountains; and that he might not eſcape either by one way, or the other, they had a Commiſſion given them, to execute ſpeedy juſtice on all ſuch as they ſhould take: The Captains, who were John Tello, and Michael de la Serva, having eighty men under their command, performed every thing according to the Inſtructions Inſtructions they had received: And being come to the City of Humanca, they were informed that Hernandez was gone to Rimut by way of the plains; and according to that Intelligence they followed him, and after a few days March, they were adviſed that he was quartered about fifteen Leagues from them, with 300 Souldiers, of which 150 were Muſqueteers. The Captains, not affrighted with his numbers, continued their purſuit after him, and the next day they were told by the Indians, that they were only 200, and ſo daily the report of their numbers decreaſed, until they were ſaid to be no more than one hundred. This variety of reports given by the Indians concerning the number of the Enemy, had ſomething of truth, and foundation in it; for Hernandez being fled, his Souldiers diſperſed themſelves by twenty and thirty in a Company, and at length came to meet together, and form a body of about 200 men, moſt of which had belonged to the Marſhal, but afterwards taking affection to Hernandez, they followed his Fortune.

But in regard they were men running away, and poſſeſſed with a fear of Enemies purſuing after them, they were forced to hide themſelves in Woods, and Caves, wanting all things neceſſary for their convenience and ſupport; ſo that when the King's Forces approached near to them, they were not above one hundred in all: For the Indians in the firſt report they gave of them, accounted them to be more than they really were, in the ſecond relation they reckned thoſe whom they found wandring on the way, and in the laſt, thoſe who were met and joyned in a Body. So we may believe that if Hernandez had not forſaken and abandoned his Souldiers, he might ſtill have conſerved himſelf and them, for it would have been very difficult to have taken, or deſtroyed them. The Captains being now about three Leagues diſtant from the Enemy, diſpatched away a Spaniard, who was very diligent and nimble, together with an Indian for his Guide, to view the Enemy, and bring certain intelligence of their ſtrength. The Spy having taken an exact ſurvey of their numbers, wrote a Letter adviſing that they might be 80, and no more. Hereupon the Captains haſtened their March all they were able, until they came within ſight of each other, with Drums beating, and Colours flying, and attended with about eighty Indians, whom the Curacas had ſent for Service of the Spaniards. The Rebels having diſcovered the Enemy coming upon them, and feared to be ſurprized, and ſurrounded by the Horſe who were forty in all, took up to the Mountain, and ſheltered themſelves under ſome Rocks, which ſerved them for a Parapet or Fortification. The Captains notwithſtanding reſolved to attack them in their ſtrong holds, truſting to a Band of 200 Indians ill armed, who voluntarily and of their own accord were come in to them, with intent to deſtroy the Rebels or Aucas as they called them, who were the Peſt and trouble of the Country. The Captains being now within Muſquet-ſhot of the Enemy, four or five of them, amongſt which an Enſign to Hernandez was one, came to them, and inſtantly deſired not to fire upon them; for that without force, or the death of any man, they intended to yield themſelves Priſoners; and upon theſe terms they ſtood, when about ten or twelve more came in and ſubmitted, tho' the Indians all the time pelted them with Stones, until the Captains commanded them to deſiſt: After which all the Souldiers of Hernandez came in, and ſurrendred themſelves, leaving him with 2 friends only, namely with his Son-in-Law de Almaraz, and a Gentleman of the Country of Eſtremadura, called Gomez Suarez de Figueroa.

Franciſco Hernandez, finding himſelf thus abandoned and forſaken by all his Souldiers; came forth with intent to be either killed or taken, as the Enemy ſhould think fit; which when the Captains ſaw, they approached near the Rock, and with all their Men ſurrounded him to take him Priſoner; the firſt that came near him were three noble Perſons, namely Stephen Sylveſtre, Gomez Arias de Avila, and Hernando Pantoxa: The latter of which taking hold of Hernandez by the Helmet, and he defending himſelf with his Sword, Gomez Arias clapt his hand on the hilt, commanding him to deliver up his Arms, which Hernandez refuſing to do, and ſtill ſtriving, Sylveſtre thruſt the point of his Lance to his Breaſt, telling him, that unleſs he did as Gomez Arias bid him, he would immediately kill him.

Hereupon Hernandez reſigned his Sword to Gomez Arias, and having ſet him up on the Horſe behind Arias, they carried him away Priſoner, and being come to the place where they intended to lodge that night, Gomez Arias deſired that the Priſoner might be committed to the cuſtody of the Sheriff, who was to take care to keep and ſecure him from an eſcape. The Captains conſented hereunto, and ordered that he ſhould be committed to Priſon, and being under a Guard of Souldiers, they marched with him by the way of the Mountain, until they came to the City of Los Reyes. The Captains Michael de la Serna and John Tello, intended to have executed Juſtice on many of the Rebels that they had taken, according to their Commiſſion, but ſeeing ſo many Noble Perſons amongſt them, and ſome poor ſilly fellows, they were touched with a remorſe and compaſſion for them, and ſo baniſh them into divers parts out of the Kingdom. But that after theſe Acts of Mercy, they might ſeem to execute ſome piece of Severity, they put one of them to death, named Guadramiros, who had been concerned in the Conſpiracy of Don Sebaſtian, and was the boldeſt, bloodieſt Villain of any of thoſe who adhered to Hernandez, and ſo his Life ſatisfied for the Crimes of his Companions. The fame of the taking Hernandez was ſoon ſpread and divulged into all parts; upon news of which the Major General Don Pedro Portocarrero, and Captain Baltatar Velazquez (who ſome few days before had by order of the Juſtices marched out of Cozco with thirty Souldiers, and two Colours in ſearch of Hernandez) made what haſte they could to joyn with the other party, who conducted the Priſoner, that they might partake of the glory of that Victory which others had acquired, and might enter into Los Reyes with triumph, as if they alſo had been concerned in that happy exploit. In this manner they met ſome few Leagues before they came to the City, and made a triumphant entry with all four Colours flying; but in regard the two Captains only were concerned in the taking of Hernandez, they with their Companies marched in the middle between the party commanded by the Major General and Captain Baltatar Velazquez: the Priſoner was placed in the midſt between the four Colours, and on each ſide, and before him, went the three Souldiers, already named, who took him. After theſe followed the Infantry in rank and file, and in like manner the Cavalry. In the rear of all came the Major General and the three Captains. The Muſquetiers in token of rejoycing and triumph fired ſeveral Vollies as they marched; and indeed the joy was univerſal to ſee an end put to that Rebellion, which had given a diſturbance to the whole Empire, and had brought ruin and miſery, as well on the Indians as the Spaniards; which was ſo great and enormous, that if it were rightly ſcann'd and conſidered, it will appear, that we have not deſcribed the tenth part of the deſtruction and ruin it had produced.

CHAP. XXX.

The Juſtices make Laws to prevent future Inſurrections. They entertain a troubleſome Conference with Souldiers, who pretend Rewards for their great ſervices. Juſtice is done upon Franciſco Hernandez Giron; his Head is fixed on the Gallows, and taken thence by a certain Gentleman, with the Heads of Gonçallo Piçarro and Franciſco de Carvajal. The ſtrange death of Baltatar Velazquez.

THE Juſtices coming from Pucara, where Hernandez was defeated, made a ſtay at Cozco for ſome few days, to order ſeveral matters conducing to the good Government of the Empire; which for above a year had been been in confuſion, and ſubjected to the Arbitrary Luſt of Tyrannical Rebels; by which it was reduced to ſuch miſery, as cannot be expreſſed. Captain John Ramon was made Governour of the City of la Paz, where his Eſtate lay, and his Juriſdiction over Indians: And Captain Don John de Sandoval was ſent to the City of Plate, and to Command that, and the Provinces thereunto belonging: And Garcilaſſo de la Vega was made Chief Juſtice and Governour of the City of Cozco; and the Lawyer, Doctor Mojaraz, was appointed Deputy, and Co-aſſeſſor with him, and to continue in that Office during the Will and Pleaſure of the Juſtices; but the Governour not being pleaſed to have his Deputy at the diſpoſal of another Power, and not at his own, deſired to have that Clauſe amended, which the Juſtices accordingly ordered: And Doctor Mojaraz, by the good and tractable diſpoſition of the Governour, and by the good Correſpondence which paſſed between them, ſo well acquitted himſelf, that after the ſpace of three years, which determined his Office, he was promoted to another place, not inferiour to the former; which was much different to the Lot and Fortune of his Succeſſour, as will appear hereafter.

During thoſe few days that the Juſtices made their Reſidence in the City of Cozco, ſeveral Captains, and Souldiers grew very importunate with them, to grant them Lands, and Commands over Indians, in reward of the many Services they had done his Majeſty, both in theſe preſent Wars, as in thoſe preceding. To which the Juſtices made anſwer, that as yet the Wars were not at an end, ſince the Chief Rebel of all was not as yet taken, and that many of his Souldiers were ſtill actually in Arms, and diſperſed over all the Kingdom: and that ſo ſoon as things were a little ſettled in peace and quietneſs, that they would then take care to reward them in the name and behalf of his Majeſty. And in the mean time, they adviſed them not to hold Cabals, or private Conſultations together, leſt thereby they ſhould give occaſion to ſcandalous Tongues to report matters tending to their diſhonour and prejudice. The Juſtices being by this anſwer freed from the Moleſtation of theſe Importunities, News came, that Franciſco Hernandez was taken, which cauſed them to haſten a diſpatch of their buſineſs, that they might come ſpeedily to Loſs Reyes, to paſs Judgment on this Arch-Rebel. Doctor Saravia departed ſix or ſeven days before Santillan and Mercado, his Brethren of the Bench. The Captains, John Tello, and Michael de la Serna, who brought Hernandez Priſoner, Committed him to the Royal Priſon, belonging to the Chancery, and took from the Keeper a formal Receipt and Acknowledgment of his being delivered to his Cuſtody, which was drawn up in full and ample manner.

Two or three days afterwards, Doctor Saravia came to Town, having made great haſte to be preſent at paſſing the ſentence of Death on the Priſoner, which was executed eight days after the Doctor's arrival, as Palentino declares, Chapter 58, in theſe words.

His Examination being taken, at the concluſion thereof, he declared, That all Men, Women, and Children, Friers, Church-men, and Lawyers, of that Kingdom, had all generally been of his Opinion. In fine, he was brought forth to Juſtice at Noon day, and drawn upon a Hurdle faſtned to the Tail of a poor lean Jade, with the Cryer going before, and with a loud voice ſaid, This is the Juſtice which his Majeſty, and the Right Honourable Don Pedro Portocarrero, Major General, command to be executed on this Man, who hath been a Traytor to the Royal Crown and Dignity, and a Diſturber of this Kingdom; by vertue of which Authority his Head is to be cut off, and fixed on the Gallows of this City; his Houſes are to be demoliſhed, and the Ground ſowed with Salt; and a Pillar of Marble thereon erected, declaring the many Crimes of which he was Guilty. Howſoever he died in a Chriſtian manner, expreſſing great Sorrow and Repentance for his Sins, and the Evils, and Miſchiefs of which he had been the Author. Thus far Palentino, with which he Concludes this Chapter.

In fine, Franciſco Hernandez ended his Life, as we have ſaid, his Head was fixed upon an Iron Spike, and ſet on the Gallows, on the right hand of that of Gonçalo Piçarro, and Franciſco de Carvajal; his Houſes at Cozco, where he contrived his Rebellion, were not demoliſhed; the Rebellion of Hernandez, from from the time that it firſt begun to the end thereof, and till the day of his Death, continued for the ſpace of thirteen Months, and ſome few days. It is ſaid, that he was the Son of a Knight of the Habit of St. John; his Wife afterwards entered her ſelf a Nun in a Convent in the City of Los Reyes, where ſhe lived with Religious Devotion. But about ten years afterwards, a Gentleman called Gomez de Chaues, a Native of the City of Rodrigo, being much affected with the Vertue, Goodneſs, and Devotion of Donna Mencia de Almaraz, the Widow of Hernandez, deſired to perform ſome Action, whereby ſhe might pleaſe, and oblige her; and ſuppoſing that none could be more acceptable than to take her Husband's Head from the Spike on which it was fixed; he, with another Friend, brought a Ladder by night to the place, where the Head was, and not diſtinguiſhing the Head of Hernandez from thoſe of Piçarro and Carvajal, to be ſure of the right, they took them all three away together, and buried them privately in a Convent. And though the Juſtice made diligent enquiry after thoſe who had committed this piece of Robbery, yet no diſcovery was made thereof: For in regard the ſight of the Head of Piçarro was an Eye-ſoar to the People, to whom his Memory was ſtill grateful: Inquiſition was not made with ſuch ſtrictneſs, as the Commands of the Officers required. This Relation was given me by a Gentlemen, who ſpent ſeveral years of his Life in Service of his Majeſty in the Empires of Mexico, and Peru, his Name is Don Lewis de Cannaveral, and now lives in the City of Cordoua. Howſoever at the beginning of the year, 1612, a Frier of the Seraphical Order of St. Francis, who was a great Divine, and born in Peru, called Lewis Geronino de Ore, diſcourſing of theſe Heads, gave me another Relation; and told me, That in the Convent of St. Francis, in the City of Los Reyes, five Heads were there depoſited, he named Piçarro, Carvajal, and Hernandez Giron, but for the other two, he could not ſay whoſe they were: Only that that Religious Houſe kept them there in Depoſite, without Burial; and that he was very deſirous to know the Head of Carvajal, having been a Man of great Fame, and Reputation in that Kingdom. I told him, that he might have known that by the Inſcription engraven on the Iron Grate, on which the Head was fixed; but he anſwered, that the Heads were taken from the Iron Spike, and laid promiſcuouſly together: All the difference between theſe two Relations is; that the Friers of the Convent would not bury the Heads, for fear of being concerned in the Robbery, but only kept them in Depoſite, or Cuſtody, to be forth-coming in caſe they ſhould be demanded by the courſe of Juſtice. This Religious Frier travelled from Madrid to Cadiz, by Order of his Superiours, and Command of the Royal Council of the Indies, to diſpatch away twenty four Friers, and to accompany them himſelf to the Kingdoms of Florida, to preach the Goſpel to thoſe Gentiles: I cannot ſay certainly whether he went with them, or whether he returned after he had diſpatched thoſe Apoſtles. He deſired me to give him one of the Books I had wrote of the Hiſtory of Florida: And I preſented him with three Copies thereof, and four of theſe our Commentaries, with which the Good Father was much pleaſed, which he teſtified by the many thanks he gave me. May his Divine Majeſty proſper them in this undertaking, to the intent that they may draw thoſe poor Wretches out of the dark abyſs of Idolatry to the knowledge and Service of the true God.

And here it will not be from our purpoſe to relate the ſtrange manner of the death of Captain Baltaſar Velazquez, ſo that Hernandez Giron may not go to his Grave alone, and without ſome Company. It happened ſome months after the former paſſages that Baltaſar Velazquez reſiding in the City of Los Reyes, and behaving himſelf like a brave young Captain, he had two Impoſthumes which broke out near his Groin, which he out of bravery neglecting to Cure, apply'd things to repel and drive them in, not ſuffering them to operate and break outwardly, which had been the only ſafe remedy; but the Corruption feſtering within, cauſed a Cancer in his Bowels with ſo much heat, that he was almoſt roaſted alive. The Phyſitians not knowing what to apply, gave him Vinegar to refreſh him, which ſerved only only to encreaſe his flame, and to burn ſo violently, that no Man was able to hold his Hand within a half yard diſtance from his Body. And thus died this poor Captain, leaving many Stories to the World of his brave Actions and Exploits, to which a ſtop was put by a death ſo violent and miſerable as this.

The Captains and Souldiers who pretended to places and rewards for their paſt ſervices, reſiding at that time at Cozco, no ſooner received intelligence of the impriſonment and death of Hernandez Giron, than they immediately went to the Juſtices to demand Rewards for their paſt Services: And being in the City of Los Reyes, they with much importunity made their pretenſions, alledging, that by reaſon of their expences during all the late War, they had conſumed all their ſubſtance, and were become ſo poor, that they had not wherewith to ſupport their neceſſary charges: and therefore it was but reaſon and equity to perform the Promiſe given them; which was, that ſo ſoon as the Rebbel was ſubdued, they ſhould be gratified in ſuch manner as was equal: That now the Rebbel was dead, they expected a compliance; for they had nothing more remaining than their pay, which was little, and the arrear (as they accounted) was very inconſiderable. The Juſtices made anſwer, That it was not the part of Loyal Subjects to his Majeſty to raiſe a Mutiny on the ſcore of Reward, and of Moneys due to them: That they, and all the World knew, that a Vice-king was hourly expected from his Majeſty with Commiſſion to govern that Empire: That it would be convenient to expect until that time, leſt his Excellency ſhould be diſpleaſed with the Juſtices and the Souldiers for being Carvers to themſelves of their own Wealth and Fortune. Wherefore they deſired their patience for three or four Months, before which time it was impoſſible, but a Vice-King muſt arive: and in caſe within that time, no news came thereof; they would then by their own Authority proceed to make a diviſion of Lands to them, being very ſenſible of the want they muſt have of a ſubſiſtance, and that in the mean time they were greatly troubled, that they could not comply with their deſires for the preſent: And therefore ſince the time was ſo ſhort, they ought to expect the coming of the Vice-King, and not ſuffer their impatience to diſoblige him, who would be ready to reward their expectation with greater plenty than was in their power; and that a precipitation of their deſires would cauſe them to loſe that Reward, which their Actions and Sufferings had long ſince deſerved. With theſe and ſuch like Diſcourſes the Juſtices moderated the violence of the Petitioners. And it pleaſed God, about ſix Months afterwards, that news came of the coming of a Vice-King, for whoſe reception all things were prepared; and in the interim the Pretenders ſurceaſed their importunities in expectation of his Excellency, who was the firſt that ever came to Peru with that honourable Character and Title.

BOOK VIII.

CHAP. I.

How the Indians and Spaniards celebrated the Feſtival of the moſt Holy Sacrament at Cozco. A relation of a quarrel which the Indians had on that occaſion.

SInce the Method of Hiſtory requires, that every thing ſhould be related in its due time and place, we ſhall here at the beginning of this eight Book, deſcribe two particular paſſages which happened in Cozco after the Wars with Franciſco Hernandez were ended, and before the arrival of the Vice-King, whoſe Preſence was inſtantly deſired, and expected in that Kingdom. One of thoſe Matters, which according to this rule, we are to mention, is the pompous and ſolemn celebration of that Feſtival, which We Catholicks call, Corpus Chriſti, performed in the City of Cozco. After thoſe Wars were ended, which the Devil had raiſed to obſtruct the increaſe and propagation of the Holy Goſpel; the laſt of which was that of Franciſco Hernandez Giron, and may God in his Mercy grant, that it may ſtill be the laſt, and ſucceeded by no other of that Nature. The Solemnity of that Feſtival is now obſerved with as much magnificence, and perhaps with more, than at that time: For thoſe Wars were concluded at the end of the year 1554, and we are now in the year 1611, from which time to this preſent in which we are writing this Chapter, fifty ſeven years have paſſed of Peace and Tranquility.

My intention is only to write the Hiſtories of thoſe times, and to leave the ſucceſſes of the preſent to the labour of other Pens: In thoſe days there were about 80 Citizens, or men of Eſtates in Cozco, who were all Gentlemen of Noble Rank and Extraction; for by the Name of Citizens, we underſtand thoſe who had Lands given them, with Indians belonging thereunto ſubjected to them in vaſſalage. Every one of theſe Gentlemen with great Curioſity adorned his Chair, or Sedan, which his Indian Vaſſals were to carry on the day of Feſtival; the Ornaments thereof were Fringes, and Embroideries of Silk, and Gold, and ſtudded with Emerolds, and other Precious Stones; therein were placed the Image of our Lord, or Lady, or ſome other Saint or Sainteſs, according to the devotion of the Spaniard, or Indian, whoſe care it was to dreſs up the Sedans; which were ſomething like thoſe, which the Co-fraternities uſe in Spain upon ſuch Feſtivals.

The Caciques who lived in the parts adjacent to the City came thither to bear a part and ſhare in the Solemnity, attended with their Kindred, and Nobility of their Provinces; and attired in all the finery and gallantry with which they uſed to dreſs themſelves at times of their own moſt Religious Feaſts; of which we have given a Narrative in the firſt part of theſe Commentaries; every Sept or Linage carrying the Enſigns or Signals of their own Race and Families, in which they take much pride, and ſhew great oſtentation.

Some of them came in the habit (as Hercules is painted) with the Lions Skin, the Head of which ſerved him for a Cap; and this is the moſt honourable dreſs, for they value themſelves very much to be deſcended from a Lion: Others appeared with great Wings extended at a large breadth like to Angels, which they took from the Fowle called by them Cuntur, which is much in eſteem with them, and from which they alſo glory to derive their deſcent. Others were habited in Cloathes painted with Rivers, Fountains, Lakes, Mountains, Caves, and the like, having a Tradition amongſt them, that their Forefathers had their original from ſuch places. Others had ſtrange deviſes with Gold and Silver, and Coronets of Gold: Some appeared like Monſters, having their Hands like Claws, or the Paws of Wild-beaſts which they took in hunting. Others feigned themſelves to be Fools and Idiots, endeavouring in all guiſes to pleaſe and divert their Kings and Governours. Some would act the part of Riches and Grandure, others perſonated Miſery and Poverty; and every Province aſſumed ſome thing, that they thought might adminiſter to divertiſement and delight, and which might ſerve to make up the ſolemnity of the Feſtival; well knowing that variety was pleaſing, and contributed much to the ſatisfaction of the Mind. By ſuch Scenes and Repreſentations as theſe, with which the Indians did uſe to celebrate the Feaſts of their own Kings, did they now, though with more oſtentation appear, and bear a part in ſhewing honour to the Moſt Holy Sacrament, which is our true God, Redeemer, and Lord of all; the which they performed with ſuch Devotion and Sincerity, as plainly demonſtrated them to be a People freed from the Superſtition and Vanity of their Gentiliſm.

The Clergy and Citizens were not wanting alſo to contribute their part to render this Feſtival the more great and glorious; to which end a Scaffold was erected in the Yard leading to the Church, on that ſide which fronts the Chief Market-place, where the Moſt Holy Sacrament was expoſed in a rich Circle of Gold and Silver. The Officers of the Church placed themſelves on the right-hand, and thoſe of the City on the left: with them were ſeveral of thoſe Incas which remained of the Royal Line; to whom they gave a place of Precedence, in token that that Empire was their Patrimony.

The Indians of the ſeveral Diſtricts paſſed in their Chairs, or Sedans, with their Kindred, and Attendances; every Province ſinging in their own Mother-language, and not in the general Tongue which is common to the Court, the better to make a difference between one Nation and another.

With them they carried their Drums, Flutes, Pipes, and Cymbals, and other ſorts of rural and barbarous Muſick; and ſeveral of the Men were followed by their Wives, who ſerved to bear a part in the Chorus.

The ſubſtance of their Songs were Praiſes to God, returning him thanks for having brought them out of Ignorance, to the light of true Knowledge. And rendring alſo Thanks to the Spaniards of what condition ſoever, whether Spiritual or Temporal, for having inſtructed them in the Doctrine of the Chriſtian Faith.

Other Provinces, according to the Cuſtom in the times of their Kings, ſent the Men only, without the company or ſociety of their Women.

To the upper ſide of the Church-yard, or Cymeterie, which is about ſeven or eight Steps higher than the Market-place, they aſcended by Stairs to adore the Moſt Holy Sacrament; every Sept, or Race in diſtinct diviſions, being ſeparated from each other ten or twelve paces diſtant, to avoid diſorder and confuſion; and having made their Adoration, they deſcended by another pair of back Stairs, which was erected on the right-hand of the Scaffold. Every Nation proceeded according to its Seniority, which was taken and meaſured by the time that the Incas had made the Conqueſt of them: So thoſe who were the laſt ſubdued, were placed the firſt in the Proceſſion; and thoſe who were the more antient Subjects followed, until at length, in the laſt place, the Incas themſelves came immediately before the Prieſts, mixed with a number of poor People, to ſignifie their Humility in a low and mean condition, having loſt their Empire, their Houſes, Inheritance, and all their Revenue particularly belonging to them.

more

This being the order directed and obſerved in the Proceſſion, divers Indians from the Canaris intruded themſelves amongſt the croud; for though that Province is not within the Precincts and Juriſdiction of Cozco, yet thoſe People alſo claimed a priviledge to appear at the Solemnity; and in their Chairs or Sedans, made a diſtinct Company by themſelves, becauſe many of their Nation lived in the City, of whom the Head and Chief was Don Franciſco Chillcho Cannari, of whom we made mention formerly, and ſet forth, how that in the time of the Siege, when Hernando Piçarro was greatly diſtreſſed by the Prince Manca Inca, this Canarian killed in the publick place an Indian Captain belonging to the Inca, who challenged the beſt man of the Spaniards to a ſingle Combat. This Don Franciſco aſcended the Stairs of the Cymeterie in a diſguiſe, covered with his Mantle, and his Hands under it, and in a Chair plain, without any trimming either of Silk or Gold, but painted with divers colours, and in the four Pannels thereof were deſcribed the four Battels between the Indians and the Spaniards.

Being come to the height of the Cemyterie to the right-hand, where the Officers of the Corporation were placed, and with them my Lord Garçilaſſo de la Vega, who was then Governour of the City, and his Deputy Monjaraz, who was a very able Lawyer, and a perſon of great Prudence and Diſcretion. Behold on a ſudden this Indian Camari threw off his Mantle, which ſerved him for a Cloak, and delivered it to one of his Servants, and ſo remained in cuerpo, with a cloſe Coat girt to him, according to their Cuſtom, when they are preparing to fight, or to perform any other Action, or Feats of Activity; in his right-hand he held by the locks the Head of an Indian carved in Wood, and painted. So ſoon as the Incas ſaw it, four or five of them bruſtled up to the Canarian, and catched him up from the Floor, intending to throw him headlong from the Scaffold, which cauſed a tumult amongſt the Indians, who remained on each ſide of the Scaffold, where the moſt Holy Sacrament was expoſed; ſo that the Deputy Monjaraz was obliged to interpoſe his Authority for keeping the Peace. And demanding of the Incas, for what reaſon they were ſo much offended? one of the graveſt amongſt them made anſwer, ſaying, This Dog Auca or Rebbel, inſtead of coming to celebrate this Feſtival, comes with a Head, to revive the memory of thoſe things which had better been forgotten.

Then the Deputy asked the Cannarian, What was the meaning thereof? To which he reply'd, Sir, I cut off the Head of an Indian, who challenged any of the Spaniards to a ſingle Duel, at that time when Hernando Piçarro, and Gonçalo Piçarro, and John Piçarro my Lords and Maſters, with 200 Spaniards more, were beſieged in this Market-place: and in regard there was no Spaniard, but who thought it a diſ-reputation to him, to engage ſingly with an Indian; I took up the Quarrel my ſelf, and obtained leave to accept the Challenge, and engage in the Combat; which I performed with ſuch good ſucceſs, that I overcame the Indian, and cut off his Head in this Market-place; and then pointed with his Finger to the very plat of Ground where the Duel was fought: Moreover, ſaid he, theſe four Pictures which are in the four Pannels of my Chair, are a deſcription of the four Battels in which I was engaged on the ſide of the Spaniards againſt the Indians; ſo that it is no wonder, if on ſuch a day as this, I ſhould boaſt and glory of thoſe Exploits, and Feats of Arms which I have performed in ſervice of the Chriſtians. To which the Inca again reply'd, Thou Dog and Traytor, didſt thou do this Action by thy own courage and bravery, or by virtue and aſſiſtance of this Pachacamac, before whom we are now preſent, and by means, and under the auſpicious conduct of the Spaniards Fortune? Doſt thou not know, that thou, and all thy Linage were Slaves to us, and that it was not by thy Proweſs and Valour that thou didſt obtain this Victory, but ſolely by virtue of that power we have before mentioned? If thou wilt make tryal of the truth of what I ſay, ſince we are all Chriſtians, get thee to the Market-place, and provide thy ſelf with Arms, and there ſhall meet thee one of the meaneſt of our Servants, who ſhall cut thee into ſlices, and confound thee, and all that belong to thee. Doſt thou not remember, that about this time, and in this very place, we cut off the Heads of thirty Spaniards, and that one of our Incas diſmounted two men, and wreſted their Lances from them, and had done the like to Gonçalo Piçarro, had he not reſcued himſelf by a more than ordinary Agility and Proweſs? Doſt thou not know, that we put an end to our Wars againſt the Spaniards, and raiſed the Siege of this Town; and that our Prince did voluntarily reſign his Empire, and retire into Baniſhment, upon no other Motive than the aſtoniſhment we conceived, to ſee the many Miracles which the Pachacamac wrought in favour and defence of them? Doſt thou not know, that during the ſiege of this City, we killed near 800 Spaniards in the way to Rimac? And were it not now a brave thing, and a Gallantry fit for the Honour of ſuch a Feaſt as this, to raiſe up the Heads of all thoſe that were ſlain, with the Head of John Piçarro, who was killed above, in yonder Fortreſs, and expoſe them to the view of all theſe Spectators? It had been well, if thou hadſt conſidered theſe particulars, and many others which I could now relate, before thou hadſt acted ſuch a ſcandalous piece of folly as this. And then turning to the Deputy, Sir, ſaid he, do me that Juſtice, which the nature of this Inſolence requires, that we may not be affronted nor trampled on by our own Slaves.

The Deputy Monjaraz having heard the Reaſons alledged by one, and the other, ordered the Head which Cannari carried in his hand to be taken from him, and the Mantle which was girt cloſe, to be ſtripped off, requiring him on pain of a far greater puniſhment, neither to diſcourſe, nor treat of ſuch matters as theſe, either in publick or private. With this reprehenſion given to Cannari, all the Incas and Indians both Men and Women were fully ſatisfied; and the word Auca, Auca, was raiſed, and taken from one to another, which reſounded over all the Town: And then the Proceſſion was carried forward without interruption, according to the accuſtomary Ceremonies. It is ſaid, that the compaſs which they take in carrying the Proceſſion now, is twice as far as it was formerly; for now they go out from the Great Church, and return round by way of St. Francis, which is much farther, than when they only fetched a compaſs round the two places of Cuſipata and Haucaypata, which we have often mentioned.

Bleſſed be the Divine Majeſty, who hath vouchſafed to bleſs this Countrey with theſe holy Footſteps, and to enlighten the Gentiles, who were formerly benighted in the dark of Ignorance.

CHAP. II.

Of a ſtrange Accident which fell out at Cozco.

SOme years after the Wars of Franciſco Hernandez were ended, another Accident happened at Cozco, which was very ſtrange; the which having received from the report of ſome intelligent, and religious perſons, who underſtood, that I ſhould ſay, that a Narrative thereof would tend to the ſervice of our Holy Mother the Roman Church, were pleaſed to Tranſmit a Relation thereof, that I might inſert it in this our Hiſtory; and accordingly as an obedient, tho' an unworthy, Son of ſuch a Mother, I have thought it my Duty to recount that matter in the manner following.

Eight or nine years before the late Troubles, the Feaſt of the Evangeliſt St. Mark was annually celebrated in Cozco, in ſuch manner as the Inhabitants of that City were able to perform. The Proceſſion was carried forth from the Convent of the B. St. Dominick, which as we have before mentioned, was founded in that Houſe, which in the times of Gentiliſm, was the Temple Dedicated to the Sun. From this Convent the Proceſſion was carried to a certain Hermitage, adjoining to thoſe Houſes which were belonging to Don Chriſtoval Paulu Inca. A certain Prieſt called Father ther Porras, who had been an ancient Inhabitant of the Country, and one greatly devoted to that Bleſſed Evangeliſt, being deſirous to celebrate the Feſtival of that Saint, was accuſtomed every Year to bring a tame Bull with him to the Proceſſion, decked with Garlands, and compoſed of variety of Flowers. In the year 1556 all the Clergy and Corporation of the City with a multitude of other people coming to ſolemnize this Feaſt, the Bull being as tame, and gentle as any Lamb, walked in the midſt, and went and returned without any diſturbance to the Proceſſion. Being come back to the Convent, the Church not being capable to receive the Multitudes of People which crouded thither, the Indians and the more common ſort, remained without, and made a Lane for the Proceſſion to paſs. The Spaniards entered into the Church, leaving a way to come up to the Chancel: The Bull which walked immediately before the Prieſts, in that tame and gentle manner, as we have ſaid before, being entered three or four Paces within the Porch of the Church, on a ſudden runs at a Spaniard called Salazar, and took him up on his Horns, and without any hurt to him, toſſed him out at one of the Doors of the Church: The people affrighted with this unuſual rudeneſs of the Bull, were put into great diſorder; but the Bull returning gently back, took his place again in the Proceſſion, and walked up gently to the Chancel. The people of the City much admiring at this Novelty, and thinking that there muſt be ſomething more than ordinary in the matter, enquired with all diligence to diſcover the Myſtery thereof: And upon a ſtrict examination of the thing, it was found that about ſix or ſeven Months before, this Salazar had maintained a Law-ſuit againſt the Church-men, and that he had incurred the Cenſure of Excommunication, and had never been abſolved from it. But upon this Accident he deſired Abſolution, and obtained it; having declared his intention, never more to fall into the like Error of Contumacy again. I was then in the City, when this matter paſſed, and was preſent at the Proceſſion, and heard the Story thereof related more at large by others, than we have done in this Chapter.

CHAP. III.

The Marquis of Cannete is deſigned for Vice-King of Peru. He lands upon the Continent. Several Negers, or Blacks, who were Fugitives, are reduced. The burning of a Galeon, with eight hundred people therein.

SO ſoon as News was brought to his Imperial Majeſty then in Germany, of the death of the Vice-King Don Antonio de Mendoça, he nominated the Count de Palma, to ſucceed him in that Employment, but on ſome juſt grounds and reaſons, he excuſed himſelf; the like did the Count de Olivares, who was unwilling to accept of that Government. Thoſe who lived in the Indies, did believe that the Great Men, who were commodious at home, were unwilling to accept an Office ſo far diſtant from Spain, and from the Court: Tho' a Vice-King who had reſided there for ſome time, was of another opinion, and ſaid, that the Government of Peru would be the beſt Employment the King had in his Gift, were it not ſo near to Madrid, where the Court reſides. His meaning, was the complaints of the many oppreſſions he exerciſed on the People, would come ſooner to the Court than he deſired. At length his Majeſty pitched upon Don Andres Hurardo de Mendoça, Marquis of Cannete, and chief Conſtable of Cuenca, to be his Vice-King in Peru, who having accepted the Office, and received his diſpatches, departed for Peru, and arrived at Nombre de Dios, which he made the place of reſidence for the Miniſters of Juſtice, and for the Officers of the Imperial Revenue. He there rewarded ſome of the Ancient Conquerors of the Iſles of Barlovento, and of the main main Land, whom, as Palentino ſaith, he found very poor, and neceſſitous: but he could not beſtow on them Lands, with vaſſallage of Indians, becauſe the Natives of that Country had been all deſtroyed; but he gave them Money, and ſome Offices of benefit. He made a Proviſion for Pedro de Orſua, who was a very Noble Gentleman, a great Souldier, and Captain in the new Kingdom, where he had performed many great exploits, and Peopled a City named Pamplona: but by the Severity, and Injuſtice of a Judge, who ſeized upon all his Eſtate, Orſua was forced to fly, and (as John de Caſtallanos writes) to take refuge in Nombre de Dios, where the Vice-King Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça met him, and gave him a Commiſſion to ſeek, and ſuppreſs the Fugitive Negers, called Cimarrones, who lived in the Mountaines, and robbed, and pillaged all Merchants, and Travellers who paſſed thoſe ways, murdering and wounding in a manner not ſufferable, ſo that there was no paſſing in leſs than twenty in a Company. The number of theſe Negers increaſed daily, for when any of them received the leaſt hard word from his Maſter, he preſently forſook his Service, having ſo good a Sanctuary, and Receptacle to fly unto. For this Enterpriſe, and Deſign, and to ſuppreſs theſe Negers, Pedro de Orſua raiſed Men; they were called Cimarrones, which is a word proper to the Language of the Iſle of Barlovento, and to theſe Robbers ſeveral of the Souldiers of Hernandez Giron joyned, being ſuch as were baniſhed and fled, all which, or as many of them as were concerned in this matter, were pardoned by the Vice-King. The Negers finding themſelves hardly beſet and diſtreſſed, offered to treat and accept Articles of Accommodation; which for quietneſs ſake and for peace were granted to them; and accordingly it was concluded, That all thoſe, who had unto that time fled from their Maſters, ſhould be Free-men, and continue in their ſtate of Freedom; but for thoſe, who ſhould for the future eſcape from their Maſters, the Cimarrones ſhould be obliged to ſurrender them up again to their Patrons, or pay the price demanded for them. That a Neger Man, or Woman, being ill treated by their Maſter, he, or they paying the price, which he, or ſhe, or they coſt, the Maſter, or Maſters, ſhall be obliged to ſet them at liberty. That the Negers ſhall People, and Inhabit that Countrey, which they at preſent poſſeſs, and ſhall live peaceably as good Common-wealths-men, or Natives of the Country, and not diſperſed within the Mountains, as formerly; and that they ſhall have free Trade and Commerce with the Spaniards: All which, in order to Peace and Quietneſs, was agreed, and confirmed on one ſide, and the other; and the Negers gave Pledges and Hoſtages for ſecurity of the Peace. Their King, called Ballano, delivered his own Perſon for a Hoſtage, and his Subjects never redeeming him, he was tranſported into Spain, where he died.

Now in regard a little before the Vice-King began his Voyage, a fatal accident happened to a Ship in the Ocean, I have thought fit to inſert it in this place, as not altogether impertinent to this Hiſtory.

Jeronimo de Alderete, was ſent from Chile into Spain, on occaſion of buſineſs, in behalf of the Governour Pedro de Valdivia; and during his Reſidence at the Court, advice coming of the death of the Governour, he Petitioned his Majeſty for the place, and obtained it. And being ready to depart for Chile, he took his Siſter-in-Law with him, an honeſt Vertuous perſon, and one of thoſe, who are called Devout Women, and with her he embarked on a Galeon, where were 800 Perſons, and which was Admiral of ſix other Ships, and ſailed from Spain two Months before the Vice-King. This Religious Woman being very devout, deſired leave from the Maſter of the Ship, to keep a Candle in her Cabin by Night, for reading her office, to which the Maſter condeſcended, conſidering it was for her Devotion, and that ſhe might pray for the whole Ship, and alſo was Daughter-in-Law to the Governour. Being at Sea, and ſailing with a fair wind, it happened that a Phyſitian belonging to another Ship, came aboard the Galeon to viſit a Friend of his, who was there; and being old Acquaintance rejoyced to ſee each other: Towards Evening the Phyſitian deſirous to return aboard his own Ship, was perſwaded by his Friend to ſtay that Night with him, for that the Weather was very fair, and likely to continue; and ſo the Boat was towed that night at the Stern of the Ship, intending next morning to make uſe of it, and return. But it happened, that that night this this devout Woman being at her Prayers, or rather fell asleep in the middle of her Office with her Candle lighted, gave a fatal Example and Instance, how dangerous it is on any occasion whatsoever to break the Rules and Orders of the Sea, which are made for conservation of the Ship, and those embarqued thereon: one of which is, That upon no pretence whatsoever, any light shall be continued in the Ship by night, unless it be that only which is placed in the Biddacle for the Compass, or in the Lanthorn on the Poop: For so it was, that the Candle taking hold of the Timber of the Ship, the flame broke out at the sides, before it was discovered, and burnt so violently, that it was impossible to be quenched; which when the Master perceived, he ordered the Marriner, who was at the Helm, to draw up the Boat by the side, wherein the Physitian had the day before come aboard; and then went to the Governour Alderete, and without any noise privately told him the misfortune of the Ship; and so he, and one of the two Sons he had aboard, with the Governour and the Marriner stepped into the Boat, without calling or crying out to the others, lest the People crouding into the Boat, and every one endeavouring to save himself, they should all be lost.

In this manner did the Master save his own life, and as an expiation of his sin for breaking the Laws of the Sea, which ought inviolably to be observed, he sacrificed one of his Sons. The Fire having such an abundance of matter administred to its nourishment, such as Pitch and Tar, increased so violently, as soon awakened all the People in the Ship; and being seen by the other Ships of the Fleet, they came as near as they durst, and put out their Boats to save as many of those as they could, who should throw themselves into the Sea: but the Fire coming to the Guns, which were all shotted, they discharged so fiercely, that the Ships were forced for their safety to retire at a distance, and suffer all the 800 persons then aboard to perish; some being burnt, and others drowned, who for fear of the flames had thrown themselves into the Sea. The news of which was the occasion of great sorrow and lamentation over all Peru. Jeronimo de Alderete, so soon as it was day, got aboard one of his Ships, and immediately commanded a Flag to be put out on the main Top-Mast head; that they might see he was still alive, and had escaped both the Fire and the Water. And so giving out his Orders to the other Ships to prosecute their Voyage to Nombre de Dios, he returned to Spain to renew his Commission and Instructions, all his Writings having been consumed by the Fire; and having procured his Dispatches, he again put to Sea with the Fleet which transported Marquis de Cannete the Vice-King to Peru, as Palentino reports, though he mentions nothing of the disaster of the Galeon.

CHAP. IV.

The Vice-King arrives in Peru. He puts new Officers into places of Trust. He writes Letters to the several Governours.

THE Vice-King Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça, departed from Panama, and with a fair Wind arrived at Paita, which is on the Confines of Peru, from whence he dispatched his respective Orders to the Kingdom of Quito, and other parts thereabouts. He also wrote to the several Governours of the Empire; and sent a Gentleman, who was a Kinsman of his Family, on a particular message to the Royal Chancery at Los Reyes; but being a Youngman, he made too long a stay at St. Michaels Town, entertaining himself in Divertisements, neither decent nor honest; upon notice whereof, whereof, the Vice-King ſent him expreſs Orders to proceed no farther; and when he himſelf came to that City, he commanded him to be taken into Cuſtody, with intent to ſend him Priſoner into Spain, reſolving never to pardon any Meſſenger or Officer of his, who did not diligently obſerve the Commiſſion and Orders he had given him: He alſo ſent away Don Pedro Luys de Cabrera into Spain, with other married men, who had left their Wives at home. But the Truth is, it was more the fault of the Wives, than of the Husbands, who had ſent for them, and given them credit for conſiderable Sums of Money to defray the charge of their voyage: But theſe Women being delighted with Sevile, which charms all thoſe which have reſided in it, have refuſed to obey the Husbands Summons, and prevailed with the Juſtice to ſend Commands to recal them into Spain. There were three of theſe Women, whoſe Husbands I knew in Peru, and were men poſſeſſed of conſiderable Eſtates in Land, to the value of a hundred thouſand Ducats of yearly Rent, all which upon their deaths would have deſcended to their Wives, had they reſided upon the place, but being abſent, the Right and Propriety devolved to the King: I could name particularly their Names, but out of reſpect to their Reputation 'tis better to conceal them.

The Vice King proceeded forward on his way, with all the gentle demeanour and courteſie imaginable; rewarding ſome, and giving fair words and promiſes to all, who demanded a remuneration for their paſt ſervices. All which he acted with Art and Deſign, that a report of his Candour might fore-run his coming, and the minds of men quieted by a prepoſſeſſion of his intentions to gratifie and reward every man as he deſerved. It was alſo the talk of common fame, that the Vice-King intended to ſelect a Cabinet Council of four Perſons, of the moſt intelligent, and experienced men of the Empire, who were impartial and unbiaſſed, and who by long and antient practice in Affairs, were able to render an account of every Man's Services, and Merit.

The Perſons commonly named, were Franciſco de Garay Citizen of Huanacu, Lorenzo de Aldana of Arequepa, Garçilaſſo de la Vega, and Antonio de Quinnones of Cozco; this was the fancy of the common people, it being well known, that every one of theſe men was endued with a Talent ſufficient to govern Peru, in caſe the Reins were committed to their hands: And with this imagination the Inhabitants of this Empire, both Clergy and Seculars, comforted and pleaſed themſelves; ſaying, that ſuch a Prince muſt be ſent from Heaven, into whoſe heart God had infuſed the thoughts of making choice of ſuch Counſellours.

Palentino in the ſecond Chapter of his Book, hath theſe words. The Vice-King, ſaith he, proceeded on his Journey to Los Reyes, declaring as he went, his Intentions to reward every man as he deſerved; but the common voice of Fame gave out, that he would confer his Favour on all, without reflection on any thing that was paſt. This report brought multitudes of people to Truxillo, and many of thoſe who had been Delinquents, and faulty in their Duty to his Majeſty, towards all which the Vice-King carried himſelf very fairly, and gave out in his diſcourſe, that by thoſe men who had revolted from Hernandez Giron to the King, that Country had been ſaved: And in this manner he amuſed the minds of the people, that thoſe who formerly durſt not adventure to Cozco, and other parts, without a ſtrong Guard and much circumſpection, were become at laſt confident and aſſured of ſafety, by indulgence from the Vice-King. Thus far this Authour. To which we are farther to add, and ſay,

That upon the News of the arrival of the Vice-King, the Inhabitants of Cozco were greatly pleaſed and ſatisfied; every one depending on the report which common Fame ſpread abroad of his Clemency and good Intentions. Howſoever Thomas Vazquez and Piedrahita lived retired at their Country-houſes, more out of ſhame than fear of their ſafety: For tho' they had followed the Rebellion from the firſt beginning of the Inſurrection, and concerned in all the Blood and Murders had been committed, yet having renounced the cauſe of the Rebel at a critical time, and in ſuch a conjuncture, as gave him the fatal blow, his Majeſties gracious Pardon under the Great Seal of the Chancery was conferred upon them; on confidence of which, they came freely to the City, when their occaſions called them thither, tho' with a modeſt Train, and with ſuch Equipage, as became men who, being under a Cloud, had retired into a kind of of voluntary Baniſhment amongſt their Indian Vaſſals: And with ſuch caution did theſe men live, that during the three years that my Father Garçillaſſo de la Vega was Governour of Cozco, I never ſaw them there, unleſs it were John Piedrahita, who upon ſome extraordinary occaſion of buſineſs, came by night to make my Father a Viſit, and give him a relation of his Solitary Life, but never in the day time appeared publickly on the place. Howſoever Alonſo Diaz, who was a Citizen, never abſented himſelf from home; but lived quietly in his own houſe, tho' he had been another of thoſe who had concerned himſelf in the Rebellion of Hernandez. And this was the truth of this Story, which our Authour makes ſuch a ſtir about, and would inſinuate things ſcandalous, and offenſive to the Hearers.

The Vice-King came to the City of Los Reyes, in the Month of July 1557, where he was received with that Pomp and Grandure which was due to his Royal Office, and to the Quality of his Perſon, having the title of Marquis given him from his Lordſhip over Vaſſals: for tho' other Vice-Kings had been Marquiſes, yet none of them before aſſumed the Title of their Marquiſate, with relation to Indians who were in vaſſallage to them. Eight days after he had taken the Chair of his Office, he again renewed his Poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the Name of King Philip the Second, to whom the Emperour Charles the Fifth had reſigned the Kingdoms, and Signories which appertained to him: what Motives he had to make this reſignation is not known, but it is believed that his want of Health, and indiſpoſition of Body, were the cauſe, and that the weight of Affairs of State were too burdenſome in that feeble condition. This exchange of Government under the names of two different Kings, was attended with all the State, and ſolemn attendance that was required; the perſons preſent, were the Vice-King, the Judges of the Bench, all the Officers Eccleſiaſtical, and Civil, Don Jeronimo de Loayſa Arch-Biſhop of Los Reyes, all the Friers of the ſeveral Convents then in that City, which were four, namely, that of our Lady of the Merceds, St. Francis, St. Dominick, and St. Auguſtine. The Ceremony in the Parade, and Streets being over, they went to the Cathedral Church, where the Arch-biſhop in his Pontifical Habit celebrated High Maſs. The ſame paſſed in all the other Cities of that Empire, every one ſhewing the great ſatisfaction, and contentment he received on occaſion of that Solemnity, which was celebrated with the Feaſt of Bulls, and throwing darts; and endeavouring to out-vie each other in Gallantry, and richneſs of their Liveries; which is ſtill the common vanity of that Country.

The Vice-King Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça having taken poſſeſſion of the Government, diſpatched new Officers, and Governours to the ſeveral Juriſdictions of Peru: Amongſt which a certain Lawyer, a Native of Cuenca, called Baptiſto Munnoz, whom the Vice-King brought with him, was ſent to Cozco. Altamirano one of his Majeſties Juſtices, who had refuſed to follow his Majeſties Army and Standard into the Field, was made Governour of the City of Plate; others were diſpeeded with Commiſſions to the Cities of Huamanca, Arequepa, and de la Paz: where many things paſſed of great importance: We ſhall give an account of ſome of them in the following Chapter.

CHAP. V.

The Orders which the Vice-King iſſued forth to prevent Mutinies, and Inſurrections. Thomas Vazquez, Piedrahita, and Alonſo Diaz, are put to death for having been engaged in the Rebellion of Hernandez Giron.

P*Alentino*, in the ſecond Chapter of his third part, ſaith, that ſo ſoon as the Vice-King entered into the City of Los Reyes, that he ſet Guards and Centinels on all the ways leading to the ſeveral Cities of the Empire; with orders to examine carefully all paſſengers, as well Indians, and Spaniards, and to take from them what Papers, and Letters, they carried with them, ſo as to diſcover what Plots and Conſpiracies were then contriving againſt the Government. All which are the words of this Author; as is that alſo which follows, the truth of which I can my ſelf avouch, having been an eye witneſs of many paſſages thereof. The Vice-King gave Order, that no Spaniard whatſoever ſhould travel without a particular Licenſe or Paſs, under the hand of ſome Juſtice of the Peace belonging to the parts where he lived; in which Paſs or Licenſe, the reaſons were to be ſpecifyed, and the Buſineſs, or Occaſions, which cauſed the Party to travel: And particularly care was taken, that no Spaniard upon pretence of coming to the City to any Feſtival, ſhould be permitted to paſs: Tho' for the preſent this Order had little effect, in regard, that before it could be publiſhed, multitudes of People had crouded to the City, to partake in the common joy, which was evidenced at the reception of this Vice-King. He commanded, that all the Cannon and Arms found in the City, ſhould be taken up, and conſerved in a common Magazine; all which was ordered to prevent Conſpiracies, and diſturbances which had been cauſed by former Rebellions; but the Country had been ſo lately wearied, and haraſſed by Civil Wars, that there was no thoughts amongſt the people tending to a ruine from whence they had ſo newly eſcaped. And now let us leave the Vice-King for a time, to diſcourſe of the Governours, which he had ſent to Cozco and to the Charcas.

The Lawyer Munnoz, approaching to the City of Cozco with Commiſſion of Governour, was met, and received by my Father Garçilaſſo; who, ſo ſoon as he was entered within the Priviledges and Juriſdiction of the City, delivered the White Rod of Juſtice into his hand; which when he had received, the firſt queſtion he made him was; how much the Fee was for ſetting his Hand, or Firm to any Writing? To which he made anſwer, that he knew not, having never demanded ſuch a Fee or Duty. No, ſaid the Lawyer, that is ſtrange, for Juſtices ought not to loſe their right of what nature ſo ever, tho' never ſo inconſiderable. The ſtanders by wondred much at this Dialogue; to which ſome made anſwer, that 'twas not ſtrange for men who came from Spain, with no other intent, than to gain what they could with a good Conſcence, to know the utmoſt value of their Office above the Income of their Salary.

So ſoon as the Governour had received the Rod of his Authority, and made his Purſuivants, he employed two of them upon a Service without the City; one he ſent to apprehend Thomas Vazquez, and the other Piedrahita, both which in 5 or 6 days being brought Priſoners to Cozco, were committed to the publick Priſon. Their Friends and Relations offered to give bayl for them, and to bind themſelves in conſiderable Bonds for their good behaviour, and that they ſhould not go forth beyond the Precincts of the City; ſuppoſing that the ſeizure made of their Perſons, was to the end that they might be confined within the Walls of the City, and not permitted to ramble abroad in the Countries amongſt their Indians and other People. My Father offered to become Bayl for one of them; but he was anſwered, that the Commiſſion and inſtructions which this Governour brought, was much different to what they imagined; for had their confinement to the City been only deſigned, there would not have needed all the formality uſed in ſending for them by Officers, and committing them to Priſon: The truth is, the iſſue was according to what Franciſco Hernandez had formerly preſaged, and as we have before intimated; for the next morning they were found dead in the Priſon, having been there ſtrangled, notwithſtanding their Pardons which they had ſued forth from the Royal Court of Chancery. Their Plantations, and Lordſhips over Indians were all confiſcated: That belonging to Thomas Vazquez, which was one of the beſt Mannors, or Lordſhips near the City, was conferred by the Vice-King on Rodrigo d'Eſqueval a Native of Seville, who had ſome ſmall Eſtate, but with this addition he was made great and conſiderable. In like manner the Eſtate of Piedrahita was diſpoſed, and forfeited, as was that of Alonſo Diaz, whom they likewiſe put to death: beſides which Executions, there were no other Proceſſes of Juſtice made againſt the Rebels in puniſhment for the late War. Howſoe're, the Governour Munnoz proſecuted his Predeceſſour in that Office, and laid four Articles to his charge. The firſt was, That he ſported (after the Spaniſh manner and cuſtome) with Darts on horſe-back, which did not become become the Juſtice of that Town. That he went often abroad to make private Viſits without the Rod of Juſtice in his hand, which gave an occaſion to many perſons to deſpiſe and expoſe the honour of the Government to Contempt. The third was, that in Chriſtmas time he gave leave to the Citizens, and others, to play at Cards and Dice in his Houſe, and that he himſelf plaid with them; which did not become the gravity of a Governour. And laſtly, that he had taken a Clerk who was not a Free-man of the City, nor had obſerved the formality which the Law required in that caſe. For anſwer unto which, he replyed, That as to the ſport of throwing Darts, it was a paſtime which he had uſed all the days of his Life, nor would he leave it off ſo long as he lived, tho' he were placed in an Office of far higher Dignity and Honour, than that in which he was conſtituted and inveſted. To the ſecond, he ſaid, that ſometimes he went without his Rod to the next Neighbour, or houſe near at hand, where he was familiarly acquainted, and where he was ſufficiently aſſured to receive no affront for want of the Badge, or Enſign of his Authority. That as to the Play and Gaming at Chriſtmas, it was very true, that he did allow thereof in his own houſe, and did himſelf play; which prevented many differences, and quarrels, which might otherwiſe have ariſen in other places, amongſt proud and angry perſons. As to the Clerk, he ſaid, that he being no Lawyer himſelf, did not ſo much regard the ability, or the manner how he was qualified for that Office, as his Fidelity, and Truth, and faithful adminiſtration, of which all the City was ready to give Teſtimony. Some other Articles were drawn up againſt Monjaraz: but he being only Deputy-Governour, could not be ſo highly charged, as was the Governour himſelf. And the truth is, the faults of neither were fit to be mentioned, only the new Judge was willing to have ſomething to ſay; but there neither being Crimes to puniſh, nor Debts to pay, all Actions were ſmoothed, and no Proceſſes further made.

CHAP. VI.

The impriſonment and death of Martin de Robles, and the reaſon for which he was executed.

WE have mentioned before, how that Altamirano, Judge of the Court of Chancery, in the City of Los Reyes, was ſent Chief Juſtice to the City of Plate, where, ſo ſoon as he was poſſeſſed of his Government, he apprehended Martin de Robles a Citizen of that Town, and without any Indictment or Proceſs made againſt him, he hanged him up publickly in the open Market-place. At which the people much lamented, and were greatly offended, becauſe he was one of the moſt principal men of Quality in the whole Empire, and ſo aged, and bowed down with Years, that he could not bear his own Sword girt to his ſide, but was carried after him by an Indian Page, who attended him. But when the Reaſons of his death were more fully known, the offence thereat was much increaſed, as Palentino mentions in theſe words following.

The Vice-King ſent a Warrant to Judge Altamirano, to put Martin de Robles to Death: The Reaſons for which he gave, that ſufficient proofs had been made before him, the Vice-King, how that this Martin de Robles having been in company with ſeveral perſons, ſhould ſay theſe words, Let us go to Lima, and teach the Vice-King better manners, than to write in ſuch a rude Stile, and with ſo little reſpect and formality, as he uſes. Theſe are the words of which he was accuſed, tho' it is generally believed, that he never ſaid them, nor ever gave any colour, or ground for ſuch an Accuſation. Some ſay, that this raſh Speech was not that which provoked the Vice-King againſt Martin de Robles, but ſome other ſuggeſtions of having been acceſſary to the Impriſonment, and death of Blaſco Nunnez Vela Vice King of Peru. Thus far, this Author, in an obſcure manner, expreſſes this Paſſage; which we ſhall endeavour to clear, and explain more at large. It is true, that Martin de Robles did ſay ſome ſuch words, which were to be taken in another Senſe: For (as we have ſaid before) when the Vice-King wrote Letters from Payta, to the ſeveral Governours and Juſtices of the Empire, giving them to underſtand the news of his arrival in that Country; the Superſcription of his Letters were in this manner, To the Noble Lord of ſuch a place: And in the Letter he treated them with Thou, which was the common Stile to what perſon of Quality ſoever; the which manner of writing gave great offence over all Peru: For in thoſe days, and a long time afterwards, perſons of Quality, and ſuch as were rich in that Country, always uſed in Writing to their Servants, the Title of Noble, ſaying, To the Noble——and within the Letter they wrote ſometimes in the ſecond, and ſometimes in the third perſon, according to his Condition and Office wherein he ſerved: and this Cuſtom prevailed, until ſuch time as a Pragmatica came forth to regulate the Terms of Honour which were given. But in regard the Letters from the Vice King were in another Form and Stile, they gave offence to ſuch evil Men, who were deſirous of Change and diſturbances; and cauſed them, with reflection on the preſent Vice-King, to commend, and praiſe the Civility of thoſe who were formerly in the ſame power, who in all their Letters uſed Terms of Reſpect, according to the Quality and Merit of the perſon. My Father Garçilaſſo being then Governour of Cozco, received a Letter from the Vice-King with the ſame Title and Superſcription; which ſome asked him how he could brook, or how he could endure ſuch a neglect? To which my Father made anſwer, that he could bear it very well; ſince that the Vice-King wrote to him, not barely by the Name of Garçilaſſo de la Vega, but with the addition of Governour of Cozco, which ſhewed him to be his Officer, and Miniſter under him; and that very ſhortly they ſhould ſee how the Vice-King would change the Form, and Stile of the Superſcription of his Letters to him: Which accordingly happened, for about eight days afterwards, the Vice-King being at Rimac, he wrote a Letter to my Father, directed in this manner, To the Right Worſhipful Senior Garçilaſſo de la Vega, &c. and within he treated him with ſuch Terms, as might become an Elder Brother towards his younger; at which, thoſe who ſaw it did much admire. I have had both theſe Letters in my cuſtody, for at that time I ſerved my Father in quality of his Clark, and wrote all the Letters which he diſpatched to ſeveral parts of the Empire; and in like manner, I gave the Anſwer to both theſe Letters. But to return to the Story of Martin de Robles, from which we have made this digreſſion. The Truth thereof is this, One of the firſt Letters from the Vice-King, was barely in this manner, To the Governour of the Charcas, and no more; which gave occaſion to the huffing, vapouring Fellows to ſay, the Vice-King was very uncivil, and rude, to write in ſuch a mean manner to Governours, who taking all things together, both as to their Eſtates and Qualities, were as good men as himſelf. Upon this, it was ſaid, that Martin de Robles ſhould utter theſe words, Let him come hither, and we ſhall teach him better manners. But this he ſaid in manner of a Jeſt; for on leſs occaſion than this, as Palentino ſaith, he uſed great liberty with his Tongue. For he would never for his Jeſt ſake ſpare his Friend, or his Wife her ſelf: And when ſome of his intimate acquaintance would blame his indiſcretion (as ſometimes they did) for taking ſuch freedom in his ſpeech; he would anſwer, that he would rather loſe a Friend, than a quick witty ſaying, uttered opportunely in its due time and place; and upon this fancy the poor man loſt his life. But as to his concernment in the misfortunes of Blaſco Nunnez, all that matter was abſolutely forgot, and laid aſide, 13 years having paſſed ſince that time; and even then this Martin de Robles performed many, and ſignal ſervices for his Majeſty, for in that very critical juncture of Affairs, he with much danger of his Life, revolted from Gonçalo Piçarro to the Preſident Gaſca, whom he faithfully ſerved, until the end of that War; for which the Preſident rewarded him, as we have before related. In like manner, he ſerved in the Wars againſt Don Sebaſtian, and Franciſco Hernandez Giron, in both which he frankly laid out his Eſtate, and neither ſpared his Silver nor his Gold, to ſerve his Majeſty; by which Merit, he obtained his Pardon for his paſt Crimes, being granted by the Preſident Gaſca, and confirmed by the Juſtices, under the Great Seal of the Royal Chancery.

CHAP. VII.

In what maner the Vice-King treated thoſe who made demands for reward of their late Services; and how by the Advice of unjuſt and ill-natured Counſellours he baniſhed thirty ſeven of them into Spain.

P*Alentino* in another part of the Second Chapter before mentioned, ſpeaking of the Vice-King, ſaith as follows, All the Cannon, Muſquets, and other Arms which were in the City he got, and lodged in his own Houſe, upon pretence of Feſtivals, and occaſion of Rejoicings. After he had done this, and ſecured other matters, he repealed all the Commiſſions and Pardons which the Juſtices had given; which ſtruck a terror and awe upon the minds of divers Captains and Souldiers; and with ſome inconſiderable gratification he rewarded others for their Services: Howſoever, underſtanding that many of theſe men were piqued, and ſpoke ſome words which ſounded not well, he apprehended ſeveral of them within the Precincts of his own Court, and immediately ſent them away to Lima under a ſafe Guard; giving out, that he ſent ſome of them for Spain, to the intent that they might be rewarded there by his Majeſty; ſince that Peru could not confer Gratifications on them agreeable to their Merits: and that he ſent others of them, that they might receive puniſhment for their Inſolence: And when ſome adviſed him to ſend the Informations againſt them, and the Proceſſes judicially made in their cauſe, together with their perſons into Spain: He refuſed to do it, ſaying, that he intended to intercede with his Majeſty in their behalf, ſo that they might receive rewards and Honours, rather than be the Attorney General to implead them.

But in regard this Author hath expreſſed ſeveral paſſages of this Hiſtory in a dark, obſcure, and confuſed manner, we ſhall endeavour to elucidate them more clearly, and in an Hiſtorical manner declare every thing methodically as it paſſed. And firſt, as to that point which this Author mentions about taking away Arms by the Vice-king: we muſt know, that before the coming of the Vice-king, the Juſtices had given orders to the Governours in their reſpective Juriſdictions to ſeize on all the Arms they could find; and accordingly my Father publiſhed this their Command by common outcry; and in obedience thereunto, many Gentlemen and Souldiers of good Reputation, who were Loyal to his Majeſty, brought in their Muſquets and other Arms; but the common People, and ſuch as were ill affected would not bring them in, unleſs they were purchaſed with Mony, or for ſome conſideration, either of themſelves or Friends: for which reaſon my Maſter Garçilaſſo acquainted the Lords of the Royal Chancery with this particular, giving them to underſtand, that this courſe was rather prejudicial than advantagious to his Majeſty, for that his Friends would by that means be diſarmed, and his Enemies guarded with their Weapons by them. And upon this conſideration it was, that the Juſtices gave orders privately, to have the Arms reſtored to their reſpective owners; which accordingly was done: And this is what paſſed about the Arms, of which this Author ſpeaks. And as to Repealing, and Revoking thoſe Pardons which the Juſtices gave to thoſe who had followed the Faction of Hernandez, it was done in order to bring thoſe perſons to Juſtice, in the manner before ſpecified. And as to the ſatisfaction he ſpeaks of, which the Vice-King gave to divers perſons, as well Captains as Souldiers, for a gratuity and reward of their paſt Services: The truth was this, He did make offer to ſome of thoſe pretenders of a Gratification, but in a mean kind, and much inferiour to their Qualities and Merits; and with condition, and under proviſo, that they ſhould immediately marry, and take Wives of thoſe Spaniſh Women, who were lately come over; it being according to his Majeſties Inſtructions, and ſo ordained for conſervation of the publick peace and quietneſs of the Land: And in order hereunto the Vice-King aſſigned to ſeveral of the Pretenders, ſuch and ſuch Women for Wives, Wives, under the notion of modeſt and virtuous Ladies, though many of them were known to be common Strumpets. For which reaſon moſt of the Pretenders refuſing their Society, gave occaſion to malicious men, who were deſirous to make troubles, to incenſe the Vice-King againſt theſe Pretenders, who were men of greater merit than themſelves, inſinuating that they refuſed thoſe Wives only out of obſtinacy, and averſion to the Commands of Authority. And hereupon this Author ſaith, That the Vice-King did look on theſe men, as diſſatisfied; and believing, as was reported to him, that they let fall many angry words tending to Sedition, he gave orders to apprehend ſeveral of them; and under a ſtrong Guard ſent them to the Port, and Callao of Lima, in order to tranſport them to Spain, giving out, that it was to have ſome perſons of merit more amply rewarded by his Majeſty in Spain, than could be done in Peru; and that others of them, who had been inſolent and daring, might be puniſhed by Baniſhment, rather than rewarded, &c.

The perſons taken, and ſent away, were thirty ſeven, all men eminently known and ſignalized for their Loyalty and Service to his Majeſty; one of which was Gonçalo Silveſtre, whoſe Labours and Hazards are at large recorded in our Hiſtory of Florida; and in this alſo he is not mentioned without regard to his Honour and Reputation. Particularly we have ſignified, how that at the Battel of Chuquinca he had a Horſe killed under him, which ſome few days before he had bought of Martin de Robles for twelve thouſand Ducats. Of the ſame degree and merit were ſeveral others in this Kingdom, of which I wiſh I had a particular liſt. And though Palentino ſaith, that ſeveral of theſe Pretenders were baniſhed, I muſt crave leave to diſſent from him, and ſay, That none of them were baniſhed for any Crime or Miſdemeanour, for all of them were men of merit and deſert. And as to what he farther ſaith, that ſome perſons would have perſwaded the Vice-King to have ſent the Informations, and Accuſations againſt theſe men, together with their perſons into Spain, and that he refuſed ſo to do, ſaying, That he would rather be an Interceſſor for them with his Majeſty, than their Accuſer, &c. The truth of which matter was this. There were not wanting Whiſperers, who inſinuated to the Vice-King jealouſies and fears of Mutinies and Seditions amongſt the Souldiers, who having for a long time ſerved the King at their own coſt and charge, complained of their hard uſage and ill treatment, and therefore adviſed to have them baniſhed: but others diſſwaded this courſe as unjuſt, and looking like Cruelty, to have men puniſhed, who deſerved Rewards. That the baniſhment out of Peru into Spain, was worſe than death to men, who were poor, and had conſumed their Eſtates and Subſtance in the ſervice of his Majeſty. Moreover, they added, That it became not the Quality nor Office of a Vice-King to ſend ſuch men into Spain with their Mouths full of complaints, to which no doubt but his Majeſty would lend an Ear and give Credit; eſpecially ſince nothing could be objected againſt them of Crime or Miſdemeanour, and that in behalf of themſelves they were able to make a large relation of their Services and Sufferings for his Majeſty, having waſted their Lives, and conſumed their Eſtates for the intereſt of the Crown: in proof and evidence of which they had their wounds, and their macerated bodies to ſhew, and plead for them before his Majeſty. Howſoever theſe conſiderations prevailed not ſo much with the Vice-King, as a courſe of greater ſeverity; for being made angry, and provoked by the evil ſuggeſtions of thoſe men, who pretended to diſcover ſecret Cabals and Conſpiracies amongſt them, he reſolved to ſend them away, as the beſt expedient to ſecure the Peace of the Empire; and that as to what they could ſay in Spain, or what they could do at their return from thence to Peru, he little regarded: for in going to Spain, ſaid he, they muſt ſpend a year, and in their Negotiations and Solicitations there, another would paſs; and a third in their Voyage back: and when they bring Letters and Orders in their own favour; it is then but kiſſing them and laying them on my Head, and ſaying, I obey; and at the end tell them, That the King hath no Money nor Means wherewith to reward them: and then after they return back again with the ſame complaints to the King, and have traced the ſame circle of buſineſs as before, they will then be, but where they were before, only three years more will have paſſed over their Heads, which in all will make up ſix, and by that time, none but God knows what will become of us. With ſuch thoughts as theſe, the Pretenders were diſpeeded into into Spain ſo poor and miſerable, that the richeſt of them had not a thouſand Ducats to defray his Charges; though to raiſe this Money, he had ſold his Horſe, and Cloaths, and the poor Furniture of his Houſe: and though ſome of them had poſſeſſions of Lands, and ſome little Rent, yet the Revenue was ſo ſmall, that it was ſcarce worth looking after, and ſo remote, that they were forced to leave and abandon it, as of no worth and value to them: for though a Perſon ſhould commit his Eſtate, in this manner, to the Truſt and Management of Friends; yet ſo far is Spain remote from Peru, that oftentimes Friends take advantage of diſtance, and long abſence, and make that their own, which is only intruſted to them by others: And thus much I can atteſt, and aver upon my own experience, who having left ſome Eſtate and Inheritance of my own to the care of another Friend, he made uſe of that confidence I had in him to cheat and defraud me of what appertained to me.

And this was the caſe of theſe poor Gentlemen, who left their Eſtates with ſome Friends, from whom they heard no farther afterwards; and enquired of me for them, after I came to Spain, to know of me whether they were alive or not, and how, or in what manner they had diſpoſed of their Eſtates: For my part I was able to give them but an imperfect account of their matters, for I was but young, and could not look ſo far back into the Eſtates and Concernments of other Men. And here let us leave our Pretenders on their Voyage, the ſucceſs of which we ſhall conſider in its due place, and in the mean time we will proceed to recount the Succeſſes of that Empire, in relation to its own Natural Lord.

CHAP. VIII.

The Vice-King deſigns to bring the Prince, who was Heir to this Empire, from his Retirement in the Mountains, to pay Homage and Fealty to his Majeſty. The ways and means which were contrived for doing the ſame.

THE Vice-King having diſpatched theſe poor Gentlemen into Spain, upon the ſuggeſtions (as we have ſaid) of evil Counſellours, who inſinuated into him dangerous Conſpiracies, and civil Diſturbances, which theſe Men might machinate, by the Intereſt they had with other Souldiers of inferiour degree: and hereof there had been ſuch freſh Examples, that the Fears and Jealouſies of the like events might very reaſonably be apprehended. But now to amuſe, and divert the minds of the People from ſuch Tragical Plots as theſe, and for better ſecuring the Peace of the Empire, Letters were wrote to Munnoz, the Governour of Cozco, and to Donna Beatriz Coya to conſider of a way, how they might in a friendly and peaceable manner perſwade the Prince Sayri Tupac to leave his Mountains, and come and live amongſt the Spaniards, who for his encouragement, would make him an allowance ſufficient to maintain his Family and Equipage. This propoſition was treated with the Coya, which was Siſter to the Father of this Prince, who was the Legitimate Heir to the Empire, being the Son of Manco Saca, whom thoſe Spaniards killed, who he had protected and delivered out of the hands of their Enemies, as is related in the 7th. Chapter of the 4th. Book of this 2d. Part. The Infanta Donna Beatriz, tho' it were for no other reaſon than to ſee her Nephew in that City, and not with expectation of being reſtored to his Empire, received with great readineſs, and good will, the Command and Order of the Vice-King; and in purſuance thereof diſpatched away a Meſſenger, attended with Indian Servants, to the Mountains of Villca Pampa, where the Inca made his reſidence: the Meſſenger himſelf was alſo of the Blood-Royal, to render the offer more ſpecious, and more eaſily accepted: His Journey was long, and much about, and over bad ways, by reaſon that the Bridges were broken down; but at length coming to the Out-

guards, he was there detained, until his Meſſage was ſignified to the Inca, after which being admitted, a Council was called of all the Captains and Governours, who were Tutours to the Prince, for he being in his Minority, had not (as we have ſaid) as yet bound his Head with the coloured Wreath. The Captains having received this Meſſage, were jealous of the reality thereof, though brought to them by a Kinſman: And therefore not being over-haſty to give Credence thereunto, another Meſſenger was diſpatched to Cozco, in behalf of the Inca, to ſpy and diſcover what deceit and fraud might be under this ſpecious overture; for they did much diſtruſt the ſincerity of the Spaniards, keeping ſtill in memory the death of Atahualpa, and other their faithleſs and treacherous practices: And until the return of this Meſſenger, and his Aſſociates, thoſe ſent from Cozco were detained as Hoſtages, and Pledges for better ſecurity of the honeſt and due performances by the Spaniards. The Meſſenger was farther inſtructed, that after he had applied himſelf to the Infanta Donna Beatriz, he ſhould diſcourſe farther on the buſineſs with the Governour of Cozco, and other Perſons, who might ſecure them of their fears, and from the apprehenſions they had of falſe and faithleſs deſigns; and ſhould deſire both of the Governour, and Donna Beatriz, to ſend unto John Sierra de Leguicamo her Son by Mancio Sierro de Leguicamo, who was one of the firſt Conquerours, to deal faithfully with them in this matter, and give to them his real opinion, whether they might truſt without Scruple, or doubt of the propoſition and offer which was made to them. The Governour, and the Infanta were both pleaſed at the coming of this Meſſenger from the Inca, and with him ſent Letters to John Sierra, that as he was a near Kinſman to the Inca, he ſhould deal clearly with him, and aſſure him that there was no other deſign in the Invitation, than to ſee him abroad, and out of thoſe Mountains, to the great Joy and Contentment of all his Relations. But whilſt theſe matters were in treaty at Cozco; the Vice-King, being impatient to ſee an end of this Negotiation, which he thought would be over-long and tedious by other hands, diſpatched away immediately from himſelf a Dominican Frier, whom Palentino calls Melchior de Los Reyes, and with him a Citizen of Cozco, named John Betanços the Husband of Donna Angelina, the Daughter of Inca Atahualpa, of whom we have formerly made mention: this John de Betanços pretended to be very skilful in the General Language of the Country, for which reaſon, and for the relation he had by his Wife to the Prince Sayri Tupac, he was ſent in company with the Frier, to ſerve for an Interpreter, and to explain the Letters, and the Subſtance of the Embaſſie upon which they were employed. Theſe two Ambaſſadours, in obedience to the Vice-Kings Commands, made all the haſte they were able, and endevoured to get admittance to the Inca, by way of the City of Huamanca, which was the neareſt Frontier of any to the entrance into the Mountains, where the Inca made his place of Reſidence: For which reaſon the Spaniards gave the name to that Town, of St. John of the Frontier, becauſe it bordered near the aboad of the Incas; and was (when the Country was firſt conquered by the Spaniards) poſſeſſed by them on St. John's day. But they could by no means procure admittance by this way; for the Indian Captains and Governours, fearing leſt the Spaniards ſhould take them upon ſurprize, and carry their Prince away from them, had ſo cut off all the Avenues, that no Perſon, without their Licenſe, could approach the place of their Habitation. Wherefore the Frier, and John de Betanços took a compaſs twenty Leagues farther by the high Road, to try if they could get entrance by the way of Antahuaylla, but here alſo they were diſappointed: All which being adviſed by the Indians to the Governour of Cozco, he wrote a Letter to the Ambaſſadours, that they ſhould not labour farther to no purpoſe, but ſhould come to Cozco, where they ſhould find directions in what manner to proceed. In the following Chapter we ſhall ſet forth at large, what paſſed in this particular affair, according to the Narrative of Palentino, extracted verbatim from his own Words: whereby we may obſerve, with what Prudence and Caution the Indians proceeded in this affair; and how prudently they governed their Artifices, whereby to diſcover the Cheats and Frauds which the Spaniards concealed under their ſpecious offers; with many other things obſervable on the part of the Indians.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

The ſuſpicion and fear which the Governours of the Prince conceived on occaſion of the Meſſage which the Chriſtians ſent to them. The ways, and diligence they uſed to ſecure themſelves from theſe jealouſies.

THis Author, in the fourth Chapter of the third book of his Hiſtory, ſaith, as follows. The Frier and Betanços being come to Cozco, it was ordered, That they ſhould remain behind, whilſt the Governour Munnoz, and Donna Beatriz went before the Ambaſſadours, with her Son John Sierra, to the Inca. Which being ſo agreed, the Frier and Betanços went out of the City three days before them, pretending to ſtay and expect them on the road: But to gain the honour of being the firſt Ambaſſadours, advanced as far as the Bridge called Chuquichaca, which borders on the Juriſdiction of the Inca: And having with great difficulty paſſed the Bridge; they were detained by the Indian Souldiers, who kept watch and guard on that ſide, and there kept without other hurt or damage done to them; not ſuffering them to proceed forward, nor return back again; and ſo remained until the next day, when John Sierra, with the Ambaſſadours from the Inca came to them, with ten other Indians who were ſent to meet the Ambaſſadours: In fine, John Sierra, and the Ambaſſadours were permitted to proceed, but Betanços and the Frier were detained: The Inca being informed that John Sierra was near at hand, and alſo that a Frier and Betanços who were Ambaſſadours from the Vice-King were not far diſtant; he diſpeeded a Captain with 200 Indian Souldiers, (whom they called Caribdes, and are of that ſort, who eat the Enemies which they take in the War) to ſignifie to the Ambaſſadours, that the Inca's pleaſure was, that they ſhould declare the Meſſage they brought unto his General. Accordingly the firſt day paſſed in complement, the General only bidding them welcome: But the next day John Sierra being admitted to Audience, he was ſeverely reproved by the General for coming with the attendance of ſo many Chriſtian Souldiers: For which John Sierra excuſed himſelf, ſaying, That he brought them by the advice and order of the Governour of Cozco, and his Aunt Donna Beatriz; and then he declared to him the occaſion for which he was ſent, and read to him the Letters from his Mother, and the Governour, with that alſo which the Vice-King had wrote to Donna Beatriz. John Sierra having thus delivered his Meſſage, Betanços and the Frier were alſo called and admitted to the ſame place; of whom they demanded the ſame queſtions, to ſee what difference there was in the propoſals which were made.

The Frier and Betanços produced the Writing of Pardon, and declared the ſubſtance of the Embaſſy upon which they were employed, and delivered the Preſent which the Vice-King ſent to the Inca of ſeveral pieces of Velvet, and Damask, and two Cups of ſilver gilded, together with other things of curioſity. After which the General and Captains ſent two Indians, who had been preſent at all the diſcourſe, to give a relation to the Inca of the particulars which had paſſed; which when the Inca had heard, and thought well upon, he gave anſwer, That the Ambaſſadours ſhould immediately return from whence they came, with their Letters, Act of Pardon, and Preſents; for that he would not have to do with the Vice-King, but remain free, and independent of him, as he had hitherto done. But as John Sierra, and the reſt were departed, orders were brought after them by two Indians, that they ſhould return immediately, and appear before the Inca, to give him and his Captains an account in perſon of the Embaſſy they had brought; and being on their way, and not above four Leagues from the Inca, another Command was given that John Sierra ſhould come alone, and that the others ſhould be diſpeeded back with ſuch convenient Proviſions, as were neceſſary for their journey.

The next day John Sierra was come within two Leagues of the Inca, when he met a new Order, to detain him two days longer before his admittance; and in like manner Meſſengers were ſent to cauſe Betanços and the Frier to return back to the Inca, who at the end of two days ſending for John Sierra, he received him with ſuch kindneſs and affection as was due to a near and principal Kinſman: And John Sierra having expreſſed and explained the particulars of his Meſſage in the beſt ſenſe and words he was able; the Inca ſeemed well ſatisfied and pleaſed with what he had delivered; but in regard, that being in his Minority, and not maſter of himſelf, nor having for want of years aſſumed the coloured Wreath, it was neceſſary for him to refer all his Affairs, and Treaties to the conſideration of his Captains: Which being done, Frier Melchior de Los Reyes was alſo ſent for, and ordered to deliver the Embaſſy he had brought from the Vice-King; which being accordingly ſignified, the Offer was kindly underſtood, and the preſents accepted: Howſoever it was ordered, that the Frier, and John Sierra ſhould attend, and expect an Anſwer after the Captains had conſulted thereupon.

The debate being again re-aſſumed, nothing was concluded; but that more time was required to conſult their Predictions and Oracles, and to conſider farther before they could come to a reſolution: And in the mean time, not to detain John Sierra, and the Frier any longer, it was ordered, that they ſhould be diſpatched away to Lima, with two other Indian Captains, who in the name of the Inca ſhould attend the Vice-King, and treat with him concerning the Penſion and allowance which was to be given to the Inca, in conſideration that the Inheritance and Succeſſion of thoſe Kingdoms, did by Right of Nature belong unto him. Being in this manner diſmiſt, they travelled by the way of Andaguaylas to the City of Los Reyes, where they arrived on St. Peters day in the month of June. The Indian Captains having had Audience of the Vice-King, and declared what they had to ſay in behalf of their Inca, were kindly received by him, and hoſpitably treated for the ſpace of eight days; during which time they were lodged in the City, and had frequent conferences with the Vice-King, touching the entertainment which was to be given the Inca for the maintenance of his Court, and Equipage agreeable to his Dignity, ſo as to be able to live peaceably amongſt them, paying Homage and Obedience to the King. The Vice-King having conſulted this point with the Arch-Biſhop and Judges, it was agreed to give an allowance to the Inca, of ſeventeen thouſand pieces of Eight yearly in Money for maintenance of himſelf, and Sons; beſides the Indians and Eſtate of Franciſco Hernandez, and to hold therewith the Valley of Yucay, together with the Indians and Lands formerly belonging to Don Franciſco Hernandez, the Son of the Marquis: With ſome Lands belonging to the Fortreſs of Cuzco which was aſſigned to him for his dwelling houſe and place, wherein he was to keep his Indian Court. In confirmation and for ſecurity hereof, an inſtrument was drawn up, to ſettle this Allowance on the Inca, provided that in the ſpace of ſix Months after the date thereof, which was the fifth of July, the Inca ſhould accept of thoſe Conditions, and leave his habitation in the Mountains, and come and live amongſt the Spaniards. This Writing was delivered to John Sierra, who was ſolely appointed to return therewith, accompanied only with the two Indian Captains; and by that time that he was come to the Indian Court, the Inca had received the coloured Wreath, and with great joy received the Letters, and Writings from the Vice-King, &c. Thus far Diego Hernandez, which I thought fit to extract verbatim from his own Writings; that I might not ſeem to have enlarged on the Care, and Cautions uſed by the Indians in their Treaty above the Sphere of their Capacities.

And now it will not be from our purpoſe, to explain ſome paſſages, which this Author hath touched upon in the preceeding diſcourſe. The firſt is concerning thoſe Carives, who, he ſays, did eat one the other in the time of War: it is true, that this was accuſtomary in the Empire of Mexico, in the antient times of Heatheniſme. But in Peru it was never practiſed; for

For as we have ſaid in the firſt part, the Incas made ſevere Laws againſt thoſe who eat human Fleſh: And therefore we muſt underſtand this Author, according to the cuſtome of Mexico, and not of Peru. The Revenue given to the Inca, did not amount to 17000 pieces of Eight, (for as we have ſaid before) the Lands of Franciſco Hernandez did not yield above ten thouſand pieces of Eight per annum. And as to what he ſays, they gave him in the Valley of Yucay, which was the Eſtate of the Son of Marquis Franciſco Piçarro, it was in reality worth nothing, for that Valley being very pleaſant, and delightful, was divided amongſt the Spaniards, who were Citizens of Cozco, and well cultivated by them, and fenced in to make Gardens and Vineyards, as it is to this day: Wherefore the poor Inca enjoyed nothing more, than to have the Title of being Lord of Yuca; which notwithſtanding, he highly eſteemed, being the moſt pleaſant piece of ground in all the Empire. The grant of which, was not carried to the Inca by John de Sierra, as this Author intimates, but was given him at Los Reyes, when he perſonally appeared there, to viſit the Vice-King, and pay the Complement of Obedience: But that which was carried by John de Sierra, and delivered to the Inca, was no other than an Act of Grace, and Pardon of all his Crimes, without mentioning any particulars, or making any promiſes of ſupport, or maintenance for himſelf or Family; or ſetting out any Lands, to make him a Revenue. In the following Chapter we will ſet down every thing methodically as they paſſed; for what we have anticipated in this place, is only to ſhew by another hand, what Caution, Subtilty, Craft, and Jealouſie, the Indian Captains uſed in their Treaties, before they would adventure to commit their Prince into the power of the Spaniards.

CHAP. X.

The Governours of the Prince conſult the ſeveral Propheſies, and Prognoſtications which were made, concerning the event of their Prince's departure from the Mountains. Diverſe Opinions ariſe thereupon; the Inca reſolves to go; he comes to Los Reyes, where he is received by the Vice-King. The anſwer which the Inca made, when the Inſtrument was delivered to him, which allotted, and ſecured a maintenance to him.

THE Captains and Tutors of the Inca continued their Debates, and Conſultations, concerning the Surrender of their Prince, into the hands of the Spaniards: And for better aſſurance therein, they inſpected the Entrails of the Beaſts, which they offered in Sacrifice, and obſerved the flying of Birds by Day, and thoſe of the Night; they looked on the Skye, to ſee whether it were thick or cloudy, or whether the Sun were bright and clear, without Miſts, or Clouds which covered it, and accordingly they made their Prognoſtications of good or bad Fortune: They made no enquiries of the Devil: becauſe, (as we have ſaid before) all the Oracles of that Country ceaſed, and became dumb, ſo ſoon as the Sacraments of our Holy Mother the Church of Rome entered into theſe Dominions. And tho' all the Obſervations made, ſeemed good Omens, and portended happy ſucceſs; yet the Captains were divided in their Opinions. Some ſaid that it was fit for their Prince to appear publickly, and in the Eyes of his People, to whom nothing could be ſo pleaſant and acceptable, as the preſence of his Perſon. Others ſaid, that there was no reaſon to expect the reſtauration of their Prince, for the Inca was already diſpoſſeſſed of his Empire, and the ſame divided amongſt the Spaniards, and proportioned by Pravinces, and Plantations, of which there was no hopes ever to ſee a reſtitution: And in ſuch a condition as this, a Prince diſinherited and diveſted of all his Power, and Riches, would make ſuch a poor figure before his People, as would give them Subject rather of Sorrow, than of Joy at his preſence. And tho' the Vice-King promiſed to make him an allowance, wherewith honourably to ſupport himſelf and Family; yet not having allotted the Provinces, nor named the parts from whence ſuch Revenue is to ariſe, it looks as if he intended to feed him with empty words, without any real or ſubſtantial performances: and in caſe when an allowance is aſſigned, which doth not prove agreeable to the Quality of the Prince, he had lived a more happy Exile within theſe Mountains, than expoſed abroad to Miſery and Scorn. But what ſecurity have you, that theſe Spaniards will not deal with this Prince, as they ſometime did with his Father? whom, inſtead of returning him all the acknowledgments, which a Soul endued with Humanity, and Reaſon, was capable to render, they barbarouſly killed with the ſtroak of a Bowl upon his Head, whileſt he endeavoured to divertiſe, and ſolace them a that Game, in their Solitude and retirement with him, where he concealed and ſecured them from the hands of their Enemies. Nor is it ſo long ſince the time of Atahualpa, but that we may remember how they ſtrangled him againſt the Faith and Articles of Peace which were made with them, having thereby given us a clear Evidence, how far their Honeſty and Promiſes extend.

Theſe and other Examples of the faithleſs and treacherous performances, uſed by the Spaniards towards the Caciques, and other Indians of Principal Note, were particularly called to mind, and related (the which for brevity ſake we omit.) And afterwards the two Opinions, with the Arguments on each ſide, being laid before the Prince, he inclined to the advice of remaining in his Station, and not intruſting his Perſon to the Honeſty and Mercy of the Spaniards; and herein he was more ſtrongly confirmed, when he reflected on the Fate of his Father, and his Uncle Atahualpa. And then it was, (what Palentino ſaith before) that the Prince ordered the Letters, and Preſents, and Writings to be returned to the Vice-King, and to tell him, That as he might do his own will and pleaſure, ſo he, who was the Inca, was free and independant of any, and ſo would continue.

But whereas our Lord God had, out of his infinite goodneſs and mercy, determined, that that Prince, his Wife and Children, and Family, ſhould be admitted into the Boſom of our Mother the Roman Catholick Church; he ſo governed the Heart of this Prince, that notwithſtanding all the Affrightments, and Apprehenſions he conceived of incurring the like Fate with his Anceſtors, he yet in a ſhort time changed his mind, and reſolved to throw himſelf, and his Good Fortune, on the Faithfulneſs, and good Nature of the Spaniards. The which Palentino confirms, and ſays, That after John Sierra, and the others were departed, the Inca diſpatched two Indians after them, with Orders to cauſe them to return, and give up the Commiſſion which was delivered to them.

Thus did this matter paſs, as this Author relates, tho' with ſome difference in reſpect to time, and the method of the ſeveral proceedings: I for my part ſet them down in that Form as they ſucceeded, according as they were often related to my Mother, by our Indian Kindred, who came out with the Prince, and made this matter the Subject of their diſcourſe at the time of their Viſits. But to be ſhort in this Story, the Prince having, with a little time, abated his choller, which the memory of his Father, and Uncle, had raiſed in him; he declared his reſolution to viſit the Vice-King, who perhaps might thereby be inclined to protect, and favour his Royal Stock. Howſoever the Captains deſired, and importuned him to be more cautious, and kind to himſelf, than to expoſe his life and ſafety to the Will and Mercy of the Spaniards: But finding the Inca reſolute, and determined to go, ſaying, that it was the Command of the Pachacamac, and of his Father the Sun, the Captains acquieſced, and again had their recourſe to the good and bad Omens, and to conſult with Birds, and the Sky, and the weather: and ſeeing no unlucky appearances, they cloſed with the deſires of their Prince, and all agreed to go with him to the City of Los Reyes. On his Journey thither he was met by the Caciques, and all the Indians of the Provinces through which he paſſed, who entertained and feaſted him and his Train in the beſt manner they were able: But alas, it was all performed with ſadneſs, by men who compared the preſent circumſtances with the antient grandure of their Incas. The Prince travelled in his Chair, not made of Gold, like that of his Anceſtors, but of leſs rich materials, carried by three hundred Indians, whom he brought with him, and not by thoſe who were ſubjected to the Spaniards. Moreover, by the Advice and Counſel of his Captains, ſo ſoon as he had paſſed the Confines of his own Dominion, he took off the coloured wreath which bound his Head, leſt that being a Badge and Signal of Soveraignty ſhould give offence to the Spaniards, as if he laid claim to the Dominions of which he was deprived. In this manner did this Prince travel, until he came to the City of Los Reyes, where ſo ſoon as he was arrived, he went to make his Complement and Viſit to the Vice-King, who (as Palentino ſaith in theſe words) was attending for him at his own Houſe; and when he came in, he received him kindly, and aroſe up to him, and cauſed him to ſit in a Chair equal with his. By the Diſcourſes which paſſed between them, the Prince gave all the indications of a wiſe and prudent perſon, and worthy to be accounted of that Line from whence he was deſcended. Thus far this Author.

Two days afterwards the Archbiſhop of the City invited him to Dinner, when by direction of the Chief Governours, it was ordered, That with the Deſert, or laſt Courſe, the Archbiſhop Don Geronimo de Loayſa ſhould deliver to the Prince the Inſtrument whereby his Pention and Allowance was ſettled; ſuppoſing that being reached to him by ſuch a hand, it might ſerve to enhance the eſtimation of the Preſent. But ſome who ſeldom ſpeak well of any man, reported, that the Archbiſhop ſhewed himſelf officious in this matter, in hopes by this Preſent to gain another from the Inca in Gold, and Silver, and Emerolds, or ſuch like fooleries. But the Inca wiſely returned a Mathematical demonſtration to the Archbiſhop, and the Gueſts invited thither, ſufficient to anſwer their Expectations: for after the Cloth was taken away, the Uſher of the Hall brought the Inſtrument of Settlement, which aſſigned a maintenance for ſupport of the Inca and his Family, in a great Baſon of gilded Plate: which when the Prince had heard, and had underſtood the Contents thereof, he gathered the end of the Carpet in his Hand which covered the Table, and which was made of Velvet, with a deep Fringe of Silk at the bottom, and ſqueezing the folds hard with his Hand, he held it up, and ſaid, All this Cloth with the Furniture thereof was mine, and now they pay me with a thread thereof, for ſupport of my ſelf and my whole Family. With which the Dinner and Entertainment ending, the Archbiſhop, and the Gueſts who were with him, greatly wondered at the aptneſs of the compariſon, ſo well fitted to the preſent matter.

CHAP. XI.

The Prince Sayri Tupac returns to Cozco, where he is feaſted and entertained by his own People. He and his Wife are baptized. The name which he took. The ſeveral Viſits which he made in the City.

THE Prince having remained ſome days in the City of Los Reyes, demanded leave of the Vice-King, that he might go to Cozco; which was granted to him, with many offers of Services and Complements, as formerly: Being on his Journey, he was met in the way, and treated by his Indian Subjects, as formerly: And at his entrance into the City of Huamanca, he was met by the Citizens of that place, who entertained him, Congratulating and Rejoycing with with him, for having left the Mountains, and all accompanied him to the lodging which was provided for him.

The next day a certain Inhabitant of that City, called Michael Aſtete, came to make him a Viſit, and preſented to him the coloured Wreath, which he declared he had taken from the King Atahualpa in Caſſamarca, when he was made Priſoner by the Spaniards, and that now he was glad of the occaſion to reſtore it unto him, as of right belonging to the Heir of that Empire. The Prince outwardly ſeemed to receive it with many expreſſions of Thanks: and it was ſaid, That he paid a good reward for it, in Gold, and Silver, and Jewels. But we may believe otherwiſe, and that this Preſent was diſpleaſing, as the Prince often ſignified in ſecret, and that it was abominable and odious to him, for having belonged to Atahualpa: For all the Kindred of the Prince were of opinion, that the War, Rebellion, and Tyranny which Atahualpa made upon Huatcar the lawful King, had been the cauſe of ruine and deſtruction of the whole Empire: and for that reaſon, that the Wreath ought to be burned, which that Auca or Traytor had worn, who had deſtroyed them, and their Poſterity. This, and much more on this Subject our Kindred related to my Mother, when they came to Cozco, and made her their Viſits.

The Prince having paſſed Huamanca, by eaſie Journies came at length to Cozco, and lodged in the Houſe of his Aunt Donna Beatriz, which was on the back ſide of my Fathers dwelling, to which place all thoſe of the Royal Blood, both men and women reſorted to welcome him to the Imperial City: and I my ſelf went in the name of my Father, to ask leave that he might perſonally come and pay his reſpects to him; I found him then playing at a certain game uſed amongſt the Indians, of which I have given an account in the firſt part of theſe Commentaries; I kiſſed his Hands, and delivered my Meſſage; he commanded me to ſit down, and preſently they brought two guilded Cups of that Liquor, made of Mayz, which ſcarce contained four ounces of Drink; he took them both, and with his own Hand he gave one of them to me; he drank, and I pledged him; which as we have ſaid, is the cuſtom of Civility amongſt them. This Ceremony being paſt, he asked me, Why I did not meet him at Villcapampa? I anſwered him, Inca, as I am but a Youngman, the Governours make no account of me, to place me in ſuch Ceremonies as theſe. How, replied the Inca, I would rather have ſeen you than all the Friers and Fathers in Town, though it were the Father in the Frock, or he in the Surplice: and tell my Aunt, That I kiſs her Hands, and that ſhe ſhould not come hither, for I will wait upon her my ſelf, and rejoyce at our happy meeting.

In this manner, he entertained me a great while, making many enquiries of my condition, and how I ſpent my time; and taking my leave of him, he deſired me often to viſit him. As I was going away, I made him a ſubmiſſive bow and reverence, after the manner of the Indians, who are of his Alliance and Kindred, at which he was ſo much pleaſed, that he embraced me heartily, and with much affection, as appeared by his Countenance. At that time all the Caciques, and as many Indian Officers as were from Cozco to the Charcas, (which is a Tract of Land reaching 200 Leagues in length, and above 120 in breadth) were then preſent, and all attending on the Inca; for whoſe ſake the Feaſts and Rejoycings which they made were celebrated with more Joy and Solemnity than in the parts and places of the Journey, through which they had paſſed: though others of more wiſe and ſober temper, were greatly troubled to conſider the meanneſs and poverty of their Prince, and that ſuch Maygames as thoſe were invented to expreſs his Grandure.

Whileſt theſe Shews were acting, the Prince deſired, that he might be admitted to Baptiſm, and that my Lord, and Father Garçilaſſo might be his Godfather, as it had formerly been agreed amongſt them, but he being then very weak and ſick was not able to perform this Office, ſo that another Gentleman, one of the moſt antient and pincipal Citizens called Alonſo de Hinojoſa a Native of Truxillo, was ſubſtituted in his place; with this Inca Sayri Tupac, his Wife named Cuſi Huarcay was alſo baptized; who (as Palentino ſaith) was the Daughter of Huaſcar Inca; perhaps rather ſhe might be his Niece, for to have been his Daughter, ſhe muſt at leaſt have been

thirty two years of Age: For Atahualpa took Huascar Prisoner in the year 1528, and the Spaniards entered into that Empire 1530, and as others will have it 1531; and when the Inca, and his wife the Infanta were baptized, it was in the year 1558; which being at the end thereof, the Infanta according to this account must be above 30 years of age; whereas, in reality, when she was baptized, she was not above 17 years old, so it must have been an Errour in the Calculation, by calling her Daughter instead of Niece. She was a Woman of great Beauty, and had been much more Comely, had she been fair; but that tawny Complexion, which is common to the Women of that Countrey, much abates that sweetness of Air, and those good features which are natural to them. The Prince Sayri Tupac had a fancy to have the name of Diego (which is James) superadded to him at his Baptism, in respect to that glorious Apostle St. James, who according to a Tradition received from his Father, and his Captains, appeared miraculously in favour and defence of the Spaniards, when they were besieged in that City. The Inhabitants of the City honoured the day of the Inca's Baptism with the sport of Bulls, and throwing Darts, and other signals of joy, appearing in rich Attire and costly Liveries. I my self am an Eye-witness thereof, having been a chief Actor in these divertisements. After these Festivals were over, and that the Caciques had made their Visits; the Inca remained some days in the Conversation of his Friends, and enjoyment of himself with ease and plenty, during which time he visited that famous Fortress which his Ancestors had built; much admiring to see it fallen to decay, and partly demolished by those, whose Glory and Honour it was to have kept up such a Monument and Trophy of their Conquests; as this History testifies. He also visited the Cathedral Church, and the Convent of our Lady of the Merceds, and of St. Francis, and St. Dominick; in all which he adored the most Holy Sacrament, calling it Pachacamac, Pachacamac, (which is God of Heaven and Earth.) And with the like profound Reverence he worshipped the Image of our Lady, calling it Mother of God. Tho' some malitious Men, who speak well of none, seeing him with great Devotion on his knees before the Most Holy Sacrament in the Church of St. Dominick, said, that he was worshipping the Sun his Father, and the bodies of his Ancestors which were interred in that Church. He also visited the Houses of the Select Virgins dedicated to the Sun: but passed by the habitation of his Ancestors, which were totally demolished, and other new Edifices erected by the Spaniards in their places. All these particulars were not performed in a day, nor in a week, but in many; making these visits his recreation, and pastime, to fill up his vacant hours. And having passed several Months in this manner, he went to the Valley of Yucay, rather to enjoy the Air, and delights of that Pleasant Garden formerly belonging to his Ancestors, than in regard to any Claim or Propriety he had therein. And there he continued during the short time of his Life, which did not continue above three years afterwards. He left a Daughter, which was afterwards married to a Spaniard called Martin Garcia de Loyola, of whom we shall speak at large in its due place, and of the manner how he ended his days.

CHAP. XII.

The Vice-King raises, and maintains Horse and Foot for security of the Empire. Four of the antient Conquerours dye a natural Death.

THE Vice-King, having acquitted himself of the importunities of those who pretended to Lands and Estates in reward of their Services, by expelling them out of Peru; having also put those to death who had sided with with Hernandez Giron in his Rebellon; and reduced the Prince, who was Heir to the Empire unto the Service, and Obedience of his Catholick Majesty; which were all great things, and of high importance: He in the next place, raised standing Forces of Horse and Foot, to secure the Empire in peace, and to defend the Power of the Courts of Justice, and his own Person. The Horsemen he called Lances, and the Footmen Musqueteers; to every Lance he assigned a Pension of a thousand Pieces of Eight a year, with condition to maintain himself, Horse, and Arms, without other charge, the which were 70 in number: The Musqueteers were to be 200, at five hundred pieces of Eight a year, who were to be at all times in a readiness, and to maintain and keep their Musquets and other Arms bright and well fixed. These men were to be chosen out of those who were of approved Loyalty, and faithfulness to the Service of his Majesty, tho' many gave them a different Character, and termed them Persons, who, if they had had their due, had been fit only for the Gallies, having been actually engaged in the Rebellions of Hernandez Giron, and Don Sebastian de Cassilla, and who for the Murders they had committed, and the blood they had spilt in private quarrels amongst themselves, had often deserved the Gallows; but all was smothered up, and the Vice-King's Commands obeyed: And now the Kingdom being quiet, and freed of those fears to which it was subjected by the Seditions and Mutinies of a company of rash and rebellious Souldiers; the Vice-King bended his thoughts towards publick Edifices, and to matters of good Government: And at leisure hours he passed his time in honest Pleasures, and innocent Recreations: And herein he was much diverted by an Indian Boy of about 14 or 15 years of Age, who pretended to be a Jester, and of a very facetious and pleasant Humour; He was presented to the Vice-King, who took great delight to hear him talk, and utter his little impertinencies, part in the Indian, and part in a corrupted Spanish Tongue; and particularly, when he would say your Excellency, he would say your Pestilency, which made the Vice-King laugh heartily; and some then in Company, who joyned in laughter with him, would say that that Title was more corresponding to him than the other, if it were rightly considered, how great a Plague and Pestilence he had been to those whom he had killed, and to their Children whose Estates he had confiscated: and to those whom he banished out of Peru, and sent them into Spain, Poor, Naked, and Forlorn, whom it had been a Mercy to have killed, rather than to have treated in that inhumane manner. And with such reflections as these, evil Tongues aspersed all the actions of the Vice-King, as if Rigour and Severity were not agreeable to the Nature and Constitutions of the People of Peru.

Amidst these various Revolutions of good and bad Fortune within this Kingdom, the Marshal Alonso de Alvarado, after a long and tedious Sickness contracted by Grief and Melancholly, dyed: For after the defeat which he received at the Battel of Chuquinta, he scarcely enjoyed an hour of contentment, but pined, and macerated away, till the Lamp of his Life was totally extinguished: And because the manner of his Death was something extraordinary, 'twill not be impertinent to recount it in this place, which was thus. When he was in his last Agony of death, and ready to give up the Ghost, they removed him out of his Bed, and laid him upon a Carpet in the same Chamber, and by him a Cross made in Ashes, according to the Custom of the Knights of St. Jago, or St. James: And having layen a short time upon the Carpet, he seemed to revive, and come to himself; so that they returned him again to his Bed; where after a short time falling into a like fit, his Attendants laid him out on the Carpet in the same manner as before; and then coming out of his Leipothymy, and seeming better, was again laid into his Bed; and so between the Carpet, and the Bed, he continued for the space of forty days, to the great labour and trouble of his Servants, until at length he breathed his last. A short time afterwards his eldest Son dyed, by whose decease the Estate, which descended to him from his Father, came to devolve to the Crown: But his Majesty, considering the great Services which the Marshal had done, was pleased to continue it to his second Son: which was a favour granted to very few in that Empire.

The

The death of Don Alonſo de Alvarado, was ſeconded by that of John Julio de Hojeda, a Noble perſon, and one of the Ancient Conquerours, and one of the Prime Citizens, and of the firſt Rank in Cozco: He was married to Donna Leonora de Tordoya, Niece to Garçilaſſo de la Vega, being Daughter to his Eldeſt Brother, by whom he had Don Gomez de Tordoya, who was Heir to his Eſtate. Some few Months afterwards dyed my Lord and Father Garçilaſſo de la Vega, after a long ſickneſs of two years and a half, with ſeveral intervals and changes: For ſeeming once perfectly cured, he mounted on horſe-back, and went into the City, as one in good and ſound health; and thus continuing for the ſpace of three or four Months, his illneſs returned upon him again, and confined him for as long a time to his Chamber, where he remained until the time of his Deceaſe; and, according to his laſt Will and Teſtament, he was buried in the Convent of St. Francis.

In thoſe days it was the Cuſtom to make very ſolemn Funerals, carrying the Corps three times round the Parade, or publick place; and for every turn which was made, a high Pedeſtal was raiſed, whereon to repoſe the Body, whilſt the Reſponſes were ſinging; and then another ſtand was erected in the Church, whereon to lay the Corps, during the time whilſt they celebrated the Office for the Dead. But in regard, that before all theſe Ceremonies could be performed, it was tedious, and troubleſome to the Prieſt and People; It was ordered by Garçilaſſo, that the former punctillio's ſhould be omitted, and that his Body ſhould be laid on a Carpet, with a black Cloth over it, without Pedeſtals, or Stands, which were troubleſome, and chargeable to erect; which being accordingly obſerved, as he had directed: All others following the ſame Example, to the great eaſe of the People.

When I was arrived in Spain, I there received a Bolle from his Holineſs, giving Licenſe to take up the Bones of my Father, and tranſport them into Spain; which accordingly was performed, and his Reliques brought over to him, which I depoſited in the Church of St. Iſidoro in Sevile, where they now remain buried, to the Glory and Honour of our Lord God; whoſe mercy be upon us. Amen.

This Mortality was a year afterwards followed by the death of Lorenço de Aldana, after a long and grievous ſickneſs; he never had been married, nor ever had any natural Sons. By his laſt Will and Teſtament he left his Lands to his Heir, that therewith he might be enabled to pay ſuch Fines, and Taxes, and Tributes, which ſhould afterwards be laid upon them. He was a very Noble and Generous perſon, and one of the ſecond Adventurers, who entered into Peru with Don Pedro de Alvarado. Some ſhort time after the War of Conçalo Piçarro was ended, two young Gentlemen of his Kindred, tho' not very nearly allyed, came over to him in that Country, whom he kindly received, and treated as if they had been his own Sons. At the end of three years that theſe young Men had been with him, he thought it fit to put them into ſome way of livelyhood, and in order thereunto, he gave them a Stock, and ſent them to his Steward, to teach them how, and in what manner they might employ and improve it; for according to the Cuſtom of that Country, whilſt there was no War, nor Expeditions on new Diſcoveries; it was no diſparagement to a Gentleman, to trade and ſeek ways of gain, rather than to ſit idle, and without buſineſs. And ſo he gave them ten thouſand pieces of Eight, which are twelve thouſand Ducats, adviſing them that it was their Stock, which with good husbandry they might increaſe to a conſiderable benefit; and which he believed they would have received kindly from him, and with thanks: but theſe young Sparks ſcornfully rejected the Offer, and told him, That it was a diſhonour and ſhame, for Gentlemen of their Quality, to buy and ſell like Merchants; and tho' the Steward acquainted them, that the moſt noble Spaniards in that Country, were uſed to trade with the Natives of the Country, and to buy up their Commodities, ſuch as the Herb Cuca, and Mayz, and ſend them to the Mines of Plate at Potocſi, for proviſions to ſupport the People which laboured there: Which was no diſhonour for the beſt Men to do; and was not of the ſame nature and eſteem with thoſe who ſate in Shops, and meaſured out Cloth and Silks by the yard. And if they thought it too mean alſo to deal like other perſons of Quality, they might act by their Indian Servants, whoſe Induſtry and Faithfulneſs they might entruſt with all confidence. But they anſwered, That they would upon no Terms whatſoever ſo far abaſe and degrade themſelves; for being Gentlemen, they more eſteemed their Gentility, than all the Gold and Silver in Peru. The which Anſwer the Steward making known to his Maſter, and how much the young Gentlemen ſtood on the Punctilio's of their Noble Blood; their good Kinſman Lorenço de Aldana, with much calmneſs made anſwer, If theſe are ſuch Gentlemen, how come they ſo poor? And if they are ſo poor, how come they ſuch Gentlemen? So Aldana never troubled his Kinſmen, nor himſelf farther, to put them in a way of livelyhood, but ſuffered them to paſs meanly, and in neceſſity, as I have ſeen them; tho' not ſo much as to want Diet, or Cloathing. For when they came from Arequepa to Cozco, they lodged in the Houſe of my Lord Garçilaſſo, where they were provided with all things neceſſary; and when they paſſed to other Cities, the Houſes of their Country-men of Eſtremadura were always open to them; for in thoſe days the very name of a Country-man, was ſufficient to make them as welcome, as if they had been Sons, or the neareſt relation to a Family. Theſe four Gentlemen, whom we have mentioned in this place, were all of the Ancient Conquerours of Peru who dyed in their Beds of a natural Death; the which we ſpecifie as a thing rare, and ſtrange; for as appears by the preceding Hiſtory, there is not an Example of any who have dyed in this manner, but all have come to their Ends by violent deaths. Wherefore theſe worthy Perſons, having been Conquerours, and Planters of this Empire, and dying in a Happy and Bleſſed manner, were greatly lamented by the People, for the ſingular Vertue, Honour, and Goodneſs, with which they were endued.

Tho' there were no expreſs Law of God, which ſhould command us to honour our Parents, yet the Law of Nature teaches it to the moſt barbarous People of the World, and inclines them to omit no occaſion whereby to expreſs the Duty and Reſpect they owe to them. The which conſideration, incited by Divine and Humane Laws, and even enſtamped on the Hearts of Heathens, obliges me to publiſh the Vertues of my Father after his Death, which I had not opportunity to do, during the time of his Life. And that the Praiſes, and Commendations, which I attribute to my Father, may not ſeem partial, and proceeding from Affection; I will here repeat an Elogium made by a Fryer, of a devout and religious Life, which he delivered after his death, for the Comfort and Conſolation of his Children, and Friends, and as an Example for other perſons to imitate. I ſhould here name the good Man, who wrote this Oration, but he engaged me not to do it, but to conceal him when I publiſhed the Writing: and I wiſh I were not under that Engagement, that by his Authority, the praiſes of my Father might appear the more Authentick. I ſhall omit the Exordium, and the many Oratorical Flights, and Colours he uſes. And, as becomes an Hiſtorian, I ſhall be very ſhort in this pious Digreſſion.

A Funeral Oration made by a Religious Perſon in Honour of Garſilaſſo de la Vega, my Lord, after his Death.

Reader,

THis Speech or Oration is filled with ſuch Doxologies, and Rodomontadoes, after the Spaniſh manner, as neither agree with the ſtyle of an Hiſtorian, nor with the Engliſh humour, unleſs I intended to expoſe my Spaniard, and render him as fantaſtical as the vaineſt of his Country-men. I have therefore thought fit to paſs it by, leſt in ſtraining our Engliſh above its key, it ſhould bear no harmony in conſort with the Spaniſh Language, and ſo we ſhall proceed unto

CHAP. XIII.

Wherein is treated of thoſe, who, for demanding a reward for their Services, were baniſhed into Spain; and what Favour and Grace his Majeſty beſtowed upon them. Don Garcia de Mendoça is ſent Governour unto Chile; and of the Skirmiſh he had there with the Indians.

BUT to return now to the Petitioners, who, for demanding a Reward in Lands, for their paſt Services, were (as we have ſaid) baniſh'd into Spain; they at length arrived there poor, naked, and almoſt famiſhed: And in this guiſe they preſented themſelves in the Court before the King, Don Philip the Second, which moved great Compaſſion in all thoſe who were acquainted with their Story, and how they had been baniſhed, and ill treated for doing their Duty, and demanding a Reward of their Services. But his Majeſty was more gracious to them, giving a Penſion to as many of them, as would return to the Indies, out of his Royal Exchequer, that they might have nothing to do with the Vice-King, nor need to make Addreſſes, or Petitions to him: And as many of them as deſired to remain in Spain, he gratified with Allowances agreeable to their Condition, that is, with more or leſs, according to their Services; and ſo I found them provided for, when I came into Spain; which was ſome ſhort time after theſe matters were tranſacted. Their Money was aſſigned them upon the Cuſtom-houſe at Sevile; the leaſt that any of them had, was 480 Ducats of yearly Penſion; and as their Merits were, ſo were their Allowances to 6, 800, and a thouſand, to 1200 Ducats, to remain Annuities to them for all the days of their Lives. A while afterwards, his Majeſty being acquainted with the Diſcourſes which were commonly made in the City of Los Reyes, touching the hard uſage of the baniſhed Souldiers; to prevent farther Mutinies there, and other Diſorders which might ariſe, by reaſon of the Severity, and Rigour of the Vice-King, his Majeſty was pleaſed to provide himſelf with another Governour for Peru, named Don Diego de Azeuedo, a Gentleman endued with all qualities of Vertue and Goodneſs, from whom the Counts of Fuentes are deſcended. But whilſt he was preparing for his Voyage, he died of a natural death, to the great grief of all thoſe of Peru, who upon the news thereof, much lamented themſelves, ſaying, that they had not deſerved a Vice-King ſo good and ſo qualified, and therefore God had ſnatched him away from them into Heaven: And this was the common ſaying, as I have heard amongſt the Grave and Wiſe Men of that Country. But in regard this Gentleman did not paſs into Peru, we do not find his Name in the Liſt of the Vice-Kings, which were tranſported into that great Kingdom. In the mean time whilſt theſe matters were tranſacting in the Court of Spain, the Vice-King of Peru, diſpatched away his Son Don Garcia de Mendoça for Governour, and Captain General of the Kingdom of Chile, which was become vacant by the Death of Geronimus de Alderete, who died on his way thither of grief, to think that 800 Persons perished in the Galeon by his fault, and the fault of his Sister-in-Law; for he knew well, that if it had not been in consideration of him, the Master of the Ship would not have given License to that Religious Woman to keep a Candle in her Cabin by night, which was the destruction of the Vessel, and of all those therein. The advancement of Don Garcia de Mendoça, to that Charge and Trust, was pleasing to all those of Peru; so that many Souldiers, and Persons of Estates, offered themselves freely to accompany him in that Expedition, knowing that it would be a Service acceptable to his Majesty, and to the Vice-King. Santillian the Chief Judge of the Chancery, was appointed Deputy Governour to Don Garcia, and to direct and guide him; and he was earnestly intreated to accept of this Office. Great preparations were made over all the Kingdom for this Journey, of Armes, Horses, Cloaths, and other Ornaments, which cost very dear in this Country, where all the Commodities of Spain are raised to a vast price. The Vice-King also appointed three other Gentlemen of Quality for three several parts, which were within that Conquest; namely, Gomez Arias, John de Salinas, and Anton de Aznayo, every one of which was very studious to discharge his Duty in his Office respectively.

Don Garcia de Mendoça being gone to his Government, attended, as we have said, with a great number of Choice and Select Persons: So soon as he was in the possession thereof, he speedily designed the Conquest of the Indian Araucos, who were become very insolent and proud by those Victories which they had gained over the Spaniards: The first was that over Don Pedro de Valdivia, which was followed by some others afterwards, which are written in Verse by the Poets of those times, which had been much more properly delivered in Prose, for then we might have given Credit thereunto, more than we can to the Fictions of Poetry.

The Governour having in a short time provided himself with all things necessary for the War, entered into the rebelled Provinces with a number of brave Men, Arms, Amunition and Provisions, for the Enemy had carried away every thing, leaving the Country naked, and without any Sustenance for an Army. They had not entered very far into these parts, but the Indians had fitted an Ambush for them, and had composed a Vanguard of 5000 Indians, with orders not to fight, nor come within any danger of being forced by the Enemy to an engagement. The Spaniards, being informed by their Scouts and Spyes sent abroad, that the Indians fled before them, without any stop or stay in a setled place; gave order to pursue them with all convenient speed, and yet with such Caution, as not to be entrapped by their Ambushes, or Surprisals; for the Governour, at the time he first entered into that Country, had been fore-warned by those who had been acquainted with the Stratagems which those People use in the War, by skirmishing, and flying, to be always circumspect, and doubtful of them. Howsoever so eager was the Governour to pursue the Enemy, in hopes totally to destroy them, and by a bloody slaughter of them to discourage the rest from making farther opposition, that he made little use of the Caution which was given him; for leaving his Camp, and Tents, he followed the Enemy a whole day, and a night; and being removed at a good distance from thence, out came the Indians from their holes and places, where they had been hidden, and seized on the Camp without any opposition, and plundered and carried away all the Baggage, and Necessaries belonging to the Army. With the News hereof the Governour was forced to give over his chase, and see to recover what the Enemy had plundered from him; but it was too late, for they were returned to their secret Holds, and to the places where they had concealed their booty past all recovery. The news of this success came to Peru, almost as soon as that of the Governours arrival in the seat of his Government, so that all the World wondered at this sudden accident, and how in so short a time the Indians should be such Gainers, and the Spaniards such Losers, for they had lost all their Baggage, even to their very Shirts, and wearing Cloaths. To repair this disaster, the Vice-King sent away with all speed new Recruits of all things that were necessary, in which he expended out of the King's Treasury vast sums of Gold and Silver, at which People much murmured, as Palentino saith, meaning the first expence which was made, when Don Garcia went to his Government of Chili, Chili, but mentions not this ſecond charge, occaſioned by the Robbery which the Indians had made upon him, which was more diſpleaſing than the former, and moved People to ſay, That the Vice-King, for the ſake of his Son, had exhauſted the Kings Exchequer of all the Treaſure. But as to what ſucceeded afterwards in the Kingdom of Chile, we ſhall leave to other Writers; and confine our ſelves to the Territories of Peru, having expatiated our ſelves from thence, no farther, than only to touch on the departure of the Vice-Kings Son from thence, and the death of Loyola. Thoſe who think fit to write the Hiſtory of that Kingdom, will find ſubject enough whereon to enlarge their Diſcourſes on a War, which hath continued already for fifty eight years between the Indians and Spaniards; that is, The Araucans rebelled towards the end of the year 1553, and now we are in the year 1611, and the Wars not as yet ended. We might here recount the unhappy death of the Governour Franciſco de Villagra, with 200 Spaniards more; which happened on that ridge of Mountains, which hath ever ſince had the name of Villagra. We might here alſo tell of the death of Major General John Rodulfo with 200 men with him, whom they killed on the Bogg or Marſh of Puren. I could wiſh to have been informed of the ſeveral particular ſucceſſes of theſe Affairs, and many greater which happened in this warlike Kingdom, that I might have added them to this Hiſtory. But I do not doubt, where People have been born with ſuch Martial Spirits, but that the ſame Countrey will produce in future Ages, Sons of her own, endued with a Spirit and Genius of Learning capable to write their own Hiſtory: And it ſhall be my Prayer to God, That Knowledge and Learning may flouriſh in all that famous Kingdom.

CHAP. XIV.

The Heirs of thoſe who were put to Death for ſiding with Franciſco Hernandez Giron in his Rebellions, are reſtored to their Eſtates and Plantations. Pedro de Orſua attempts the Conqueſt of the Amazons. His End and Death, with many others with him.

THE Vice-King Don Andres de Hortado, ſeeing thoſe men whom he had baniſhed from Peru, for demanding a Reward of their paſt Services, now again returned with Penſions aſſigned on the Treaſure of his Majeſty, and on the Cheſt of the three Keys, he wondered much at the ſucceſs, not imagining by what intereſt it could have been procured for them: but more ſtrange it ſeemed to him, to hear of the coming of a new Vice-King to ſucceed him in that Office. This change of Fortune cauſed him to change his Humour, and convert much of that haughty and ſevere Spirit which was natural to him, into a Gentleneſs and Lenity more becoming the Office of a great Miniſter: and in this good temper he continued to the end of his life, which was ſo extraordinary, that thoſe who obſerved it, would ſay, That if he had begun as he ended, he would have proved the moſt admirable Governour that ever had been in the World. Thus when the Kingdom obſerved this great change in the Vice-King, the Country in peace and quietneſs, and the rigour of the Juſtices converted into an affable and complying Humour; thoſe who had been lately oppreſſed by the heavy Hand of Juſtice, aſſumed the courage to demand ſatisfaction for the evils and damages they had ſuſtained. Accordingly the Sons and Heirs of thoſe Citizens, who had been executed for being engaged in the Rebellion of Hernandez, made claims of their Eſtates, laying before the Juſtices the Inſtruments of Pardon, which had been given to their Fathers: and ſo followed the ſuit, that after ſeveral hearings and reviews of their Cauſe, they obtained Sentence to have their Lands, and Commands over Indians reſtored to them, together with all other Confiſcations

Confiſcations of their Eſtates: and thus did they obtain a reſtitution of their Indians which the Vice-King had divided, and conferred on other Spaniards to increaſe and better their Eſtates. At all which the Vice-King was in great trouble and perplexity: For not only did he ſuffer the affront to have his own Orders repealed, but alſo lay under an obligation of making ſatisfaction to thoſe who were diſpoſſeſſed, by ſome other returns, or equivalents to be made them. All that hath been ſaid in this matter, I ſaw my ſelf tranſacted in Cozco, and the like paſſed in other Cities, where the ſame rigour of Juſtice had been put in practice; as namely, in Huamanca, Arequepa, the Charcas, and the New Plantation. So ſoon as it was generally known that the aforeſaid Sentence was repealed, and that the Heirs were reſtored again to the poſſeſſion of their Lands; the Spaniards took a liberty to report, That this courſe was taken without any order from his Majeſty, or direction from the Council of the Indies, but meerly by the Power and arbitrary Will of the Vice-King, intending by ſuch ſeverities to ſhew his Power, and ſecure himſelf from all Mutinies and Conſpiracies for the future. But the Vice-King being now of another Humour, and proceeding with that gentleneſs and good temper which we have before mentioned; was pleaſed to grant unto a certain Gentleman of Worth and Virtue, and of an agreeable Perſon, named Pedro de Orſua, a Licenſe to make a Conqueſt of the Country of the Amazons, which runs along the River Marannon, which is the ſame we have mentioned before, where Franciſco Orellana deſerting Gonçalo Piçarro came into Spain, and begged of his Majeſty the aforeſaid Conqueſt, but he died in the way, and never put his Enterpriſe into Action. In purſuance of this Grant Pedro de Orſua went from Cozco to Quita to raiſe Souldiers, who were willing to adventure on new Conqueſts: For in Peru all the Lands were meaſured out, and divided amongſt the Antient Conquerours, and men of Merit in that Empire: He alſo gathered all the Arms and Proviſions he was able, to which the Citizens, and Inhabitants of thoſe Cities, largely contributed by their Bounty and Liberality; for ſo obliging was Pedro de Orſua in his carriage towards every one, as engaged their Affections to render him all the Aſſiſtances and Services they were able. Many Souldiers attended him from Cozco; amongſt which was one called Don Fernando de Guzman, with whom I was acquainted, he was lately come from Spain; and there was another, who had been an old Souldier called Lope de Aguire, a fellow of an ill ſhapen Body, and of worſe Conditions and Practices, as are deſcribed in a Book of the Elogies of Worthy and Illuſtrious perſons, written by John de Caſtellanos a Secular Prieſt, who had a Benefice in the City of Tunja, in the new Kingdom of Granada. Theſe Elogies, though written in Verſe, are yet a true Hiſtory, and wherein he fills ſix Cantos with the expedition of Pedro de Orſua, and how he marched with 500 men well armed and appointed, together with a conſiderable body of Horſe. He alſo relates the manner of his death, how he was killed by his own Souldiers, and his moſt intimate Friends, that they might enjoy a beautiful Lady, whom Orſua carried for a Companion with him; the which paſſion of Love hath been the ruin of many brave Captains in the World, ſuch as Hannibal, and others. The principal Actors in this Tragedy were Don Fernando de Guzman, Lope de Aguire, and Salduendo, who were in love with this Lady, beſides ſeveral others, whom this Author names; who alſo farther relates, That theſe Traytors ſet up Don Fernando for their King, which Title he was ſo vain and fooliſh as to accept, though he had no Kingdom to poſſeſs; nor right to any thing but his own ill Fortune, which ſoon followed him, being killed by the ſame Friends who had promoted him to his Royal Dignity: And then Aguire took upon himſelf the Government, which he ſo well exerciſed, that at ſeveral times he killed above 200 men; he plundered the Iſland of Margarita, where he committed moſt deteſtible Cruelties. Thence he paſſed over to other Iſles near adjacent, where he was overcome by the Inhabitants; but before he would yield himſelf, he killed his own Daughter, whom he brought with him, for no other reaſon, than that after he was dead, ſhe might not be called the Daughter of a Traytor. This was the ſum of all thoſe Cruelties which indeed were moſt Diabolical, and the beginning and ending of this whole Enterpriſe, which commenced with ſo much Gallantry, and mighty Preparations, of which I was in part an Eye-witneſs.

The Count de Nieva is choſen Vice-King of Peru. He ſends a Meſſage to his Predeceſſor. The Death of the Marquis of Cannete, as alſo of the Count de Nieva. Don Garcia de Mendoça returns to Spain. The Lawyer Caſtro is appointed Governour of Peru.

WHilſt theſe matters were tranſacting in Peru, and that Orſua, and his Fellow adventurers with him, were defeated upon the great River of the Amazons; his Majeſty King Philip the Second, was mindful to provide a New Governour for that Empire; having in the place of that good Man, Don Diego de Azevedo, who lately dyed, appointed Don Diego de Cunniga and Velaſco Count de Nieva, to ſucceed in the Office of Vice-King; who diſpatched his Affairs with ſuch diligence, that he departed from Spain in the Month of January 1560, and arrived in Peru in the Month of April following. So ſoon as he came to Payta, which is a Town within that Dominion, he diſpatched away a Servant of his, with a ſhort Letter to the Vice-King, Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça, giving him advice of his arrival within the Dominions of Peru, with Commiſſion from his Majeſty to govern that Country, and that therefore he ſhould deſiſt from intermedling further in the Affairs thereof. Don Andres Hurtado having received intelligence of the coming of this Meſſenger, gave Orders to have him well received, and treated all the Way of his Journey; and being come to the City of Los Reyes, he had there Honourable Lodgings provided for him, with Preſents in Jewels, and Gold, and Silver, to the value of ſix and 7000 pieces of Eight, and upwards: But the Meſſenger loſt all theſe upon a Pique, and Exception which the Vice-King took at the Title of Lordſhip, which was ordered to be given, and not of Excellency; the which he ſo highly reſented, and ſuffered the thoughts of being ſlighted, and neglected by his Succeſſor, without Reaſon or Juſtice, ſo far to run in his head; that it ſtruck him into a deep Melancholly, which ſo prevailed on his Spirits, that being a Man of great Years, and not able to ſtruggle with the Diſeaſe, he ended his days before the new Vice-King arrived at Los Reyes: who alſo enjoyed not long the happineſs he expected in his Government, in which he had not been many Months Seated with the Solemnity uſed on ſuch occaſions, before a ſtrange Accident haſtened his Death, of which he was the Author, and brought it upon himſelf. But the manner of it being ſcandalous to relate, we ſhall leave it as it is, and proceed on to other particulars.

Don Garcia de Mendoça, who was Governour of Chile, having received intelligence of the death of his Father, made ſuch haſte to return into Peru, and thence to prepare for his Voyage into Spain, that many people reported, that he haſtned away more out of fear of the Araucans, than out of a deſire he had to aſſiſt at the Funeral of his Father: And that with the like precipitation he quitted the Territories of Peru, not to be ſubject to the Dominion of another. At length he arrived in Spain, where he continued until he returned with a Commiſſion to be Governour of Peru; where he impoſed that Taxe on the Spaniards, and Indians, which is paid by them unto this day. As to his other ways of gain, his Contracts, and Commerce, we ſhall paſs them all by, being not within the compaſs of this Hiſtory: For my intention being only to write, as far as to the Death of the Prince, who was lawful Heir of that Empire, ſecond Brother of Don Diego Sayri Tupac, of whoſe coming out of the Mountains, his Bap-

Baptiſm and Death we have already given a Narrative: So that now we ſhall haſten to a concluſion of this Hiſtory.

King Philip the Second having received advice of the unfortunate end of the Vice-King Don Diego de Cunniga, was pleaſed to appoint the Lawyer Lope Garçia de Caſtro, who was Preſident of the Royal Council of the Indies, to ſucceed in that Office, of whom we have formerly made mention, on occaſion of the Pretenſions which I had in Spain, on ſcore of my Father's Merit, which he oppoſed. This Lope Garçia de Caſtro being a Perſon of great Prudence, and of that Talent of Wiſdom which was required to Govern that Empire, was diſpatched ſuddenly away with Title of Preſident, and General Governour of all that Empire, that ſo by his good Conduct, thoſe many Confuſions might he compoſed, and unhappy Accidents rectified, which had been cauſed by the ſudden Deaths of preceding Governours. And indeed his Wiſdom anſwered expectation, for he governed thoſe Kingdoms with ſuch moderation, and gentleneſs, that he lived to return again into Spain in peace and quietneſs, and to be placed in the ſame Chair of the Council, in which he lived with much Honour, and afterwards dyed like a good Chriſtian.

When my Friends underſtood that this great Perſon was returned to his Seat in the Supream Council of the Indies, they adviſed me to renew my Pretenſions to the right I had unto my Mother's Eſtate, on ſcore of my Father's Services and Merit: For they were of Opinion, that Caſtro having now ſeen and been acquainted with Peru, which my Father had helped to Conquer, and in which my Mother's Anceſtors had a right of inheritance, he might become my Advocate, and change his mind in what he formerly argued againſt me.

But I having buried, and laid aſide all my pretenſions, and loſt my hopes, could not be perſwaded to leave my Cell, wherein I live with more Security Honour, and Profit; and where I have with God's Aſſiſtance had leiſure to write this Hiſtory; which tho' it prove little to my Honour and Profit; yet praiſed be God for all.

CHAP. XVI.

Don Franciſco de Toledo is choſen Vice-King of Peru. The Cauſes which were alledged for proſecution of the Prince Inca Tupac Amaru. And the impriſonment of that poor Prince.

Don Franciſco de Toledo, ſecond Son of the Family of Count de Oropeta, ſucceeded Lope Garçia de Caſtro in the Government of Peru, and was elected thereunto for his great Vertue and Chriſtian Piety, being ſo devout a Gentleman, that every eight days he received the moſt Holy Sacrament. He was ſent to Peru, with the Title of Vice-King, and received at Los Reyes, with the State and Solemnity agreeable thereunto: and governed with that Gentleneſs, and Moderation, that no man could take occaſion, either to mutiny or rebel. He had ſcarce been two years in the Government, when he reſolved to bring out from the Mountains of Villca pampa, the Prince Tupac Amaru, the Legitimate Heir to that Empire, being the Son of Manco Inca, and Brother of Don Diego Sayri Tupac, of whom we have given a large Relation in this eight Book; he was the lawful Heir, becauſe his Elder Brother left no Son, but a Daughter only, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in due place: The intention of the Vice-King in this matter was ſincere, and real, and with no other deſign, (than after the Example of his Predeceſſor Don Andres Hurtado de Mendoça) to advance his own Honour and Reputation, by an action ſo generous and heroick, as to reduce ſuch a Prince to the Service of his Catholick Mejeſty, and to civiliſe him as it were, by calling him from the Barbarity of thoſe mountains, tains, where he lived like a Fugitive and a Salvage Perſon. To bring this Deſign about, the Vice-King acted according to the former methods, and ſent Meſſengers to him, inviting him to come out of thoſe Mountains and live amongſt the Spaniards, ſince they were become one People with them; which offer, if he was diſpoſed to accept, he aſſured him, that the King would beſtow on him the ſame Livelyhood and Support that he had formerly given to his Brother. But theſe Propoſals did not prevail, according to the hopes conceived, nor anſwer Expectations, for want of thoſe Inſtruments and Meſſengers, both Spaniards and Indians, which were formerly employ'd. Moreover on the Prince's ſide, greater difficulties preſented, for his Kindred, and Subjects who were with him, affrighted him with the ſtory of his Brother; telling him, That the Allowance given him by the Spaniards was ſmall and inconſiderable, and that the life of his Brother afterwards was very ſhort, cauſed (as they would inſinuate) by Poiſon, or ſome treacherous or ſuſpicious manner of dealing; therefore they adviſed the Inca by no means to move out of his Retirement, being more ſecure in his Baniſhment, than in the faithleſs Hands of his Enemies. This Reſolution of the Prince being made known to the Vice-King, by thoſe Indians who went to, and came from thoſe Mountains, of which ſort of Informers, there were many who were Domeſtick Servants in the Houſes of Spaniards: His Excellency conſidered with his moſt intimate Friends of the ways and methods which were to be uſed for reducing that Prince to the Terms they required; who all agreed, That ſince the Inca refuſed to accept the fair Conditions which were offered to him; that they ſhould look on him as an Enemy, and proſecute him by force of Arms: For in regard that he having ſeated himſelf in a Station which much infeſted the ways from Cozco to Humanca and Rimac, where his Indian Subjects pillaged and robbed all the Spaniſh Merchants and Travellers, which paſſed thoſe Roads, and committed many other outrages and inſolencies like mortal Enemies; it was but reaſon to declare War againſt him. Moreover it was the Opinion of the wiſe Counſellors of thoſe times, That many Inſurrections might be raiſed in that Empire by this young Heir, being countenanced and aſſiſted by the Incas his Kinſmen, who lived amongſt the Spaniards, and by the Caciques his Subjects, and by thoſe very men, who were born of Indian Mothers, though their Fathers were Spaniards; all which would joyn, and rejoice at a change; being willing to better their Fortunes, which were reduced to that mean degree, that moſt of them wanted even Bread to ſupport the neceſſities of Humane Life.

Moreover it was alledged, That by the Impriſonment of the Inca, all that Treaſure might be diſcovered, which appertained to former Kings, together with that Chain of Gold, which Huayna Capac commanded to be made for himſelf to wear on the great and ſolemn days of their Feſtival, and eſpecially on that day, when he gave a name to his eldeſt Son Huaſcar, as hath been formerly related; all which, as was reported, the Indians concealed. And in regard, that that Chain of Gold with the remaining Treaſure belong'd to his Catholick Majeſty by right of Conqueſt, it was Juſtice and Reaſon to take ſuch courſes as might retrieve thoſe Riches which the Incas concealed, and had conveyed away from the true Proprietor: Beſides all which, many other matters were alledged, which might incite the Vice-King to take the Inca Priſoner.

But to return Anſwer to thoſe Accuſations which were charged on the Inca. We confeſs, that many years paſt, in the time of his Father Manco Inca, ſeveral Robberies were committed on the Road by his Subjects: but ſtill they had that reſpect to the Spaniſh Merchants, that they let them go free, and never pillag'd them of their Wares and Merchandiſe, which were in no manner uſeful to them; Howſoever they robbed the Indians of their Cattel bred in the Country, which they drove to the Markets, being enforced thereunto more out of neceſſity than choice: for their Inca living in the Mountains, which afforded no tame Cattel; and only produced Tigers, and Lions, and Serpents of twenty five and thirty Foot long, with other venomous Inſects (of which we have given a large account in this Hiſtory) his Subjects were compelled for the natural ſuſtenance of their Prince, to ſupply him with ſuch Food as they found in the Hands of Indians: which the Inca Father of this Prince did uſually call his own, ſaying, That he who was Maſter of that whole Empire might lawfully challenge ſuch a proportion thereof, as was convenient to ſupply his neceſſary and natural ſupport. But this paſſed only in the time of this Inca, and as I remember when I was a Child, I heard of three or four ſuch Robberies, which were committed by the Indians: But ſo ſoon as that Inca dyed, all was quieted, and no other Spoyls enſued.

Notwithſtanding which, the Vice-King was induced to follow the advice of ſome Counſellors, who ſuggeſted, that the Inca lived in places on the frontiers from which he much annoyed the Spaniards, taking away their Cattle, and robbing their Merchants: And that it was impoſſible to keep the Indians quiet, and within terms of Peace, whilſt the Inca was ſo near them, and dayly in their Eye, that to ſerve him, they would adventure to commit the greateſt Outrages they were able. The Vice-King, (as we have ſaid) being overſwayed by this way of reaſoning, committed the charge of this enterpriſe to a certain Gentleman, named Martin Garcia Loyola, who in times paſt had performed great Services for his Majeſty. Accordingly Souldiers were raiſed, upon pretence that they were to be ſent to Chile, for recruits againſt the Araucans, who very much oppreſſed, and ſtreightned the Spaniards. About 250 Men being armed, and provided with Weapons offenſive, and defenſive, they marched directly to Villca pampa, the entrance whereunto was made very eaſie and plain, after the Prince Don Diego Sayri Tupac had abandoned his Habitation there; ſo that they might go in, and come out from thence without any difficulty.

The Prince Tupac Amaru having received intelligence, that ſome Forces were entered within his Juriſdiction, he preſently fled twenty Leagues within the Country down a River below the Mountain. The Spaniards inſtantly fitted themſelves with Boats, and Floats, and therewith followed and purſued after him. The Prince conſidering that he had not People to make reſiſtance, and that he was not conſcious to himſelf of any Crime, or diſturbance he had done or raiſed, ſuffered himſelf to be taken; chuſing rather to entruſt himſelf in the hands of the Spaniards, than to periſh in thoſe Mountains with Famine, or be drowned in thoſe great Rivers, which fall and empty themſelves into the River of Plate. Wherefore he yielded himſelf into the Power of Captain Martin Loyola, and his Souldiers, in hopes, that when they found him naked, and deprived of all ſubſiſtance, they would take Compaſſion on him, and allow him the ſame Penſion which was given to his Brother Don Diego Sayri Tupac, little ſuſpecting that they would kill him, or do him any harm, ſince he was guilty of no Crime. The Spaniards in this manner ſeizing on the Inca, and on all the Indian Men and Women, who were in Company with him, amongſt which was his Wife, two Sons, and a Daughter, returned with them in Triumph to Cozco; to which place the Vice-King went, ſo ſoon as he was informed of the impriſonment of this poor Prince.

CHAP. XVII.

Proceſs is made, and an Endictment drawn up againſt the Prince, and againſt the Incas his Kindred of the Blood Royal: As alſo againſt the Sons of Spaniards born of Indian Women, though their Fathers had been the Conquerours of that Empire.

SO ſoon as they ſaw that the Prince was taken, the Attorney General was ordered to draw up a Charge againſt him; which was done according to the Articles before mentioned, accuſing him to have appointed and ordered his Servants, and Vaſſals, to infeſt the Roads, and rob the Spaniſh Merchants, as they paſſed upon their Lawful occaſions, declaring all thoſe his Enemies, who had made any League or Contract with the Incas his Anceſtors, or who lived or inhabited amongſt the Spaniards: And that at ſuch a time, and upon ſuch a day he had entered into an agreement with the Caciques, who were made Lords of Mannors, and Commanders of Indians, by Ancient Grants from his Anceſtors, to riſe in Arms againſt againſt the Spaniards, and to kill as many of them as they were able. In like manner, an Accuſation was brought againſt thoſe who were born in that Country of Indian Mothers, and Fathers who were Spaniards, and Conquerours of that Empire. Alledging againſt them, that they had ſecretly agreed with the Prince Tupac Amaru, and other Incas, to make an Inſurrection in the Kingdom: Being moved thereunto out of a diſcontent, that they who had been born of the Royal Blood of the Incas, whoſe Mothers had been Daughters, or Nieces, or Couſin-Germans to the Incan Family; and whoſe Fathers were Spaniards, and of the firſt Conquerours, who had gained great Fame, and Reputation; were yet ſo little conſidered, that neither on ſcore of the Natural Right of the Mother, nor of the high Deſert and Merit of the Father, any thing was beſtowed upon them; but all was conferred on the Kindred and Relations of the preſent Governours; whilſt they were ſuffered to ſtarve, unleſs they would live on the Alms of Charitable people, or Rob on the High-Way, and ſo come to the Gallows. Moreover it was charged upon the Prince, That he had not diſcountenanced ſuch perſons as theſe, but had received them into his Service, upon promiſe that they would joyn with him, and dye in the defence of his Cauſe. All which being alledged in that Accuſation, which was drawn up againſt the Sons of Spaniards born of Indian Women, they were all apprehended, and as many of them as were of twenty years of Age, and upwards, being capable to bear Arms, then reſiding in Cozco, were clapped into Priſon. Some of them had the Queſtion put to them under the Torment, to extort a Confeſſion from them of that for which they had no Proof, or Evidence before. Amidſt this Mad rage, and Tyrannical proceedings by Impriſonment, and Torture, an Indian Woman, whoſe Son was condemned to the Queſtion upon the Rack, came to the Priſon, and with a loud Voice cryed out, Son, ſince thou art ſentenced to the Torment, ſuffer it bravely like a Man of Honour; accuſe no Man falſely, and God will enable thee to bear it, and reward thee for the Hazards and Labours which thy Father, and his Companions have ſuſtained to make this Country Chriſtian, and engraft the Natives thereof into the Boſom of the Church. You brave Sons of the Conquerours, how excellently have your Fathers been rewarded for gaining this Country, when a Halter is the only Recompence and Inheritance purchaſed for their Children! Theſe and many other things ſhe uttered with a loud Voice, exclaiming like a mad Woman about the Streets, and calling God and the World to examine the Cauſe, and judge thoſe Innocents: And if the Fate of them be determined (ſaid ſhe) and that they muſt dye, let them alſo kill the Mothers, who had the Sin upon them, to bring them forth; and who were ſo culpable as to deny their own Country and Relations, for the ſake of thoſe Conquerours, and joined with them in the Deſign of making this Empire ſubject to the Spaniards: But the Pachacamac, or the great God, hath brought all theſe things juſtly upon the Mothers, who for the ſake of the Spaniards, could ſo eaſily renounce their Inca, their Caciques, and Superiors. And ſince ſhe had paſſed this Sentence upon her ſelf, and in behalf of all the other Women in the ſame State and Condition with her, and had pronounced them all guilty, ſhe deſired that ſhe might be the firſt to ſuffer, and lead the way of Death and puniſhment to all the reſt; which if they were pleaſed to grant unto her, God would reward this good work to them both in this, and in the other World. Theſe paſſionate expreſſions uttered with all the Violence her force would admit, worked greatly upon the Mind of the Vice-King, and diverted him from his intention to put them to death; howſoever they were not acquitted hereby, but procured for them a more lingring ſort of Death, which was Baniſhment into divers remote Parts of the New World, unknown to their Fore-fathers. So ſome of them were ſent into the Kingdom of Chile; and amongſt the reſt, a Son of Pedro del Barco, of whom I formely made mention to have been my School-Fellow, and under the Guardianſhip of my Father. Others of them were ſent to the new Kingdom of Granada, and to divers Iſles of Barlovento, and to Panama, and Nicaragua: Some of them alſo were ſent into Spain, and amongſt them was John Arias Maldonado, the Son of Diego Maldonado the Rich; who remained under Baniſhment in Spain, for the ſpace of ten Years; where I ſaw him, and entertained him twice in my Lodging, at a certain Village within the Bi-Biſhoprick of Cordona, where I then lived, and where he related to me many of thoſe things which are here recounted. After ſo long a time he obtained leave from the Supream Council of the Indies to return to Peru, and had three years given him to diſpatch his Buſineſs there, and remit his effects into Spain, where he was afterwards obliged to live and finiſh his days. Being on his departure, he with his Wife whom he had married at Madrid paſſed by the place where I lived, and deſired me to help him to ſome Furniture for his Houſe, for that he returned to his own Country poor, and in want of all things: I preſently gave him all the Linnen I had, with ſome pieces of Taffaty, which I had made up after the Souldiers faſhion, intending them for Colours, or Enſigns for a Foot Company. The year before I had ſent him to the Court a very good Horſe, which he deſired of me, which together with the other things I gave him might be worth 500 Ducats; which he took ſo kindly, that he ſaid to me, Brother truſt me herein, and when I come to my own Country I will ſend you 2000 pieces of Eight in payment thereof. I do not doubt but he would have been as good as his word, but my ill Fortune croſſed me, for three days after he arrived at Payta (which is juſt on the Frontiers of Peru) he died meerly by an exceſs of joy he conceived to ſee himſelf again in his own Country. Pardon me, Reader, this Digreſſion which I have preſumed to make ſolely out of reſpect, and affection to my School-fellow. All the others died in their Baniſhment, not one of them returning again to his own Country.

CHAP. XVIII.

How all the Incas of the Blood Royal, and thoſe of them born of Spaniſh Fathers and Indian Mothers were baniſhed. The Death and End of them all. The Sentence given againſt the Prince, with his Anſwer thereunto, and how he received Holy Baptiſm.

ALL thoſe Indians who were Males of the Royal Line, and neareſt of the Blood, to the number of thirty ſix perſons, were all baniſhed to the City of Los Reyes; and there commanded to reſide, and not to ſtir from thence without ſpecial Order obtained from the Government: With them alſo the two Sons and a Daughter of that poor Prince were ſent, the eldeſt of which was not above ten years of age. The Incas being come to Rimac, otherwiſe called the City of Los Reyes, the Archbiſhop thereof, named Don Geronimo Loayſa, out of compaſſion to them, took the little Girl home, with intent to educate, or breed her up in his own Family. The others looking on themſelves as Exiles driven out of their Country and Houſes, and put beſides their natural ways of living, took it ſo much to Heart, and bewail'd their condition with ſuch grief, that in little more than the ſpace of two years thirty five of them died, together with the two Sons. But what we may believe contributed likewiſe to their greater Mortality, was the heat and moiſture of the Climate upon the Sea-Coaſt wherein they lived: For as we have ſaid in our Firſt Part of this Hiſtory, That the Air of the Plains is ſo different from that of the Mountains, that thoſe who have been bred in, and accuſtomed to the Hilly Countries, cannot endure the lower Airs, which are made as it were Peſtilential to them by the exceſſive heats and moiſtures of the Sea. This was the end of theſe poor Incas; and as to the three which ſurvived, one of which was my School-fellow, named Don Carlos, the Son of Don Chriſtoval Paulu, of whom we have formerly made mention, the Lords of the Chancery, taking pity of their condition, gave them liberty to return to their Houſes, and to more agreeable Air; but they were ſo far ſpent, and conſumed beyond beyond recovery, that within a year and a half's time all the three dyed. Howſoever the whole Royal Line was not as yet totally extinct; for the ſaid Don Carlos left a Son, who, as we have ſaid in the laſt Chapter of the firſt Part, came into Spain with expectation to receive great Rewards and Preferments, as he was promiſed in Peru; but he died at Alcala de Hennares, about the year 1610, by a Melancholly he conceived to ſee himſelf, upon a quarrel he had with one who was a Knight as he was, of the Order of St. Jago, to be ſhut up within the Walls of a Convent; and afterwards to be removed to another Convent; where, upon more diſcontent for his Impriſonment, he dyed in the ſpace of eight Months. He left a Son of three or four Months old, which was made Legitimate, that it might be rendered thereby capable to inherit, in right of his Father, the ſame favour of his Majeſty, which, by way of Penſion, was aſſigned to him on the Cuſtoms of Seville: But the Child dying in a year afterwards, the Allowance ceaſed: And then was fulfilled the Propheſie, which the Great Huayna Capac made concerning the Blood-Royal, and that Empire.

In the Kingdom of Mexico, though the Kings were very powerful in the times of their Gentiliſme (as Franciſco Lopez de Gomara writes in his general Hiſtory of the Indies) yet no Wrong or Injury was done to them in matter of their due Inheritance, or Right to the Succeſſion; becauſe the Kings being Elective, and choſen by the Grandees, or Great Men, according to their Vertue, or Merit to the Government. There was not the ſame Jealouſy upon any in that Kingdom, as was of the Heirs of Peru, whom Suſpition only brought to Deſtruction, rather than any Faults, or Conſpiracy of their own, as may appear by the Fate of this poor Prince, who was ſentenced to have his Head cut off.

But that his Condemnation might appear with ſome colour of Juſtice, his Crimes were publiſhed by the Common Cryer, namely, That he intended to Rebel; and that he had drawn into the Plot with him ſeveral Indians, who were his Creatures, together with thoſe, who were the Sons of Spaniards born of Indian Mothers, deſigning thereby to deprive and diſpoſſeſs his Catholick Majeſty, King Philip the Second, who was Emperour of the New World, of his Crown and Dignity within the Kingdom of Peru. This Sentence to have his Head cut off, was ſignified to the poor Inca, without telling him the Reaſons, or Cauſes of it. To which he innocently made anſwer, That he knew no Fault he was guilty of, which could merit Death; but in caſe the Vice-King had any Jealouſie of him, or his People; he might eaſily ſecure himſelf from thoſe fears, by ſending him under a ſecure Guard into Spain, where he ſhould be very glad to kiſs the hands of Don Philip, his Lord and Maſter. He farther argued, that it was impoſſible that any ſuch imagination could enter into his Underſtanding; for if his Father with 200000 Souldiers could not overcome 200 Spaniards, whom they had beſieged within the City of Cozco, how then could it be imagined, that he could think to rebel with a ſmall number, againſt ſuch multitudes of Chriſtians, who were now increaſed, and diſperſed over all parts of the Empire. That if he had conceived, or complotted any evil deſign againſt the Spaniards, he would never have ſuffered himſelf to have been taken, but would have fled, and retired from them; but knowing himſelf to be innocent, and without any Guilt, he voluntarily yielded himſelf, and accompanied them, believing that they called him from the Mountains, to confer the ſame Favours and Bounty on him, as they had done on his Brother Don Diego Sayri Tupac. Wherefore he appealed to the King of Caſtile, his Lord, and to the Pachacamac, from this Sentence of the Vice-King, who was not content to deprive him of his Empire, with all the enjoyments therein, unleſs alſo therewith he took away his Life, without any fault, or colour of offence; ſo that now he could welcome Death, which was given him, as the value and price of his Empire: Beſides this, he ſaid many other things, which moved pity in the Hearts of all the ſtanders by, as well Spaniards as Indians, who were inwardly affected with ſuch paſſionate expreſſions.

Upon Notice of this Sentence, the Friers of the City of Cozco flocked to the Priſon, to inſtruct the Prince in the Chriſtian Doctrine, and to perſwade him to be Baptized, after the example of his Brother Don Diego Sayri Tupac, and his Uncle Atahualpa; The Prince readily accepted of the offer to be Baptized, and told told them, that he was glad to obtain the benefit of the Chriſtian Ordinances, upon the Teſtimony and Authority of his Grand-father Huayna Capac, who declared, That the Law which the Chriſtians taught them, was better than their own; and being by Baptiſme received into the Church of Chriſt, he would be called Philip, after the name, as he ſaid, of his Inca, and King, Don Philip of Spain: But this Function was performed with as much Sadneſs and Sorrow, as that of his Brother's was celebrated with Joy and Triumph, as before declared.

Though this Sentence againſt the Prince was publiſhed every where, and that all we have ſaid, and much more appeared, (which we for brevity ſake omit) which might perſwade the World, that the ſame would be executed: yet the Spaniards of the City, as well Seculars as Religious, were of Opinion that the Vice-King would not proceed to an Act ſo unhumane and barbarous, as to kill a poor Prince depoſed, and diſ-inherited of his Empire; which could never be pleaſing and acceptable to King Philip, whoſe Clemency would rather have ordered his Tranſportation into Spain, than paſſed this Condemnation of him to death, which he had never deſerved. But the Vice-King it ſeems was of another Opinion, as we ſhall ſee preſently in the following Chapter.

CHAP. XIX.

The Sentence is executed upon the Prince. The endeavours uſed to prevent it. The Vice-King refuſes to hearken thereunto. With what Courage the Inca received the ſtroak of Death.

THE Vice-King, reſolving to execute his Sentence, which he believed to be for the Safety and Security of the Empire, cauſed a Scaffold to be raiſed in the chief place of the City. This was ſo new and ſtrange a reſolution to all People, that the Gentlemen, Friers, and other grave Perſons were ſo concerned for it, that they met together, and drew up a Petition to the Vice-King, repreſenting to him the Barbarity of the Fact, which would be ſcandalous to the World, and diſapproved by his Majeſty. That it would be much better to ſend him into Spain; for tho' Baniſhment be a lingering Torment, yet it is a token of Clemency, much rather than the Sentence of a ſpeedy Death. A Petition being drawn up to this effect, with deſign to be delivered with all the ſupplication and interceſſion, in behalf of the Prince; the Vice-King, who had his ſpyes abroad, and by them was informed of the Petition which was preparing, with the Subſcription of many hands thereunto, reſolving not to be troubled with ſuch Importunities, gave Order to have the Gates of the Court ſhut, and no Man ſuffered to come to him upon pain of Death: And then immediately he iſſued out a Warrant to have the Inca brought forth, and his Head cut off without farther delay, that ſo the diſturbance of the Town might be appeaſed by a ſpeedy execution; whereas by giving time, a Combuſtion might be raiſed, and the Prince reſcued out of his hands.

Accordingly the poor Prince was brought out of the Priſon, and mounted on a Mule, with his hands tyed, and a Halter about his Neck, with a Cryer before him, publiſhing and declaring, that he was a Rebel and a Traytor againſt the Crown of his Catholick Majeſty. The Prince not underſtanding the Spaniſh Language, aſked of one of the Friers who went with him, what it was that the Cryer ſaid? And when it was told him, that he proclaimed him an Auca, which was a Traytor, againſt the King his Lord; which when he heard, he cauſed the Cryer to be called to him, and deſired him to forbear to publiſh ſuch horrible Lyes, which he knew to be ſo, for that he never committed any act of Treaſon, nor ever had it in his Imaginations, as the World very well knew: But, ſays he, tell them, that they kill me without other cauſe, than only that the Vice-King will have it ſo; and I call God, the Pachacamac of all, to witneſs, that what what I say is nothing but the Truth: After which the Officers of Justice proceeded forward to the place of Execution. As they were entering into the Chief Place, they were met by great numbers of women of all Ages, amongst which were several of the Blood Royal, with the wives and daughters of the Caciques, who lived in places adjacent to the City; all which cryed out with loud Exclamations and cryes, accompanied with a flood of Tears, saying, Wherefore, Inca, do they carry thee to have thy Head cut off? What Crimes, what Treasons hast thou committed to deserve this usage? Desire the Executioner to put us to Death together with thee, who are thine by Blood and Nature, and should be much more contented and happy to accompany thee into the other World, than to live here Slaves and Servants to the Will and Lust of thy Murderers. The noise and outcry was so great, that it was feared lest some insurrection and out-rage should ensue, amongst such a Multitude of People then gathered together; which was so great, that with those who filled the two Places, and the Streets leading thereunto, and who were in Balconies, and looking out at Windows, they could not be counted for less than 300 thousand Souls. This combustion caused the Officers to hasten their way unto the Scaffold; where being come, the Prince walked up the Stairs, with the Friers who assisted at his Death, and followed by the Executioner with his Faulchion or broad Sword drawn in his hand. And now the Indians seeing their Prince just upon the brink of Death, lamented with such groans and out-cries as rent the Air, and filled the place with such noise, that nothing else could be heard: Wherefore the Priests who were discoursing with the Prince, desired him that he would command the People to be silent, whereupon the Inca lifting up his right Arm with the Palm of his hand open, pointed it towards the place from whence the noise came, and then loured it by little and little, until he came to rest it on his right thigh: Which when the Indians observed, their Murmur calmed, and so great a silence ensued, as if there had not been one Soul alive within the whole City. The Spaniards, and the Vice-King, who was then at a Window observing these several passages, wondred much to see the obedience which the Indians in all their passion, shewed to their dying Inca, who received the stroke of death with that undaunted Courage, as the Incas and Indian Nobles did usually shew, when they fell into the hands of their Enemies, and were unhumanely butchered, and cruelly treated by them, as may appear in our History of Florida, and other Wars which were carried on in Chile, and which now the Indian Araucos still wage with the Spaniards, according as they are described in Verse by Poets who write thereof. Of which we have many other examples in Mexico, as well as in Peru, which may serve to demonstrate the Cruelty of the Spaniards, and the Constancy and Bravery of the Incas: Of which I could give many instances in my own time, and of my own knowledge, but I shall let them pass, rather than give offence by this History.

Thus did this poor Prince submit with great Courage to Death, yet Rich and Happy, in that he dyed a Christian; and was much lamented by those Religious Orders, which assisted him at the Hour and in the Agony of his Death, namely those of St. Francis, our Lady of Mercedes, St. Dominick, and Augustine, besides a multitude of other Priests and Clergymen, who bewailed him with much grief and sorrow, and said many Masses for his Soul: Howsoever they were much comforted and edified, to see with what Patience and magnanimity he entered on the Scene of Death, and with what Acts of devotion, like a good Christian, he adored the Images of Christ Our Lord, and of the Virgin his Mother, which the Priests carried before him. Thus did this Inca end his days, who was the lawful Heir to that Empire, being descended by the direct Male-Line from the first Inca Manco Capac; which (as Father Blas Valera saith) had continued 500, or near 600 years. This Compassion and Sorrow was the general sense at that time of all the Country, as well of Spaniards as Indians: And tho' we may believe that the Vice-King might also be in some measure affected with this Passion, yet he might have other Reasons of State, sufficient, if known, to justifie this Action.

The aforesaid Sentence executed on the good Prince, was seconded by the Banishment of his Sons and Kindred, to the City of Los Reyes, and of those who were born of Indian Mothers and Spanish Fathers, into divers parts of the New and Old World, as before related. Which we have anticipated out of its due due place, to make room at the end of this our Work for ſo ſorrowful a Tragedy, which is the ultimate Scene of the ſecond part of theſe our Commentaries. Praiſed be God for all things.

CHAP. XX.

Don Franciſco de Toledo returns to Spain. His Catholick Majeſty gives him a ſevere reprehenſion: His End and Death: As alſo of the Governour Martin Garcia Loyola.

IT is not fit to conclude our Hiſtory with the Death of Don Philip Tupac Amaru alone, and therefore we ſhall accompany it with a ſhort Relation of the Death, and End of the Vice-King Don Franciſco de Toledo: Who after he had compleated the time of his Government, which was very long, and as ſome ſay 16 years, he returned into Spain with great Riches and Proſperity, being reported by common Fame to have brought with him above the value of 500 thouſand pieces of Eight in Gold and Silver: Upon the Reputation of which, he procured admittance into the Court, and expected to be made one of the great Miniſters of State, in reward of the ſpecial Services he had done in cutting off, and extirpating the Royal Line of the Incas, by which a way was made to the Kings of Spain to claim a Right of Inheritance to the Empire of Peru, without other Competitor. He alſo imagined, that he had highly merited of his Majeſty by the many good Laws and Rules he had Eſtabliſhed in thoſe Kingdoms, whereby his Majeſties Revenue was improved, and the Mines of Plate, and Quickſilver, well governed, by the orderly Regulations he had made therein; having ordained and directed that the Indians of ſeveral Provinces, ſhould by their turns come in, and work in thoſe Mines, with the ſame pay for a days labour, as the Spaniards who are Planters in thoſe Countries are by late Laws obliged to pay them for their work. And moreover that the Indians being employed in Gardning, or doing any thing for the pleaſure, or benefit of the Owner, ſhall receive a pay proportionable to the value of the thing: The which Regulations and Rules being many and long, we ſhall omit to rehearſe the particulars of them.

Upon ſuch grounds, and with ſuch expectations as theſe, Don Franciſco de Toledo obtained admittance to the Preſence of King Philip the Second, and to kiſs his Royal Hand: But his Catholick Majeſty having been duly informed of all Matters which had ſucceeded in that Empire, and particularly of the Death of the Inca Tupac Amaru, and of the Baniſhment of his neareſt Relations and Kindred, to a place where they all periſhed, did not ſhew that kind and graciousacceptance of his Perſon, as he expected; but told him in ſhort, That he ſhould go home to his own houſe; for that the King had not ſent him to kill Kings, but to ſerve them: With which Reproof he went home much dejected, and under that Cloud of diſfavour which he never expected. In this diſgrace, (as it is uſual for men who are going down the Hill, to be helpt forward in their way) ſo certain Informers brought an accuſation againſt him: That he ordered the Salaries of his Servants and Officers to be paid in Pieces of Eight, inſtead of Ducats, ſo that for every 40 thouſand Ducats 40 thouſand pieces of Eight were made good, which was an injury and damage to the Royal Treaſury, during the time he aſſiſted in the Government which amounted to the value of 120000 ducats: To make which good, an Order was ſent from the Council of State to lay a Sequeſtration upon all the Gold and Silver he had brought from Peru, and to remain in ſuch manner ſecured, until the account was audited and cleared, how much was owing on that ſcore to the Royal Exchequer: Don Franciſco de Toledo being a man of a haughty Spirit, was not able to reſiſt this ſecond blow of his Majeſties diſfavour, but therewith fell into such a Sadness and Melancholly, as broke his Heart in a few days.

We have only now to relate the End of Captain Martin Garcia Loyola, whom, in reward of having taken the Inca Prisoner, and many other Services which he performed to the Court of Spain, they married to the Infanta, who was Niece to the last Prince, and Daughter to his Brother Sayri Tupac: whereby he came to inherit that Estate which this Princess received from her Father; and for his greater Honour and Advancement, and better Service of his Majesty, he was preferred to be Governour, and Captain General of the Kingdom of Chile, where he had a great party of Horse, with a good force of Spanish Infantry under his Command. It was his Fortune to govern this Kingdom for several years, and some Months, with great Prudence and Discretion, and to the contentment also and satisfaction of his Companions; howsoever he was engaged in continual Labours and Embroyls, caused by the Wars which were waged against the Indians; and which are not yet at an end, in this year 1613, having ever since 1553, when the Indians began first to rebel, been constantly carried on without Truce or Intermission during all that time, as we have intimated before in several Places. Whilst this Governour employed himself in the exercises of War, he went one day (according to his usual custom) to visit the several Forts which were raised on the Frontiers, to curb the Enemy, and keep them from making incursions and depredations on those Indians, who had submitted, and were become Servants to the Spaniards: And having supplyed all those Garrisons with Ammuntion and Provisions, he returned to those Cities within the Kingdom which were setled and in peace: And being without the Limits of the Enemies quarters (as indeed he was) and as he believed out of danger, he dismissed 200 of his Souldiers, (which were then of his Guard,) and dispeeded them away to their respective quarters: Leaving himself only with about thirty Companions, amongst which were several Captains, and old veterane Souldiers, who had served many years in the Wars: And being come into a very pleasant Plain, they pitched their Tents, intending to repose and solace themselves that Night and several Nights afterwards, that they might recover the Sleep they had lost, by their continual watchings; for whilst they were on the Frontiers, taking care to secure the Garrisons, they were so continually allarm'd by the Enemy, that they had not time to Rest, Eat, or Sleep.

The Araucos and Indians of other Provinces, Neighbouring on these who had rebelled, sent their Spies by Night to discover the condition of the Spaniards; and finding them without Centinels, and in all security fast asleep, and as safe as their Enemies could desire, they whistled to each other with Bird-Calls, and gave notice by such kind of barking and howlings which Giacalls or Wolves use in the Night, which were the signals agreed upon amongst them. At these noises great numbers of Indians came flocking together, and with all the silence possible, went softly to the Spaniards Tents, where finding them asleep, and in their Shirts in Bed, they cut the Throats of every one of them; and carrying away with them their Horses, Arms, and all the Spoyl which belonged to the Spaniards.

This was the end of the Governour Martin Garcia Loyola, which was much lamented over all the Kingdom of Chile and Peru; but as often as that Discourse was moved, either amongst Indians or Spaniards, it was confessed, that Providence had so ordered those matters, that the death of the late Inca should in this manner be revenged on the Spaniards by the Hands of his own Vassals. And herein it was more plainly evidenced by an Infatuation which possessed the Minds of such Captains, and Veterane Souldiers practised in the Wars of that Country, who knowing that they were near an Enemy incensed and enraged against them, and thirsting after the Blood of the Spaniards, should yet with so much security compose themselves to a sleep from which they did never afterwards awake.

This Governour Martin Garcia Loyola left one Daughter, which he had by his Wife the Infanta, Daughter of the Prince Don Diego Sayri Tupac, the which Daughter was transported into Spain, and there married to a Gentleman of Quality, called Don John Enriquez de Boria. His Catholick Majesty, besides the Estate which she inherited from her Father in Peru, was pleased

(as they wrote to me from the Court) to confer upon her the Title of Marqueſs de Oropeſa; which is a Colony founded by the Vice-King, Don Franciſco de Toledo, in Peru, and called Oropeſa by him, in memory of his Anceſtors, which he deſired might be continued in the new World; beſides which Title and Favour, I am informed, that a Conſultation hath been held amongſt the Illuſtrious Preſidents and Lords of the Royal Council of Caſtile, and the Indies, at which alſo his Majeſties Confeſſour was preſent, with two other Advocates belonging to the Council of the Indies, to conſider what farther Gratifications could be made, in reward of the many Services which her Father had done, according to his Duty towards his Majeſty, and as a Compenſation for her Patrimonial Inheritance. Towards which (as I am informed) the Relation I have given in the firſt part of theſe Commentaries hath, in ſome manner, contributed: Which if ſo, I ſhall eſteem my ſelf ſufficiently rewarded for the labour and pains I have taken to write this Hiſtory, though no other benefit or ſatisfaction accrues thereby unto my ſelf.

CHAP. XXI.

The Concluſion of this Eighth Book, and laſt of this Hiſtory.

HAving, in the beginning of this Hiſtory, ſhewed the Original of the Incas, who were Kings of Peru, and deſcribed their Increaſe, and Conqueſts, and all their generous Exploits, together with the manner of their Government, both in War and Peace, and thereunto added their Religion and Idolatry practiſed in the times of their Gentiliſme: All which, by the Divine favour and aſſiſtance, we have largely handled in the firſt part theſe Commentaries; by which I have complyed with the duty I owe to my Country and Kindred by my Mothers ſide. In this ſecond part we have at large related all thoſe brave Acts, and gallant Exploits performed by the Spaniards, in the Conqueſt of this rich Empire, in which I have complied (tho' not fully) with the Duty and Obligation I owe to my Father, and to his Illuſtrious and Generous Companions. So that now it may be time to conclude this Work, and put an end to this Labour, with the ultimate Reign and Succeſſion of the Incas, who, with that unhappy Huaſcar, were 13 in number, who poſſeſſed the Throne of that Empire, until the Invaſion of the Spaniards. But as to the other five, which ſucceeded afterwards, that is Manco Inca, and his two Sons Don Diego, and Don Philippe, and his two Nephews, we do not inſert them in the Line of Kings, for tho' they had a right to the Inheritance, yet they never had poſſeſſion of the Government; but if we ſhould reckon them in that number, we might then account 18, who deſcended by the direct Male-line from the firſt Inca Manco Capac, to the laſt of thoſe Children, whoſe Names I do not know. The Indians do not reckon Atahualpa in the number of their Kings, being, as they call him, an Anca, that is a Traytor.

Tho' in the laſt Chapter of the firſt Part of theſe Commentaries, we have given an account of all the Sons, which in an oblique Line deſcended from the ſeveral Kings; of which (as we have there affirmed) a true, and an authentick Liſt was ſent me; with Power and Authority directed to Don Melchior Carlos, Don Alonſo de Meſa, and my ſelf, that we jointly, or any one of us, ſhould lay it before his Catholick Majeſty, and before his Supream and Royal Council of the Indies; to the intent and purpoſe, that they might be freed from thoſe Taxes and Impoſitions which they ſuſtained: Which Papers and Memorials, as they came directed unto me, I diſpatched to the ſaid Don Melchior Carlos, and Don Alonſo de Meſa. But the ſaid Don Melchior, having Pretenſions of his own, would not weaken his own Intereſt, by giving Countenance to their demands; nor would he preſent their Papers, that it might not be known thereby, how many of the Royal Line were ſtill ſurviving; fearing leſt his Intereſt ſhould be divided, vided, and the benefit which he expected to himself alone, might be imparted unto them all together: So at the Concluſion of all, he neither did good to them, nor to himſelf. I have thought fit, for my own Diſcharge, to give a Narrative hereof, that my Relations of thoſe parts, may not accuſe me either of unkindneſs, or negligence, in not performing what they have deſired of me, and entruſted me in. I ſhould have been very glad, if I could have performed this Service for them with the hazard of my Life; but it was impoſſible for me, to have done any thing in this matter; not being able to contribute more thereunto, than only by writing this Hiſtory, in which I hope I have as well done Juſtice, and Right to the Spaniards, who have Conquered this Empire, as to the Incas, who were tho true Lords, and Poſſeſſors of it.

To the Divine Majeſty, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, three Perſons and one true God, be Praiſe for Ever and Ever, who have been pleaſed to grant me Grace, and aſſiſtance, to arrive at the Ultimate End and Concluſion of this Hiſtory. May it be to the Honour and Glory of his Divine Name: By whoſe infinite mercy, through the Blood and Merits of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and by the Interceſſion of the ever Bleſſed Virgin Mary, and of all the Court of Heaven, I beg Favour, and Protection, now, and in the Hour of Death. Amen ſweet Jeſus, a hundred thouſand times Jeſus. Amen.

Praiſed be God.
